THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, LIONEL LORD CRANFIELD, EARLE OF MIDDLESEX, Lord High Treasurer of England, and Master of his Maiesties Court of Wardes and Liueries.

THE treasures of Emperors themselues in their stil-preserued Actions, Counsailes and Liues (transcending farre their transitory treasures) In all Humility I present to your Lordshippes preseruation and protection; as proper, and peculiarly due to the Honors of your Office and Title, for the most apt correspondency of your Iudiciall habilities, to husband and dispose as well the Treasures of Counsailes and Actions, as of Offices and Reuenues. Of all these Imperiall Liues (my truely honoured Lord) most of the first Edition I haue only weeded, ordered, and amplified: The last six are the fruits of mine owne Labours. Three of the first I haue cast into new Mouldes: And the later I haue faithfully collected according to the most Authenticall and Impartiall-reputed Authours now extant, together with the confident relations of such as haue been eye-witnesses of some of the late Accidents, here offered as a Sacrifice to Immortall Memory. Notwithstanding which sufficient acquitall (and discharge from blame) of my well-intended Industries, I can no more assure nor promise their Approbations, then all other ingenuous and laborious Treasurers of example and vertue; though therein they cannot but be commended for cordiall restoratiues, to redouble Liues, if not to eternize them. But, in these moderne times, Endeuours that profit not, receiue acceptances that please not. Yet such was the Bounty and Nobility of all our antient Presidents of Times, that whosoeuer committed, to the Monuments of writings, eyther the prayses of Cities or singular Men, were euer adorned with Crowns, or Honours.

But in these degenerate yeers of ours; As many other excellent and ornamentall Merits: so these, especially, are left vtterly prayseleſſe and exolete. For ſince men ceaſe to doe praiſe-worthy deeds; To be prayſed, likewiſe they thinke thriftleſſe and idle. Notwithſtanding, what Preſents more precious can poſsibly bee giuen to Men, then Prayſe, Glorie, and Eternitie? All which I intentionally and effectually preſent and aſcribe, with all Worthineſſe, to your Lordſhippe, in entitling them to you, in theſe ſupreameſt Perſonages. For, Whoſoeuer protects and maintaines Vertue and Nobilitie, muſt neceſſarily be himſelfe both Vertuous and Noble. To the Protection therefore of all the Vertue and Nobility herein made ſacred to Eternitie, I only ſelect and inuoke your Honour, in theſe my humble Dedications; Abiding euer

Your good Lordſhippes moſt

THE LIFE OF IVLIVS CAESAR,

FOVNDER OF THE EMPIRE AND MONARCHIE OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

IVlius Cæsar was of a Noble Fawily; and, returning to Rome from the Prætorship in Spain with great renown, entred into friendship with Marcus Crassus & Gneius Pompey, who were the mightiest Citizens in Rome: and, pacifying the controuersie between them, he obtained the Consulship: which he executed with such grauity and reputation, that his fellow-Consul would not endure to be with him, but liued retired. Afterwards, giuing his daughter Iulia in mariage to Pompey, hee went into France; which he subdued, and ouercame the Germains. Hee went afterwards also into Britannie, and by force subdued it to the Romen Empire. Iulia afterwards dying, and Marcus Crassus being slain by the Parthians, mortall discord grew between Cæsar and Pompey: the occasion whereof was, for that the second fiue yeers of Cæsars gouernment of France being expired, it was propounded by Pompeyes faction, that a successor should be sent him: and Cæsar desired, that hie command in the French Wars might be prolonged, and that in his absence he might demand the Consulship: which beeing denied him, hee made another proposition, that he would giue ouer his army in France, vpon condition that Pompey should do the like by his in Spain. Which being also denied, and being enioyned to leaue his army, he passed the Riuer Rubicon (limits assigned him which he was not to passe) and, taking the city of Ariminum, he went with such fury directly to Rome, as Pompey abandoned Italie; and he, following him, in the end ouerthrew him in Pharsalia. Whereupon Pompey, for refuge repairing to Ptolomey King of Egypt, was in a small Bark, by that Kings direction, slain by the hands of Septimius and Achilla: whose head being (by Ptolomy's command) presented to Cæsar, he wept. Afterwards, bending his force against Ptolomy, and ouercoming him, he passed into Egypt, and tamed the pride of the Egyptians. Thence he went into Africa, pursuing the remainder of Pompeyes faction; all which he ouercame: and Cato being in Vtica, vnwilling to fall into Cæsars hands, slue himself. Cæsar, returning to Rome, triumphed: and afterwards going into Spain (after a most cruell battell, wherein he was in danger to haue been lost) hee ouerthrew Sextus Pompeius, eldest son of the great Pompey: and, returning to Rome, hee took vpon him the Dictatorship. Where, finally, Decius, Marcus Brutus, Gaius Cassius, Gaius Casca, Attilius Cimber, Quintus Ligarius, Marcus Spurius, Cornelius Cinna, with many other principall Romans, conspiring against him, he was slain in the Senat, being of the age of 56 yeers, vpon the fifteenth day of March, with 23 woundes; many prodigious signes of his death appearing both before and afterwards: which hindred his passage against the Parthians, and many other high designes, which he resolued to haue vndertaken.

BEing to write the liues of the Roman Emperours, which held the Monarchie of the world; or, to speak more properly, to reduce them into a brief Compendium (a work in truth of waight and troublesome, requiring an actiue spirit, and a more eloquent pen than mine) I hould it no small difficulty to begin with IVLIVS CÆSAR, of whom I am first to treat. Who although he were but Dictator, and not stiled Emperour, in that sense of Lord and Soueraign, as his Successors afterwards held it; yet he was the fore-runner, and made the way to this Monarchie: and all succeeding Emperours haue held it a glory to be called CÆSARS after his name. His exploits were such and so many, and Histories are so fraught with them, that I hould it as great a difficulty to relate them briefly, as to write them confusedly. Wherefore, out of so large and copious a field, I will onely collect that which I shall hould fittest fitteſt for the Subject of this Work; yet handling it with conuenient breuity: notwithſtanding (he being the baſis and foundation of this ſtately Building) it wil be needfull I ſhould extend my ſelf much more in this, than in the reſt which ſhall follow. As for his other braue atchieuements, I will refer the Reader to thoſe many books which make honourable mention of CÆSAR, and to the content which is generally conceiued of his vertues and worthy endeauours.

His greateſt exploit.

Among all the glorious actions of IVLIVS CÆSAR, the greateſt in my opinion, and which breeds moſt admiration, is, how he durſt project, then put it in practice, and laſtly bring it to effect, to make himſelf Lord of the Roman State (the which was Lady and Miſtreſſe of the greateſt and moſt habitable part of the world) and of all that ſhee had ſubdued during the ſpace of 700 yeers: for, ſo long it was from the firſt foundation of Rome, vntill that IVLIVS CÆSAR ſeized vpon the gouernment of the Common-weal: whereof there were 240 yeers vnder the abſolute command of Kings, and the reſt vnder the gouernment of Conſuls, who were choſen by the people; except ſome few yeers, in which the Tribunes and Decemuiri bare the ſway. Doubtleſſe, a ſhort time to raiſe and get ſo great an Empire as the Romans had obtained; when as CÆSAR, of a free State, made it ſubiect to the command of One; whoſe Empire without doubt exceeded all others both for continuance, extent and power: the which is confirmed by many approued Writers. Wherefore, omitting all other Kingdoms and Common-weals, wch are not to bee paralleld with this, I will make mention onely of the greateſt and moſt famous which at the firſt were called Monarchies; namely, the Aſſyrians, Perſians and Macedonians: all which the Roman Empire did far exceed. As for the Aſſyrians and Babylonians, which is the moſt antient of all Monarchies, during the ſpace of 1240 yeers (for, ſo long it continued, according to the computation of Saint AVGVSTINE) it neuer extended it ſelf out of the bounds of Aſia, nor had any footing in Affrick or Europe. Neither were the Medes more powerfull: of which Kingdome ARBATVS was the firſt Founder; by the ruine and death of SARDANAPALVS King of the Aſſyrians, ouerthrowing the firſt Monarchie. Then the Perſians extinguiſhed the Medes by the powerfull hand of CYRVS; and this ſhall bee accounted the ſecond Monarchie: who although they made ſome irruption into Europe (as that of XERXES and others) and in Aſia grew more powerfull than thoſe which had gone before, yet it continued not aboue 200 and odde yeers; and they were ruined, with DARIVS their King, by ALEXANDER, the Great, King of Macedon. We cannot deny, but that his Empire was of a greater extent than any of the aboue-named: for, he had vnder his obedience a great part of Europe, and hee ſubdued in a manner all Aſia: and this is held for the third Monarchie; but it was like a flaſh of lightning, burning all it encounters, and is ſoon extinct: for, with the death of ALEXANDER, his power decaied. Then grew factions, and diuerſe Kingdoms were erected; ſo as it is apparant, that the Roman Empire exceeded them all both in time, greatnes and power. In time, being not much leſſe than 1300 yeers ſince Rome was built, and yet the name of the Roman Empire continueth vnto this day. For the ſpace of 1300 yeers it ſtill increaſed, and hath euer ſince been held the moſt predominant power of all others. In extent of dominions & power; for, it is moſt certain, that, vniting whatſoeuer the others held, it will ſcarce equall the one half of the Roman Empire. For, laying aſide whatſoeuer the Emperours did adde vnto it, before that IVLIVS CÆSAR did ſeize vpon the State, they had ſubdued the beſt part of the world. In Europe they were Maſters of all Italie, and Gallia Ciſalpina or Lombardie, Auſtria and Illiricum, now called Sclauonia; and they extended themſelues as farre as the riuer of Danubius: they had ſubdued all Greece (ſome yeelding voluntarily; others, by force) the States of Athens, Lacedemon, Thebes, Corinth, and all Peloponeſus, now called Morea, with their Territories; the Kingdoms of Macedon, & Epirus now Albania, and in like maner Thracia. They held the Ilands of Sicilie, Sardynia, Crete or Candie, Cypres, Rhodes, Eubœa, now Negropont, with many other Ilands in the Mediterranean Sea. They alſo ſubdued Spain (but with more difficulty and oppoſition than any of the reſt) and in like manner all France, with that part of Germanie which lies on this ſide the Rhine, called the Lower, or Gallia Belgica, which was the work of CÆSAR himſelf; and in like maner that of Britannie, vnder which are comprehended England and Scotland. They were Maſters of all Affrick (which is the third part of the world) that is to ſay, of the fruitfulleſt and moſt habitable parts, hauing ruined proud Carthage. In Aſia they had ſubdued the greateſt and beſt Prouinces, and made them their Subiects and Tributaries: among the which were Syria called Soria, Phœnicia, Paleſtina, Iudæa, Phrygia, Caria, Cilicia, and Bithinia by the laſt will and teſtament of King NICOMEDES. The Kings of Egypt and Cappadocia were their friends and confederates; and they had a commanding power in Armenia, Colchos, and other Prouinces. Albania, Iberia, Iberia, and ſome other Countries, did them homage, and paied them tribute: which Countries had been vanquiſhed by them, and many Kings and valiant Captains ſlain. Finally, they were Lords of ſo many Cities and Prouinces, as it were an endleſſe labour to ſet them down in particular; and their power was ſo great, as no forces but their owne were able to annoy them. But afterwards, diſcord and ambition creeping into this State which was ſo free and powerfull, what forren force could not effect, they wrought with their owne Arms, and triumphed ouer themſelues. The cauſe of all this grew through the diſcord between POMPEY and IVLIVS CÆSAR, which two were at that time the moſt eminent and powerfull men in Rome; and yet at the ſame Inſtant there were other Citizens of great eſteem. But, the root of this hatred grew from a further cauſe, that is, from the factions and ciuill war between SCILLA and MARIVS: in which, MARIVS being ſlain, SCILLA made himſelf Dictator, and ſeized vpon Rome; yet before his death hee gaue it ouer, and left the City at liberty. POMPEY had followed SCILLAS faction, and done braue exploits for him: but CÆSAR had ſided with MARIVS, being his kinſman, and at that time very young. This was the ſeed from whence ſprung the ciuill war between them. But, it ſhall be needfull to relate ſome former matters, for the better vnderſtanding of the occaſions which went before, and the ſucceſs which followed; the which wee will deſcribe briefly after this manner: The warre and power of SCILLA being ended, GNEIVS POMPEIVS and MARCVS CRASSVS (who had alſo followed that partie) remaining in great reputation, the one ſought to ſupplant the other, ſo as there grew ſome jarrs between them, which began during the life of SCILLA. CRASSVS grew very powerfull: for, beſides his Wiſdome, Nobility and Eloquence, he was very rich beyond all the other Citizens of his time. POMPEY alſo became famous and much eſteemed, beſides the ſucceſſion he had by SCILLA, for his great victories and valiant exploits in Arms performed in SCILLAS time and ſince, both by ſea and land, in Affrick, Spain and Aſia; the which are ſo many and ſo great, as I dare not relate them. The deeds of theſe two eminent Perſons being growne to this height, and their quarrels increaſing daily as the heads of factions (and yet at the ſame time there were others of great note within the City, as CATO, CICERO, LENTVLVS, and others) during theſe alterations, IVLIVS CÆSAR returned to Rome from his Prætorſhip in Spain with great reputation, yet his ambitious thoughts aimed at greater matters, both in regard of the greatnes of his houſe (for, by the fathers ſide, hee was of a Noble and very antient Family; and by the mother hee deſcended from the Kings of Rome, who were extracted from ÆNEAS of Troy) and for his many allies and friends; being alſo very witty and eloquent. He had alſo purchaſed great credit and authority in the managing of thoſe charges which had been committed vnto him. He had bin Queſtor in Spain, Tribune of the ſouldiers, Ædile, high-prieſt and Pretor; hauing gotten victories in Spain againſt the Inhabitants of Galitia and Portugal; adding to all this, his merits and vertues, being bountifull, wiſe and learned in all good Arts, moſt actiue in the managing of Arms both on foot and horſe-back; very valiant and ſtrong, whereof he made great proofs before he had any command in the wars of Aſia, vnder the Pretor MARCVS TERMO, and SERVILIVS the Proconſul; where hee obtained a Ciuicall Crowne. He was, moreouer, of a good conſtitution of body, tall of ſtature, fair, ſtrong of his members, and very patient of labour. For all which conſiderations and many others, hee was in great eſteem; but neither by his authority nor place able to equall MARCVS CRASSVS or POMPEY, for that the roots of their greatnes had been of long continuance.

CÆSAR being comn to Rome, with a ſecret intent to make himſelf greater than either of them; CRASSVS and POMPEY affected his friendſhip, by whoſe help they might ſupplant one another. But CÆSAR, being diſcreet and wiſe, would not follow any party, nor tie himſelf to defend their actions; but, carrying himſelf indifferently, he laboured to reconcile them; hauing a conceit, that, if he carried himſelf as a Neuter, they would both yeeld vnto his will: and this his cunning practice (as PLVTARCH reports) was onely diſcouered by M. CATO. In the end, by his endeauours a peace was concluded betweene them, beeing both bound vnto him: yet, being ſtill jealous one of another, and fearing to loſe CÆSAR, they both ſought to gratifie him: and in this ſort he made himſelf equall to either of them; and that power which two had formerly vſurped, was now diuided between three; and in the end wee ſhall ſee who got the ſole command. This league and attonement beeing made, CÆSAR demanded the Conſulſhip, which is the greateſt ordinary dignity. He carried himſelf in this charge with ſuch reputation, as his fellow Conſul BIBVLVS neuer accompani'd him, but kept himſelf retired during his Conſulſhip. and to attain to the greatnes whereunto he aspired, he himself took to wife CALPHVRNIA, the daughter of LVCIVS PISO, who was to succeed him in the Consulare; and hee gaue IVLIA his daughter in mariage to POMPEY, rejecting her former spouse SERVILIVS CEPIO, by whose help he had a little before croft his Collegue BIBVLVS. CÆSARS consulship being ended, these three Confederates being equally greedy of honour, they easily made a match to inuade the Common-weal. CÆSAR made choise of Gaul or France for his Prouince; CRASSVS, of Asia; and POMPEY, of Spain: whither they went with three puissant Armies. And thus the whole world was to be held by three Princes in partnership. The exploits of CÆSAR in his Prouince, what battels he fought, what victories he won, what cities and people he subdued, what stratagems, policy and valour he vsed (this warre continuing little lesse than ten yeers) I cannot relate, my meaning being to obserue breuity. He left excellent Commentaries of his owne deeds, and full of truth; the which were approued by his very enemies, and much commended by CICERO. Yet ASINIVS POLLIO (enuying CÆSARS vertues) doth in some things tax him. They are also written by PLVTARCH, SVETONIVS, APPIANVS, ALEXANDRINVS, LVCAN, PAVLVS OROSIVS, LVCIVS FLORVS, EVTROPIVS, and many other: to whom I refer the Reader. CÆSAR got such reputation in this war, as he was held the greatest Captain of his time, yea, or of those that were in former Ages. He subdued all France, from the Pyrene Mountains vnto the Alps, and all the remainder vnto the riuer of Rhine. Hee first vanquished the Suissers and Tigurins, who (as PLVTARCH affirms) were 300000 men, whereof 190000 were well trained vp in Arms. He conquered the Germains, with ARIOVISTVS their Leader, who had inuaded France, from whence he expelled them. He subdued the Belgii, the Ambiani and Neruij, with other warlike people of France, and he spilt more bloud than euer was in any wars in the world. Then, passing the Rhine vpon a bridge of wood which he built, he subdued the Germains to the Roman Empire; and, finding no more opposition there, hee past with his Army into Brittanie, which was inhabited by a fierce Nation, not till that time knowne by any traffick or commerce: these hee forced to subject themselues to the Roman State. During the continuance of these warres, in which CÆSAR got great spoils and wealth, he neuer left to purchase to himself friends, both in Rome and in all other places, both by letters and gifts, and in like manner with the Kings and Cities of Asia, Greece, and other Countries; sending them aids of men, without any leaue or authority from the Senate: the which he might safely do, as long as the league continued betwixt him, POMPEY and CRASSVS. He won men vnto him, and was much beloued of his souldiers, giuing these double pay, and bestowing honours vpon others: by which means (POMPEY not foreseeing it) he grew to such power and reputation, as he began to fear him when he was not able to suppresse him. But now that strict league of friendship, which had been betwixt these two, began to dissolue, for that the pawn which maintained it was taken away; so as there grew a mutuall fear & jealousie betwixt them; first, by the death of IVLIA, CÆSARS daughter, who marrying to POMPEY entertained concord between the son and the father-in-law, by the league of nuptiall loue; secondly, by the death of MARCVS CRASSVS, the third man in this company, who was slain by the Parthians in Asia, whither he went to make war (as some write) more to heap vp riches, than to win honour; whose reputation notwithstanding was a support to their good agreement. So as the chief causes, wherupon their friendship was grounded, being taken away, their emulation presently brake forth. POMPEY was jealous of CÆSARS greatnes; and CÆSAR hardly endured POMPEY's supereminency: the one brookt no equall; the other, no superiour. Whereupon they fell to warre, which was the greatest and most generall that euer was: for, in it there were engaged the Senate, all the Roman Legions, all their friends and subjects, Kings and Cities, for the one or the other partie. On the one side were eleuen Legions, on the other eighteen; all Roman and Italian souldiers, with all the forces of Rome, besides the aids of their confederates. This war was managed in Italie, France, Spain, Epirus, Thessalie, Egypt, Asia and Affrick, by themselues or their Lieutenants; and in the end, after fiue yeers, it died in Spain. Some Authors set down the causes of this ciuill war, although they vary in some points: but the truth is, the chief reasons were enuy, ambition, and desire of command, wherewith they were both infected: and the one jealous of the others greatnes (as if the Roman Empire had not been sufficient for them two) the one sought to ruine the other. That POMPEY had any intent to vsurp the State, and become a Tyrant, it doth not appear: but it is apparant, he would not haue CÆSAR attain to that dignity wherein he was. Of CÆSAR some write, that being forced through fear he came to Arms, lest he should see himself called in que-question, and condemned: for, CATO had threatned to accuse him whensoeuer hee should giue-ouer his Prouince. Others object, that he had alwaies a desire to vsurp the State; and therfore, balancing his power with POMPEY's, he thought it behooueful to entertain friendship and contract an alliance with him. CICERO saith, that he had alwaies in his mouth that verse of EVRIPIDES, that If it were lawfull to infringe the lawes, it was for a Kingdome; and that CÆSAR, being greedy of command, could not endure to be without an Army: but, in my opinion, the reasons were such as haue been related; and these, the occasions.

This being the last of the second fiue yeers of CÆSARS gouernment in France, LENTVLVS and MARCELLVS being Consuls, and of POMPEY's faction; it was propounded in the Senate, to send a Successor to CÆSAR, and that hee should giue-ouer his gouernment and the Army; and if he would (as he had written) demand the Consulship, he should com to Rome in person. CÆSAR demanded, that his command in the war might be prolonged, and the gouernment which he had, and that he might demand the Consulate being absent, before he gaue-ouer his Armie; which honor ten Tribunes had formerly granted him, with POMPEY's good liking. But now POMPEY would not yeeld vnto it, as being against the lawes, which did not allow any man to demand the Consulship but present; forgetting, that he had been made Consul before he came to lawfull age, and had attained to other dignities, contrary to the ordinarie course of law. But it is the common condition of men, To blame that in another which they allow in themselues.

Lawes for demanding the consulship.

This being denied to CÆSAR, he made another propositon; that hee would leaue his Army, and come to Rome as a priuate man, so as POMPEY would giue-ouer his which he held in Spain. This was put to the question, and did cause a great distraction in the Senate. CICERO interposed himself, labouring to reconcile them, and to conclude their jars with peace. POMPEY would haue been tractable, had not those of his faction, being of the prime men of Rome, stood proudly vpon tearms; who (notwithstanding any just and reasonable conditions propounded by CÆSAR) were inflexible. It was therefore decreed in Senate, that CÆSAR, by a certain time prefixed, should leaue his Army, and that hee should not passe it ouer the riuer of Rubicon, which did bound in his Prouince; declaring him an enemy to the Roman State if he did otherwise. LVCIVS ANTONIVS and QVINTVS CVRIO, Tribunes of the people, fauouring CÆSAR, opposed themselues to this decree: but they were disgraced, ill-intreated, and thrust out of the Senate. Whereupon, they fled out of Rome, and went to CÆSAR: the which was a great help to him to win the hearts of his souldiers, for that the office of the Tribunes was held sacred and inuiolable.

A decree of the Senat against Cæsar.

CÆSAR hearing how matters had past, seeing himself depriued of all future hope of peace, he marcht speedily from Rauenna, onely with 5000 foot, and 300 horse, commanding his Legions to follow presently after, and to joyn with him. Comming afterwards to Rubicon (which if he should passe, there would be no hope of peace remaining) some say that he staid there a good space; considering with himself, of what importance this passage was, and what miseries would ensue. PLVTARCH writes, that he discoursed thereof with ASINIVS POLLIO, and other his friends which did accompany him. APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS reports, that hee vsed these words, Doubtlesse, if I forbear to passe this riuer, it will be the beginning of my ruine; if I passe it, the ruine will be generall. And SVETONIVS writes, that turning towards the riuer, he said, It is yet in our power to turn back; but, passing the riuer, wee must make our way with our weapons. He writes, moreouer, that CÆSAR standing thus doubtfull and irresolute, he was animated by the apparition of a man of an extraordinary stature & shape, sitting neer vnto his Army, piping vpon a reed. Besides the shepheards and heardsmen, many souldiers left their guards, and went down to hear him, and with them some Trumpetters; so as hee caught hould of one of their trumpets, and leapt forth to the riuer, beginning with a mighty blast to sound the battell, and so went on his pase to the bank on the other side. Then, with a furious resolution, CÆSAR cried out, Let vs go whither the gods, and the injurious dealings of our enemies, do call vs: The dice are cast. I haue set vp my Rest, come what will of it. After which words, he set spurs to his horse, and past the riuer, the whole Army following him. In this manner he resolued: which was the beginning of the ciuill wars, and of Romes seruitude, and the first step to a Monarchy and the soueraigne command of one, as I will briefly set it down.

Cæsars words when he past Rubicon.

Whoso desires to haue a full view of this History, let him read APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS, SVETONIVS, PLVTARCH in the liues of CÆSAR, CATO, and CICERO; Saint AVGVSTINE lib. 3. de ciuit. Dei, IVLIVS CÆSAR himself in his Commentaries, LVCIVS FLO-

CAESAR hauing past the riuer, and drawn his whole Army together, where (as SVETONIVS writes) the Tribunes of the Commons came vnto him, in base and dishonourable garments, with the which they had fledde from Rome; there hee made an excellent Oration to his souldiers; shedding some tears, and rearing his garment down the breſt, laying before them the equity of his cause, and craving their helps and assistance. To whom hauing with a generall applause and consent made answer, that they were ready to obey his will, he parted presently, and the next day came to Ariminum, whereon he seized: the like hee did to all the Towns and Castles where he past. DOMITIVS, who in a factious tumult had been nominated his Successour in Gaul, held Corfinium with a garrison of 30 Cohorts: which being taken, he pardoned the souldiers and inhabitants, and intreated DOMITIVS kindly, giuing him leaue to depart (who went presently to POMPEY) which was an act of a Noble and generous minde: the which, CAESAR obserued in all his victories during the ciuill war; by which clemency he purchased to himself as great honour, as by his victories.

The beginning of the ciuill war.

CAESARS resolution being knowne at Rome, it troubled POMPEY, amazed the Senat, and terrified the common people; and it would bee tedious to relate what prouisions they made. POMPEY was much deceiued, for that hee could not beleeue that CAESAR would thrust himself into so great a danger, or that hee should bee able to raise sufficient forces to resist him: but the succeſs proued otherwise. For, notwithstanding that he had authority from the Consuls and Senate to leuie souldiers, to call home the legions, and to send Captains for the defense of diuerse cities of Italie whereas CAESAR should passe, yet all this was not sufficient to resist CAESARS fury, and the power he brought with him. The fame of his coming increasing daily, POMPEY with the whole Senat abandoned Rome, going to Capua, and from thence to Brundusium, a sea-town vpon the confines of Italie, seated at the mouth of the gulf of Venice: where he gaue order, the Consuls should passe to Dirrachium, now called Durrazzo, a sea-town of Macedonie (whereof a great part is now called Albania) to vnite all their forces; beeing out of hope to be able to resist CAESAR in Italie, who had already taken Corfinium, as I haue formerly said: where, hauing drawn DOMITIVS Cohorts to serue him, hee marcht on; and, hearing that POMPEY and the Consuls were together at Brundusium, he went towards them with his Legions with all the speed hee could. But POMPEY had fortified himself sufficiently to make defense; yet vpon CAESARS approach, beginning to inuest the Town, he imbarkt himself in the night time, and so past ouer to Dirrachium, where the Consuls attended him. And thus CAESAR remained in Italie without resistance; being very doubtfull what to resolue: for, although he would gladly haue followed POMPEY, yet he had no prouision of ships: and, by reason that it was winter, shipping could not come so soon as was requisite; and considering withall, how much it imported, not to leaue any enemy behinde him, which might cause any alteration in France or Italie by his absence, he resolued to deferre the pursuit of POMPEY, and to take his way towards Spain, which held for POMPEY: where he had his best legions, and two captains, PETREIVS and AFRANIVS. SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS saith, that when hee had thus resolued, he said to his friends, Let vs first go against an Army which is without a Captain; and afterwards let vs return against the Captain that hath neuer an Army: for, the souldiers that POMPEY had in Spain were valiant, and had been long trained vp in Arms; but their Commanders, PETREIVS and AFRANIVS, were not held for politick or expert in the wars. And, on the contrary, POMPEY was most wise, and a very valiant Captain: but the souldiers which he had with him were newly leuied, and of small experience.

Pompey's error, presuming too much of himself.

Cæsar forced on Rome and all Italie.

Returning from Brundusium, in sixty daies, without bloudshed or battell, CAESAR becam Lord of all Italie; and coming to Rome, they were in very great fear, remembring the cruelties committed in the time of SYLLA: But CAESAR, vsing his accustomed clemency, did hurt no man of any degree, high or lowe; but called to the Senate those Senators which remained, and which came with him, comforting euery one with milde and good words, and laying the whole fault vpon POMPEY, in accusing him of all things which had hapned, and of this discord. He sought by all means to justifie his owne cause, and declared how much he did then and euer had desired peace, and therewith requested that Embassadors might be sent to POMPEY to procure the same; and, causing himself to be presently chosen Consul, he opened the Roman Treasury, notwithstanding that METELLVS, one of the Tribunes of the people, was desirous and went about to hinder the same. The treasure which he took from thence he diuided among his his souldiers: which, as PLINIE in his three and thirtith Book reports, was very great; the which LVCAN also affirmeth. These things being ended, and CAESAR desirous to go from Rome into Spain (like a wise and discreet Captain) first took order aswell for the ciuill gouernment, as for the wars; and, making choice of the legions which were to go with him, hee left part of his troops in Brundusium and Otranto, and in other strong places vpon the Sea side, to keep POMPEY from landing if he sought to return into Italie. He also nominated HORTENSIVS and DOLABELLA for his Captains, to make prouision of shipping to be brought to the port of Brundusium, there to bee in a readineſse against his return from his journey. QVINTVS VALERIVS hee sent with a legion to Sardinia against MARCVS COTTA, which held the same for POMPEY. To Sicilia he sent CVRIVS against MARCVS CATO, with direction, that hauing taken the same, hee should passe ouer into Africa. LEPIDVS hee left in Rome, as Prefect thereof; and MARCVS ANTONIVS, for Gouernor of all Italie: and, determining to leaue LICINIVS CRASSVS in France, with his accustomed celerity he went on his journy, and found no resistance, neither in Italie, nor in France, but onely at Marſelles, which held for POMPEY: who (in my opinion) more like bould and aduenturous friends, than wise men, would not receiue nor lodge him in their city, but put themselues in Arms against him for their defense. CAESAR coming thither beſieged the City; and, to auoid losse of time, left DECIVS BRVTVS and CAIVS TREBONIVS with sufficient forces, who continued the siege, and endured much: he himself followed his way into Spain, where his coming was alreadie knowne; and AFRANIVS and PETREIVS attended him, with the aid of their friends, and foure Roman legions; between which and CAESAR the warres continued many daies, and chiefly neer the city of Lerida. In the beginning, CAESAR was in great danger and much distressed, aswell through want of victuals, as by reason of the winter being com, which annoyed him with the swelling of riuers: before and after which, there passed many great skirmishes and conflicts between the two Armies, and other accidents and aduentures too long to bee recounted. Finally, CAESAR knew how to make war in such sort, as, without giuing them oportunity to come to a battell, he brought his aduersaries to such extremity and distresse, as perishing with hunger they came to a composition; which was, that to the legions (who now were able neither to offend nor defend) should be granted liberty to depart & to go whither they would: which was performed accordingly; and PETREIVS and AFRANIVS went to POMPEY: and part of the legions, which would not abide with CAESAR, had leaue to do as they listed; CAESAR still perseuering in his clemency and mildnes.

Cæsars going into Spain against Petreius and Afranius.

This war being ended, and the spring come (not to leaue any thing in Spain to be subdued) he passed forwards, and came into the prouince of Betica, now called Andaluzia, with part of his forces, leauing commandement with the Armie to march whither hee had appointed, and there to stay for him, because that MARCVS VARRO, being POMPEY'S Lieutenant in that prouince, held it for him, with one legion of good souldiers: but not daring to oppose himself against CAESAR, he peaceably yeelded vp vnto him both the countrey and the legion; and so all was pacified, and at his command. Thence hee went to Cordoua, where hee called a parliament, and an assembly of all the estates of that prouince: wherein, among other things which there were treated of, he highly commending the Cordouefes and Seuillians which had taken his part (as himself writeth) marched forwards, and visiting the prouince he came to the Isle and city of Cales; and, prouiding there certain necessaries, hee took the shippes and gallies which MARCVS VARRO had there in a readineſse, and such other as hee could get, and embarked himself. And, leauing QVINTVS CASSIVS with foure legions in that prouince, he took his passage by sea to Tarragona, sending commandement by land to his legions to march thither: where hauing in few daies taken order for that prouince, hee departed with his Army towards Narbona, and from thence to Marſelles: which yeelded vnto him, hauing in the siege and assaults endured many calamities. CAESAR, nothing respecting the small regard and ingratitude of that city, but the antiquity and fame therof, would not permit any violence to be offred to the citizens & inhabitants; but, leauing a sufficient garrison to guard the same, he commanded his legions by appointed iournies to march towards Italie: himself, with a necessary guard for his person, and others in his company, took passage for Rome; all things succeeding prosperously with him, although that some of his Captains had ill succeſſe. For, CAIVS ANTONIVS, whom (we said) he left with DOLABELLA for Captain of his Nauie, was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner in the gulf of Venice by OCTAVIVS, POMPEY'S Lieutenant. At this ouerthrowe there was an Act don worthy to be recommended with honour to posterity. ANTHONIE

Cæsar subdued all Spain.

The taking of Marſelles, and Cæsars return to Rome.

NIE was constrained to ship his souldiers in long boats for want of seruiceable ships; the which were taken by a stratagem as in a toil, by the Pompeians, who tied ropes vnder the water. One of them, which carried almost a thousand Opitergins, young men and valiant, was intangled in this snare, and was assaulted by the power of the whole Armie, they making resistance from morning vntill night: but, in the end being oppresst by the multitudes of their enemies, and seeing no means to escape by their valour, by the incouragement of VVLTEIVS their Colonel they slue one another. And DOLABELLA was likewise ouercome neer to the Ile of Cocyra, now called Corfu; and CVRIO, who (according to CÆSARS commandement) went into Africa with two legions, hauing in the beginning good successe, was afterwards ouerthrown, and the most part of his people slain by POMPEY's friend, IVBA King of Mauritania, which is now the Kingdom of Fes: hee might haue fled away, but shame perswaded him to dy with that Armie which his rathnes had cast away.

CÆSAR being comn to Rome, and made Dictator (as PLVTARCH and APPIANVS testifie) new Consuls were chosen; and he, being one of them, deposed himself from his Dictatorship, and so, changing and prouiding Pretors for the prouinces at his pleasure, sending MARCVS LEPIDVS into Spain, and AVLVS ALBINVS into Sicilia, SEXTVS PEDVCEIVS into Sardinia, and DECIVS BRVTVS into France, and taking such further order as he thought good, he departed from Rome in the moneth of December towards Brundusium: whither hee commanded all his Forces to march, there to take passage for Macedonia, the greatest part whereof (as I said) is now called Albania; where he knew that POMPEY staid with his Armie. Who, all one whole yeer, which CÆSAR spent in his journey into Spain, busied himself in prouiding a Nauie to return into Italie, and in gathering treasure, and in leuying souldiers for that purpose, and had made ready a wonderfull great prouision of all things. For, there came vnto him ships, mony and men, from many kingdoms, prouinces and cities of Asia and Græcia, from Syria, Pontus, Bithynia, Cilicia, Phœnicia, Cappadocia, Pamphilia, Armenia the lesse, Egypt, Græcia, Thessalia, Boëtia, Achaia, Epire, Athens, Lacedemonia, and the Iles of Creta, Rhodes, and many other parts and countries: there came also to his aid, in person, the Kings, DEIOTARVS and ARIOBARZANES. Of which people, and of those which he brought with him from Italie, POMPEY had drawne together a great Armie by land, and an exceeding great number of ships and gallies by sea; which I do not set down, by reason of the diuersity of opinions between Authors touching the number of his souldiers and of CÆSARS: for certain, they were very mighty Armies, but the greatest number were of POMPEY's side. Who imagining (because that it was in the hart of winter) that CÆSAR should not be able, nor haue time, commodiously to passe the seas; and hauing (as indeed he had) aduertisement that CÆSAR was in Rome, he diuided and lodged his people in Macedonia and Thessalia, retiring himself from the sea, commanding and charging his Captains by sea (of which, MARCVS BIBVLVS was chiefe) that they should guard and defend the coast. But CÆSAR knowing, that in the speedy execution consisted the principall point of his victory, and that occasion once let slip is seldome recouered; being departed from Rome, and arriued at Brundusium (as we haue before said) notwithstanding that all his legions were not yet come, yet he embarked aboord those ships which hee had there in readinesse, so many as they could contain, which were seuen legions of his choise men (as he himself recordeth) and sent commandement to those which were comming, to make haste, to the end they should join with the rest which there remained, whom he would speedily send for. And so hee departed from Brundusium, now called Brindez, in the beginning of Ianuarie: and, crossing the seas with prosperous weather, the third day after, he arriued vpon the coast of Macedonia, before that POMPEY, had any intelligence of his embarking; and, setting his people on shore in the despite of POMPEY's Captains, hee commanded the ships and gallies presently to returne to Brundusium to fetch the rest of his Armie which hee had there left and commanded to come. And the wars beginning, hee presently seized vpon the cities of Apollonia, which is now called Bellona, and Erico; driuing from thence LVCIVS TORQVATVS and LVCIVS STRABERIVS, which held the same for POMPEY: who as soon as he was aduertised of CÆSAR'S landing, with the greatest speed possible sending for his troops (such as were neerest hand) hee marched towards Dirrachium, where lay all his victuall, munition, and prouision for the warres; doubting that CÆSAR would come to surprise the same, as in truth he did; but in vain: for, the situation thereof made it inexpugnable.

POMPEY being come, their Camps were lodged within few forlongs one of the other, a riuer running between them: there passed many aduentures, skirmishes, and also some treaties of peace,

Cæsars passage to Græcia against Pompey

Cæsar and Pompey lodge

peace which CÆSAR offred; the which were not accepted by POMPEY, so much he assured himself of his power: and CÆSAR daily expecting the coming of his other legions, who staied longer than he thought they ought to haue done, without the which he thought it no wisdome to come to a battell, beeing much grieued, and very carefull for the same, hee resolued in person, with three confident seruants onely, secretly to embark himself in a Brigandine, and to passe that streight of the sea to fetch them, thinking to bee able to perform the same without the knowledge of any. And, putting it in execution accordingly, he passed down the riuer to the sea, which he found so troubled and tempestuous, as the Master of the Brigandine (not knowing whom he carried) nor daring to passe any further, would haue returned. Then CÆSAR, discouering his face, as it is reported, said, Be not afraid, Friend: for, thou carriest with thee CÆSAR and all his fortune. The Master, heerwith encouraged, striued to hould on his voyage: but, at length, the force of the tempest was so great, and the winde so contrary, that (notwithstanding CÆSARS courageous words) they were constrained to return, vnable to passe anie further forwards. Which being vnderstood in his Armie, they much wondred, grieued, and murmured thereat; praising him more for a valiant Knight, than a wise Captain: and so VALERIVS MAXIMVS recounts it for a rash aduenture; which, in my opinion, was the occasion why IVLIVS CÆSAR records it not in his Commentaries.

neer vnto Dyrrachium.

The rash aduenture of Cæsar.

This being past, within fewe daies after, ANTONIVS arriued with foure of those legions which were left behinde in Italie, presently returning the ships back again for the rest: and (after some aduentures which hapned) joyning with CÆSARS Armie, and all things set in good order (and the like being done on POMPEY's side) there passed some things between them, which for breuity I omit, vntill that neer to the city of Dyrrachium (whither CÆSAR went, with a determination to haue surprised the same, and POMPEY to relieue it) the two Armies lodged themselues the one so neer the other, as there were daily skirmishes and slaughters of men of either partie; and that one day the skirmish waxing hot, and rescues coming from either Armie, it came to a battell: wherein the successe was such, that CÆSARS troops began to flee, and could not bee made to stand by any intreaties or threats, till they came to their camp which they had fortified; and yet some abandoned the same, and durst not defend it. But POMPEY, either for that (as some think) hee imagined their flight to bee fained, and that there was some deceit or ambush, or that he supposed there was no more to be done, and that CÆSAR had been ouerthrowne with small toil, so as he should bee no more able to recouer himself, did not prosecute the victorie, neither followed the charge, but rather caused a retreit to bee sounded, without assailing his enemies camp. Whither when CÆSAR came, he took such order as was most conuenient, being no lesse courageous and politick in time of aduersity, than of prosperity: and it is reported that he said to his friends, Truely, this day had ended our warres, if our enemies had had a Captain which had knowne how to haue ouercome. This day, IVLIVS CÆSAR lost a great number of his souldiers, amongst which were foure hundred Romane Knights, ten Tribunes, and two and thirty Centurions; and his enemies took from him two and thirty Ensignes. This battell ended, POMPEY sent the newes thereof to diuerse parts of the world, houlding himself for absolutely victorious: And IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing blamed some of his Captains and Ensigne-bearers (notwithstanding that his whole Armie grieued, and were ashamed of their late loss) again desired the battell; yet he would not then fight, his Armie being timorous, against those which were in-heart & victorious, but rather took a new course: and, sending his sick and hurt men to the city of Apollonia, hee departed by night, with the greatest silence that could be, from the place where he was, and took his way towards Thessalia, with intent to refresh and encourage his Armie, and to draw his enemie further from the sea-coast, where his chief force lay, and where his camp was fortified and victualled; or, at the least, to go to meet and ouerthrowe SCIPIO, who (as hee was aduertised) came to join with POMPEY.

A battell betwixt Cæsar and Pompey neer to Dyrrachium.

Pompey's victory.

POMPEY, seeing CÆSARS departure, after that hee had followed him some fewe dayes, took counsell, and (as APPIANVS testifieth) was determined (leauing so sufficient a Nauie at sea, as CÆSAR should not be able to make any benefit thereof) to passe into Italie, and to recouer the same, with France and Spain, and then afterwards to return against CÆSAR: but, beeimportuned and ouer-ruled by the Roman Lords which came with him, he altered his determination, and presently departed to pursue CÆSAR, who made a stay in the fields of Pharsalia, which are in Thessalia (making his retreit with such discretion and in so good order, as in all occasions that were offred he had euer the better) vntill that at length, seeing his men full of resolution, force and courage, he resolued no longer to forbear the Fight; and therefore cared not any any more to refuse the battell, but rather daily presented the same to POMPEY. Who knowing (as indeed it was true) that CÆSAR began to want victuals, and that his Armie began to weaken and diminish, he deferred the same, and would not fight; and, as a wise and well-experimented Captain, would haue prolonged the war, defeating his enemie without putting his own Armie in hazard: and although that POMPEY had thus resolued, yet the opinions, murmurings, and importunity of those which were with him preuailed so much (as LVCAN, PLVTARCH, and CÆSAR himself, report) that they made him yeeld to giue battell, euen contrary to his owne opinion and will: wherein joined, of the one side and the other, all the flower and force of Rome. And although that CÆSARS Forces were fewer in number (for, all Writers affirm, that POMPEY'S Armie was twice as great) yet his men were more actiue, and better trained. How many there were of the one side and the other, I cannot certifie; the Authors doo so much differ among themselues therein. APPIANVS setteth down the diuerse opinions which are held thereof. Some raise the number to three hundred thousand men, whereof LVCIVS FLORVS was one; others, to threescore and ten thousand: and some set down somewhat lesse, among which is PLVTARCH; who saith, that POMPEY brought to this battell 45000 men, whereof 7000 were on horseback; and IVLIVS CÆSAR, two & twenty thousand Foot, and of horse fewe more than one thousand. But APPIANVS vnderstandeth, that this lesser number of these Armies was to be vnderstood of Romans onely, who were the force and hope of both these Generals: for, it is not likely, that of all nations there should be so small a number in a war so long prepensed, and of such importance: and, in my opinion, this is most likely to be true. But, howsoeuer it was, this battell was between the best captains and best souldiers, aswell for experience, as for force and valour, that euer were in the world; and yet being so, it was not much fought, neither did it long continue. So strange and variable are the aduentures which happen in wars and battels: for, where there seemeth to be the greatest force and assurance, oftentimes is found the greatest weakness; and that which is least feared, doth sometimes annoy most. Before the battell there were many signes of an eminent downfall; The running away of beasts appointed for the sacrifice, swarms of Bees, the sky darkned in the day time, POMPEY'S fearfull dream ouer night of mourning in his Theatre at Rome; and in the morning early he was seen in the head of his main battell in a black Robe.

Ominous signes before the battell

Either of these two great Commanders, hauing resolued to giue battell, ordered his battalions and squadrons as to him seemed most expedient, making speeches and orations to animate their souldiers; and, the accustomed signe being giuen, the battell presently beganne on either side: In the beginning whereof, POMPEY'S horse-men (wherein he reposed his greatest hope) who were all of the Roman Nobility, and of the Order of Knighthood, and who alwaies had the better; began to come where CÆSAR'S Cauallery was, and forced them to forsake the Field. Which, CÆSAR perceiuing (losing nothing by ouerfight) he made a signe to a battalion, which for that purpose he had left a-part from the other squadrons, to charge POMPEY'S Cauallery: who charged them with such fury, wounding them (according to CÆSAR'S direction) no where but in the face; that POMPEY'S horse-men either vnable or vnwilling to endure it, began to retire, in such sort, as from that part whence POMPEY thought to haue obtained the victory, from thence sprang the beginning of his ouerthrowe. For, notwithstanding that they had broken the first squadron, and were entred into the second, and the other battalious continued still fighting, and that they maintained the same with great resolution; yet, seeing that POMPEY'S Cauallery fled, and that CÆSAR'S came to charge them afresh, they all did the like; in such manner, as in short space the victory plainly appeared for CÆSAR: and POMPEY, hauing lost all hope to preuail, fled to his camp, leauing the field and victory to his enemy. Happy had POMPEY been in this misery, if he had runne the same fortune with his slaughtered Armie: but he out-liued his owne glory, that with dishonour he might flee for life through Thessalie, be chased from Larissa, and vpon a forlorn rock of Cilicia studie whether to flee; to Parthia, Affrick, or Egypt: Finally, that vpon the Pelusian shoar, by the command of a most vnworthie treacherous King, by the councell of gelded men, he should be murdered by the sword of SEPTIMIVS his Fugitiue, in the view of his sorrowfull wife and children. CÆSAR, letting slip no occasion, seeing that hee found no resistance in the field, assembled his Forces to assaile POMPEY'S camp, which with small difficulty hee entred: which POMPEY perceiuing, leaning his ensignes and robes of Generall, and putting on other apparell, vpon the first horse that he could get, with foure on horse-back onely that accompanied him, which (as VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS saith) were his son SEXTVS POMPEIVS, and the two LENTVLI, and FA-

FAVONIVS of the Pretorian order: he fled so fast as he could, as you haue heard; and neuer staied vntill he came to the citie of Larissa; where ioyning with some thirtie other horse, which had fled, without any stay he continued his flight, vntill he came vnto the shore-side of the Ægean sea; where, finding a certaine Merchants ship of Rome, he embarked himselfe therein, and sailed to the Isle of Lesbos, which is in that sea which now is called Archipelago, to the citie of Mytilene in that Iland: For, in that citie were his wife and familie, which he tooke with him: and, gathering together such ships and men as he was able, he departed from thence very doubtfull, and not able to resolue whither to go. Some counselled him to sail into Africa, for that King IVBA was his friend, and very mighty. Others were of opinion, that hee should retire himself to the Parthians. Finally, he resolued to go into Egypt, for the friendship which hee held with King PTOLOMY, father of that PTOLOMY then raigning; and did so. Hauing first touched in the prouince of Cilicia in Asia, and in the Ile of Cyprus, sailing into Egypt, and arriuing at the city of Alexandria, he had such an end as we will presently declare.

Pompey's flight.

IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing obtained so great a victory, as is aforesaid, vsed therein his accustomed clemency, not suffering any Romane to be either slaine or hurt after the battaile was ended, and pardoning all those which were taken therein, or found in the Campe; among which was MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO. And although that in the battaile were slaine of POMPEIES side fifteen thousand men, and of the Conquerors lesse then two thousand, as CÆSAR himselfe writeth: yet vnderstanding which way POMPEY fled, to the end to giue him no place or meanes to returne and repaire himselfe; without losing any time, he pursued him with the lightest and swiftest of his Army. And comming to the Sea side, bringing to his obedience in his way all the Cities whereby he passed, and gathering together such Ships and Gallies as hee then could, together with those which CASSIVS had, who was at this time receiued to his grace and seruice, he therein shipped such troupes as he was able, and passed into Asia the lesse; where being aduertised that POMPEY had been in Cyprus, he presumed that he tooke his way towards Egypt. For which cause he tooke the same course, taking with him two whole legions of old souldiers only; and arriuing in safety at Alexandria in Egypt (where we said that POMPEY had lately taken port) he vnderstood that POMPEY was arriued, there: who presuming of the benefits and good entertainment which this King PTOLOMIES father had receiued in his house, he sent to request PTOLOMY to harbour and assist him. But as with men which are fallen from a high fortune, few men hold faith and friendship; and in their aduersities, the benefits and good turnes receiued are commonly forgotten: so this King sent him his promise to perform what he required: and comming vpon safe conduct, in a small boat towards the shore, hee was murdered before he came to land by the Kings commandement, by the hands of one called SEPTIMIVS, and another ACHILA; thinking by meanes hereof to winne CÆSARS friendship. This was done by the perswasion and counsell of FOTINVS an Eunuch, who was of great authority in the Court, and by whom the King was much ruled. He vnderstood also that CORNELIA, POMPEIES wife, and his sonne SEXTVS POMPEIVS were fled from that port in the same ship, wherein they came. CÆSAR being landed and receiued into the City, they presently brought him for a present, the great POMPEIES head; which hee would not see: and his ring and seale of Armes being presented vnto him, he wept for pity, considering the end and successe of the great aduentures and prosperities of POMPEY, who with such honour and fame had three times triumphed, and bin so many times Consul in Rome, and had gouerned the same, and had been the most eminent man there for so many yeers, and had in like sort obtained many victories and dignities.

The death of Pompey.

Cæsar wept for the death of Pompey.

When IVLIVS CÆSAR landed in Egypt, he found the countrey infested with ciuill wars, and great discord between yong King PTOLOMY and his sister, the fair CLEOPATRA, about the diuision and inheritance of that Kingdome: wherein IVLIVS CÆSAR (as a Roman Consul) took vpon him to intermeddle. For which cause (as CÆSAR himself writeth) or because that their guilty conscience, for the treacherous murder of POMPEY, made them to fear, as PLVTARCH affirmes; the before-named FOTINVS which had been the practiser of this murder, and ACHILA who had been the actor thereof (both which were in great authority in Court and with the King) imagining that CÆSAR inclined to fauour CLEOPATRA'S faction, sent for the Armie which the King had neer the city, consisting of 20000 good men, purposing to do by IVLIVS CÆSAR as they had done by POMPEY: and so within few daies there beganne between CÆSAR and the small forces which he brought with him, both within the city and in the harbour, between the ships and gallies, the most cruell war and inincounters that he euer had; which I cannot distinctly set down, for the many aduentures that passed. But let this suffice, that IVLIVS CÆSAR fought therein many times in his owne person, both within the city (whereof his enemies held the greatest part) and also in the harbour with his ships; and was sometimes in such perill and danger, as he was driuen to leap out of the boat wherein hee was, into the water, and by swimming to flee into one of his gallies: and, as SVETONIVS writes, he carried his Commentaries in the one hand out of the water, lest they should bee wet; and his Robe in his teeth, to the end it should not fall into his enemies hands. But at length his forces and aid being comn from Asia and other parts, he at the end of nine moneths (for, so long lasted these wars) remained victorious, as in all others hee had been; and the yong King PTOLOMY was slain in Fight. In this warre CÆSAR did such exploits, and shewed such valour and wisdome, that for the same onely hee did well deserue the fame and renowm of a most excellent Captain.

The death of Ptolomy King of Egypt.

CÆSAR hauing tamed the pride of the Egyptians, and put to death the murtherers of POMPEY, and established CLEOPATRA for Queen and Gouernesse in that Kingdome, whom during his staie there he entertained for his friend, and she conceiued and had a sonne by him, called CÆSARIO; all things being quietly settled, he departed from Egypt towards Asia, trauelling through Syria, now Soria, by reason that he was giuen to vnderstand, that while he was busied in the warres of Egypt, King PHARNACES, sonne of the mighty King MITHRIDATES, thought it now a fit time (seeing the ciuill discord between the Romans) to recouer that which his father had lost: and hauing ouerthrowne DOMITIVS, whom CÆSAR had sent to gouern those parts, and also hauing taken by force of Arms the prouinces of Bithynia and Cappadocia, expelling thence King ARIOBARZANES, a friend and subiect to Rome, and beginning to do the like in Armenia the lesse, which King DEIOTARVS had made subject to the Romans: IVLIVS CÆSAR coming with his Armie sooner than King PHARNACES imagined, although hee had expected him, and had intelligence of his approach; within fewe daies they came to a battell: in which (without any great resistance) the King was ouerthrowne and put to flight, with great slaughter of his people, from which hee escaped by flight. Great was the joy CÆSAR conceiued of this victory, for the desire he had to return to Rome, where he knew that many scandals and insolencies were committed, by reason of his absence: he knew also, that POMPEY's eldest son had seized on a great part of Spain, and had raised great forces of those which M. VARRO had there left, and of his fathers troops. Hee also vnderstood, that in Africa many principall Romans, which had escaped from the battell at Pharsalia, were gathered together, whereof M. CATO (called VTICENSIS, because that in Vtica he slue himself) was the chief, and SCIPIO, POMPEY's father-in-law; and that these went thither with a great part of the gallies and ships of POMPEY's Nauie, and with the greatest power they were able to leuie; joyning with IVBA King of Mauritania, they had subdued all that countrey, and had a great Armie in readinesse against CÆSAR, hauing chosen SCIPIO for their Generall, because that CATO would not take that charge vpon him, and for that the name of SCIPIO was very fortunate in Africa. CÆSAR, hauing intelligence of all these things, within fewe daies, with great celerity and diligence, recouered all that which PHARNACES had vsurped: and, chasing him out of Pontus, he recouered all those countries: and leauing CELIVS MINVCIVS for Generall, with two legions to guard that prouince, pacifying the contentions and controuersies in the rest, rewarding the Kings & Tetrarchs which had continued firm in league and amity with Rome; without any longer aboad he departed from Asia, and in short space passing into Italie, came to Rome: within little more than a yeer after that, he departed from thence; a short time in truth, for the performance of so great matters and so long a journey.

Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, had a sonne by Cæsar.

Cæsars victory against Pharnaces King of Pontus.

Within few daies after his comming to Rome, he made himselfe to be chosen the third time Consul, and reforming (the best that he could in so short a time) all disorders in Rome, being grieued and not able to endure that his enemies should possesse Africa, with great expedition he prepared all things necessary, and from Rome tooke his way thitherward, commanding his forces to follow him. First he went into Sicilia, and there shipped himselfe, and thence passed into Africa: and notwithstanding that neither his Naule nor Armie arriued with him; trusting in the valour and goodnesse of his souldiers, and his owne good fortune, he tooke land with those small forces which he brought with him, neere vnto the citie of Adrumentum in Africa; and from thence marched to another citie called Leptis, where he was receiued: and after some conflicts which passed, his legions being come, and certaine troopes both on foote and horseback; he began the warre, which lasted foure moneths, viz. from the beginning of Ianuarie till till the end of Aprill, beginning first against PETREIVS and LABIENVS: afterwards it was continued against SCIPIO and King IVBA; which assisted the contrary faction with 8000. men, the one halfe whereof were horsemen, whereof the prouince of Africa did then, and to this day doth abound; among all which were leuied against CÆSAR eight legions of footemen and 20000. horse. In this warre were many encounters, skirmishes and battailes, which HYRCIVS in his Commentaries, PLVTARCH, LVCAN, LVCIVS FLORVS & others write of at large, in which CÆSAR was in great danger: but at the last with his force and good fortune, he ouercame them all in a great battaile; wherein, of the enemies, were slaine 10000. men, and CÆSAR remained master of the field, and in few daies after of all the Countrie. SCIPIO and all the principall Captaines which were his aduersaries, died sundrie deaths within few daies; and king IVBA by slight escaping from the battaile, and finding no place of refuge, in despaire, he and AFRANIVS determined to die fighting; the one against the other, till they were both slain, in which combat King IVBA being of greater strength then AFRANIVS, slew him; and afterwards commanded a slaue of his own, to kill himself, and so he died desperately.

The good MARCVS CATO who was in the citie of Vtica, knowing that CÆSAR marched thitherwards, and although he knew that he would not put him to death, but had rather a desire to pardon him, and to doe him honor; yet to the end that he would receiue neither life nor honor from his enemie, he slue himselfe: in whose death passed many notable accidents recorded by many authors both christian and heathen. CICERO did write in commendation of the death of CATO, against the which CÆSAR did write another discourse: both which are lost. And FLORVS writes his death after this manner; Hearing of the decease of his partners, hee dallyed not at all, but (as it became a wise man) did ioyfully hasten his owne death: for after he had imbraced his sonne and friends and bid them good night; he rested a while vpon his bed, hauing perused PLATOES booke of the immortalitie of the Soule; then about the first reliening of the watch, he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe into the bodie: After which the Physitians sought to wrong this resolute man, by applying some salues, the which he endured vntill they were out of the roome; but then he pulled them away: and, the blood following abundantly, he left his dying hand in the very wound. SCIPIO, who had been Generall in this warre, escaped from the battaile by slight, and shipping himselfe in certaine galleyes, wherein he fled, was met withall by CÆSARS nauie; who, to the end hee would not be taken, giuing himselfe some wounds, cast himselfe into the sea, and so was drowned. CÆSAR, hauing obtained so great and absolute a victory, spending some fewe dayes in ordering the prouinces of Africa, reducing the kingdome of king IVBA into a prouince, hee came to the citie of Vtica, where he imbarked himselfe the third of Iune, and came to the Isle of Sardinia, wherein he stayed some few dayes, and arriued at Rome the fiue and twentith day of Iuly. At his comming (as SVETONIVS, APPIANVS, and PLVTARCH record) there were granted vnto him foure triumphs. The first triumph was for his conquest and victories in France, where were set the portraitures of the riuers of Rodanus and the Rhine, wrought in gold: and in the second triumph of Egypt, and of King PTOLOMEY, were set the riuer of Nilus and the Pharus of Alexandria burning. The third triumph was of the prouince of Pontus and of King PHARNACES, wherein for the speede wherewith he prosecuted the victorie, was placed a briefe writing which signified as much; which was, veni, vidi, vici, which is to say, I came, I saw, I ouercame. The fourth triumph was of the prouince of Africa, wherein was placed King IVBA his sonne, as a captiue: and in this triumph (as SVETONIVS writeth) were giuen iewels and armes to OCTAVIVS, CÆSARS Nephew, who afterwards was Emperor, as we will declare, notwithstanding that he was not present in those warres by reason of his yong age: for he was not then fully sixteene yeares old. As for the battaile which CÆSAR wanne against POMPEY, he would not triumph for it, because it was against Citizens of Rome.

Cæsar would not triumph for his victorie against Pompey.

These triumphs being ended, giuing great rewards to his souldiers, and entertayning the Romane people, with feasts, gifts and other great bountie, hee caused himselfe to be chosen the fourth time Consul, and to the end that there should be no place in the world wherein he would not be obeyed, he resolued to goe into Spaine, where he vnderstood that GNEVS POMPEIVS (POMPEIVS sonne) with the remainder of the armie which had escaped out of Africa, was gone to ioyne with his brother SEXTVS POMPEIVS, who already was there, as I haue said, and was in possession of a great part of Spaine, with the cities of Seuill and Cordoua, and many others in that coast, and many Spaniards were come to their ayde. CÆSAR, departing, carried with him his most experienced and chosen souldiers, and made so good speede, as within few dayes he arriued in Spaine, and in this iourney (as SVETONIVS and VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS recorde) his Nephew OCTAVIVS followed him.

Cæsars going into Spaine against Pompy's sonnes.

CÆSAR, being entred Spaine, came into the prouince of Betica, which is Andaluzia, where SEXTVS POMPEIVS and his brother GNEIVS POMPEIVS were with such legions and souldiers as they had gathered together; and so there began betweene them a cruell and bloudie warre. The end whereof was, that neere to the citie of Munda, CÆSAR and GNEIVS POMPEIVS (for SEXTVS POMPEIVS was in Cordoua) ioyned battaile; which was one of the most obstinate and cruell, that euer was in the world. For CÆSAR being the most excellent Captaine, and the souldiers which he brought with him, the most valiant and accustomed to ouercome; the resolution and courage of POMPEY and his men was such, and they fought in such manner, as CÆSARS esquadrons began to giue ground and were ready to forsake the field, and at the very point to haue been wholly ouerthrowne: And the matter came to this issue, that (as SVETONIVS and EVTROPIVS do write) CÆSAR was about to haue killed himselfe, because he would not see himselfe ouercome; and that he took a target from one of his souldiers and rushed in among his enemies, saying with a loud voice (as PLVTARCH reporteth) If you be not ashamed, leaue me and deliuer me into the hands of these boyes: for this shall be the last day of my life and of your honour. With which words, and his example, his souldiers took heart in such manner, that, recouering the ground which they had lost, the battell becam equal, which (as APPIANVS affirmeth) lasted the most part of one whole day, without any signe of victory; sometimes seeming to incline to one partie, and sometimes to the other, vntill that at length CÆSAR and his men did so great exploits, as the euening being come his enemies became faint, and began to flee, and the victory was apparantly CÆSARS. There died of his enemies aboue 30000 men in this fight: and of CÆSARS part, were slaine a thousand men of account, besides many other of lesser note. CÆSAR esteemed this victorie so much, and so gloried in the danger wherein he had been, that after the victorie he vsed to say, that only that day he fought for his life, and in all other battailes euer for honor and victorie. He then remayning master of the field, his aduersarie POMPEY, who in nothing had failed of the office of a valiant and good captaine (after that he saw no other hope) escaped by flight, and wandring through many places was afterwards taken and slaine by CÆSARS friends, whose head was brought vnto him; the like hapned vnto LABIENVS. His second brother SEXTVS POMPEIVS fled form Cordoua, & in the end forsook Spain: hereafter more mention shall be made of him. I. CÆSAR recouered the cities of Seuill and Cordoua, & all the rest; and disposing of all things in Spaine at his pleasure, returned to Rome, & entred in triumph for the warres in Spaine, which was his fift and last triumph: in this place LVC. FLORVS and PATERCVLVS speak of all his triumphs.

Cæsars cruell battaile and victorie against Pompeies sons.

Cæsars triumph for his victories in Spaine.

CÆSAR came to be the most mightie, the most redoubted, and most highly esteemed man that euer had been in the world, hauing subdued and conquered the greatest part thereof, with an Armie and by force, in as little time, as it might seeme that another man might be able to trauail those countries by reasonable iourneys. All which being in subiection vnto him, he made himselfe perpetuall Dictator of Rome; and so without contradiction he finished the making of himselfe soueraigne Lord and Monarch of the Romane Empire, within little lesse then fiue yeeres after that he began the same. And this was the originall and beginning of the Romane Emperours: for IVLIVS CÆSAR would not be called King (for the name of King was odious to the Romans aboue all things, euer since the Kings were chased from Rome) but contented himselfe to be called perpetuall Dictator and also Emperor; although not with a name of such power and dignitie as his successors haue done since; but as by a name wch signified he had been a conqueror in the warres, which in this sense was giuen to the Romane Captaines, when they had obtained any notable victorie: but after IVLIVS CÆSAR, all his successors took that name, glorying to be called Emperors, which was held for the highest title and dignitie in the world.

The beginning of the Romane Empire.

The originall of the name of Emperor.

IVLIVS CÆSAR hauing attained to that absolute power which he so much desired, he shewed in all things great clemency and magnanimitie, honouring and rewarding his friends, and easily forgiuing, and very cheerefully pardoning all those which had been his aduersaries; and so he not only pardoned BRVTVS and CASSIVS, CICERO, MARCELLVS, and many others: but also some of them he admitted to his companie and priuate familiaritie, and to offices and dignities. It is certaine that among all the many vertues wherewith CÆSAR was endued, his clemencie and liberalitie were most glorious. But this sufficed not to quench the desire of their lost libertie, neither to asswage the hatred and malice conceiued against him by his aduersaries, as in time did appeare.

The clemency and bountie of Cæsar.

And

And notwithstanding that many were grieued: yet some for the loue which they bare him; others for feare and dissimulation; the Senate and people of Rome, and finally all, gaue him names, preheminencies and titles of honour, such as neuer had been giuen to any other; neither ought he to haue accepted the same, as PLVTARCH, APPIAN and others doe report: But CÆSARS minde and ambition was such, and his thoughts so eleuated and so high; as he held nothing so great, but he was worthie thereof and had deserued the same: and so he not only accepted that which they offered him; but many more were offered, because they knew that he desired the same. Whereupon they gaue him the name of Emperour, Father, restorer and preserver of his countrey: He was created perpetuall Dictator, and Consul for ten yeeres, and perpetuall Censor of their customes. His statue and image was erected among the Kings of Rome, and a chayre and throne of Iuorie in the Temples and Senate, and a high pulpit and throne in the Theatre, and in the place where the Senators did vse to sit, his pictures and statues were set vp in all the Temples and publike places. I passe ouer some titles which they gaue him, and he accepted, which only, to those whom they held for God, ought to haue been attributed. The moneth which they called Quintil, they called IVLIVS after his name, as March of their god MARS, and Iune after the goddesse IVNO: they did also consecrate and build Temples vnto him, as vnto IVPITER, and their other gods: and gaue him certaine honours which they held particularly for their gods, which they call Thensas: and so they did many other things to his honour, which exceeded all measure.

The names and high titles which were giuen to Cæsar.

IVLIVS CÆSAR enioying such honour and power, so as he had no equall or second in the world with whom he might contend; it seemeth that he would contend with himselfe, and attempt something wherein he might excell himselfe: for he was not contented with all the victories which he had obtained, neither (as PLINIE, SOLINVS and other report) to haue fought in fiftie seuerall battailes (in all which he ouercame) sauing in that one at Dyrrachium against POMPEY; where, as we haue alreadie said, he was not wholly ouerthrowne, neither (according to the same authors) to haue slaine in the warres and battailes which hee fought, a million, ninetie and odde thousand men; and yet they say that they reckon not those which died in the ciuill warres: but that as he was of a most haughtie minde, he sought to doe greater matters, if greater might be. For, first he resolued to passe into the East, there to conquer and subdue the fierce nation of the Parthians, and to reuenge the death of MARCVS CRASSVS, and to passe through Hircania and other countries, vntill he should come to the Caspian sea, and so through all the prouinces of Scythia Asiatica; and passing the riuer Tanais, to returne through Scythia in Europe, and in this retreit to come into Germany, and other prouinces bordering thereupon, conquering and subduing them all to the Romane Empire; for the which conquest hee presently caused to be leuied in sundrie places, ten thousand horsemen, and sixteene legions of choosen footmen, and appointing the time wherein he thought to depart, he commanded them to march towards their Rendeuous. And besides all this, he sought not only to subdue all the nations of the world, but to correct and reforme nature it selfe: for he purposed to haue made an Iland of Peloponesus, which now is called Morea, by cutting the neck of the land which is betweene the Egean and the Ionian Seas.

The high thoughts and purposes of Cæsar.

Of the Riuer Tiber and the Riuer Anien (as PLVTARCH saith) he purposed to haue altered the courses, and to haue opened new chanels, through which they should run into the Sea, making them to leaue their naturall course, and capeable to bear great ships. He commanded, and already began to dig down and make plain many hils and high mountains in Italie, and to dry vp and dreine some of the great lakes and marishes which are therein: and, in this manner, hee thought to haue done other things more than a man, which seemed to bee possible to none but to God alone. He corrected (as many Authors affirm) the computation of the yeer, conforming it with the course of the Sun, and brought it to that rule which is yet held: for, before that time it was much out of order. He did the like in the course of the Moon, and the conjunctions and oppositions of her and the Sun: and this was attributed to him for tyrannie, by those which did hate him. For, one day, in a discourse in the presence of CICERO, it was said, that the next day there should be an Eclipse of the Sun; yea, quoth he, it is so: for, CÆSAR hath so commanded. Many other things CÆSAR began, which were very great, in reforming the lawes, customes and offices, which for breuity I omit: among which, the reedifying of the ruined city of Carthage by SCIPIO (as all the world knoweth) was one, and he sent thither Colonies and Roman citizens to inhabite: the like hee did by Corinth. But all these works and these so high conceits and resolutions were abbridged by death, which within fewe daies ensued: and this man, whom no force could resist, a fewe men (yea, and those disarmed) were of power to bereaue of life; as hereafter we will declare. Fiue moneths onely hee liued a soueraigne Lord in peace (as VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS hath noted) when those, in whom he reposed greatest trust, conspired his death.

The causes of the conspiracies against Cæsar.

Some write, that CÆSAR was counselled to haue had a guard alwaies about him: whereto he answered, that he would haue none; for, he would rather dy once, than liue continually in jealousie and fear. Many set down the causes wherefore they desired to kill him. Some say, that it was for the hatred they had long borne him: some others say, that it was for the desire of liberty, houlding him for a tyrant. But the most part are of opinion, that it was for suspicion that hee would haue made himself King of Rome; a thing in the highest degree hatefull to the Romans: whereof he gaue many signes and causes to suspect; which PLVTARCH and others do write at large. Heerunto was added, that he began to haue men in contempt, and all other things: whereby he became hatefull to many. For, he vsed to say, that the Common-wealth was but a voice and a name without a body or substance; and that it well appeared, that CORNELIVS SYLLA had no learning, seeing that hee resigned the perpetuall Dictatorship. All the whole Senate, coming one day into the Temple of Venus wherein he was, he attended their comming, sitting still, and rose not as he was wont to doo, notwithstanding (as some say) that CORNELIVS BALBVS counselled him to rise: which was a thing much noted, and odious to the Common-wealth. His friends and fauourites began also to say and to publish, that in the books of the Sibyls (which in Rome were held in great veneration, and for a true prophecy) it was written, that the Parthians could neuer bee ouercome but by a man which should haue the title of king; and they practised that CÆSAR should take this name, for that conquest, whither he had determined to goe: and although that he made shew to be much moued thereat, yet they suspected the contrary. Which suspicion encreased (besides that which is already said) for that the Tribunes of the people commanded a man to be apprehended, which had set a Diadem (which is the ensigne of a King) vpon the head of one of CÆSARS statues: Whereat CÆSAR was so highly offended with the Tribunes, that he deposed them from their offices, making shew that he did it, because they gaue him cause of offence, in this, that they would make the world beleeue that there was cause of suspicion, that he would make himself a Tyrant-king. The like in a manner passed, when MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was a great fauourite of his, and (that yeere) his fellow and companion in the Consulship, being at certaine publike games, came to CÆSAR and put a Diademe vpon his head: and although that he cast it downe, yet they all imagined, that MARCVS ANTONIVS would not haue presumed to haue done it without his consent or liking, and that he did this to proue what liking the people had thereto, and how they would take it: so as these, and such other like things as passed, gaue them occasion to desire and to procure his death: as some of them did. This did also encourage them, and made them attempt to do it; for that in sundry publick places certain Writings were set vp, which did incite and animate them to conspire against him: as, vpon the statue of BRVTVS, who in antient time chased the Kings out of Rome, were written these words; Would to God thou wert now liuing, Brutus: And vpon the image of MARCVS BRVTVS, who then was Pretor, and descended from the other BRVTVS, these words; Thou sleepest long, Brutus: truely thou art not Brutus. And, as APPIAN recounteth, at other times they set vp others, which imported, Thou art dead, Brutus: would to God thou were liuing: thou art vnworthy of the succession from the Bruti: surely thou art not descended from that good Brutus. And other such like things were set vpon these statues, and in other places: So as for all these reasons, and for other added heerunto, there were seuenty of the most eminent men in Rome which conspired to murder him; one alluring another, vntill they grew to that number: of which, the principall Heads were DECIVS, MARCVS BRVTVS, CAIVS CASSIVS; yet MARCVS BRVTVS was held for CÆSAR's son: for, his mother was suspected by him, and had receiued from him great honours and good entertainments. With these were GAIVS CASCA, ATTILIVS CIMBER, SERVIVS GALBA, QVINTVS LIGARIVS, MARCVS SPVRIVS, and many other men of account: which, after som consultations, concluded to kill him vpon the Ides of March, which is the fifteenth day of that Month, in the Temple where the Senators were to sit that day: which was agreed vpon, and kept so secret, that (notwithstanding their great number) there was not any one found that did discouer the same. But there were so many signes and prodigies, and to himself there hapned so many auguries and forewarnings, that, without knowing any cause, all men were of opinion, that CÆSAR's death was neer at hand. The which, among many other which recite the same,

OVID

OVID doth most excellently set down in his Metamorphoses, which for breuity I omit: but chiefly SPVRINA, who was his diuiner or soothsaier, forwarned him, that he should look to himself vntill the Ides of March were past; for, his life was in great danger: and CÆSAR's owne wife entreated him vpon her knees, that hee would not that day go forth to the Senate; for, she had dreamt, that he lay dead in her lap. Finally, CÆSAR was so many waies forewarned, and put in such fear of some great danger, as he was about to send to MARCVS ANTONIVS to make his excuse, and to defer the Senat vntill another day. But (as it was Gods will he should dy so) MARCVS BRVTVS, being in place when this matter was in question (who, as we haue already said, was one of the conspirators) counselled CÆSAR, that in no case hee should make shewe of any such fear: whereupon he resolued to go. Lib. 14

A petition giuen Cæsar.

Some (as SVETONIVS and PLVTARCH) write, that CÆSAR made small account of death, and that he suspected he should dy in this manner: for he said, that hee did not so much esteem his owne life, as the danger whereinto the Common-wealth would fall by losing him: For, as for him, he had wonne power, fame and glory enough for himself; and that hee in no time could dy with greater honour. It gaue also cause of this suspition, that some discoursing in his presence, the night before his death, what kinde of death was best: euen, quoth hee, the sudden, and that which is not prepensed. Whether this be true or no, I knowe not: but, the fifteenth of March, he went from his house in a Litter towards the Senate; and, passing along the street, there was a petition deliuered vnto him, which (some say) ARTEMYDORVS, his Master in the Greek Tongue, gaue him: others say, that it was giuen him by another, and that ARTEMIDORVS could not come so neer to him as to aduise him: but, whosoeuer hee were that gaue it, therein was giuen him (in writing) all that which was concluded in this conspiracie, and he which gaue it desired him to reade it presently; which he began to doo: but there came so many to speak to him, that he could but begin to reade it; for, it was found in his hand when he was dead. And, passing so along the street, hee also met with SPVRINA, who had giuen him warning to look to himself vntill the Ides of March were past: and as CÆSAR saw him, very pleasant and jesting he said, Dost thou not knowe, SPVRINA, that the Ides of March are come? Yea, answered SPVRINA, and I knowe that they are not yet past. Being comm to the Temple where the Senate was to sit that day, he cam down from his Litter, and entred therein; and, hauing first done sacrifice (as then was the custome) which all, according to their superstitious ceremonies of that time, presaged to be fatall and infortunate, he fate down in the Senate in his chair: and BRVTVS ALBINVS, entertaining MARCVS ANTONIVS at the door of the Temple, or (after some others) TREBONIVS; as it was decreed, one of the conspirators (whose name was CELER) came to CÆSAR vnder colour to intreat him to be pleased to release a brother of his from banishment, and presently all the rest of the conspirators drew neer to his chair. Which when CÆSAR perceiued, thinking that they had all come for the same purpose, it is written that he said vnto them, What force is this? And at that Instant one of them, whose name was CASCA, beginning, they all drew their poiniards and swords, which they had brought in secret for that purpose vnder their gowns, and began to wound him. The first blowe he receiued, they say, CASCA gaue him in the throat: at which wound CÆSAR spake aloud; saying, What dost thou, Traitor CASCA? and, wrestling the poiniard out of his hands, he arose and stabbed CASCA through the arm: and beeing about to strike him the second time, he was preuented by the other wounds which they gaue him; with great force and courage leaping from one side to the other to defend himself. But, when hee saw MARCVS BRVTVS (whose authority and reputation was great) with his sword drawn in his hand, wherwith he had already wounded him in the thigh, they write, that hee was much amazed thereat, and said in the Greek Tongue (which the Romans did then vnderstand and vsually speak) Why how now, sonne BRVTVS? and thou also? And hauing said so, and seeing so many weapons bent against him, and that no body came to his rescue (for, there was so great a tumult in the Senate, as they all thought to haue died; and, being in despair, none durst attempt to defend him) he remembred to keep the honour of his person, and with his right hand couered his head with part of his robe, and with his left hand hee gitt himself, and settled his clothes about him; and, being so couered, he fell dead to the ground, wounded with three and twenty wounds: and his fortune was to fall at the foot of the seat or base whereupon POMPEY's statue stood; which was noted for the judgement and permission of God. And so in this maner died the most mighty, the most worthy, valiant, wise, and fortunate Prince and Captain, that without all doubt before him hath been in the world; and I knowe not if after him in valor and humane power there hath been the like. For, his excellencies, graces and abilities; his inuincible minde, his incomparable force and courage; the battailes and victories which he obtained; the prouinces, Kings and nations, which he ouercame and subdued; his counsels, stratagems, policies, and bold attempts; his magnanimitie, clemencie and bountie to the conquered and conquerors; the great designes he had propounded when he was slaine; being all well weighed and considered: it will plainely appeare, that in none of these things aforesaid, neither in many other more which may be said of him, there hath beene any King or Captaine that hath excelled him; but that he in the most hath excelled all others, and had fewer imperfections and vices then any other. For, setting apart his ambition and desire to raigne (which he held for no vice, and might alledge that he was compelled thereto) he was only noted and blamed, as too much giuen to women; as for the rest, wherewith he was charged, it doth rather appeare to be the murmuring and slandering of his aduersaries, than any truth.

The time wherein Cæsar died.

CÆSAR was slaine in the six and fiftieth yeere of his age, foure yeeres and a little more (according to PLVTARCHS computation) after the death of POMPEY; in the seuen hundred and tenth yeere (according to OROSIVS) after the foundation of Rome; and according to the Hebrew truth, in the three thousand and tenth yeere from the creation of the world; and according to the greater account of the seuentie interpreters, fiue thousand, one hundred, fiftie and seuen yeeres; in the hundred, eightie and fourth Olympiad; and fortie and two yeers before the birth of Christ our Redeemer: But I would haue the reader to vnderstand, that in this account of yeeres, there sometimes happeneth difference betweene the authors.

Iulius Cæsar adopted Octauianus his Nephew for his son.

CÆSAR had neither sonne nor daughter legitimate, at the time of his death; for notwithstanding that he was married foure seuerall times, yet he had but one only daughter, named IVLIA, which (as I haue said) was married to POMPEY, and died: Wherefore he adopted for sonne by his last will, and made him his heire in the Dodrant, which are nine parts of the twelue of his goods, his Nephew OCTAVIVS CÆSAR; which afterwards was called OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS, who was nephew to his sister IVLIA and of ACIVS BALBVS, and sonne of ACIA his neece, and of OCTAVIVS Pretor in Macedonia, who died sodainely. OCTAVIVS was at this time by the commandement of his vncle, in the citie of Apollonia in the prouince of Epire, where he gaue himselfe to studie; staying for him there, thence to goe with him to the warres of the Parthians, being then of the age of seuenteene yeeres.

CÆSAR being dead in the manner as I haue said (as it happeneth in great accidents) the newes presently ranne ouer all the citie; and the tumult and alteration therein was so great, as no man knew what to doe or say: all offices ceased, the temples were shut vp, there was no man but was amazed: CÆSARS friends were afraid of those which slew him; and they, of his friends. It would be a long discourse to recite what succeeded, but I will briefly set down that which shall be most to my purpose. BRVTVS and CASSIVS and all the conspirators, and others which were willing to ioyn with them, hauing murthered him, seeing the great tumult among the people (and as PLVTARCH writes) for feare of MARCVS ANTONIVS and LEPIDVS, whereof the one was Consul, and the other Master of the horsemen, durst not goe to their houses, neither doe such other things as they had pretended; but presently from thence went to seize vpon the Capitoll, and cryed by the way as they went, Libertie, libertie, imploring the assistance and fauour of the people. The rest of that day and all the next night, MARCVS ANTONIVS & LEPIDVS who took CÆSARS part, were in arms, and there passed treaties & messages from the one to the other; wherein it was agreed the Senat should sit, whither BRVTVS & CASSIVS cam, M. ANTONIVS sons (by the perswasion of CICERO, a great louer of the libertie) remaining hostages for them; where they treated of peace & concord, and all that wch was past should be buried in perpetuall silence and obliuion. Wherunto M. ANTONIVS (who was Consul) and all the whole Senate agreed: and all the prouinces being diuided, there was a great likelyhood of peace; for the Senate approued and commended the fact, and the people dissembled it: for on the one part, the authoritie of BRVTVS and CASSIVS, and the name of libertie, seemed to giue them some contentment; and of the other side, the greatnes of the fact, and loue which they bare vnto CÆSAR, did moue and incite them to hate the murtherers, and so it rested indeterminate. But MARCVS ANTONIVS, as one who also thought to become a tyrant, euer sought meanes to incense the people against them; and matters passed in such sort, that among other things which were done, CÆSARS testament was opened; wherein (besides the adopting of his Nephew OCTAVIVS for his son, and appointing him for his chiefe heire, among other bequests which he made) he bequeathed to the people of Rome cercertaine gardens and heritages neere the riuer of Tiber, and to euery citizen of Rome a certaine sum of money; to be diuided among them; which being knowne, did much renew their olde loue, and made his death farre more pittifull. And hauing agreed vpon his funerall, which was, with great solemnity to burne his body in the field of Mars, putting it in effect, MARCVS ANTONIVS, who that day made a funerall oration in his praise, and with the intent aforesaid, took the robe wherein CÆSAR was slaine; which being all bloody, he shewed to the people, vsing some speeches which prouoked them both to wrath and pittie. So as before the solemnitie of the funerall was throughly ended, they all departed in great furie, with the brands of the same fire which was made for CÆSARS bodie in their hands, and went to burne the houses of BRVTVS and CASSIVS, running vp and downe the streetes of Rome seeking them and the rest of the conspirators to haue slaine them; and in that furie they vnaduisedly slew ELIVS CINNA, by mistaking him to haue been CORNELIVS CINNA, who was one of the conspirators. This tumult put BRVTVS and CASSIVS and their confederats, in such feare, as they all fled from Rome to sundry other parts; and MARCVS ANTONIVS not obseruing what was decreed, thinking to inherit CÆSARS power and authoritie, fought their destruction in all that he might: And notwithstanding that the Senate (hauing appeased the tumult of the people) would haue inflicted punishment vpon some of the seditious, and some were already imprisoned, yet BRVTVS and CASSIVS durst not returne to Rome, but after a while went into Græcia to gouerne those prouinces, which CÆSAR (whom they had slaine) had consigned vnto them; which were Macedonia to BRVTVS, and Syria to CASSIVS, and so all the rest of the conspirators absented themselues. Surely it was a wonderfull thing that within the space of three yeers, they all died, and not one of them a naturall death.

The murderers of Cæsar fled from Rome.

The death of those which conspired against Cæsar.

At this time CAIVS OCTAVIVS, who (as is aforesaid) was afterwards called OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS, came to Rome from Apollonia, being aduertised of CÆSARS death, and sent for by his mother and other his kindred, all continuing in the confusion aforesaid.

After the death of Cæsar, Marcus Antonius became the mightiest man in Rome.

For MARCVS ANTONIVS was now very mightie: for his brother LVCIVS ANTONIVS was Tribune of the people, and other his friends and kinsmen were in offices and dignities, many of which he procured for them, saying; that IVLIVS CÆSAR had so ordained it in his Commentaries: and in this season came OCTAVIVS to Rome, whose storie we will now begin.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROR
AVGVSTVS CÆSAR.

THE ARGVMENT.

OCTAVIANVS, or Octauius, the adopted sonne of Caius Iulius Cæsar, after the death of Cæsar, applyed himselfe, together with Marcus Antonius, to pursue Brutus and Cassius with their complices; and ouercomming them he returned to Rome: where plotting the Triumvirat, he shed so much blood, and did such like cruelties, as there was not any streete in Rome, but was polluted with ciuill blood. He fought with Lucius Antonius, brother to Marcus Antonius, for that it should seeme that Octauius made small account of his brother: and besieging him in Perugia, he constrained him (through famine) to come in person to sue for peace and life; whom he gently pardoned, together with all those which were his partakers in that warre. He also ouercame Sextus Pompeius, after they had warred together many yeeres. And falling at variance with Marcus Antonius by meanes of his wife Octauia, sister to Octauius, for that Antonius was besotted with the loue of Cleopatra Queene of Ægypt: Finally after many changes of fortune, he ouercame him: whose victorie constrained Marcus Antonius (in a manner) in despaire to kill himselfe, and Cleopatra to poyson her selfe; but Marcus Antonius slew himselfe, more for that he beleeued that Cleopatra had already killed her selfe, then that he accounted himselfe ouercome by Octauius. After this victorie, Marcus Antonius being dead, and Lepidus reduced to a most base estate, Octauius obtained the Monarchie and sole gouernment of the Empire. In which time, subduing many barbarous Nations, he seuerall times made Ianus temple to be shut, and was called Monarch; in which Monarchie he liued in such manner, as with his greatnes, he alway digressed from vertue by reason of his high estate; and was no lesse vertuous then a fauourer of learned and vertuous men. He had infortunate in honest wiues, and chast and continent daughters; and most vnhappy in sonnes, hauing none amongst him by nature worthie of the Empire. He ruled the world sixe and fiftie yeares; foure and fortie alone, and twelue in companie with Marcus Antonius. In his time our Sauiour Iesus Christ was borne. And being little more then threescore and sixe yeeres old he died, to the great griefe and sorrow of the whole world, which through his goodnesse had been so long time maintayned in peace.

Octauius Nephew to Cæsar and his sonne by adoption.

IF in the Historie and life of IVLIVS CAESAR it behooued me to be briefe in the relation thereof; I haue now no lesse neede to do the like in the Historie of his Nephew OCTAVIVS CAESAR, which afterwards was called OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS, his sonne by adoption, as by that which is before written may appeare: aswell for the great accidents which happened in his time, as for the multitude thereof, which cannot be repeated but by a long discourse. But we will do herein what we shall be able, notwithstanding that his raigne was long (for it was fiftie and odde yeares) that in reason we may spend somewhat more time, then in the actions of those which were of lesse continuance. The father and grandfather of OCTAVIVS, I haue already said, who they were. His linage and familie of his fathers side, was of the OCTAVII, and was of great antiquitie in Rome, from the time of TARQVIN their king, and in the beginning they were Patricij (as SVETONIVS recordeth in his life) although that afterwards the order altred, reducing it to the people by adoption, or some other cause: and in processe of time many of the OCTAVII, obtaining offices and Magistracies, continued in the order of Knighthood, which was in the middle degree betweene the Patricij and the Plebeians, vntill the time of OCTAVIVS the father of OCTAVIANVS; who was a Senator, and a Pretor in Macedonia. Of

The Linage of Octauianus.

Of his mothers side (as it was said of IVLIVS CÆSAR) hee descended from the Kings of Rome. And yet notwithstanding all this, as OCTAVIANVS had many enemies and emulators, it was said to his reproach, that his grand-father (the father of his father) had been a mony-changer, and that his great grand-father was a Libertine; which is as much as to say, a man that had been a slaue. But it seems to me vnlikely, that the son of such parents should haue been admitted into the Senat, and made Pretor; and that IVLIVS CÆSAR, whose place & thoughts were so high, would haue married him to his Niece. And so SVETONIVS treats thereof, as a matter which he houlds for vntrue.

OCTAVIVS then vnderstanding of the death of his Vncle IVLIVS CAESAR, being aduertised and sent for by his mother (as I haue said) departed from Apollonia, and with the best speed he could make came to Rome, accompanied with some of CÆSAR's friends and some men of warre, of those which in Epire and Macedonia attended the enterprise and wars of Asia, as it was decreed: and, arriuing at Brundusium, he found there certain legions, which by CÆSARS commandement were comn thither to haue been embarked for the warre pretended; by whom he was receiued with the greatest loue and affection that could be. And (as saith APPIANVS) he was there called and took vpon him the name of CÆSAR, by the adoption of his vncle; and, leauing off to bee called OCTAVIVS the son of OCTAVIVS, was called CAIVS CÆSAR, son of CAIVS CÆSAR; and commonly he was called CAESAR OCTAVIANVS: wherein he preserued the memory of his naturall father, with the name of his adoptiue father: like as PAVLVS EMILIVS son of PAVLVS EMILIVS, being adopted by SCIPIO, the son of SCIPIO the Great, was called SCIPIO EMILIANVS; SCIPIO by his adoptiue father, and EMILIANVS by his naturall father; a matter vsuall among the Romans. So was OCTAVIVS called CAESAR OCTAVIANVS: and so from thenceforth we will call him.

Octauianus tooke vpon him the name of Cæsar.

OCTAVIANVS CAESAR departed from Brundusium towards Rome, accompanied with the ould souldiers: and by the way many more joined with him, with many of his vncle and father CAESAR's friends, and of his faction, and entred into the city with great shew & pomp. But, as MARCVS ANTONIVS was of great power, and therewith very proud, and took in ill part that OCTAVIANVS was preferred before him, as PLVTARCH recordeth, hee went not to receiue him: which was much noted, and was the first signe of the discord which afterwards ensued between them. OCTAVIANVS had a resolution and great desire to reuenge the death of IVLIVS CAESAR. But, by his mother, and PHILIP his father-in-law, with whom she was married, he was counselled to dissemble his purpose for a season: for, on the one side, they saw that the Senate had approued the death of IVLIVS CÆSAR; and, on the other, MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was to bee their principall fauourer heerin, did not shewe himself a friend to OCTAVIANVS. Wherefore he, following their wise counsell, aduisedly concealed his thoughts for a time: and, to justifie himself, and to hould correspondence, and temporize with ANTONIE, he went presently to his house to visit him. And, vnderstanding that ANTONIE had in his custodie all the treasure which IVLIVS CAESAR had left, after discourse of some other matters, he desired him to command it to bee deliuered vnto him, therewith to satisfie his debts, and to distribute it as CAESAR had ordained by his Will. To this, and all the rest which OCTAVIANVS required, hee was answered by MARCVS ANTONIVS with greater haughtinesse and grauity than the minde and thoughts of OCTAVIANVS were able to bear, denying to him what he required, yea, and reprouing him for his demands. Whereupon presently contentions and discord arose between them; OCTAVIANVS aiding himself with the counsell of MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO, a great enemy to ANTONIVS: whose authority at that time, by reason of his wisdome and eloquence, was very great. The hatred encreasing, although that friends of either side passed between them to bring them to some conformity, and to haue reconciled them, yet in the end it brake out. And OCTAVIANVS his power encreasing, principally (as I said) through the fauour and assistance of CICERO, MARCVS ANTONIVS left Rome, and began to raise forces in Italie, and so leuied foure legions of ould souldiers against him. And because that DECIVS BRVTVS, who commanded Gallia Cisalpina (which is now called Lombardie) was opposite vnto him, procured thereto by CICERO his counsell and letters, MARCVS ANTONIVS went to besiege him in the city of Mutina, now called Modena. This being knowne in Rome, CICERO his credit and authority in the Senate was such, as, after much contention, MARCVS ANTONIVS was declared an enemy to the State: and the new Consuls HIRCIVS and PANSA were sent against him, and with them OCTAVIANVS, with ensignes of Consul and title of Propretor, Octauianus and Marcus Antonius fell at variance.

M. Antonie declared an enemie to the commonweal.

tor, with part of the Armie, hauing been first receiued into the Senate (notwithstanding that he was not yet eighteen yeers ould) by the procurement of CICERO, although that afterwards he did ill requite it.

There were also assigned vnto MARCVS BRVTVS the prouinces of Illyricum or Sclauonia, and Macedonia, with the Armies therein; and to CASSIVS, the prouince of Syria in Asia, with the Armie also. This and other things beeing granted by the Senate, OCTAVIANVS and the Consuls with their Armies drew neer to MARCVS ANTONIVS, MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO remaining for chief in all matters in Rome. After some skirmishes and incounters, which passed between the two Armies, they came to battell, or (as some record) battels, which are declared in sundry manners; but in effect they all agree: and the truth is, that the Consuls and CÆSAR had the victory, and one of the Consuls (which was HIRCIVS) was slain in the battell, and PANSA the other Consul came wounded from it, and died shortly after: and so OCTAVIANVS remaining with the whole Armie, DECIVS BRVTVS was freed from the siege; and MARCVS ANTONIVS, with part of his people, escaped by slight. In this seruice, OCTAVIANVS made maruellous proof of himself (as SVETONIVS reporteth) not onely as a Captain, but also as a priuate souldier: and, among other things which hee did, one was, that seeing him which bare the standard to bee sore wounded and ready to fall, with the Eagle, the ensigne of his legion, which were the Armes of Rome; OCTAVIANVS took the same, and bare it a great while, vntill that he put it in safety: yet for all this, some of his enemies forbare not to defame him; saying, that, being in the battell, he himself slue the Consull HIRCIVS; and that afterwards he caused poison to be put into the medicines applied to the Consul PANSA, and that thereof he died.

The battell against Marcus Antonius, wherein Octauianus and the consuls had the victorie.

MARCVS ANTONIVS, being escaped from the battell, gathering together the remainder of his Armie, passed the Alps and went into France, soliciting the friendshippe of LEPIDVS, who remained there with an Armie since the death of IVLIVS CAESAR: with whom, after some treaties and matters which succeeded, he concluded to be his friend. And OCTAVIANVS, after the battell and victory obtained, seeing himself at liberty from the authority of the Consuls, began to put in effect the high designes which he did inherit with the goods and name of CAESAR, and presently sent to the Senate to require triumph for the victory; and also the Consulship for the rest of the time which remained to the dead Consuls, with succession in their charge, and command of the souldiers succeeding them in dignity. But his demands were not so pleasing to the Senate as he desired: for, the kinsmen and friends of the conspirators which slue CAESAR, began to stand in fear of him, and they grieued to see him so powerfull. Wherfore (as APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS and VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS distinctly set down) they vsed a mean to protract and delay that which he required; and in the end they resolued to assigne the Armie vnto DECIVS BRVTVS: and temporizing with OCTAVIANVS, they granted him the triumph, without admitting him to the Consulship. Whereat hee shewed himself much discontented, and took occasion thereby to attempt that which peraduenture he had before projected: which was this; He had secret treaties & practices of friendship with MARCVS ANTONIVS, and hauing drawne vnto him the hearts and good will of the Armie, imitating IVLIVS CAESAR; accompanied therewith, he took his way to Rome: and approaching neer vnto the city, in despite of the Senate hee made himself to bee chosen Consull, being then not fully twenty yeers ould. Wherein hee presently entred: and, discouering his desire and resolution, he made accusations to be exhibited against BRVTVS and CASSIVS, and the rest of the conspirators, which was declared against them all: and as there were none to defend their cause, and they absent, not daring to appear, they were condemned. This being done, he again departed from the city; and, with the Armie which he brought, returned to draw neer to the camps of LEPIDVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, who were already entred Italie.

Octauianus made himself to be chosen consull.

Those which murdered Cæsar, accused & condemned.

DECIVS BRVTVS, being aduertised of the treaties and league betwixt OCTAVIANVS, LEPIDVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, not daring to stay in that countrey, departed with his people: by which, seeing himself abandoned, part whereof going to CAESAR, and part to MARCVS ANTONIVS, he fled into sundry parts; and in the end was taken and brought to MARCVS ANTONIVS, and put to death by his commandement, and (his head beeing brought vnto him, hee caused him presently to bee buried. The Armies of these Captains approaching neer together, with which ASINIVS POLLIO and PLANCVS, with the legions which they commanded, were joined; the league was made, and friendship concluded betweene tweene these three, to wit, OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, MARCVS ANTONIVS, and LEPIDVS, all three meeting to that effect three daies together, at an appointed place in the fields betweene Bologna and Perugia, as APPIANVS recordeth, which was an Iland, which the River Lauinum which passeth thereby, maketh; where they concluded their accursed peace. And either of these firebrands of sedition entred into that accursed Triumvirat, with a seueral desigme & intent. LEPIDVS was couetous of riches, the hope wherof consisted in troubling the State. ANTHONIE by nature an enemie to peace, and troublesome to the common weale, desired to be reuenged of such as had declared him an enemie to the State. And OCTAVIVS, for the death of his adopted father, upon BRVTVS and CASSIVS, whose lives were offensiue to his unrevenged ghost. After which, OCTAVIANVS, putting away SERVILIVS daughter, to whom hee was married, contracted himselfe to CLAVDIA, ANTONIVS daughter in law, daughter to his wife FVLVIA, which was then a childe; from whom he was also divorced afterwards, without touching her, by reason of the discord which arose, as shall bee declared. In this proscription and league which they made, besides the dividing of the Empyre and Provinces, as hereafter shall bee declared, they concluded each of them to kill his enemies, and the one delivered them into the others hands, having more respect and care to bee revenged of an enemie, then to the saving of a friend; and so was made the most cruell and inhumane proscription and butcherie that ever was seene or heard of, giving and exchanging friends and kinsmen, for enemies and adversaries. For MARCVS ANTONIVS gave his fathers brother; and LEPIDVS, LVCIVS PAVLVS, his owne brother; and OCTAVIANVS, MARCVS TVLLIVS CICERO, whom hee called father, and by whom hee had beene intreated and honoured as a sonne. Besides these, they proscribed and condemned to dye, three hundred other principal men of Rome, as PLVTARCH setteth downe in their lives, although LVCIVS FLORVS, and TITVS LIVIVS doe but briefely set downe the number of the Senatours: of which one saith, there were put to death 130, and the other 140. But if wee shall beleeve APPIANVS, a most diligent and grave Author, there died of the Senators in a manner 300 (therin agreeing with PLVTARCH) and neere 2000 Romans of the order of Knighthood: so great power had ambition & hatred in the hearts of these three Citizens.

The Triumvirat and league betweene Octauianus, Marcus Antonius, and Lepidus.

The cruell proscription made by Octauianus and Marcus Antonius.

Cicero deliuered to his enemie.

Having made their agreement, and resolved what they would doe, they all three (newly reconciled) went to Rome, where they tooke upon them the governement of the Common-wealth, by the name of a Triumvirat, for that they were three, the time being appointed for five yeares, although they never meant to leave the same. And presently those which by them were condemned and proscript, were by their commandement put to death, being sought out in all parts and places, ransaking their houses and confisking their goods: In the execution whereof there was so great confusion, sorrow and heavinesse in the cittie of Rome, and almost in all Italie, as the like was never seene nor heard of by man. And although APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS very eloquently recounteth the cruell death of many, it shal be sufficient for us to describe the murdering of CICERO onely: who understanding that his name was in the catalogue of those which were proscript, onely for that he had beene a lover of the Romane libertie, fled towards the Sea, where imbarking himselfe, hee had so cruell fortune, as hee was forced to returne to the shore: and comming to certaine his possessions neere to Capua, not far from the sea, sleeping, hee was awakened by Crowes, which with their bills pluckt the cloathes from his backe. His servants moved with this evill presage, tooke him and put him in his Litter, and againe carried him towards the Sea; but hee was overtaken by the executioners, which smote off his head, and right hand, wherewith hee had written the orations against MARCVS ANTONIVS called PHILIPPICKS, imitating those which DEMOSTHENES made against PHILIP, father to ALEXANDER the great: and so CICERO was slaine by one whom hee had defended and delivered from death. And his hand being ioyfullie beheld by MARCVS ANTONIVS, was by his order nayled up in the place where hee was wont to plead; whither repaired all the Romane people to behold so miserable and sorrowfull a spectacle: whereof there was not anie one but was heartily sorie for the death of so great a personage, and so fervent a lover of the Commonwealth.

These Princes having done their wils in Rome, and knowing that BRVTVS and CASSIVS had a great and mightie Armie in Grecia, able both to defend, and offend, & called themselves deliverers of their Countrey, and gave it out publikely, that they would goe to set Rome at libertie from oppression; CASSIVS having before overthrowne and slaine DOLABELLA in Syria, who was made Consul in the place of IVLIVS CÆSAR when he was slaine; and in the time that that CICERO bare sway, was adjudged for an enemie to his Countrey: and being certified that they had (with the assistance of the Kings and provinces of Asia, and such people as they could levie) drawn together 18 legions: This (I say) being knowne, MARCVS ANTONIVS and OCTAVIANVS resolved to goe against them with the greatest Armie they were able to levie, which they had of expert and old soldiers, and that LEPIDVS should remaine behinde to guard Rome. Being departed from thence, and arrived in Gracia, dividing their Armie, for the more commodious marching thereof, they drew neere to the place where BRVTVS and CASSIVS were encamped, which was in Macedonia, in the fields called Phillippicks, for that they were neere the Citty Philippos. Before the Armies came to joyne, there were apparent signes of an inevitable overthrow; for those birds which used to gorge themselves with Carion, hovered about BRVTVS Campe, as if it had beene their owne alreadie: as they marcht out to battel, a blacke Moore met them, which was an eminent signe of ominous succesſe: and BRVTVS himselfe being alone in his tent at night in meditation, a man sad and gastly appeared unto him; and being demanded by him, what he was? he answered, I am thy evill spirit; and so vanished out of his sight. In Cæsars Campe, all presages were as good as the others bad, birds and beasts promising all fayre fortune. These contrarie Armies being so neere together; after some encounters and skirmishes, they came to a battaile, where the victorie was divided after a strange manner: for either partie having ranged their Armie into two squadrons, or battailes, the right wing of BRVTVS his Armie, joyned with the left wing which OCTAVIANVS commanded; and the right, whereof MARCVS ANTONIVS was leader, with the left which CASSIVS governed: where wounding and cruelly slaying one another, BRVTVS his Battalion was of such power, as that it brake and put to rout OCTAVIVS CÆSARS Battalion; who, as APPIANVS ALEXANDRINVS, PLVTARCH, and LVCIVS FLORVS report, was not in the battaile, for that hee was then very sicke; neither durst he abide in his Tent in the Campe, for a certaine augurie or dreame of one who was his Phisition, who (they say) adviſed him, that he ſhould not abide in his Tent in the Campe; for if hee did, hee would be slaine by his enemies. Yet SVETONIVS, VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS affirme that he was there, & that being overcome, he retyred to ANTONIVS battaile. And although that this be diverſly reported (as it usually happeneth in great exploites and adventures) the truth wher-in all agree, is, that his people being overthrowne, and his Campe entred by his enemies, imagining that he had beene in his bed, there were many thrusts and stabs given thorough the curtaines, and into the bed, and it was publiſhed abroad that hee was dead. And while as BRVTVS followed this victorie, his companion CASSIVS was overthrowne by MARCVS ANTONIVS, notwithstanding that hee performed all that was possible for him to defend his people; so as there was victorie on either side, whereof the cloudes and dust of that day were a great occasion; for the one could not see nor understand the other: and CASSIVS seing his people overthrowne and scattered, retired himselfe to a high ground, where hee had pitched his Tent, whereinto he could not come, for that the enemie had alreadie possessed it: And so standing and looking about, hee saw BRVTVS troopes come to his ayde, and to relieve him: but hee imagining they came flying, or that they were his enemies, as he had before resolved (so great was his griefe and sorrow) so commanded hee a slave of his, whom hee had made free (named PINDARVS) to kill him, who performed it presently, and so he died fooliſhly, yet bound by neceſſitie, believing that which was not.

Brutus puts his enemies to rout.

Cassius defeated by Antonie

The death of Cassius.

OCTAVIANVS his people escaped by flight, & retired to MARCVS ANTONIVS campe, whose forces returned to him with victorie: although their General MARCVS ANTONIVS, as some write, did not that day discharge the part of a good Captaine but rather affirme, that the battaile being begunne, hee left it, and went into a lake which was thereby, where he remained untill that hee certainely understood, that the victorie remained on his side: which truly is hardly to bee beleeved in so valiant a man, and of such experience as he was; so as there was a great broile and a confusion. But PLVTARCH affirmeth, that if BRVTVS his people had not that day busied themselves in ransacking and pillaging of OCTAVIANVS his Campe & Tents, his partie had obtained an entire victorie: for they might in sufficient time have rescued CASSIVS, and both being joyned together, might easilie have broken MARCVS ANTONIVS his battaile. But the victorie divided in such manner as I have told you, the Captaines of either partie gathered together their forces, where of BRVTVS part were slaine 8000 men; and of his adversaries a far greater number: and BRVTVS did his best to comfort the soldiers and gentlemen which followed CASSIVS. And although the next day there were some shew between the

the two Armies of a desire to fight, and that they were neere the one to the other, yet they came to no battaile: but within few daies after (during the which, there past some skirmishes of smal importance) it was tried betweene them, whereto BRVTVS was forced by his soldiers. For he would willingly have delayed and prolonged the warre: being advertised that his enemies wanted victuals, and many necessaries, and also for that he repoſed [illegible] trust in CASSIVS forces; for he found that they were growne fearefull, by meanes of that which was past, and were ill to command: but being come to the encounter, he [illegible] roughly discharge all the offices which to a good Captaine and valliant knight did belong. But in the end, his men unable to endure the force of OCTAVIANVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, were by them broken and overcome: And BRVTVS, after that hee had done all that which was possible to gather his troopes together, being out of hope to be able to make any resistance, the night being come, he was counselled by some which joyned themselves with him, to flie, to whom hee answered, that he was resolved to doe so, not with his feete, but with his hands: and having spoken these words, hee tooke a sword from a servant of his, named STRATVS, and slew himselfe. Some affirme, that this STRATVS killed him by his commandement. And so DRVSVS LIVIVS and QVINTILIVS VARRO and some others of the conspiracie slew themselves, besides many others which died fighting in the battaile. And in this manner were OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR and MARCVS ANTONIVS Lords and Masters of the field, and all things succeeded unto CÆSAR according to his desire: for whom alone, God in his secret judgment, had reserved the sole Monarchie, which then was divided and sharedbetween three.

The Battaile gainſt Brutus.

Brutus slew himselfe.

This exploit being atchieved, and BRVTVS and CASSIVS legions being reduced to their obedience (saving those which flying sundrie waies went to SEXTVS POMPEIVS, sonne of the great POMPEY, who in these troubles and confusions seised on the Ile of Sicilia, and was very mightie by Sea) OCTAVIANVS, and MARCVS ANTONIVS agreed together, that ANTONIVS should remaine in the Provinces of Gracia and Asia, LEPIDVS should goe into Africa, and OCTAVIANVS should returne to Rome, whither with some difficultie he came, through want of his health; and MARCVS ANTONIVS went into Asia, & afterwards gave himselfe to sensualitie, delights and pleasures in Egypt, with Queene CLEOPATRA, of whom wee have spoken in the life of CÆSAR.

Marcus Antonius fell in love with Cleopatra Queene of Egypt.

Within few daies after that OCTAVIANVS came to Rome, there arose new warres and troubles: for although that he were in peace with LEPIDVS, to whom was given the Province of Africa, OCTAVIANVS remaining with the rest of Spaine, France, and part of Germany, Italie and Illyricum: LVCIVS ANTONIVS, who at that time was Consul, incited thereto by his Sister in law FVLVIA, wife to MARCVS ANTONIVS, began to oppose himselfe against LEPIDVS and OCTAVIANVS, attempting to defeat the Triumvirat, and the league and government of three; which began about the division of the fields, which OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR had made to the men of warre which had served him. APPIANVS writeth, that FVLVIA did this with an intent to disturbe Italie, and so to procure her husband MARCVS ANTONIVS to come unto her, for that she was ialous, hearing of his familiaritie and companie keeping with CLEOPATRA, the Queene of Egypt. The discord in Rome grew to that height, as they came to Armes: and LVCIVS ANTONIVS departed from thence, and levied an Armie against OCTAVIANVS, who marched towards him with his power: but LVCIVS durst not joyne battaile with him, but rather suffered himselfe to be shut up in the Citie of Perugia, where CÆSAR besieged him, and at that time divorced himselfe from CLAVDIA, the daughter of FVLVIA, to whom he was contracted (as is aforesaid) without ever touching her, and was married the third time with SCRIBONIA, by whom hee had one daughter. Perugia was so strictlie besiedged (OCTAVIVS being then 23 years old) that LVCIVS ANTONIVS, and the rest which were besieged with him, endured so great hunger, as it grew to a proverbe, to say, The Perugian hunger; wherewith LVCIVS ANTONIVS oppressed and forced, yeelded himself to OCTAVIANVS, who pardoned him, & used him wel, & those which were with him; and so this warre was ended without shedding of blood, and he came victorious to Rome, & was ever after Lord thereof. Wherefore many account the beginning of his Empire from this time, which might be about some 4 years after the death of his uncle CÆSAR: & the account which is commonly called CÆSARS computation, agreeth with this time: foure yeares (as I said) after the death of CÆSAR, and thirtie and eight yeares before the birth of Christ.

Lucius besieged in Perugia, yeelds.

The beginning of Octavius his Empire.

CÆSAR being in this quietnes (the which cannot long continue in the course of this life) presently without any delay, FVLVIA with letters and false persuasions, sought by all means to set MARCVS ANTONIVS and OCTAVIAN at variance, seeing that LVCIVS ANTONIVS his attemptes tooke no better effect: and with this resolution shee went out of Italie, by OCTAVIVS permission, and tooke her way towards her husband, in hope to perswade him to come into Italie against OCTAVIVS, as he did. When shee parted from Italie, MARCVS ANTONIVS parted from Alexandria in Egypt: and comming to the Ile of Rhodes, he was enformed of all that happened to his brother; and arriving in Græcia at the city of Athens, he found his wife FVLVIA there sicke, but sound and constant in her determination against OCTAVIVS: whom hee there leaving by her owne good will and consent, hee came with two hundred Gallies into Italie; and landing neere unto Brundusium, now Brindez, the warres began between him and OCTAVIANVS his forces, who then was in Rome. SEXTVS POMPEIVS (as I said) held Sicilia, and was in such sort Lord of the Sea, as he caused a great scarcity and want of corne in Italie. But as this warre was not through OCTAVIANVS his fault, or by his will, so MARCVS ANTONIVS, by the relation of sundrie persons, understood it to be so; and therefore there were some friends which interposed themselves to reconcile them and make them friends: and it was agreed there should be arbitrators, which should compound the differences betweene them: whereto were nominated of OCTAVIANVS side, his great and private friend MECENAS, chanted by VIRGIL, HORACE, and other Poets; and for MARCVS ANTONIVS, was ASINIVS POLLIO. And in this time, newes came that FVLVIA the wife of MARCVS ANTONIVS was dead: whereby a great obstacle to the peace was taken away. MECENAS then, and ASINIVS POLLIO, set downe the agreement betweene them; the principal points whereof were, to renew the league and Triumvirat for other five yeeres, and to share the Romane Empyre betweene them, as they before had done. To MARCVS ANTONIVS was assigned all the East from Italy, from the beginning of the Ionian Sea, which is the entrie into the gulfe of Venice, unto the River Euphrates in Asia, wherein were included all the Provinces of Græcia and Asia, and the Ilands contained betweene these two limits. To OCTAVIVS was alotted from the said Ionian Sea to the westerne Sea (which wee call the Spanish Sea) Italie, France, the provinces of Spaine, Germanie, Britannie, with their Ilands and bounds. And to LEPIDVS was confirmed Africa wherein hee then was, and all the provinces therein conteined, subject to the Empire. And for the better corroborating of this league of friendship, it was agreed that MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was a widdower, should marrie with OCTAVIA, who was sister to OCTAVIANVS by his fathers side, and lately the widow of MARCVS MARCELLVS, with whom shee had bin married, and had by him one sonne called MARCELLVS, whom hee much loved, and OCTAVIAN adopted him for his sonne, of whom VIRGIL maketh much mention. This marriage was made by dispensation of the Senate, because that in Rome it was not permitted for widdowes to marrie, untill they had lived ten months in widdowhood.

The death of Fulvia wife of Marcus Antonius.

Marcus Antonius married Octavia sister to Octavianus.

This being concluded, OCTAVIANVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS went to Rome: where the wedding was solemnized, and they returned againe good friends. But this peace was greatly disquieted, by meanes of the ill neighbourhood of SEXTVS POMPEIVS: for hee commanded the Sea from Sicilia where hee lived, and with his ships and Pirats (for he had many in his service) he disquieted CÆSARS part (relying on the friendship of MARCVS ANTONIVS) and OCTAVIANVS had determined to make warre and to ruine him: but at the entreatie of the Senate, and of MARCVS ANTONIVS, hee gave eare to a peace, and by the mediation of some which were friends to them both, it tooke effect in this manner: That all matters past being forgotten, they should become good neighbours and friends, and that SEXTVS POMPEIVS should enioy Sicilia, Sardinia, and Corsica, which hee had in possession; and that he should cleere the seas from danger, for Merchants and passengers; and that hee should furnish Rome yeerely with a certaine quantitie of corne. This being concluded, they agreed upon a meeting betweene them three, ANTONIVS, OCTAVIANVS, and POMPEY, upon the Sea side, in the streight of Mesina, in a Fortresse built for that purpose, which reached into the water, whither SEXTVS POMPEIVS might come with his gallies, and might be in safety on all parts: which was performed with great joy and solemnitie, and afterwards POMPEY feasted them in his gallies, and they him likewise by land: and from thence he returned to Sicilia, and OCTAVIAN and ANTONY to Rome, where they remained certaine daies in very friendly manner. And MARCVS ANTONIVS, making preparation for his journey into the East, sent sent VENTIDIVS away before with a great Armie against the Parthians, against whom he had resolved to make war, as hee did. VENTIDIVS had so good successe in his journey, as hee overcame and defeated PACORVS, the Kings sonne of the Parthians, and slew of them twenty thousand men: so as he sufficiently revenged the death of MARCVS CRASSVS: for the which, after his returne to Rome, he triumphed.

Ventidius triumphed of the Parthians.

MARCVS ANTONIVS departed Rome towards the East with his new wife, with whom he wintered in Græcia in the Citie of Athens, & from thence he continued his journey. Within a while after, as OCTAVIVS (remayning in Rome) grew mightie, and in great estimation; so likewise hee became pensive: and as the companie and neighbourhood of SEXTVS POMPEIVS in Sicilia was displeasing unto him, so he attended an occasion to warre against him: which having resolved, he prepared a great fleet for that purpose, under pretext that POMPEY with his gallies and ships hindred the comming of prouision of corne into Italie. These warres of Sicilia were long (resting sometimes) and continued certaine yeeres. In the beginning whereof OCTAVIVS had ill successe, more through tempests and foule weather at Sea, then the force of his enemies, although there were some fights betweene the ships of either partie; but by tempest and shipwrack OCTAVIVS lost sundry fleetes. And if SEXTVS POMPEIVS had beene as able to offend and conquer as he was to defend himselfe, and overthrow his enemie; and as he was valiant, if he had beene wise and politicke, most authors affirme, that he might have greatly distressed OCTAVIAN in all matters concerning Italie. But the matter was so handled, that in this warre MARCVS ANTONIVS came twice out of Græcia into Italie, whither hee came from the East at OCTAVIANVS request; in one of which journeyes hee came to Brundusium: and not finding him there according to his appointment, and as he had sent him word, he returned without seeing him, upon some suspicions and jealousies which greyve betweene them. Wherefore OCTAVIANVS having lost the most and best part of his Navie in a storme, he sent MECENAS his private friend unto him; at whose intreatie, MARCVS ANTONIVS returned againe into Italie with three hundred sayle of ships and gallies, giving it out; that hee came to CÆSARS ayde: And notwithstanding that there were some differences & jealousies betwene them, yet in the end OCTAVIA, who came thither (being wife to the one, and sister to the other) prevailed so much as shee reconciled them, so as they met together in the mouth of a River neere to Taretum, where MARCVS ANTONIVS gave to OCTAVIAN one hundred and twentie gallies for the warres: and OCTAVIAN gave to him certaine troupes of Italian trained souldiers; and they renewed their Triumvirat for other five yeeres then begun: MARCVS ANTONIVS returned towards the East, to the warre which he had begun against the Parthians (which concerne not mee to write) his wife OCTAVIA and her children remayning in Rome.

The first warre between Octavian & Sextus Pompeius.

Octavius and Antonie parle and agree by the means of Octavia.

ANTONIE being gone; OCTAVIANVS, who was resolved to prosecute the warres with all his forces against SEXTVS POMPEIVS (whom it seemed fortune and the winds did favour) was not contented with the arming of two navies (AGRIPPA being Captaine of the one, and himselfe of the other) but he earnestly intreated LEPIDVS, a Triumvir & his companion, to come from Africa to his aide: who came with such power, as APPIANVS affirmeth, that he brought with him a thousand ships little and great, and foure score gallies, wherin hee transported five thousand horse, and twelve legions of foote. SEXTVS POMPEIVS, whose power by Sea was very strong, seeing so great preparations made against him, did marvailously fortifie all places upon the Sea side in Sicilia; and on the frontiers of Africa, neere unto Lilybæum, he placed a very good Captaine called PLINIVS, with good troupes of souldiers: his whole fleet by Sea (whereof he was aboundantly provided) he drew together in the port at Mesina, where he purposed to follow the warres with his shippes and gallies, for by land he was neither of such experience nor power; and in this order hee stood ready to prosecute it, which APPIANVS, TITVS LIVIVS, and LVCIVS FLORVS write at large. The summe whereof is, that LEPIDVS parting with his whole fleete from Africa, was overtaken with a tempest, wherein with great losse of his Shippes, hee landed at Lilybæum; and having taken certaine places in those parts, he might have done much hurt: but being of small judgement and little experience in the wars, hee managed it with greater cost and outward shew, then to any effect or profit.

Octavius last second warre with Sextus Pompeius.

And the very same day that he was in that tempest, OCTAVIVS also was at sea, & lost thirty galies, besides Foists & Brigandines, & with much difficulty returned into Italie: and TAVRVS, who had had the command of the gallies, which MARCVS ANTONIVS left with him, the same day tooke land at Tarentum, with great losse and danger; so as it seemed that the winds and weather tooke part with POMPEY. Wherewith OCTAVIANVS was so much grieved, as he was in doubt to have given over the warre for that yeere: but altering his determination, hee repaired his Navies and Armies, and commanded AGRIPPA with a great fleet to passe into Sicilia, and there to make warre by Sea and Land: and hee with all the rest afterwards did the like.

Octavianus puts away his wife Scribonia, and marrieth Livia.

In this time, or a little before (as it seemeth by SVETONIVS) OCTAVIANVS divorced himselfe from SCRIBONIA, notwithstanding that hee had by her one daughter, called LIVIA, and married LIVIA DRVSILLA: wherefore TIBERIVS NERO, to whom she was married, and by him had a sonne called TIBERIVS as his father, was driven to leave her, which hee unwillingly did, to please OCTAVIANVS, she being with child of a son. This LIVIA he much loved, and continued with her til his death. But returning to our history of the war; I say, that AGRIPPA assaulted & tooke certaine places upon the coast of Sicilia: which when POMPEY understood, hee departed from Messina, to relieve them; at which time hee had of his owne, and of Pirats which served him, one hundred seventy and five Galleys.

A battaile by Sea.

It is a wonderfull thing to consider the great Fleets that were put to sea in those dayes. AGRIPPA being advertised of his comming, put his Galleys, being almost equall in number, in a readinesse to encounter him; & so they joyned battaile: wherin, although at first the victory was doubtful, yet in a short space it plainly appeared, that AGRIPPA had the better: which POMPEY perceiving, fled, before he would be wholly overthrowne, and his gallies and foysts withdrew themselves to some places and Rivers neere at hand. But AGRIPPA, for that his Gallies were greater, could not follow the chase, nor come so neere the shore as he would: but yet notwithstanding, POMPEY lost thirtie of his Gallies. AGRIPPA the next day went to a citie called Tindaria, which he thought to get by reason of certain secret intelligence he had with those of the Citie: and POMPEY, in the darke of the night, giving secret advice to his whole fleet, tooke his course toward Messina. And OCTAVIAN, to lose no occasion, embarked abord his ships and gallies a great part of his armie; and passing over into Sicilia, set them on shore, appointing CORNIFICIVS for their Commander, little thinking that POMPEY had beene so neere; of whom he was in great danger, if hee had beene so dainely charged by him: so as if POMPEY had then given him battaile, hee had defeated him. But hee losing that oportunity, OCTAVIAN embarked himselfe againe, with intent to determine the quarrell by a battaile at Sea, leaving CORNIFICIVS with his land souldiers fortified on land: and POMPEY, with the same desire, after some accidents which happened, sailed out of Messina with all his whole fleete: and neither partie refusing it, they came to fight; in which conflict (although the historie recite it with some difference) OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR was overcome, and all his great Fleet scatered and lost, and hee driven to flie into Italy in a Brigandine, where hee escaped many dangers; and in the end arrived where his Armie was; whereof MESALLA was General: & being nothing discouraged with this losse, he presently tooke order for all that was needefull. To Rome he sent in hast his familiar friend MECENAS, to foresee that these newes should breed no alteration: and by a Brigandine he presently sent direction to AGRIPPA, who (as is said) was Admiral of his other fleete, that with the greatest speede that might bee, hee should goe to succour CORNIFICIVS, who remained in Sicilia with his Armie by land: and to LEPIDVS he sent word, that (all matters set aside) hee should make his present repaire to the Isle of Lipari, which is betweene Sicilia and Calabria; whither hee should come so soone as hee might possibly.

Octavianus Cæsar overcome in a battell at sea by Sextus Pompeius.

With these provisions, and the diligence and good order which hee tooke, hee so much prevailed, as within a short time, being holpen with the wars which LEPIDVS and AGRIPPA made (in despite of POMPEY) he passed over all his forces into Sicilia. And joyning himself with LEPIDVS, he encamped neer to the citie of Messina, where the war began to be most cruell both by sea and land: which truely was admirable, to consider the power and sufficiency of POMPEY, to know how to defend himselfe against so great enemies. Who seeing himselfe oppressed, (notwithstanding that hee had well fortified the land, and wanted no forces for his defence by sea) he sent a challenge to OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, with this message; that to avoide the effusion of blood, and to make an end of the warre; although hee were were well provided and furnished with singular good Gallies, and well trayned souldiers; yet that hee would come to a battaile by Sea, so manie against so manie Shippes and Galleys; whereunto were made many answers and delaies, but in the end they agreed to doe so. And appointing the number, which were three hundred Ships and Galleys of either side; and the time and place set downe, eyther of these Commanders prepared himselfe as strongly as hee could for the battaile: and OCTAVIANVS, leaving LEPIDVS with his Armie by land, embarked himselfe in his Fleet; and POMPEY doing the like, they joyned battaile; which, without doubt was one of the most cruell that ever was, considering the Commaunders and power of either part: wherein, after that POMPEY had done all that which to a good and valiant Captaine did appertaine, and after the death of much people of either side, he was overcome by OCTAVIANVS, and all his Fleete was taken, burnt, or sunke, saving xvi Sayles which escaped by flight, and hee in one of them; and so hee entred into the haven at Messina: The which though it were sufficiently fortified, & that he knew, PLINIVS, a Captaine of his (as is aforesaid) came to his rescue: yet, acknowledging that all sufficed not to defend him from such powerfull enemies, in a darke night he imbarked himselfe in a Galley; and with the other xvj which escaped, abandoning Sicilia, he fled towards the East, and sayled to MARCVS ANTONIVS, in hope to have found some relieefe with him; but it happened contrary to his expectation: for being arrived, after some great toyle and accidents that happened (which for brevity I omit) hee was slaine at the command of MARCVS ANTONIVS, by the hands of one named TICIVS. And so ended the power of SEXTVS POMPEIVS (which truly was very great) and in him the house and memorie of his father the Great POMPEY.

A battell by sea.

Octavianus Cæsar overthrew Sextus Pompeius.

The death of Sextus Pompeius.

It is a great example, and a fayre document of the inconstancie of all things in this life, to see and read the changes in the Historie which wee are now to relate. For when it seemeth that matters succeede in such sort as quietnesse and peace may ensue, then begin new alterations, and greater troubles; as wee have seene hitherto, and shall see hereafter in the processe of this discourse.

SVETONIVS writes, that at the very instant of this naval Battaile, OCTAVIVS was in such a sound sleepe, as his friends were faine to waken him, and to rayse him from his bed to give the signal; wherewith ANTONY did afterwards reproach him, that hee could not with his eyes see his battaile arranged, but lay like a senslesse corps on his backe, looking up unto the skie, and that hee never came in sight of his soldiers, untill that M. AGRIPPA had put twelve of his enemies shippes to flight.

Hee escaped many dangers in this warre. For having transported part of his Armie into Sicilie, and sayling backe againe to conduct the rest from the firme Land; hee was at unawares surprized by DEMOCHARES, and APOLLAPHANES, Lievetenants and Admirals to POMPEY: from whom, with great difficultie hee escaped with one onely Barke. In like sort, travailing by land to Rhegium; neere to Locris, seeing a farre off, certaine of POMPEYES Gallies neere the shore; and supposing them to bee his owne, hee went downe, and was in danger to have beene taken by them: And even then seeking to escape away by unknowne passages, a Bond-slave of ÆMILIVS PAVLVS his familiar friend; grieving that his masters Father PAVLVS had in times past beene proscribed by him: he imbraced this oportunitie of revenge, and attempted to kill him.

OCTAVIANVS, having obtained so great a victorie (although not without great losse) going to land with his Shippes, and the Armie; hee commanded AGRIPPA presently to joyne with LEPIDVS and goe to Messina, whither PLINIVS POMPEIVS Captaine had retyred himselfe (after POMPEYS flight) with all his troupes; who, for that he would not stand upon his defence, yeelded himselfe to LEPIDVS, with all his Legions: whereof LEPIDVS grew so proud, that coveting to have all Sicilia for himselfe, hee presumed to contend with OCTAVIAN: And entring into the citie of Messina (notwithstanding that AGRIPPA requested him to stay for OCTAVIANVS) hee placed a Garrison therein to his owne use, and did the like in many other places in that Iland. And OCTAVIAN being come, hee sent the next day to speake with him, greatly complayning of his proceedings.

But as in rule and command, equalitie is intolerable; so either of them coveting the Ile of Sicilia particularly for himselfe, they fell at variance, and OCTAVIANVS made his Navie to draw neere the shore: both Armies beganne to stand upon their guard, the one against against the other, and many messages and complaints passed betweene them: in the end although they met and spake together, yet they could not agree. But as OCTAVIAN was much more beloved and better esteemed by the men of warre for his many vertues and nobilitie, and for the names sake and remembrance of IVLIVS CAESAR, this dissension did much grieve them all, and both the one part and the other laid all the fault on LEPIDVS. Which when OCTAVIAN understood, before that they would fall so farre out as to take armes, he practised secretly with sundrie in LEPIDVS his Armie, and with gifts and promises drew them to his will: so as having well effected this device, hee one day with a great troope of horsemen roade neere to LEPIDVS his Campe: and singling himselfe from his companie, hee began to parley with his souldiers, complaining of him, and laying the fault of all that was like to ensue, upon LEPIDVS: which being heard by them, many of them began to come over to his side. LEPIDVS, advertised hereof, commanded the alarme to be given, and to sally out against him; so as they skirmished, where in the beginning, OCTAVIAN was in some danger, but it continued not long: for the most part of LEPIDVS troupes passed over to OCTAVIAN, whom LEPIDVS could not containe; but, seing himselfe in danger to be abandoned by his whole armie, for his last refuge, he yeelded himselfe into CAESARS power; and putting off his robe of General, went out of his Tent, and submitted himselfe unto OCTAVIANVS, humbly intreating him to pardon him: whom OCTAVIAN received, as if he had never offended him, very courteously and honourably, but he restored him neither to his estate nor power, but sent him to Rome well accompained, and entertained, but without Magistracy or office, with the dignity of highest Priest onely; which he had ever held from the death of IVLIVS CAESAR, whose it was: and so this quarrell was ended without battaile or bloodshed, which some feared would have brought both danger and ruine.

Lepidus deprived of his province of Africa.

OCTAVIANVS CAESAR remained Lord of Sicilia: and, depriving LEPIDVS of the Triumvirat, he appropriated to himselfe the province of Africa, and remained General of the three Armies, viz. that which was LEPIDVS armie, POMPEIES, and his owne, wherein APPIANVS affirmeth, were 45 Legions of footmen, and 25000 horse, well armed, besides many other light horsemen and Numidians: which seemeth not incredible to him that considereth how great a part of the world they commanded which levied the same. He affirmeth also, that there were then at sea, and upon the coast 600 Gallies, and a greater number of Ships, Foists, & Brigandines: And although that OCTAVIANVS had these great forces, yet would hee not pursue or send after POMPEY, who (as we have said) fled, which he did (as some did suspect) supposing that MARCVS ANTONIVS would have harboured and succoured him, being glad that occasion might be offered to quarrell with him, for that now there was no other man living that was an eye-sore unto him: or else he did it, as he himselfe said afterwards, for that POMPEY was none of those which conspired CAESARS death. And purposing now to disperse his forces, and to returne to Rome, he paid his souldiers, giving Coronets, and other honours and armes to those which had performed any notable exploits in the warres: and having given many gifts, and made many fayre promises to his legions, pardoning the Captaines and souldiers which had followed POMPEY, and in the best manner that he could, paying and contenting LEPIDVS his companies, he sent them home to their houses; notwithstanding that there were some scandals and mutinies: but he pacified and brought all in good order. Leaving in Sicilie: and sending into Africa, Pretors & Governors, he tooke his way towards Rome, where he was received with ovation (which was little lesse then a tryumph) with incredible joy and honour, and began to be so beloved and esteemed, as in many places they erected Temples and Altars unto him, as to their gods; and hee reformed all things which by reason of the wars and troubles were corrupted and out of order. It would be a long discourse to relate the particulars of all things which he did in Rome and in the provinces, as well concerning the governement & justice, as the decency and beautifying thereof.

An exceeding great assembly of men of war.

At this time, MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was in the East; although that in the Parthian warre hee had no prosperous successe: yet neverthelesse he was still of great power, very rich, and greatly obeyed in all the provinces of Grecia, Asia, Egypt, and in all the rest of his governments. But he was so much blinded and besotted with the love and companie of CLEOPATRA Queene of Egypt, as he thought of nothing but how to satisfie her humor, being unable to leave her, or to have any regard or remembrance of his wife OCTAVIA, sister to OCTAVIANVS, who in beautie and wisdome was nothing inferior to her, and in vertue and goodnesse did farre excell her.

Antony captivated by Cleopatra.

And

And so the Monarchie of the world was divided betweene these two, the one in the East and the other in the West: and as the desire and gredinesse to raigne is endlesse, and the thirst with continuance encreaseth; as though that each of them had not had enough to his share, both of them bethought themselves how they might be able to obtaine the whole. Principally OCTAVIAN seeing that ANTONY cared not for his sister, neither sent for her after that hee had left her in Rome, he therefore continually advised and urged her to goe to her husband, to have (as I conceive) occasion to fall out with him (as PLVTARCH observes in the life of ANTONY) if she were not well entertained. And she not understanding this device, with an intent to prevent all controversies that might arise betweene her husband and her brother, departed from Rome, bearing with her many jewels and presents, which she had gathered together to present them to MARCVS ANTONIVS, as VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS reportes. But he who had fixed his heart upon CLOPATRA wrote to her upon the way, that shee should stay in Grecia in the citie of Athens, untill he should returne from the journey which he intended against the Parthians; the which he never performed, CLEOPATRA hindring the same. Finally, to be briefe (for otherwaies there were much to say) OCTAVIA sent all those things which shee brought with her, to her husband; and this nothing availing, shee returned to Rome sorrowfull, and forsaken. Whereunpon OCTAVIAN began openly to complaine of MARCVS ANTONIVS, and to shew himselfe his enemy: and MARCVS ANTONIVS (who had the same desire) entred into league and amity with the King of the Medes in Asia, causing CLEOPATRA (besides the title of Egypt) to be called Queene of Syria, Lybia, and Cyprus; and joyntly with her a sonne of hers named CÆSARION, of vvhom (as we haue already said) IVLIVS CÆSAR left her with child vvhen he was in Egypt; and to two sonnes which he had by her, the one named PTOLOMY, and the other ALEXANDER, he gave titles of kings: to ALEXANDER, of Armenia and Parthinia, which he meant to conquer; and to PTOLOMY, of Cilicia and Phœnicia: for which and many other causes which vvere offered, the hatred betvveene him and OCTAVIAN was apparant; but the warre was yet deferred, for that OCTAVIAN was hindred by the wars in Illyricū & Dalmatia, now called Slavonia. The people of which countries, seeing the civil warres of the Romans, rebelled, with other nations which conspired with them, and did assist them, although not subjects as they were, to wit, the two Pannonia: the upper, which is now Austria; and the lower, which is Hungary, and Noricum, which is now part of Bavaria, with other their borderers and neighbours. Which war OCTAVIAN undertooke of purpose, and followed it in his owne person, the which was very cruell and dangerous: wherin he was twice wounded, and made marveilous proofe of his person, both for valour and wisdome: wherein there passed great and famous actions, which require a large field to relate. APPIANVS, in his sixt booke which he calleth Illyricus, writeth thereof at large: and also VELLEIVS PATERCVLVS, although more briefly LVCIVS FLORVS, and TITVS LIVIVS abbreviated by him and some others. The end thereof was, that OCTAVIAN not onely subdued and tamed Illiricum, and sundrie Nations contained under that name, but also the Pannonia's, and the rest which had conspired with those of Illyricum, partly by himselfe in person, and partly by his Captaines.

These victories being obtained, OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR came victorious to Rome: and notwithstanding that the triumph was granted unto him, yet he would not tryumph as then; so great was the desire he had to make war against MARCVS ANTONIVS, who was no better affected unto him: but he levied soldiers, procured friends and armes against him, and promised his friend CLEOPATRA, to bring her triumphing into Rome. LVCIVS FLORVS, writeth, that she requested of him the rule and Empyre of Rome, and he promised it her: as though the Romans had beene more easie to subdue then the Parthians. And matters standing on these tearmes, MARCVS ANTONIVS sent to his Wife OCTAVIA, sister to OCTAVIANVS, a divorcement and renunciation of his marriage, in such manner as then was accustomed, commanding her to goe out of his house, wherein she dwelt in Rome: All which, with many other indignities OCTAVIAN imparted to the Senate, complaining against him, and in his orations and speeches to the people, accusing him, that the second five years of his Triumvirat & league being expired, without comming to Rome, or respecting the authority of the Senate, he exercised the same, and held the possession of Grecia and the provinces of the East, and so used many speeches against MARCVS ANTONIVS to incense the people against him.

retayning those prouinces and others which he held; and that therein he had no respect of him, neither had he given him any part thereof; and that hee detained the gallies which hee lent him for that Warre: and besides this, that he had practised meanes to deprive LEPIDVS, and so held all the prouinces of Africa, and all the Legions which were his, without imparting any thing thereof vnto him; and that he had giuen the lands of all Italy to his Souldiers, not contributing any part thereof vnto his. And in this manner the one accused the other, and either of them made shew, that he was vrged and enforced to vndertake this warre. But the truth is, they both desired to be Lords of the whole: and in my opinion, vaine-glorie, ambition, couetousnesse, and enuie, moued them thereto, each of them putting his determination in effect, & calling diuers Nations to their aydes; so as the whole world in a manner, either of the one side or other, was in armes: those of the West in the behalfe of OCTAVIAN, and those of the East in fauour of MARCVS ANTONIVS; at the least, the best and most choise men of all, although not so many as they might haue leuied: for the Romanes neuer vsed to make warres with such huge multitudes and excessiue armies as they should not be well able to maintaine and rule, as the Persians and other barbarous nations did.

The causes of the warre betweene Octauianus and Marcus Antonius, and the beginning thereof.

ANTONY was first in field, and came with great troupes to the famous citie of Ephesus, which was in Ionia a prouince in Asia the lesse, whither he had sent for his ships and Nauie, to passe into Europe, and had there in readinesse 800. galleys and ships of burthen; 200 whereof CLEOPATRA gaue to him with all the munition and victuals necessarie for the fleete; and her selfe he caried with him, contrarie to the opinion of all those which were of his councell: And herewith sayled to the Ile of Samos, whither he had appointed to come by a prefixed day, all the Kings, Terrarchs and people of those cities which serued him in this warre, and from thence he went to Athens. PLVTARCH sets downe the Kings which came with him, and those which sent forces to his aide, part whereof were friends and allies to the Empire, and others vassals and subiects; to which were giuen the title and gouernment of prouinces: of which he names TARCONDEMVS of the vpper Cilicia, and ARCHELAVS of Cappadocia, PHILADELPHVS of Paphlagonia, and MITHRIDATES of Comagena, with others; besides those which sent their forces, as HERODES king of Iudea, AMYNTAS of Lycaonia, and the king of Arabia, the king of the Medes, and PALEMON king of Pontus, with some others: wherein (it was said) he brought 100000 good and well trained footmen, and 22000. horse: and according to the same PLVTARCH, besides this armie by land, his Nauie by Sea consisted of fiue hundred galleys, besides the ships of burthen which carried the munition and victuals.

The people and preparation of Marcus Antonius.

Although that in the number of Ships and Gallies Authors doe varie, yet it should not diminish the credit of the History; sithence that in actions which passe now adaies the which we see with our eyes, we can hardly know the certaine number of Ships and Armies. MARCVS ANTONIVS came with such power, as Historiographers affirme, that if he had presently taken his passage for Italy, he had put OCTAVIAN to his shifts, and in great hazard: for he had not then sufficient forces leuied to haue fought with him, neither had he necessary prouision for the warres. And so MARCVS ANTONIVS delaying the time, he was taxed with want of discretion, knowledge and foresight of the good fortune which was offred him. For he spent so much time in Athens, that OCTAVIAN had leasure to prouide all things wanting, from Italy, France, Spaine, and other prouinces vnder his subiection: and leuying 80000. choise and well trained Souldiers, and aboue 20000. horse; seeing that ANTONIE stayed so long, he sent him word, that for as much as he had Ships & prouision fit, he should draw neere to Italie, where he staied in field to giue him battaile, promising to giue him free Ports and Hauens, where hee might safely take landing without any interruption, to the end that he might the more commodiously order and prouide all things thereto necessarie. Whereto ANTONY answered, that it would be more honourable, if he would determine this quarrell in person against him bodie to body, which he vvould vvillingly accept; notwithstanding that he vvas now old and crazed, and the other young and lusty: and if he liked not hereof, he would stay for him with his Army in the fields of Pharsalia, in the same place where his father IVLIVS CÆSAR fought with GNEVS POMPEIVS.

These Embassies and messages passing betweene them, vvithout effect; ANTONY drew his Army by land, and his Nauy by Sea, towards the coast of Italy; and OCTAVIAN, drawing his Ships to Brundusium, embarked his legions, and crossing the Sea came to a place called Torma, in the prouince of Epire, vvhich is now called Romania. After certaine notable exploits which passed, the two Armies drew neere, and the like did the Nauies by Sea. OCTAVIANVS Nauie vie (as PLVTARCH affirmeth) consisted of 250. galleys, but better appointed and swifter, then MARCVS ANTONIVS his galleys were, which were more in number, although (as I haue said) Authors, in this matter, agree not: but the most common opinion is, as I haue said. But howsoeuer it were, MARCVS ANTONIVS, perswaded by CLEOPATRA (who euen in this also was the cause of his ruine) would needes trie his fortune in a battaile at Sea, notwithstanding that in his armie by land hee had the aduantage. CLEOPATRA did this (as some write, and as it after appeared) thereby to haue the better meanes to flie if the battaile should be lost. ANTONY chusing 22000. men out of his armie, put them aboord his fleet, vvhich was neere at hand: and OCTAVIAN, who refused not to fight at sea, made his prouision also for the battaile; and shipping himselfe aboord the galleys, committed the charge of his armie by land, to TAVRVS: and ANTONY doing the like left his forces with CANIDIVS; in sight of both which, these two most powerfull Captaines with the best troupes and Nauies of the world, tooke the Seas, where they fought for no lesse then the Empire and Monarchie of the world. The which was deferred for three daies space in despite of both parties, the Seas swelling so high as they could not gouerne their vessels. The fourth day they came to encounter at a Cape called Actius, which is in Epire, not far from whence were their armies by land. The battaile was one of the most cruell that hath beene written of: for it lasted tenne houres before that OCTAVIAN, who was the victor, did wholly obtaine the victorie, although that ANTONY staied not so long in the fight: for as CLEOPATRA knew better how to mollifie and soften mens harts, then to encourage them; in the hottest and greatest furie of the battaile, with a feminine hart vnable to endure the sight of so furious a spectacle, she fled away in her galley, whome 70 of her other galleyes followed; which is not to be woundred at, but how she durst stay so long. But the vnfortunate MARCVS ANTONIVS, who all his life time had been a valiant and worthie Captaine, that day metamorphosed into CLEOPATRA, seeing her galley flie, whereon he had fixed his heart & eyes, went out of his (for that it seemed too heauy) and embarking himselfe in another more swift (desiring rather to flie with CLEOPATRA) then to conquer without her) followed her, without respect of his Armies by land or sea: and, ouertaking her, he went aboord the same galley wherein she was; wherein hee sailed three daies without seeing or speaking to her, for shame (as it is most likely) for the great weakenes which he had shewed. And after some wandring, hee arrived in the Port at Alexandria in Egypt, where hee after wards ended his life, as we will declare.

The shamefull flight of Marcus Antonius.

Octauianus his victorie.

His Armie which he left fighting, although without a captaine, made resistance as I haue said, whereof there were slaine about fiue thousand men: but in the end it was wholly ouerthrowne, more through want of a captaine, then through any force of the enemie: although some write, that the lightnes and swiftnes of OCTAVIANS gallies was a great help vnto him, and so he remained conqueror, and graunted life and pardon to the conquered, and had in his power three hundred of their gallies. In the armie by land there wanted neither constancie, nor faith to their generall ANTONIE, although abandoned by him; who continued seuen dayes in their campe readie to giue battaile, without accepting any composition or offer, made vnto them by OCTAVIAN (with a shew that they would yet haue stayed longer) if CANIDIVS, whom ANTONIE left in his place, had not abused his charge, as he who had giuen him that charge had done. For it happened after seuen dayes that he fled secretly in the night from the campe to seeke ANTONIE, and abandoned the armie: which being forsaken, yeelded to the enemie, and OCTAVIAN vsed his victorie with great clemencie: which being obtained, he either thought it not good, or could not at that time pursue ANTONIE, but tooke his way towards the citie of Athens, where taking order for all matters in Græcia; by reason of some mutinies of his souldiars in Italie (as SVETONIVS writs) he returned thither, where he stayed somewhat longer then he would haue done, aswell by reason of the former letts, as the euill weather to saile in, which followed.

Octauius goes into Egypt against Antonie.

After all this, OCTAVIANVS hauing set all things necessarie in a readinesse, he sailed with great forces into Egypt, with a resolution to make an end with MARCVS ANTONIVS (as indeede he did) and arriued neere to the citie of Alexandria: where ANTONIE (recouering courage, and Queene CLEOPATRA making great preparation for the warres, in the time of OCTAVIANVS his stay) had leuied great forces, both of foote and horse for their defence. They had also a great nauie by sea, as well of CLEOPATRA's, as of those which came from other places: and MARCVS ANTONIVS with his old courage, which now too late and to no purpose he recouered, tooke the field and entertaining a skirmish with CÆSARS horsmen, which which were then landed and ſtrongly entrenched, he vſed ſuch skill, and charged them with ſuch dexteritie, as he made them flie to their ſtrength: and being returned to the citie, he againe ſent to challenge OCTAVIANVS to fight with him body to body. Whereto CÆSAR anſwered, that MARCVS ANTONIVS had other waies and meanes enough in a readineſs to die, without dying by his hands.

Antonie challengeth Octauius, and his anſwere.

ANTONIE receiuing this anſwere, determined to die fighting, although it happened otherwiſe. The next day in the morning he againe ſalied forth with an intent to fight; and ſtanding vpon a high ground, looking towards the ſea, hee ſawe that his nauie and gallies moued, and made towards OCTAVIAN his fleete; which he thought they had done, with a reſolution to fight: and ſtaying a little to ſee the ſequell, within a while, he ſaw them ioyne together in companie, by meanes of a ſecret practice paſt betweene them. Which when hee ſaw, and fearing the like in thoſe which he brought with him to field, he returned to the citie, ſuſpecting and affirming that CLEOPATRA had betraied him, although that in truth ſhe was blameleſs therein: and ſhe being aduertiſed of what ANTONIE had ſaid, ſtoode in feare of him; and withdrew hir ſelfe into a ſtrong temple or ſepulcher: and commaunding the doores thereof to be ſhut and fortified, ſhe ſent ſome fainedly to tell him that ſhe had ſlaine her ſelfe with her owne hands. Which MARCVS ANTONIVS beleeued as firmely as though he had ſeene it, and refuſing to liue any longer, without ſtay to die fighting; after he had vttered certaine ſpeeches, he ſtabbed his poiniard into his owne breſt, and ſo (deadly wounded) he fell downe vpon a bed in a ſwoune. And within a while comming againe to himſelf, being aduertiſed that CLEOPATRA was yet liuing, he made himſelfe to be carried thither where ſhe was: who receiued him with ſo many teares and ſuch pitifull complaints, as he being ſo neere death, began to comfort her, ſaying, that ſhe ought not lament for him, neither to hold him for vnfortunate, ſith hee accounted not himſelfe ſo, for he had been a great captaine and very powerfull, and in the end died ouercome by the Romans. He counſelled her to yeeld to the mercie of OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, and ſpeaking theſe words (his ſtrength failing within a little while after) he dyed: and ſo ended the power and life of MARCVS ANTONIVS. Who in truth for matters of war was very famous: and if his excellent wit and courageous mind had not been captiuated with the loue of CLEOPATRA, after IVLIVS CÆSAR he was in election to haue obtained the monarchie of the world: but it appeared plainely that the ſtars and the diuine powers were inclined to fauour OCTAVIVS.

Antonie kills himſelfe.

OCTAVIANVS hauing intelligence hereof, and of the bad order and guard of the city, marched thither with his forces and entred the ſame, ſending to comfort CLEOPATRA, and to make great offers vnto her, to the end ſhe ſhould not kill her ſelfe; and going to ſee her in perſon, he did the like: but all his care little auailed. For ſhe being aduertiſed, that he would ſend her to Rome, and would carrie her and her ſonnes in his triumph, choſe rather to dye, then that he ſhould triumph ouer her: and ſome ſay, that ſhe tooke poiſon which ſhee had prouided for that purpoſe, wherewith ſhe killed her ſelfe. Others (and this is the moſt common) that ſhe put an Aſpicque to her arme (which is a certaine kinde of Serpent or venemous Adder) to the end that it ſhould ſting her, which was brought to her in a basket of flowers; ſo as ſhee was found dead without any ſigne of blow or wound, but as if ſhe had bin aſleep. Whereat OCTAVIAN was much grieued (not without great admiration at the reſolution and courage of that woman) and he commanded her to be buried in the ſame Sepulchre wherein ſhe had entombed her ſelf, together with MARCVS ANTONIVS, with whom ſhe had liued and raigned 14. yeares, ſhe being 39. yeares old when ſhe dyed, and MARCVS ANTONIVS 56, or (after ſome) 53. He commaunded the tombe which they had begun, to be finiſhed.

The death of Cleopatra.

OCTAVIANVS eaſily pardoned all thoſe which had ſerued or ſent ſuccours to MARCVS ANTONIVS, and alſo his children, which were ſeauen, by three women, FVLVIA, OCTAVIA ſiſter to OCTAVIANVS, and CLEOPATRA; ſauing the eldeſt, which he commanded to be ſlaine, and the like he did by CÆSARION CLEOPATRAS ſonne by IVLIVS CÆSAR, of whom we haue alreadie made mention: the eldeſt (they ſay) he ſlue vpon particular diſpleaſure which he conceiued againſt him; and CESARION, by the counſell of ARRIVS a Philoſopher, who told him that it would not do well to haue many CÆSARS; an vſuall thing among Princes to ſecure their eſtates.

The clemencie of Octauius to Antonies children.

This buſineſs touching MARCVS ANTONIVS being ended, and the kingdome of Egypt made a tributarie prouince, that it might bee fit to yeeld corne and victuals for the Citie of Rome; he viewed the tombe with the bodie of ALEXANDER the great, taken newly out of the the vault or ſecret Chappell where it had beene layd; hee ſet a coronet of gold vpon it, and ſtrewing flowers theron worſhipped it; and being demanded if he would looke vpon the PTOLOMIES, he anſwered that his deſire was to ſee a King, and not the dead.

Afterwards paſſing through Syria and Aſia the leſſe, leauing all quiet and in peace, he paſſed into Gracia, and there doing the like, he came into Italy; where hauing ended all ciuill warres, and the whole Empire being ſubiect to himſelfe alone; he entred into Rome in triumph, with the greateſt feaſts and ſolemnities of the Senat and the people of all Italy, that could be deuiſed or imagined. It was granted vnto him to triumph three times; to wit, for the victorie in Illiricum, and for the victorie in his battaile by Sea, and the ouerthrow of MARCVS ANTONIVS, the conqueſt of the Kingdome of Egypt, and Queene CLEOPATRA, whoſe ſtatue was placed in his triumph, with the Aſpicques ſet to the veines of her armes.

And ſo OCTAVIANVS finiſhed the building, and erected the Monarchie which his Vncle IVLIVS CÆSAR had begun and founded: which (at it ſeemeth by PAVLVS OROSIVS his computation) was ſixteene yeeres after the death of IVLIVS CÆSAR. And although that hee obtained it by meanes hardly juſtifiable, yet truely, he afterwards governed it moſt juſtly and wiſely, and was one of the beſt Princes that ever was in the world; gentle, mercifull, liberal, juſt, valiant, indued with many vertues and excellencies, moſt happie and fortunate in all his affaires, and beloved above meaſure of all men.

Octauianus an excellent Prince

As there was no man to contend with OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, and he ſo beloved of all men (as is aforeſaid) the people & Senate of Rome gaue him a new name, which before that time was never heard of, AVGVSTVS; & ſo he was afterwards called CÆSAR AVGVSTVS: a name which they held for holy, venerable, of great majeſtie, and which appertained to the Gods and their temples; as wee finde it vſed by CICERO, VIRGIL, OVID, and other authors; although that ſome derive it from the Verbe augeo, in Latine, to increaſe, becauſe that OCTAVIAN enlarged and increaſed the Empire: and ſome others give it other derivations; but whether ſoeuer be the moſt certaine, it was given him for the moſt honourable name of al others: they alſo called him father of his Countrey, & gaue him all the other titles & names they could deuiſe.

Titles giuen to Octauius.

CÆSAR AVGVSTVS (for this name henceforth we ſometimes give him) ſeeing himſelfe now in ſuch quiet, & without war with any perſon or nation in the world; commanded the temple of IANVS to be ſhut, which they religiouſly obſerued that during the warres it ſhould ſtand open; and never had beene ſhut but twiſe from the foundation of Rome, according to TITVS LIVIVS, LVCIVS FLORVS, and PLVTARCH, and other Authors: once in the time of NVMA POMPILIVS, ſecond King thereof; and the other after the end of the ſecond Punick warres, which they waged with Carthage, whenas TITVS MANLIVS was Conſul. I know that ſome Authors ſet this ſhutting vp of IANVS temple by OCTAVIAN to be a great while after, at the time of the birth of Chriſt our Saviour. But in this place I follow the authority of PAVLVS OROSIVS, a Chriſtian Author, who vſed great diligence and truth, and is of a 200 yeeres antiquitie; who reckoneth, that CÆSAR AVGVSTVS ſhut this temple three times; whereof this was the firſt; and I hold his opinion for certaine: for hee is aſſiſted by the authority of TITVS LIVIVS, who in his firſt booke affirmeth, that AVGVSTVS did ſhut this temple after the warres with ANTONY: and LVCIVS FLORVS, and other Authors ſet downe, that this temple was ſhut after that. And hereby it appeareth, that OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR did ſhut the temple of IANVS more then once, and every one ſheweth his time when; and PAVLVS OROSIVS all, which was thriſe, ſetting downe the time to every one of them, as he noteth; which is alſo drawne out of SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS, following the letter, as PHILIPPVS BEROALDVS followeth. I haue a deſire to ſet this downe here (although it little importeth) to the end that the varietie and difference which the Reader ſhall finde among Authors ſhall not offend him; and that hee may know that I haue an approued Author whom I follow, though I name him not, if he ſhall finde ought written by me contrary to that which he hath read. OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR, living in this peace and tranquillitie, omitted no part of his care for the gouernement of the Romane Common-wealth, and Prouinces thereof; ſending thither Pretors, Proconſuls, and other Gouernours, which were excellent men, to rule and governe; and himſelfe gaue direction, and was very diligent in all things touching juſtice, cuſtomes, religion, and publike buildings: ſo as in all things his raigne was moſt happie, peaceable, and quiet; and ſo it continued during his life.

could the gods give that to men which OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR AVGVSTVS, after his victories and returne to Rome, did bring and give to the Romane people, and the whole Empire. Notwithstanding that this was common to them all (as great minds naturally affect libertie) yet in that so prosperous a time, some people and nations were so presumptuous as to shake off the Romane yoke, and to molest and disquiet the Empire; as the Spaniards, the nations of Illyricum and the Pannonians. In Spaine the Cantabrians, which are the Alaveses and Biskains, the Asturians, and part of Gallicia were not onely unwilling to obey; but passing their limits, began to make warre against the subjects of the Empire. OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR knowing this, holding it to be a doubtfull warre, and of importance, commanded (as PAVLVS OROSIVS writes) the temple of IANVS to bee opened, and determined to goe thither in person, and to send other Captaines to follow the other warres. The time of these warres, which were first or last, the Authors doe handle very confusedly, so as I cannot bring it to light: whereof it might bee that divers of these things did concurre at one time. But OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS tooke his journey into Spaine, and began the warre with three armies against the people before named, which rebelled; which warre was very doubtfull and desperate, and lasted five yeares. During this time passed many conflicts: and although that AVGVSTVS did suppresse the Cantabrians and Asturians, and drave them to the rockes and mountaines; yet they did so defend themselves, as it behooved him before hee could subdue them, to raise a great Navy on the coast of Brance, to invade the sea coast of Cantabria, Asturia, and Gallicia: at which time he drave the people of those countries to such extreamities by land, as he compelled them to yeelde and submit themselves to his obedience; His great favorite AGRIPPA, serving him well and faithfully in this warre (as in all the rest) whom hee married to his daughter IVLIA, who then was the widdow of his nephew MARCELLVS, sonne to his sister OCTAVIA, with whom she had beene maried. And so AVGVSTVS finished the full subjection of all Spaine, above two hundred yeeres after that the Romans began to make their first warre there: so as no province cost the Romans more blood, more toyle, and more time, then Spaine. And this long and doubtfull conquest being finished, PAVLVS OROSIVS saith, that OCTAVIAN esteemed the same so much, as having established peace in Spaine, in signe therof, he againe commanded the doores of IANVS Temple to be shut, and came to Rome in great triumph. But this Temple continued not long shut, for some Nations of the Germanes rebelled (although at divers times) so as it was againe opened to make warre against them which were the Inhabitants of Noricum, which is now Bavaria, and the Pannonies, which are Austrich and Hungary, as is aforesaid, and the two Missias, which are Bulgaria and Servia, and also Illyricum, which is Slavonia, although at another time tamed by him; and the Province of Dacia, which now is Transilvania & Walachia, and some others also. Against all these Nations this most fortunate Emperor CÆSAR AVGVSTVS sent his Captaines and armies: among which were his sonnes in law, the sonnes of his wife LIVIA, TIBERIVS NERO, who succeeded him in the Empyre, and his brother DRVSVS NERO, of whom LIVIA was with childe when OCTAVIAN married her: and these two brothers (although the warre lasted somewhat long) vanquished those Nations, and obtained great victories in Germanie, and the confines thereof; especially TIBERIVS (as SVETONIVS writeth in his life, and PAVLVS OROSIVS in his histories) who in three yeeres space subdued the Pannonies, Illyricum, and Dalmatia; for which victories he afterwards entred into Rome in ovatian triumph, with great honour and pompe. And another Captaine, whose name was MARCVS CRASSVS (as LVCIVS FLORVS, and TITVS LIVIVS report) overcame and put the Missians to flight in their owne Countrey, a nation which had never seene the Romans; which (as LVCIVS FLORVS recordeth) being readie to give battaile, in manner of justification, said to the Romane Armie: Tell us who you are that seeke to molest us? Whereto they were answered: Wee are Romans, the Lords of Nations. Whereupon they replied: It shall be so if wee bee overcome. And so they were afterwards, both they, and those also which conspired with them. But OCTAVIAN had not these victories without some crosses: for in this warre died his sonne in law DRVSVS, who was highly extolled and esteemed for his great acts and victories, for whom hee and the Empresse LIVIA his mother were very sorie. But that was farre greater without comparison, which hee conceived for the mishap which befell to QVINTILIVS VARRO, who was Captaine of three legions in Germanie, and being careless, was surprised by the Almanes, and himselfe and all his legions, and the Auxiliaries slaine, and two Standards with the Imperiall Eagles taken: wherewith he was so wonderfully grieved, as they write, that hee cryed out very unadvisedly, and knocked his head against the

the walles, saying: QVINTILIVS VARRO, give mee my legions againe. For certaine months together he suffered the haire of his head and beard to grow carelesly: And the verie day of this unfortunate accident hee did every yeare observe mournefully, with sorrow and lamentation.

Augustus sorrow for the losse of his Legions.

Of his sonne in law DRVSVS, there remained two sonnes, called GERMANICVS and CLAVDIVS, which he had by ANTONIA, OCTAVIANS neece, & daughter of his sister OCTAVIA and of MARCVS ANTONIVS: of which, CLAVDIVS was Emperour: and this GERMANICVS which married with AGRIPPINA, the daughter of IVLIA which was OCTAVIANS daughter, was father to CAIVS CALIGVLA, who afterwards was also Emperour. But these losses confirmed the victories which his sonne in law TIBERIVS obtained: Wherefore OCTAVIAN married him to his daughter IVLIA, who was a widow by the death of AGRIPPA, causing him to put away AGRIPPINA the daughter of the same AGRIPPA, by his first mariage, by whome he had one sonne named DRVSVS: so as after many notable victories, and subduing sometime one nation, and sometime another, which were compelled to sue for peace, OCTAVIAN againe commaunded the Temple of Janus to be shut, and from thenceforth all things succeeded vnto him most prosperously.

He was carefull to haue martiall discipline obserued: he dismist all the tenth legion with ignominie vpon a mutinie and vnwillingnes to obey. Whole bands and Cohorts, if they gaue ground and recoyled before the enemie, he decimated, and to the rest he allowed barley in steed of wheat to feed on. A Romane Knight, hauing cutt off the thombes of two young men his Sonnes to auoide the militarie oth and seruice of warre, he set him and all his goods to open sale: but seeing the Publicans bidde freely for him, he deliuered him to his owne freed man; that being confined and sent awaie vnto his liuing in the Countrie, he might suffer him to liue free.

The subiects of the Empire were very obedient vnto him, and all others sent him ambassades seeking his fauour and friendship, offering him their seruice: the Indians (a people of the remotest part of the East) and also the Scythians which inhabit in the North, and the Parthians (a people most fierce and vntamed) sent their Ambassadours to him, giuing securitie to keepe the peace, and deliuered the Standards and Eagles taken in battaile, when MARCVS CRASSVS was slaine. There came also Kings, friends and subiects to the Empire, to Rome, to doe him honour, as his familiar friends, laying aside their Ensignes and royall Robes; and many of them built cities to his name, for his honour, calling them Cæsareas in remembrance of him: so did HERODES in Palestina, IVBA in Mauritania, and others.

The greatnes of the Romane Emperors.

The world continued in this quietnes and generall peace, fortie and two yeeres being fullie expired since that OCTAVIAN, after the death of IVLIVS CÆSAR, came to Rome, from which time is commonly accounted his Empire. In this generall peace was borne IESVS CHRIST our Lord and Sauiour in Bethlem, of the holie womb of the blessed Ladie the Virgin MARY (HERODE being King of Ierusalem, placed there by the Romanes, he who slew the innocent children) comming to the world in humane forme and nature, to saue and redeeme mankinde with his blessed death and passion: whose most holie life, mysteries and infinite miracles ought not to be mixed with prophane Histories, and therefore I will not intermeddle to treate thereof. But returning to my purpose, I say, that OCTAVIAN enioying so great prosperitie and good fortune, was not altered in his naturall condition, as in other Princes it hath happened, but rather became more milde, iust, and affable, more curteous, more liberall and more temperate. He established wonderfull good orders and lawes, for the reformation of abuses and euill customes: he erected in Rome and without it, great and sumptuous edifices, and bestowed great gifts and fauours vpon all sorts of people: hee delighted the people with feasts and playes in diuers manners, going himselfe in person, to honour them, and sent Colonies and inhabitants to sundrie parts and prouinces: he made an excellent good order for the gouernment and gouernours of the whole Empire. The like hee did for the warre and martiall discipline; he shewed himselfe louing and sociable to his familiars and friends, and honoured and loued them much. Some conspiracies which were discouered against him, he punished without rigour; giuing more pardon then punishment and correction. Of murmurings and defamatorie libels he neuer sought nor desired to know the authors, but with great grauitie answered, giuing satisfaction, and purging himselfe of those things which were imputed vnto him. He was much giuen and affected to letters and learning, and was very learned and eloquent, and compiled bookes and notable workes: He did much honour and reward the wise and learned men of his time, wherein were many very learned in all Arts. But for all these vertues and perfections, and other which for breuitie I write not, yet he escaped not to be noted of some vices, growing through humane weakenes and great liberty, especially to be much giuen to women; although that in eating, drinking, in his apparell and ornaments, he vvas very modest and temperate: he gaue himselfe also excessiuely to play at dice, and other games then accustomed. But SVETONIVS sayth, that the most part thereof was vpon ceremonious and festiuall dayes, which ought well to be noted for a shame and example to our time, wherin Christianity is professed. For that is accounted by many for brauery and valow, which to OCTAVIAN being an Heathen and vnbeleeuing Prince, was imputed for vice. Wherefore, to conclude and make an end of his History, as is reason, I say, that although that in many things hee was happy and fortunate, yet besides all his troubles and dangers, he was vnhappy and vnfortunate in his children and succession: for by foure wiues, with which he was maried, onely by SCRIBONIA, which was his third wife, he had one daughter named IVLIA; and yet this one scarcely proued honest of her body: so as for want of sonnes to succeed him, he first adopted his Nephew MARCELLVS, his sister OCTAVIAS son aforenamed, to whom he first maried his daughter IVLIA: and MARCELLVS dying without issue, he maried her to his fauourite AGRIPPA, who also left her a widow, as is aboue sayd: but he left by her, three sonnes and two daughters, the daughters prouing no honester then their mother, and two of his sonnes dyed in OCTAVIANS time, hauing bin first by him adopted. Wherefore, desiring to ouercome the crosses which he had herein, he adopted the third, who was called AGRIPPA as his father vvas, the which adoption he afterward reuoked for some displeasure conceiued against him: and taking this care for his succession, he adopted and made his sonne in law TIBERIVS NERO, his sonne, whom, as is aforesaid, he married to his daughter IVLIA, who, as I said, was AGRIPPA his widow. But hee commaunded TIBERIVS when he adopted him, that he (notwithstanding that he had a son called DRVSVS) should adopt his Nephew GERMANICVS, sonne to his brother DRVSVS, who died in Germanie, for that he had married his neece AGRIPPINA the daughter of IVLIA: and by this meanes came TIBERIVS to be OCTAVIANVS successor, more through the diligence of his mother, then any good liking that his father in law had to him; who rather was, and seemed to be very sorrie, that he should succeede him.

The death of Octauianus Cæsar Augustus.

All things standing in this state, OCTAVIAN being now seauentie and sixe yeeres old and odde dayes, hauing raigned aboue fiftie and sixe yeeares, and being the best beloued and most obeyed Prince, that euer was in the world, death ouertooke him: the cause thereof was a flux which held him for certaine dayes, whereof in the end he died in the citie of Nola (whither he came sicke from Naples) a quiet and peacefull death, in the fifteenth yeere after the birth of Christ our Redeemer.

TACITVS writes, that it was suspected his death was hastned by the lewd practices of his wife, for that it had been bruited abroad, that AVGVSTVS accompanied only with FABIVS MAXIMVS had been in the Iland of PLANATIA to visit his Nephew AGRIPPA, both weeping when they met, where vpon there was some hope that the young man should be recalled to his Grandfathers house. This secret FABIVS disclosed to his wife, by whose means it came to LIVIA and to TIBERIVS: which made them to practise all the means they could to preuent this reconciliation.

Octauian his proporcion of body.

His death was generally lamented, and there was an vniuersall sorrow and heauines ouer the whole Empire for him: for he did wisely and vprightly gouerne that, which by force and cunning he had gotten. OCTAVIAN was of a meane stature, and of a very good shape and proportion of his body, exceeding faire of face mixed with modestie and grauitie, his eyes were exceeding cleere and bright, he was very aduised, and loued to speake quicke and briefly. His last will and testament was written a yeare and foure months before he died, and left in the custodie of the Vestall Virgins. It was then produced, & in open Senate read: the contents whereof you maie reade in SVETONIVS.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter the good Augustus, succeeded his sonne in law wicked Tiberius Nero, who was most subtill, and knew how to dissemble and faine to loue those will whome he hated, and to hate those which he loued. He made shew to be vnwilling to accept of the Empire; to obserue who was his friend and who his enemie: and whereas before this dignitie, he was very orderly and discreet, he became afterward so riotous and such a drunkeard, that he was called in scorne Biberius. In his time died Iesus Christ and Iohn Baptist in Ierusalem; he caused Germanicus a great Comander to be slain; although he made shew to Agrippa to be very sorie for it. He subdued many prouinces which rebelled against the Romane Empire, and was no lesse cruell then libidinous: and of these three vices (to wit) cruelti, incontinencie, and gluttonie, it is hard to say, which was least. He ruled the Empire, foure and twentie yeares, and was no great enemie to Christians: he propoued in the Senate whether Christ should be accepted for a God or no, whereto the Senate consented not. Finally, he died through the treason of Caligula, whom he had nominated his successor, being seuentie and eight yeares old: which he did, as it was thought, to the end that Caligula his vices should make his seeme lesse, who was so wicked and cruell, as he wished that the world might end at his death.

AFter the good and valiant Emperor OCTAVIAN, succeeded his sonne in law, and adopted son, the wicked and cruell TIBERIVS NERO, vnworthy of his succession and of the Empire: for he was one of the most cruell and wicked men that euer was: yet in OCTAVIAN his time, both in Germanie and in other parts he did many great and notable feats in armes. In the beginning of his Empire he made shew of a good prince, and did many good deedes, but afterwards (as this was but counterfeit) he discouered his malice, and gouerned cruelly, couetously, and dishonestly. This TIBERIVS (as I haue said) was the sonne of TIBERIVS NERO and LIVIA, whom OCTAVIAN afterwards tooke to wife, of both sides descended of the auncient family of the CLAVDII: whose grandfather by his fathers side was TIBERIVS CLAVDIVS NERO; and by his mothers side he descended from APPIVS CLAVDIVS PVLCHER, and by adoption he likewise descended from the LIVII, a worthie family (although but Plebeian) for Consulships, censures, and triumphs. He was of a tall and strong body, and had a large brest and broade shoulders, where to all parts of his body were answerable: he had a faire face, and great eyes, and so cleere, as they affirme a strange thing of him, which is, that awaking in the night, for a good space he cleerely saw the place wherein he lay, and al things therein aswel as if he had had a light. He was a man of great strength, and had the vse of both his hands alike; whereas commonly euery man vseth the right hand with greater dexteritie then the left, and he had so great strength in his fingers, that with a fillip he would (as often as he listed) breake a pages or a young mans head, as SVETONIVS reporteth. He was very learned both in Greeke and Latin, delighted chiefly in poesie, and made many verses in both tongues, which truely was ill imployed in him, seeing he so little profited thereby. When OCTAVIVS AVGVSTVS fell sicke, TIBERIVS was gone towards the prouince of Illyricum or Slauonia: and his mother LIVIA seeing that his sickes encreased, sent in great haste for him, and he happily arriued at the citie of Nola, CÆSAR AVGVSTVS being euen neere his end, but yet in such case as he could speake, and (as SVETONIVS reporteth) he conferred with him a great while in secret: Although CORNELIVS TACITVS saith, that it is not certainely knowne whether he found him aliue at his comming or no, for his mother the Empereſſe had ſet ſo many gards as the death of OCTAVIAN was not knowne, vntill that all had conſented that TIBERIVS ſhould rule, and ſucceede him. At that time was Poſthumus AGRIPPA Nephew to OCTAVIAN, and ſonne of his daughter IVLIA by AGRIPPA her ſecond husband, ſlaine by the hand of a Tribune of ſoldiers who had him in keeping, (as it was thought) by the commaundement of his father in law TIBERIVS, and by the counſell of his mother LIVIA, to the end that hee ſhould bee aſſured of the ſucceſſion.

But yet he gaue it out that it was done by AVGVSTVS commandement, who (as he ſaid) had giuen charge to the Tribune or Centurion which had him in gard, to make him awaie as ſoone as he ſhould haue notice of his death: but it is not credible, that to aſſure the ſtate to his wiues ſonne, he would ſeeke the bloud of his owne Nephew. The Centurion bringing word that he had fullfilled his commandement, he anſwered preſently that he had commanded him no ſuch thing, and that he ſhould anſwer it before the Senat. CRISPVS SALVSTIVS who was acquainted with Tiberius greateſt ſecrets hearing hereof, hauing ſent the Centurion letters to proceede in the buſineſs, fearing his owne danger aduiſed LIVIA not to diuulge the ſecrets of her houſe, the counſell of friends, nor the ſeruices of ſoldiers; & that TIBERIVS ſhould haue a care not to weaken his power of ſoueraigntie, by referring all to the Senate, and ſo this buſineſs was paſt ouer in ſilence.

In Rome libertie now was ſo forgotten, and the Monarchie ſo ſettled by thy cuſtome of many yeeres continuance, vnder the raigne of OCTAVIANVS, that notwithſtanding that there were Conſuls, Pretors, Tribunes, and other names of dignitie and magiſtracie; yet ther was in a manner no man in Rome that did remember and vnderſtand the manner of the old gouernment, which was before that IVLIVS CÆSAR ſuppreſſed the Common-wealth; and the death of OCTAVIAN being knowne, there was no man that durſt name or ſpeake of libertie, but when as TIBERIVS came to Rome, they preſently gaue the gouernment and adminiſtration of the Common-wealth vnto him. And he was the firſt Emperor that did quietly and ſpeaceably inherit the Empire, ſo as he was not forced to make a conqueſt thereof, as IVLIVS CÆSAR and OCTAVIAN had done. And notwithſtanding that before he would accept thereof he cauſed himſelfe to be much intreated, and made great ſhew to haue no deſire to the Empire; yet afterwards it appeared plainely that he did but counterfet, to the end he might diſcouer euery mans affection towards him: For to all thoſe which yeelded to accept of his excuſes, and did not importune him, he bare a perpetuall hatred; for although that one way he excuſed himſelfe, yet in many other things he began to vſe the authoritie of an Emperor, taking a guarde, and muſtering the armies, as Emperor.

Hauing accepted the Empire, there were ſome accidents which put him in great feare: the firſt was, that the armies in Pannonia or Hungarie, mutined, and reuolted from IVLIVS BLESVS their Commander, a captaine called PERCENIVS being principall of this mutinie, and they ſent to require many exceſſiue things: againſt whome TIBERIVS ſent his ſon DRVSVS, whom he had by AGRIPPINA, with whom he was married before he eſpouſed IVLIA. The which was pacified with much danger and difficultie; PERCENIVS and VIBVLENVS, with ſome other ringleaders of this mutinie being put to death.

It happened alſo that the legions which were by the riuer of Rhine, as the cuſtome was, did the like, through the abſence of GERMANICVS their Generall before named, adopted ſonne and Nephew to TIBERIVS: And thoſe of Pannonia were not onely diſcontented with the paies and exemptions which they required, but they preſumed to chuſe a new Emperor againſt TIBERIVS, nominating their generall GERMANICVS, who (as is before ſaid) was TIBERIVS Nephew and adopted ſonne, and preferred before his naturall ſonne, by the commaundement of OCTAVIAN. But GERMANICVS was ſo loyall, that when theſe newes were brought vnto him, he not onely refuſed their offer, but with great danger and hazard of his life, and with much trouble, pacified thoſe alterations.

TIBERIVS was another way diſquieted, being aduertiſed that LVCIVS SCRIBONIVS an eminent man, and one which bare great ſway in the common-wealth, had ſome ſecret practices againſt him: but he freed himſelfe from all theſe troubles, and they were pacified, though not without great difficultie. For his ſon DRVSVS on the one ſide (after ſome treaties) reduced the legions of Pannonia to his obedience, and did iuſtice on PERCENIVS. And GERMANICVS (as I ſaid) after ſome great difficulties (which CORNELIVS TACITVS relateth at large) made thoſe of Germanie to obey: and not therewith content, he paſſed the riuer of Rhine

Rhine (which commonly was the bounds of the Romane Empire on that part) and made war within the countrie of Germanie, with good ſucceſſe. While theſe matters were a-doing, & for ſome ſpace after, TIBERIVS did cloake and conceale his vvicked inclination and vices; and (as I ſayd in the beginning) performed many parts of a good, diſcreet and mild Prince, vvherewith he deceiued the people, eſpecially thoſe vvhich did not inwardly know him; vvhereof (although they be recited before their time) it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſet downe ſome, to the end that (as of a venemous Beaſt) that which is profitable and medicinall, may be taken. First, many of the names and titles of Honor which were offered him by the Senate, and other Honors and Ceremonies, he refuſed, and would not conſent that they ſhould erect or build any Temples vnto him; and forbad them to ſet vp his Statues and Images without his expreſſe commandement: and if ſometime he did permit it, it was vpon condition that they ſhould not place them among the Images of the gods.

What good Tiberius did in the beginning.

He ſeemed alſo to grieve to heare himſelfe praiſed, croſſing and interrupting them in ſpeeches which did it. One in a diſcourſe called him Lord, whom hee commanded to vſe that word no more: but inſolencie and preſumption ſince that time hath ſo encreaſed, as that which in thoſe dayes ſeemed pride in an Emperour, there is not any now (bee hee never ſo baſe) but preſumeth he deſerveth the ſame. The like diſcretion did TIBERIVS ſhew in other words, which were alſo proper to the gods, & the things to them appertaining. He fained alſo patience and meekeneſſe: for although that in the Senate there paſſed ſome matters contrary to his will & opinion, and that in other affaires they gainſaid him, yet he ſeemed not any way to be diſpleaſed or offended therewith. And underſtanding that ſome ſpake ill of him, and mutmuring, uſed reproachfull ſpeeches againſt him, hee ſhewed no diſcontentment or alteration thereat: but ſaid, that in a free Citie mens tongues ought to bee free, and men might lawfully ſpeake freely. And wheras the Senate would have exhibited an information, and haue proceeded againſt thoſe which had written defamatorie libells againſt him, he would not conſent thereto; ſaying, that he had not ſo little imployment as to loſe time about ſuch matters: affirming that hee would doe nothing againſt them which ſpake ill of him, but trouble them with keeping account of what hee ſaid and did; and if that were not ſufficient, it ſhould ſatisfie him, to love them as little as they loved him.

At firſt, TIBERIVS ſhewed great reſpect to the Senate, & gave them ſo great authority in all things, as he did nothing without their counſell, willing that all ſhould bee done by their advice and conſent. In execution of juſtice and governement hee made many good beginnings, taking care and order that there ſhould be no theeves nor robbers by the high wayes ſide in all Italie, but that men might travell in ſafetie; and that juſtice ſhould bee executed in Townes and Villages. The Enſignes, and pretorian Cohorts, which in Rome were the Emperors guard (to eaſe the citizens of their gueſts and other troubles) he made to encampe and lodge without the citie in the fields, where they ſhould continue and abide: which although it then ſeemed profitable, yet afterwards it bred great inconvenience and prejudice. By theſe meanes he not onely diſſembled and covered his crueltie, pride, and ambition; but hee was ſo double and falſe hearted, that even his auarice and covetouſneſſe (which of all other ſeemeth to bee the moſt apparant paſſion) and his incontinencie and looſeneſſe he could ſo maske for a time, as he ſeemed to bee no way touched with thoſe vices. So as when ſome governours of Provinces gave him notice of meanes how to encreaſe his rents and revenues; hee anſwered, that a good ſhepheard ought to ſheare his flocke, but not flay them: & ſo he abated ſome tributes; and ſhewed favours to certaine particular perſons. His looſe life he ſought to cover, by ordaining a publike informer againſt diſhoneſt and adulterous Matrons of Rome, which he did (as it afterwards appeared) to the end there ſhould be no other adulterer but himſelfe. He did other things (which for brevitie I omit) which ſeemed to ſpring from a good roote and intent: but it failed in the end; for he fained, to bite, and drew backe, to charge againe with the greater force: As wee will hereafter declare in part, for the whole cannot bee related as it was; nor mentioned for the filthineſſe thereof, which is the occaſion why that order and ſtile cannot be obſerved which is fitting; for certainely, diſordered and obſcure lives cannot bee cleerely and orderly written. And beſides this, he uſed his wife IVLIA cruelly and diſgracefully; forgetting that by her as for her dowrie, he enjoyed the Romane Empire: for hee never lived nor kept company with her after the death of OCTAVIAN.

The pretorian cohorts were the Emperors guard.

The fained vertues of Tiberius.

The ſpeeches of a good paſtor, and the minde of a Wolfe.

One of the firſt ſignes hee ſhewed of an evill Prince and governour, was; that notwithſtanding there came great complaints againſt the Proconſuls, Pretors, and Prefects, ſent into Provinces; yet he would not remove them: which was contrary to the order and custome of Rome, and his predecessor OCTAVIAN: which some attributed to his carelesnesse; others held it to proceed of malice and an ill disposition, to the end that many men should not enjoy the honor and profit which grew in such charges. After this he began to envie and malice GERMANICVS, for that he was preferred before his sonne DRVSVS, and it grieved him to see his good successe in the warres of Germanie. Wherefore to finde occasion to remoove him from that charge, hee dissemblingly caused the Triumph to be granted unto him, for the victories which he had obtained, and wrote to him many times to come to tryumph: but GERMANICVS understanding his evill intent, deferred his comming. It happened within a while after, that the King of the Parthians tooke armes and made warre against the Romane Empire, breaking the peace confirmed in the time of OCTAVIAN, entring into the Province of Armenia, the King whereof was inuested there by the Romanes: wherewith TIBERIVS was nothing displeased, supposing thereby to haue the better occasion to draw GERMANICVS from his charge and gouernment of Germanie, vnder colour to send him to the Parthian Warres, as he did: And so GERMANICVS being sent for, came for this purpose, hauing few daies before wonne a great battaile, & slaine tenne thousand of his enemies, & so he entred into Rome in a solemne triumph, and (as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth) hee brought thither with him the ensignes which QVINTILIVS VARRO had lost, and presently began to prepare for the warre against the Parthians.

Germanicus sent against the Parthians.

A little before GERMANICVS his triumph, there arose a man in Italie, called CLEMENS, a bondslaue to AGRIPPA, who named himself AGRIPPA, nephew to OCTAVIAN (whom we haue said to be slaine by TIBERIVS his order) which action seemed of some importance: for much loose and seditious people ioyned with him, which caused a great tumult in Italie; this man pretending that he ought of right to be Emperor, and not TIBERIVS: But as hee had a weake foundation, so was he soone ouerthrowne, taken prisoner, brought to TIBERIVS, and finally executed although secretly. And about the same time TIBERIVS committed a fowle and perfidious act of cruelty: for hauing with gracious and kind words allured ARCHELAVS King of Cappadocia to come to Rome (who was a friend and vassall to the Romane Empire) for fained and vniust causes he made him to be accused and committed, where afterwards this miserable King died in prison, and his countrie was made a tributarie prouince. In the like maner he dealt with many Princes and great men of Spaine, France, Gracia, and other parts. The expedition which TIBERIVS had intended against the Parthians, was much hastned by reason of the death of ANTIOCHVS King of Comagena, and of PHILOPATER King of Cilicia in Asia, vassals to the Empire: by meanes of whose deaths some alterations grew in those prouinces; for some would haue a King, and others would be gouerned by the Empire.

Cappadocia made a prouince.

GERMANICVS being prepared for his Easterne Iorney (as he was commanded) departed from Rome, carrying his wife AGRIPPINA and his children with him: betweene whom and LIVIA the mother of TIBERIVS was great emulation. There was also at this time great controuersie and parts-taking, both in words and affections in TIBERIVS his Court; some taking part with GERMANICVS, who (as we haue said) was his adopted sonne and nephew: others adhered to DRVSVS, his sonne legitimate. TIBERIVS and his mother LIVIA euer sought to aduance the reputation of DRVSVS, and in secret to disgrace GERMANICVS: for which occasion he gaue the charge of all the legions of Illyricum to his sonne DRVSVS. And to the end, that GERMANICVS should not be too powerfull in the East whither he went, he made GNEVS PISO captaine of the prouince and legions of Syria (who was an eminent man, greatly allied in Rome, and of a good house) for that he held with DRVSVS; and dispossest CRETICVS SYLLANVS of that charge, being a friend to GERMANICVS. This PISO was married to a Romane Matrone called PLANCINA, of the same condition, but of an hautier spirit then her husband; to the which husband and wife the Emperour TIBERIVS and his mother LIVIA gaue in charge, to procure hatred and dislike against GERMANICVS; yea and his death also: as it after appeared. And with this resolution they departed from Rome towards the East: where PISO presently, with gifts and flatterie, began to draw to himselfe the loue and good liking of the armie against GERMANICVS, and to murmure and speake ill of him: who, while as PISO practised these things, tooke so good order in the warre and gouernment, as hee placed a King in the prouince of Armenia, who was a friend and subiect to the Romanes; and the kingdomes of Comagena and Cilicia being voide by the death of their Kings, he reduced into prouinces, and placed in them Pretors and gouernours. In Comagena QVINCIVS SERVIVS, and and in Cilicia QVINTVS VERANIVS; moderating in them both the royall subsidies and tributes. And after this he tooke so good order, as he compelled the King of Parthia to sue for peace and friendship: which he graunted and concluded, to the honour of the Empire. Being thus busied about these things, PISO and his wife neuer left to murmure against him, and to taxe him openly: the which he dissembled, knowing from whence it did proceed. And hauing made an end of the Parthian warre, hee departed from thence to visit the prouince of Egypt: and in his absence (although it were not long) his competitor PISO plotted such matters against him, as when he vnderstood of his return, he departed out of that prouince. But as he had practised his death, he went not far off, but remained some daies in an Iland: during which time, GERMANICVS comming on his way, was poysoned by the practice of PISO, but by the direction and counsell of TIBERIVS (as it was thought) whereof he dyed suddenly, leauing behind him sonnes and daughters; among which was CAIVS CALIGVLA, who was afterwards Emperour. For which cause it hath been very expedient to make such mention of his father GERMANICVS, who if he had liued had been Emperour and successor to TIBERIVS.

Before his death he complained much vnto his friends of the leud practices of PISO and PLANCINA his wife, by whose fraud he was brought to an vntimely death, intreating them to prosecute reuenge. And turning to his wife, he conjured her by all the bonds of nuptiall loue, to submit her courage to the frownes of fortune; least at her returne to the Cittie, by emulation of greatnes she should purchase to herselfe two powerfull enemies.

The worthie and valiant Captaine GERMANICVS being dead in this manner, as is said, his wife AGRIPPINA came to Rome with her children, and brought with her the ashes of her deceased husband. The Emperour TIBERIVS made shew of great sorrow (though counterfet) for the death of GERMANICVS (the like did LIVIA and her sonne DRVSVS, who then was come to Rome) but in truth was very glad therof: for by the death of GERMANICVS he did assuredly hope to succeede in the Empire. But true and vnfained was the sorrow which all the people of Rome conceiued for the death of GERMANICVS; and great were the fauours and loue which they shewed to AGRIPPINA and her children: and great was the hatred they bare against PISO, whom they openly charged to haue murdered him; who presuming on TIBERIVS his fauour (being altogether shameless) came to Rome: where, in the behalfe of AGRIPPINA and her friends, he was accused before the Senate for hatred to GERMANICVS; that he had corrupted the common soldiers with licentiousnes and done wrong to the Confederats; that he was called father of the Legions by the leudest sort; that hee had beene cruell to all good men, and that he had poysoned GERMANICVS, and borne armes against the State. To most hee answered weakely, onely the poysoning could not bee well verefied. Which, TIBERIVS dissembling, (as one who was not to loue him any better then the rest) he was driuen to such an extremitie in the accusation, as before that the cause was determined, hee was found dead in his bed (as it was thought) by his owne hands; although (as CORNELIVS TACITVS saith) it was neuer certainely knowne: but there were many opinions concerning the same. Who also writeth that a powerfull man named TACFARINAS rebelled in Africa in the prouince of Numidia; and leuying great forces, ouerthrew certaine Romane cohorts, thinking to haue been able to possesse the countrie: against whom went the Proconsul LVCIVS ASTRONICVS with an armie: and comming to a battaile he ouercame him and put him to flight, to his great losse. Which (as it seemeth) happened in the seuenth yeere of the raigne of TIBERIVS; although afterwards the same TACFARINAS was againe ouerthrowne, by the Proconsul BLESVS, in a second rebellion.

The yeere following, the Emperour TIBERIVS made himselfe to be chosen Consul, and his sonne DRVSVS his Companion, as at other times hee had done: and faining that it behooued him for his health, hee vvent forth of Rome, to the end hee might settle and establish DRVSVS in the gouernment of the Empire; for of his brother CLAVDIVS vntill then he made small account: but God disposed of all in another manner. In the same yeere many cities in France rebelled, being vnable to endure the intolerable tributes and exactions which TIBERIVS imposed vpon them. The captaines and authors of this rebellion, were two hardy men, the one called FLORVS, and the other SACROBIS, which did so much trouble the countrey, as they put Rome it selfe in great feare; much more being there reported then was true. But this did nothing trouble TIBERIVS; so much had hee forgotten all vertue and goodnes, giuing himselfe wholly ouer to vice and sensualitie in his old age. But CAIVS

SILIVS, who was Captaine of those parts, did soone suppresse the troubles of France, who with his legions came against those which rebelled, put them to flight in a battaile, and slew a great number of them: and so he pacified that countrey, and his sonne DRVSVS did principally employ himselfe in the gouernment. TIBERIVS passing the most part of the time in Campania, betweene whom and his mother LIVIA began some secret (which grew to publike) quarrels and dislikes, he being very vnreuerent and vndutifull; and she much discontented with his manner of gouernment, and chiefly for the priuate familiaritie betweene him and ELIVS SEIANVS, whom he fauoured so much as he made him captaine of the Pretorian cohorts, and gaue him many other dignities: and finally made him so great, as he presumed to contend with his sonne DRVSVS: and his presumption was such, as by wicked practices and deuices, he allured to his dishonest lust the wife of the said DRVSVS, daughter in law to TIBERIVS, whose name was LIVIA, the daughter of GERMANICVS. Commitming this adulterie (with a conceit to succeed in the place of DRVSVS) he practised his death, and found meanes by an Eunuch his seruant, to poyson him: which tooke effect, and DRVSVS died thereof, and left one sonne named TIBERIVS, as his grandfather; but it was not then knowne who was the cause of his death. Whereof arose great murmuring in Rome, although it little grieued the greatest part: for they deemed that GERMANICVS his three sonnes should haue succeeded in his place, whome they much respected for their fathers sake: whose names were CLAVDIVS NERO, CAIVS CALIGVLA, and DRVSVS. This happened in the ninth yeere of the raigne of TIBERIVS, which was a beginning of his misfortunes: we may say the like of the Common-wealth; for from that time forwards, all his actions and resolutions had ill successe, his detestable vices discouered themselues, and the subiects endured infinite cruelties, robberies, outrages and oppressions: as also in this same yeere, TACFARINAS rebelled againe in Africa, who in his last rebellion escaped by flight: and hauing leuied much people, in the end was the third time ouerthrowne in battaile, and wholly defeated by PVBLIVS DOLABELLA the Proconsul.

The insolencies of Seianus.

The death of Drusus, Tiberius sonne.

In Rome the wicked SEIANVS (TIBERIVS fauorite) although that in the beginning he made shew publikely to fauour GERMANICVS sonnes, which (as hath been said, and it was thought) should haue been TIBERIVS successors: yet afterwards all his studie and practice was to disgrace and ruine them; and to that end, procured false accusations to be made against all such as tooke their or AGRIPPINA their mothers part. And to bring this and other his wicked deuices to effect, he procured TIBERIVS to depart from Rome whither he was come: who following the others counsell, aswell for this, as the more freely to giue himselfe to his detestable vices, went into the Ile of Capra, which lieth vpon the coast of Naples, where he remained for a time; and being returned into Italie, making his progresse into diuers places, neuer came any more to Rome: neither in the rest of his life is there any more to be spoken, but of his vices and cruelties, whereof in summe we will make a briefe relation. Before which it is requisit that all men vnderstand, that during this peregrination of the Emperour TIBERIVS in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, our Lord and Sauiour Iesus Christ true God and man suffered his death and passion, PONTIVS PILATE being president or gouernor of Ierusalem in the prouince of Iudæa. And to the end that it may be the better knowne and vnderstoode how PILATE came to concur with one of the HERODES, and how many there were of the HERODES, of whom mention is made in the holy Scriptures, (which is a matter whereof some haue made a doubt) in few words I will here set downe: which was in this manner, as the Euangelist testifieth, and as out of Saint IEROM and IOSEPHVS it is gathred. HERODE the great, sonne of ANTIPATER, who was called HERODE ASCALONITA, was placed there by the Romanes: and hauing raigned many yeeres, was the same to whom the three Kings came from the East guided by a Starre, and he who murthered so many innocent children, and some of his owne children also, when Christ was borne; who within short space after died, and by his death, his sonne, whose name was ARCHELAVS, had the kingdomes of Iudæa, and Idumæa; and to his other two sonnes (for the other three died before their father) were giuen certaine Tetrarchies, whereof to this HERODE ANTIPAS (which was one of them) was allotted the Tetrarchie of Galile, and by this meanes he is called Tetrarch; & this was he which put Saint IOHN BAPTIST to death, and he, to whom PILATE sent Christ, who disdained him. And to PHILIP his other sonne was giuen the Tetrarchie of Thrachonitis: and the other brother, who (as I said) had the title of a King, was accused to OCTAVIAN, and by him depriued and banished into France, to the citie of Vienna, by meanes whereof PILATE was sent to goueine goueine that prouince; and by this meanes it happened that Christ died in the time of PILATE and of HERODE ANTIPAS the Tetrarch, from whom the Tetrarchie afterwards was taken by CAIVS CALIGVLA, and he died banished in Lions in France, and his Nephew the sonne of his brother ARISTOBVLVS, who was one of the three which their father slew in his life time. HERODE AGRIPPA was hee, to whom CAIVS CALIGVLA, restor'd the kingdome of Iudea. And afterwards the Emperor CLAVDIVS gaue the Terrarchie of Galile to his Vncle: and this was he, who put Saint IAMES to death, who beginning to persecute the Apostles, died striken by an Angell, as Saint LVKE beareth record.

The acts of the Apostles chap. 12.

Christ being put to death by the sentence of PILATE, and he knowing afterwards that Christ was risen againe, by the report of those which he himselfe had set to watch his bodie, being also informed of the many miracles which he did in his life time (notwithstanding that he was an idolater and a wicked iudge, and had adiudged him to die) yet TERTVLLIAN and EVSEBIVS in his ecclesiasticall historie, and PAVLVS OROSIVS in his seuenth booke, most ancient and true authors, doe recorde, that by his letters, he aduertised the Emperor TIBERIVS thereof, to the end that he should aduise and determine, whether Christ should be held for a God or no; and TIBERIVS sent to the Senate to consult thereof, he giuing his opinion that he ought to be so: but the Senators, as the diuels schollers, counselled TIBERIVS that he should not doe it. Which (as these authors affirme) was for that he had not first made the Senate acquainted therewith, which pretended by an ancient law which they had, to haue the superintendence in all matters of religion: yet TIBERIVS notwithstanding that the Senate consented not to his opinion, commaunded that the christians should be free from persecution; but he neither embraced the faith of Christ as he ought, neither left his sinne and vices.

Pilate made relation of the miracles which Christ wrought, to the Emperor Tiberius.

First he gaue himselfe to his old vice of excessiue gluttonie and drunkennes, for which cause from his youth (in steede of TIBERIVS NERO) they called him BIBERIVS MERO, which signifieth a drinker of the best: and euen in this his old age, he hath beene often knowne to sit a whole night, & part of the day, at a bâket, giuing gifts & rewards to such as drank most, and in fauour thereof he instituted a new office and magistracie; as, master of delights and sports. After this, his chiefest time was spent in abominable luxury and incontinencie, which was such and so abominable as christian eares can hardly endure the hearing thereof, nor a christian hand write the same, wherefore I will passe most of thē ouer in silence. Let this suffice, that it was horrible and detestable: and not contented to commit it himselfe, he induced and drew others thereto, and gaue iewels and rewards to those which inuented and committed most filthines.

For during his priuate abode in Capree, (as SVETONIVS writes) he deuised a roome with seates in it of purpose for his secret wanton lusts. For the furnishing whereof he drew from all parts a number of young strumpets, and stale Catamites or baudes, and such also as inuented monstrous kindes of libidinous filthines, whome he tearmed Spintrie, who being in three rankes linked together, should pollute one anothers bodie before his face, that by the sight there of he might stirre vp his owne colde courage and fainting lust, with manie other such shamefull deuices, as are not to be mentioned, for the which men did vsually tearme him CAPRINEVS, after the name of the Iland.

This wicked old Emperor, perseuering in his libidinous sinne, forgot not his crueltie and couetousnes, whereto he was no lesse addicted: for hee encreased his subsidies and tributes in such manner, that the prouinces became ruinate and defolate; and committed many other extortions of the like qualitie.

As for his crueltie, all the examples cannot be repeated, they did so exceede: for he condemned the principall and best men in Rome to death, and confiscated their goods, for very light causes, and most of them forged. One he put iustly to death, and with great reason caused him to be slaine, which was his great fauorite SEIANVS, for many sinnes which he had learned of him (as DION COCCIVS recordeth:) but for the rest, it is a matter ridiculous, and otherwise lamentable, for what causes they were accused and condemned. One he caused to be slaine, because that commending BRVTVS and CASSIVS, he said, they were the last Romanes: another he caused to be slaine, because that in a tragedie which he had compiled, he spake ill of AGAMEMNON: another Romane Knight he commaunded to be slaine, because that in a garden he had taken vp a Capon: and for other such like matters as these, he put to death sixteene, of twetie ancient noble mē; whome he had chosen for his counsellors. And he forbare not to execute these cruelties vpon his allies and kinsfolkes: for besides that which is alreadie related related, he commaunded his Nephew GERMANICVS to be slaine, and afterwards the three sonnes which he left, seeing them to growe in estimation; the two elder of them he caused to be accused by false witnesses, and he himselfe wrote such things to Rome against them, that in the end they were condemned to death: the one of them desperately killed himselfe, and he caused the other to pine to death with hunger, as SVETONIVS reporteth. It was a maruell that he had not done the like by the third, whose name was CAIVS CALIGVLA, and by their Vncle CLAVDIVS: but it is likely he would haue done it, if he had liued a while longer. These executions hee thus commaunded to be done, to the end that his crueltie might attaine to the highest degree, which were not ordinarie: for before their death, they suffered hunger, torments, and disgraces, to qualifie them. Finally, to conclude, they were so many and so fearefull, that many which were condemned, slew themselues, some with poyson, and some with the sword, for feare; for TIBERIVS did execute his furie with such crueltie, as hee accounted it a deede of charitie, to put them to an ordinarie kinde of death: so as, for that one had killed himselfe before that he could execute his rage vpon him, he cryed out, Oh how hath CORNELIVS escaped me? for so was that mans name: and to another, which entreated him that he would not deferre his death; TIBERIVS answered, I am not so much thy friend, as to hasten it. And imploying himselfe in these diuelish exercises, wherein he continued vntill his death; ARTABANVS King of Parthia, breaking the peace and league which he had contracted with GERMANICVS, presumed to enter into Armenia, and the limits of the Empire, and also the Sarmates inuaded the prouinces; for which TIBERIVS tooke no care, neither leuied any new armie; but they defended themselues with their ordinarie legions and armies the best they could.

Now, forasmuch as in many places of this historie, mention is made of legions and armies, which the Romanes ordinarily entertained in their prouinces, in time of peace & warre, I hold it fit to declare what they were, for the better vnderstanding of what is alreadie, and shall be said hereafter. Which is a great argument, to proue how great the wealth and power of the Romanes was: and although that some Authors do treate thereof, I will onely set downe what CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth in the fourth book of his histories, an historiographer of great authoritie. He first saith, that in the two seas, of the one and other side of Italie, to wit, in the Adriatike sea, now the gulf of Venice, and in the Sicilian sea called Mediterranean, they maintained two great nauies of gallies and shippes for their guard and securitie, and for the safe passage of Merchants, and such other necessarie occasions. Another great nauie they maintained vpon the coast of France, between Spaine and Italie; besides those which they had in a readinesse and caused to be built when any occasion of warre was offered. Their armies by land were diuided in manner following: vpon the Rhines side on the frontiers of France, they maintained eight legions, to keepe those countries which they possessed in Germanie, and to resist the Germanes and other northerly nations, and these ordinarily were the most experienced and best souldiers. And although that the number of a legion did increase and diminish vpon diuers occasions, yet the ordinarie in the time of the Emperors was (after VEGECIVS and MODESTVS) that euery legion should containe sixe thousand and one hundred footemen, and seuen hundred twentie and sixe horsemen. Of these they held, in Spaine, three ordinarie legions; and in Africa, in the prouince of Carthage, two; and in Mauritania one; and two for the guarde of the kingdome of Egypt; and in the prouinces of Mesopotamia and Syria (to wit) in the countries contained betweene the Syrian sea, the furthest end of the Leuant sea, and the riuer Euphrates, which were (for a long time) the bounds of the Romane Empire, they held foure legions. And heere in Europe (besides those which I haue alreadie mentioned) they had other sixe legions, in this manner: in Austria and Hungarie they had two; in Seruia and Bulgaria, as many; and other two in Slauonia; and neere vnto the citie of Rome, were alwayes lodged twelue Cohorts, nine of which were called Pretorian, and the other three Vrbane, which by turne did guarde the Emperors palace. Of all these Cohorts (according to the same authors) the first and chiefe of them contained one thousand, one hundred and fiue footmen, and one hundred thirtie two horse; and the others equally each of them fiue hundred and fiftie footemen, and threescore and six horse. Besides all which, they had in diuers cities and prouinces, companies of horsemen, which were friends and subiects to the Empire; and also other companies of footemen, which were called Auxiliaries, which were not trained after the Romane order and discipline: so as they continually entertayned & paied fiue and twentie legions, besides those which were payed by their friends. And this was in time of peace, for the authoritie and guarde of the Empire Empire; for when there happened any warres (according as neede required) they reinforced their armies, and encreased the number of their legions.

With the force of these great garrisons the Romane Empire maintained & defended it selfe, notwithstanding the want of care and diligence in some Emperors, as in TIBERIVS, of whom we now discourse; who (as is said) spent the rest of his life vntill his death, in wicked practices: which being much wished for by all the world, ouertooke him in a house of pleasure neere to Naples, hauing raigned twentie and three yeeares Emperor, in the seuentie and eight yeere of his age, and thirtie, and nine yeeres after the birth of Christ. In what manner he died, authors agree not, for some say that hee was poysoned, by his Nephew and successor CAIVS CALIGVLA: others write that being sicke (as it was thought) mortally, and seeing that he made some shew of recouerie; for feare that hee should mend, CALIGVLA smothered him with a pillow, or with the couering of the bed, he hauing ordained him for his successor; Notwithstanding that by reason of a certaine prophecie which hee held, he had resolued to make his Nephew TIBERIVS the sonne of DRVSVS his heire, whom DION COCCEIVS in his histories saith, he would not name, because he was not assured that he was his sonnes sonne, for the suspicion which he held of his mother; and also because that the Mathematicians and Astrologians, to whom he was much affected and gaue credit, had told him, that he should liue but a little while, and that CALIGVLA should kill him: and so vpon a time being very much offended, he said to CALIGVLA, thou wilt kill me, and another shall kill thee. It is also imagined, that TIBERIVS chose CALIGVLA for his successor, for that he knew his euill and wicked inclination, hoping that with his vices, he would deface and blot his wickednes out of remembrance; and also for that he beleeued, that he would extinguish the Romane nobilitie; for he was so wicked and cruell as he desired that all the world might end with his life, and so he was sometimes wont to say, that hee wished, that when hee should die, then the heauen and earth might be dissolued: but he deserued not to see the heauens; and all the earth reioyced and was glad when he died; as all Authors write: and this was the end of TIBERIVS. SVETONIVS writes, that the people rejoyced much at his death: and some running vp and downe, at the newes thereof cryed out Fling TIBERIVS into Tiber. Others besought the mother Earth, and the infernal gods to vouchsafe him no place but among impious wretches. And some threatned to drag his liuelesse carcasse into the Gemoniæ.

THE LIFE OF CAIVS CALIGVLA, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

CAligula, before he was made Emperor, was so pleasing, and in such grace with the people and Senate of Rome, as when he was aduanced, it is vnknowne whether was the greater, the sorrow which was in Rome for the death of Octavian, or the ioy which it conceiued for the succession of Caligula. But being made Emperour, as if with his dignitie hee had changed his naturall inclination, hee became so wicked and infamous, as I cannot set downe his vicious life without offending the chaste eares of him that shall read the same; nor without a burthen to his modestie that shall write it. Hee made the Bridge at Baias, a worke of no lesse folly then great expense. Hee deflowred three of his owne sisters; and of his Palace (with reuerence be it spoken) he made a brothel of Romane Matrons. Hee was so couetous, as he raysed a tax vpon the Whores, and had a share of their gettings. He vsed to walke vp and downe vpon Crowners; and was so prodigall, that sometimes hee caused most precious iewels to bee dissolued with vinegar and put into his meat: hee was finally in all his actions so contrary to himselfe, that no man knew how to behaue himselfe towardi wards him. He wonldbe called and reputed for a God, which name he ſtained with ſuch abominable cruelties, that he was worſe then the diuell: he ſhed ſo much bloud, and made the wilde beaſts which he kept, to deuoure men, and to drinke their bloud; ſo as thoſe which were condemned to be ſlaine by them, rather choſe to kill themſelues, then to endure the torments which he deuiſed in his cruell diſpoſition. He died of thirtie wounds giuen him by certaine which cõſpired againſt him, hauing raigned almoſt foure yeeres: whoſe death was ſo acceptable to the people: as it is hard to ſay whether was the greater ioy, that which was conceiued when he was made Emperour, or that when he left the Empire, together with his moſt ſhameleſſe life.

Caligula in the higheſt degree abominable.

ALIGVLA the ſonne of GERMANICVS ſucceeded TIBERIVS in the Empire, who during the time of his raigne, was in the higheſt degree of all kinde of wickednes moſt abominable: and his words and deedes were ſo odious and deteſtable, as in truth it is a ſhameful & vnworthie thing, hauing written the liues of ſo worthie men, as were IVLIVS, and OCTAVIANVS CÆSARS, & their heroicall acts; now to deſcend to the ſinke of the villanie, crueltie, and ribaudrie of CALIGVLA. For although there wanted not in TIBERIVS cauſe to be abhorred & blamed, yet ſome part of his raigne was good, and he in former times had been an excellent Captaine, and had enlarged the dominions of the Empire, for which cauſe his euil cõditions might be ſomewhat the better tolerated: but this wanting in CAIVS CALIGVLA, who was a man of no ſuch valour (although in the beginning he deceiued the world with an apparance of ſome good deedes) yet it maketh the remembrance of him the more deteſtable, and his hand that ſhall write the ſame, the more heauie. But becauſe I am not to make choiſe of Emperours, of whom I am to treate at my pleaſure, but to continue the courſe of my hiſtorie, wherein my chiefe foundation is, to obſerue the truth, and cleauing thereto, to continue my troubleſome iourney; Let him which ſhall reade it conſider how deteſtable and odious his actions were, and how ſmall time his Empire indured (which attained not to foure yeeres complete) and the end which he made; to the end that he may flie and abhorre them, & may do the like by ſome others which followed, like to him, or worſe.

In Caligula was nothing that was good.

After the death of TIBERIVS CÆSAR (as I ſaid) the ioy which the Senate and people of Rome conceiued was incredible, and therewith they accepted and approoued the Empire of CAIVS CALIGVLA (whom before his death TIBERIVS had adopted and nominated for his ſucceſſour) for the loue and goodwill which they bare to his father GERMANICVS, and for the pittie and commiſeration which they conceiued for his death, and the affliction and wrong done to his houſe. For theſe cauſes was he accepted by all the Prouinces, and prouinciall armies: for his father being Generall in Germanie, and in the Eaſt, he was bred vp among them, and this name of CALIGVLA was giuen him for a certaine kinde of hoſe, called Caliga, vſed among men of warre, which hee did vſe to weare. Comming from the place where TIBERIVS died, to Rome, a great number of the principall men of all eſtates went foorth to entertaine him vpon the way, with exceeding ioy, notwithſtanding that he came mourning with the dead bodie of TIBERIVS, which the ſouldiers brought to be burnt at Rome, according to the manner of that time. And comming with great ſolemnity to Rome, he was obeyed with vnſpeakeable gladnes and ioy, they giuing him new names and Epithetes, ſhewing great reuerence and loue.

Wherefore he was called Caligula.

Caligula his geſture and diſpoſition of bodie.

CALIGVLA was a man tall of ſtature, great boned and corpulent; but his necke and legges were very ſmall and ſlender, deformed and vnſutable to the reſt of his bodie; his countenance was horrible and vgly: being Emperor, he tooke pleaſure to terrifie people with his lookes; and to this effect it is written, that beholding himſelfe in a glaſſe, he would ſtudie what countenance to ſet, to ſeeme more fierce and terrible. His eyes were very hollow, his forehead broad, his complexion yellow, his head very bald, and in thoſe parts of his head where he had any haire, it was very thinne, all the reſt of his bodie being marueilouſly hairy. He was very vnſound and vnhealthy, and in his youth was troubled with falling ſickneſs and other diſeaſes, and afterwards (as we will preſently ſhew) he was ill diſpoſed both in bodie and minde, changing his conditions with the Empire: for before that time, he was euer held for good. Wherefore it is ſaid of him, that he had been the beſt ſeruant, and was the worſt and moſt wicked Lord in the world. The firſt thing he did after he came to be Prince, was to diſannull & make void the teſtament of TIBERIVS, which he had made two yeeres before, wherein he made him & his nephew TIBERIVS

BERIVS his coheirs: whereto the Senate did willingly agree, & euerie man deuiſed & plotted how to gratifie him and doe him ſeruice, with ſuch loue as within few daies after he was confirmed in the Empire. Going foorth of Rome to recreate himſelfe vpon the Sea at the Ile of Capreæ, and in other Ilands vpon that coaſt, they made vowes and ſacrifices for his health and returne: and writers affirme, that there were ſlaine 170000. beaſts, according to the rites and ceremonies then vſed: And then making ſhew of a man, and not of a beaſt (as his deedes did afterwards make manifeſt) he preſently commaunded the aſhes of his mother and brethren to be brought to Rome, and there to be ſumptuouſly buried. He then tooke for his companion in the Conſulſhip, which hee would execute, his vncle CLAVDIVS, brother to GERMANICVS, who in the time of TIBERIVS liued priuate and in diſgrace; and young TIBERIVS, (which was nephew to TIBERIVS the Emperour) faining to loue, and affect him: to doe him honour, he made him captaine and prince of all the Romane youth. Seeking by counterfeit goodnes and bountie, to draw to himſelfe the goodwill of the people; he did twice giue vnto euery bodie (excepting none) a certaine donatiue of money, which they called Congiarius; and to all the Senate, and to all thoſe of the order of Knighthood (which was a degree betweene the communaltie and the Nobilitie) he made a moſt ſolemne banquet. And faining alſo that he meant to gouerne with iuſtice, he commaunded OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR his Inſtitutions to be ſought out, which TIBERIVS interrupted and brought out of vſe. He commaunded alſo great playes and feaſts to be made in Rome of Sword-plaiers, who were men which to ſhew pleaſure to the beholders, fought and killed one another; and certaine men on horſeback which they called Troians. He alſo appointed certaine huntings, wherein were ſlaine a great number of Lions, Panthers, Boares, Beares, and other wilde beaſts; and beſides this, Comedies and other ſhewes which were made in the Theater, & other kinds of ſports and pleaſures to delight the people, whoſe loue and grace he then affected. And beſides that which is alreadie ſaid (as SVETONIVS reciteth) principally in the beginning of his Empire, ARTABANVS King of Parthia, who rebelled and was an enemie, came to a conference with the Generall of the Romanes which commaunded the legions in Syria, and fearing the new Emperour whom he yet knew not, made a peace with him; and paſſing the riuer Euphrates, which was the bound of the Romane Empire, came in perſon to adore and to doe reuerence to the Emperours ſtatue, and to the Imperiall ſtandard and Eagle: ſo as the little, vntill this time, may be reported of CALIGVLA, as of a wiſe and diſcreete prince; and the remainder ſeemeth to be of a ſenſeleſſe man and a brute and ſauage beaſt. The beginning whereof was one of the greateſt fooleries or vanities that euer was ſeene, which was to make ſuch a feaſt as was neuer heard of, to ſhew his greatnes and vanitie, and to be able to walke and treade on the Sea as well as vpon the land. Or (as others ſay) becauſe he would imitate King XERXES, who paſſed his armie out of Aſia into Europe ouer the ſtreight of Helleſpont vpon a wooden bridge, he commaunded to be brought together, and to be new built all the ſhips he could get, which were infinite; & in a bay or a creeke which the Sea maketh neere to the hauen of Baias in Campania, from one point of the land to the other ſide of the Bay, which is about three miles diſtant, hee commaunded a bridge to be made vpon the ſaid ſhips, ſet in two rankes, faſtned and moared together with anchors, chaines and cables, which made them to ſtand fix and firme: he commanded this bridge to be made of boords, ſo ſtrong and eeuen, and to lay ſo much earth vpon the ſame, as it ſeemed to be firme ground, and one of the ſtreets of Rome. And bringing for this worke a great number of Artificers and labourers, with an infinite charge; he alſo cauſed houſes and lodgings to be built vpon the bridge, as writeth DION, who relateth this worke more at large then all the reſt.

Peace with the king of Parthia.

A wonderfull bridge made by Caligula.

This being finiſhed, and hee with all the Court going thither, with an infinite number of people which from all parts came to ſee this worke; hee proudly attired in robes of gold and pearle, with a crowne of Oaken boughes vpon his head (which was called Civica) on horſeback, accompanied with men of warre, and all the Nobles and gentlemen of Rome, entred at the one end of the bridge and road to the other; and lying one night vpon it, the next day hee returned, riding in a Chairot drawne by moſt excellent faire horſes, in manner of a triumph. DION writeth, that the night when he lay vpon the bridge, he cauſed ſuch an infinite number of Torches, Lant-hornes, and other lights to be lighted and ſet vp, as the cleerenes thereof did exceed the darknes of the night, of all that ſide of the mountaines neere adioyning; CALIGVLA boſting that he had made of the night, day; and of the Sea, land. And ſpending herein two whole daies (in all which time the Sea happened to be ſtill and calme) he ſaid; that Neptune (whom they held for the god of the Seas) did it for feare, and to do him reuerence. The fruite which enſued of this ſtrange follie, was great famine and ſcarcitie of corne, and other neceſſaries, for that the ſhips were ſtaied about this bridge, to make the which there were imployed an incredible number. Such like benefits as this, did euer follow the actions of CALIGVLA. Wherefore before I ſpeake of the reſt, to ſay the truth, it is to be vnderſtood, that many were of opinion, that to this man was giuen a certaine drinke by his wife, whoſe name was CESONIA, wherewith ſhe made him mad and diſtract of his wits; ſhee giuing it him, to the end he ſhould loue her: for hauing been at other times married he had put away his wiues; ſo as his crueltie and riots were by ſom attributed to his fooliſhnes & want of wit. Of this opinion is IOSEPHVS in the 18. booke of his Antiquities, and the Poet IVVENAL with SVETONIVS: and they ſay that after he had taken this drinke, CALIGVLA ſlept not by day nor night aboue three houres; and riſing ſometimes affrighted, it ſeemed to him that he ſaw apparitions and viſions: adding this to his peruerſe condition and nature, hee ſuffered himſelfe to be led by her, and committed outrages without number or meaſure, which I know not how to ſet downe in any order: among which hee ſhewed himſelfe ſo haughtie and vainglorious, as he deſpiſed all men.

Diueliſh pride.

In the end (beſides that hee was the firſt of the Emperours which cauſed himſelfe to be called Lord) he purpoſed to be honoured as a God, or to ſay better, a Diuell; and made himſelfe to be adored, taking firſt vpon him names neuer thought nor heard of, calling himſelfe father of Armies, Optimus & maximus, with other epithetes, which they gaue to their god IVPITER only. And certaine Kings in his preſence which came to viſit him, and to doe him honour, being at contention among themſelues about the antiquitie and nobilitie of their houſes and linages, he interrupted, repeating a verſe out of HOMER in the perſon of VLYSSES, which ſaith, That there neither is, nor ought to be, but one King and Lord; and had then taken a Crowne and Diademe of a King, but that he was giuen to vnderſtand, that his owne was a more high eſtate and dignitie. Neuertheleſſe, he determined with his pride and elation to vſurpe the dignitie which he held for diuine, and cauſed to be caried before him the ſtatue of IVPITER, & ſome others, which (as PLINIE recounteth) the Romanes vſed to haue with heads to be taken off and on, to the end they might ſerue for diuers gods; and taking away thoſe heads which they had, he cauſed other heads to be ſet on, to his owne likenes: but in my opinion it had beene better they had cut off his head and ſet it thereon. Beſides this, he cauſed a temple to be built, and tobe dedicated to his name and honor, and made his ſtatue at Life to be ſet vp therin, which they called Iconium; and he inſtituted Prieſts to ſerue him: and this his image to be euery day clothed in ſuch attire, as himſelfe did weare. Alſo he cauſed Peacocks, Feaſants, and an infinite number of other princely birds to be ſacrificed in this Temple, as in other Temples of the gods of the Gentiles was vſed; with whom he ſought to make himſelfe equall: which truly was no great matter: for they all were dinels, Impoſtures and deceits.

The images of the gods, with heads to be taken off and on.

A ridiculous follie ſuch as the like was neuer heard of.

But conſidering the opinion and conceit which they then held, it was a preſumption neuer heard nor thought of, which came to bee accounted a ridiculous fooliſhneſſe: for preſuming much vpon his deitie, hee came foorth one night by Moone light (ſhee being then at the full) and wooed and made loue to her, as if ſhee had beene a faire Ladie. Sometimes hee would alſo goe to the Temple of IVPITER; and ioyning himſelfe cloſe to the Image, hee made ſhew as though hee had ſpoken in his eare: and ſometimes hee layd his eare to the Image, as though it ſhould ſpeake to him: and ſometimes hee made as though hee were very angrie, chiding, and threatning to ſend it into Gracia: and afterwards hee would faine himſelfe to bee pacified, and that he was contented that they two ſhould dwell together: and in this manner hee proceeded to a thouſand idle fooleries, although they were diueliſh. And on the other ſide, this man which preſumed to diſplace the gods and to make himſelf one of them, ſhewed his enuie to men; grieuing to ſee their ſtatues and memories honored, commaunding many of them to be ouerthrowne, and defaced. He practiſed and was deſirous to diſgrace the poems of HOMER and of VIRGIL, and in like manner the hiſtories of the excellent hiſtoriographer TITVS LIVIVS, and commaunded his image to be taken out of the Libraries in Rome, where they vſed to keepe the Images and pictures of great and excellent learned men. Of VIRGIL he ſaid, that he was a man without any wit, and leſſe learning; and TITVS LIVIVS he reprooued for a man of many words, and negligent; of SENECA (who in that time was much eſteemed, and with great reaſon) he ſayd that hee was ſand without lime, and a vvorke made without mixture: and ſo did he taxe the moſt ſublime and excellent wittes. Beſides vvhich, hee tooke from many Patricij and Noblemen of Rome the Armes and Ornaments which they bare of their Linages and Families: and his enuy yet deſcended ſcended to lighter and meaner matters then theſe, ſo as there was no man (were he neuer ſo baſe) whom he enuied not for any proſperity or good ſucceſſe that might happen vnto him, as to make men to be ſhauen, if he ſaw they had yellow or faire coloured haire.

Now for matters of laſciuiouſneſſe and diſhoneſtie, truly there is ſo much to be ſayd, as a man may not, neither ought to make the whole relation thereof, to the end that his filthineſſe doe not ſoyle and corrupt our Hiſtorie: for it is certaine that he was as filthy and abominable, as his predeceſſor TIBERIVS, if not more. Hee was ſo ſhameleſſe in his incontinencie and luſt, as he reſpected neither perſons nor place. He abuſed all his Siſters; of which (it is thought) he deflowred DRVSILLA being a Virgine, himſelfe but a very boy. Shee being afterwards maried to LVCIVS CASSIVS LONGINVS, a man of Conſular degree, he tooke her from him and kept her openly, as if ſhe had been his lawfull wife, and being ſicke he made her heire of all his goods, and his ſucceſſor in the Empire: but ſhe dying, he ſorrowed with impatiencie. His other Siſters LIVIA and AGRIPPINA, he neither loued nor reſpected, but would often proſtitute them to his owne ſtale Catamits. And in the end he condemned them to exile with ÆMILIVS LEPIDVS, as Adultreſſes and priuy to treaſons againſt his perſon. Neither was any Roman Matron (how honorable or vertuous ſoeuer) free from his pollution. He would vſually inuite them with their husbands to ſupper: and if any one liked him, he would riſe from the table, and call her to him into an other roome, and there abuſe her, and then preſently returne againe and bragge of his fowle fact.

Caligula.

The abominable vices of Caligula.

In other vices he was beyond all meaſure paſſionate, being extreame in extremities, the one againſt the other: for he was greedie and couetous in extreame manner, and of the other ſide, prodigall and a ſpender aboue all meaſure. To glut his greedy couetouſnes he inuented meanes to gather wealth, and to rob the land and the people: ſo as there was no kinde of tribute or impoſition to be deuiſed which he put not in practice, euen amongſt common & diſhoneſt women; and of all ſuites in law, hee had the fortith part of any ſum that was recouered; and if the parties agreed before ſentence giuen, he had a certaine portion: and ſo in all matters wherein any thing was to be gotten, he tooke a ſhare, euen of thoſe which were porters and got money by carrying of burthens vpon their ſhoulders. And hauing amaſſed together an infinite ſum, by direct and indirect meanes, he would lie downe and tumble vpon it, recreating himſelfe in his couetouſnes: wherein he ſhewed great ſimplicitie, ſeeing how little he did otherwaies eſteeme it, and his lauiſh expences, as the moſt prodigall man that euer was, which a man may eaſily iudge by theſe few examples following. Into the bathes wherein they did vſe to to bathe, he cauſed moſt precious and ſweete ſmelling oyntments to be caſt which were of exceeding great price, that they might bathe in them, hot and cold, as in other water. In the feaſts and bankets which he made, he commaunded moſt pretious pearles and iewels to be diſſolued in moſt ſtrong vinegar, and to be put into their meate, becauſe the coſt ſhould be ineſtimable: and he commaunded that all the ſeruices in ſteede of meat, bread, fleſh, fiſh, and fruites, ſhould be of fine golde for his gueſts. Beſides this, he ſometimes caſt among the people great ſummes of money: whereby it ſeemeth they had reaſon, which attribute the doings of this man to fooliſhnes, aſwell as to his ill diſpoſition. There was ſo great varietie in his actions, affections and deſires, as may be gathred by that which is alreadie ſaid, and the reſt which we will declare; as on the one ſide he contemned the gods, and preſumed himſelfe to be one of them, and yet he was ſo afeard of a thunderclap that he ranne and hid himſelfe vnder a bed. Sometimes he was very familiar, and called men to conuerſe with him, ſeeming to be much delighted with their companie and conuerſation: at other times he ſhunned them, and retired himſelfe to his workes. He ſometimes diſpatched matters with ſuch expedition and diligence, as he ſeemed to be the moſt quicke and actiue man in the world, and at other times, with ſuch ſlacknes and leaſure, as he ſeemed not to be the man which he was before. Many which committed hainous crimes, he puniſhed not: and others he commaunded to be ſlaine, which had done no offence. He would this day praiſe one thing: and the next day, he would peraduenture cauſe him to be ſlaine which ſpake well thereof. Finally, he was ſo variable that (as DION reporteth) men knew not what to doe, nor ſay, his conditions were ſo doubtfull. The like he did in his apparell, in his exerciſes, and in all his other actions: for procuring one thing, he would doe cleane contrarie; as we ſaid in robbing and heaping treaſure together, he would ſpend ſo prodigally that thoſe treaſures ſhould not ſuffice for his expences. Beſides what is already ſaid, authors affirme that he cõmaunded certaine ſhips to be built, which were the greateſt and moſt coſtly that euer were ſeene, of which all the timber was of Cedar, and the poupes and ſternes of Iuorie ſet with gold and precious ſtones, and all the ſailes and tackling were were of silke of diuers colours : they were so great, as they had in them halles and gardens, wherein were many trees and flowers : in one of these shippes, he sailed along the coast of Naples one whole day, to disport himselfe. He also began certaine buildings and workes against all reason and humane discretion, and such as seemed impossible. For in the sea he commanded huge pillers and towers to be built, and by land he raised certaine valleyes, & made them equall with the mountaines, heaping vp rockes and earth in them, vntill they were euen therewith. And in other places, he began to digge downe mountaines to make them leuell with the meadowes, presuming to correct the workes of nature.

As CAIVS CALIGVLA was so variable and inconstant, as we haue said; so in crueltie onely he was constant, vsing it indifferently to all without respect of parentage or friendship: in the like manner he vsed his grandmother ANTONIA daughter to GERMANICVS, so as she being in despaire, tooke poison whereof she died. And the yong TIBERIVS Nephew to the Emperor TIBERIVS, and sonne to DRVSVS (as I haue said) he making shew to loue him, liuing secure and without feare, he sent to kill him by the hands of a Tribune, for no other cause, but for that he vsed a certaine kinde of confection of sweete sauours for his delight: CALIGVLA saying, that he did it, for feare to be poisoned. And SILLANVS, (who had beene his father in law,) he forced to kill himselfe, onely for that he went not one day to sea, with him. Which SILANVS did forbeare, because the sea made him sicke. And PTOLOMIE the sonne of IVBA King of Mauritania, to whom he was neere allied, and MARCO which had holpen him to get the Empire, and others with whom he was in great league and friendship, in requitall of their deserts he caused them to be cruelly put to death. To all men generally, both in word & deede he vsed such crueltie, as it would seeme incredible, had not so many and such authors written the same: for he commaunded wild beasts which hee kept for feasts and triumphs, to be fatted with the bodies of liuing men, condemned to death. And sometimes causing some to be executed, he commaunded their parents and kinred to be present at their execution, and then inuited them to eate with him, and compelled them to discourse of pleasant matters. He also qualified his cruelties, with sundrie kindes of deaths which he inflicted; prolonging it, to the end that the torment should be the greater: So as they stoode in so great feare of this man, that many (if they had oportunitie) slew themselues rather then they would stay for his sentence : among which the accursed PONTIVS PILATE, who condemned to death the giuer of life IESVS CHRIST our Redeemer, was one; who being accused and banished, slew himselfe with his owne hands.

The crueltie of Caligula.

This wretched CALIGVLA was so nusled in bloud, as he much desired and wished that all the Romane people had had but one head, to the end that he might cut off that heade at one blowe. He also held the time of his raigne infortunate, & complained of the infelicitie thereof, for that in his daies there was no pestilence, famine, earthquakes, deluges, spoiles by fire or other misfortunes.

There came by chance one day into his presence, a man who had been banished by the Emperor TIBERIVS, of whom hee asked what life hee led in his exile? the other to flatter him, answered, that he spent his time in praying for the death of TIBERIVS, to the end he should be Emperor: which when CALIGVLA heard (as he had banished a great number of men) he beleeued that they all made the like prayer for him, & therefore commaunded so many of them as could be found, to be sought out and slaine. Vsing these crueltries and such like, or greater, he made himselfe within few dayes so hatefull, as his death was generally desired, and practised by some: but the conspiracies against him being discouered, it deferred his death, although but for a small time, which was as he deserued, as we will presently declare. But first we will speake of the warrs & conquests which he made, wherin he shewed no lesse vanitie then in all the rest. For vpon a sodaine at the end of the third yeere of his raigne, he caused a great number of men of warre to be leuied, wherewith he departed from Rome, giuing it out that he went to make warre in Germanie whither he tooke his iourney: whereto he added the ordinarie legions, which were in those parts, and with a shew and appearance to doe some great exploite with his armie, he passed the riuer of Rhine: and he began to make warre at such time as it seemed to all men (considering his great number of men, and the resolution wherewith he came) that he would haue ouerrunne the world, and haue made some great conquest; but he contented himselfe with this, that the Kings son of Batauia (which is now called Holland) being in disgrace with his father, came to his seruice, and herewith hauing done some small harme in that countrie, he returned, and passed the riuer: And after he had giuen some alarmes, he tooke his way with his armie towards the the sea; and in memorie of his victorie, he there commaunded a tower to be built, and all his souldiers to gather abundance of cockle shelles, as the spoyles of his enemies: and then calling his armie together, in such manner as captaines vse to doe after some notable victorie, he made a long oration vnto them, and commended them all; and afterwards he commaunded a great some of money to be distributed amongst them, ouer and aboue their pay.

Returning to Rome, he sent before, to commaund that there should be prepared a most solemne triumph; carrying with him to that effect, certaine Barbarians his enemies, such as he could get; but afterwards he altered his determinatiō, deferring the triumph vntil another time, and entred into Rome in ouacian triumph, and there began againe to execute some of his accustomed cruelties, purposing to haue done greater. Which the world being vnable to endure, many conspired against him: he which did most therein, and the first that began to practise, was a Tribune of the Pretorian Cohorts, whose name was CHEREA: he died of thirtie wounds which they gaue him, in a vault or secret gallerie, wherein he vsed to passe vnseene, from his palace to certaine bathes, hauing most vnworthily raigned three yeeres and ten moneths, in the nine and twentith yeere of his age.

Caligula murthered, and in what manner.

The manner of his death, besides SVETONIVS, DION and others, is written by the true Historiographer IOSEPHVS: to whom I referre the curious reader to make an end of so brutish a monster, as was CAIVS CALIGVLA.

This happened in the three and fortith yeere of CHRIST our Lord. After that he was dead, there died the same day CESONIA his wife, and one only daughter which he had: and notwithstanding that the Almaines which were of his guarde fell to armes, & would haue slaine the conspirators, and did kill some of them, yet in the end all was pacified, and his death was generally approued, as of a Tyrant and most cruel Prince; in like maner as the death of such Kings and Princes is vsually approued & pleasing, whose liues haue been detestable and odious. It is certainely knowne, that when CALIGVLA was slain, he had purposed to haue put many to death: for in his closet or priuy chamber, were found two bookes; whereof the one was called the poiniard, and the other the sword, wherein were written the names of a great number of Senators and Knights of Rome whom he had condemned to death.

There was also found a chest full of diuers kindes of poysons, such were the relickes and iewels of this wicked man. In this short time wherein CAIVS CALIGVLA raigned, the name and faith of CHRIST was published and preached in a great part of the world, the holy Apostles Saint PETER and Saint PAVL preaching the same; and particularly in Iudea Saint MATTHEVV, who first of all wrote the Gospell.

THE LIFE OF CLAVDIVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FIFT ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

CLaudius the sonne of Drusus, and Vncle to Caligula, obtained the Empire more through the temeritie of the souldiers, then for any worthie acts done for his country: for Caligula being dead the Senate resolued to extirpate the race of the Cæsars, and to restore Rome to her auncient libertie, and with many armed men had seised vpon the Capitoll. Whereupon he standing in great feare, seeing so great a tumult (as commonly it happeneth vpon innouation in States) and being by nature fearefull, and a coward, he hid himselfe in a secret place of the palace, where being found by a souldier which by chance came to seeke for pillage, he was by him reuerenced, and hailed Emperor. This souldier beeing seconded by others who together with the people desired a prince, in the end maugre the Senate they made him Emperor; in which dignitie he carried himselfe in the beginning with such modestie and humanitie, as all men began to assure themselues of an excellent gouernement: but he continued not long in that good disposition: for through his little care, the naturall vices of his minde encreasing, he desrauded the world of the hope conceiued of him, and in short space became both luxurious, cruell, a drunkeard, and a glutton. He had many wiues, but aboue all the rest Messalina was so incontinent and so infamous, as her filthines cannot be written without vndecent and immodest words. This Emperor was so forgetfull, as he remembred not in the euening what he had done in the morning; by reason whereof, he did oftentimes cause those to be called to eate, or play with him, whome he had commaunded to be slaine; and among st others, he asked where fore his wife Messalina came not to dinner hauing but a little before caused her to be put to death. He caused with excessiue charge the lake Fucinus to be dried up, wherein before that it was dreined, he made an infinite number of men (condemned to die) to fight a nauale battaile. He subdued Mauritania which rebelled against him: and in his old age tooke to wife Agrippina the mother of Nero: who perceiuing that he was not greatly affected to her sonne, as a woman desirous to make him to succeede in the Empire, poysoned him in certaine Mushrumps which he loued to eate, alleaging that they were meate for the gods, for that they grew of their owne accord, whose death was concealed by Agrippina, vntill she had confirmed her sonne for his successor in the Empire. He liued sixtie and foure yeeres, and raigned fourteene; his death was not greatly lamented, for that his life was not much beloued.

BY the death of CAIVS CALIGVLA, his Vncle CLAVDIVS, and brother to his father the good GERMANICVS sonne of DRVSVS and sonne in law to OCTAVIANVS, had the Empire. But the manner how hee attained thereto was very strange, and therefore worthie to be related. The sodaine death of CALIGVLA caused great alteration and confusion in the cittie of Rome, as soone as it was published. Some would not beleeue it, seeing it was done in a secret place, imagining that it was a matter fained by him, thereby to discouer euery mans affection towards him. The conspirators, as they did not practice his death to the end that any of them should aspire to the Empire, neither for any other man, but onely to free the common-wealth from so cruell a Tyrant, had more care for their owne safeties then to make choise of a new Emperor. The Consuls as soone as they were certified of his death, assembled the Senate; and being terrified with the miseries past, resolued to reduce the cittie of Rome to her auncient libertie, and to extinguish the name of CÆSARS and the Monarchie; and perseuering in this determination, they seised on the Capitoll, with some of the Cohorts of the citie, which had the guarde of the palace, who were also of their opinion. But herein were diuers opinions in the citie: for the common people would haue a head and an Emperor, for the hatred which they euer bare to the Senate, and for that the least part of the euills and cruelties committed by the Emperors, fell vpon them; and also for that they enioyed and tasted of the feasts and largesses which the Emperors vsed to make. The men of war of the pretorian Cohorts which were lodged hard by Rome, desired there should be an Emperor; because they were in hope to make choyse of him at their pleasure; and in regard of the rewards and priuileges which they inioyed from the Emperors. But the matter remaining in this cõfusiõ, neither the one nor the other knew whõ to nominate.

The Senat sought to reduce the cittie to her auncient libertie.

The common people and men of warre would haue an Emperor.

It happened that CALIGVLA being dead, CLAVDIVS was in so great feare of his life, as he dared not goe foorth of the Imperiall palace, neither openly to shew himselfe. But being amazed and in this feare, he went to hide himselfe in the most secret place he could finde; but certaine souldiers running vp and downe to take what they could finde, it chaunced that one of them found him, seeing his feete: who to the end hee might know who he was, vncouered him, and knew him. And CLAVDIVS imagining himselfe to bee sought for to bee slaine, cast himselfe at the souldiers feete, desiring him to saue his life: whereof the souldier assured him, & presently resolued to name him Emperor: who gathring together those which came with him, they all did the like: and taking him vpon their shoulders, they carried him in a litter to their Campe; where (trembling in great feare) he knew not to what issue this would come. But he was well intreated in the Camp, & the souldiers agreed to make him Emperour. The Cõsuls and Senate hearing he was carried to the Campe, in such manner as aforesaid, sent to him, requiring him by a tribune of the people, to come to the Senate, and there to treate of such matters as should bee for the common good. Whereto he answered, that hee was there detained by force and could not come. It chanced that at this time, HERODE AGRIPPA King of Iudea, was in Rome: whom (as is aboue said) CAIVS CALIGVLA had restored to the Kingdome, which in right had belonged to his vncle ARCHELAVS, & to his grandfather HERODE, which slew the Innocents.

This

This HERODE shewing himselfe a newter, began to mediate an agreement betweene CLAVDIVS and the Senate; although that secretly he fauored CLAVDIVS, counselling him to be resolute, and not to submit himselfe to the Senate. One whole day and a night was spent without any resolution, during which time CLAVDIVS wauered betweene hope and feare: the next day the people began openly to demande an Emperor, and many abandoned the Senate and Consuls; so as there followed much trouble (which IOSEPHVS noteth.) But at length, seeing that the succession in the Empire more rightly appertained to CLAVDIVS, then to any other, they all agreed to make him Emperour: and the Senate went vnto him, and the Cohorts tooke the oath, and did their accustomed homage, hee making many large promises; and so the Senate accepted and confirmed him. And thus he obtained the Empire of the world, who but a day before knew not where to find a place to hide himselfe, for the safety of his life.

Lib. 19. c. 3.

When CLAVDIVS attained to the Empire, he was fiftie yeeres old; hauing euer liued poorely and little esteemed, notwithstanding that hee was neer of kinne to the Emperours, and had passed great daungers and perils, without any office or dignitie; sauing some few moneths the Consulship, wherein by CAIVS CALIGVLA he was admitted for his companion. He was a man of a tall stature, neither fat nor leane, of a faire and pleasing countenance; and whether he sate or stood, he euer shewed a greatnes, representing maiestie: whereto his faire gray haires were a great ornament. He had so little strength in his knees as he went weakly, and as though he were careleese. And when he was angrie, he was so much altred therewith, as the teares would fall from his eyes, and he stammered in his speech; besides all which, his head did euer shake. He was a sickly man: but being once Emperor, he was cured of his infirmities, except the paine of the stomacke, which sometimes troubled him very much. He was learned both in the Greek and Latin tongues, and wrote bookes and histories. He also tooke vpon him to adde three letters to the Latin Alpabet: but as a matter superfluous they continued not.

Claudius was learned in the Greeke and Latin tongues.

CLAVDIVS is numbred among the bad Emperours, for his vices and the great cruelties which he committed, suffering himselfe to be gouerned by certaine enfranchised men which were his fauorites: yet he did many things befitting a worthie Prince, which were profitable, so as PAVLVS OROSIVS in some sort seemeth to defend his actions.

Beginning to take the gouernment vpon him, notwithstanding that there were diuers opinions, & many both attempted and spake much against him; The first thing he did, was to giue a generall pardon, and to commaund all things past to be buried in perpetuall silence and oblion: yet for example, and to feare others to attempt the like, he commaunded iustice to be done on CHEREA the captaine of the cõspirators & vpon some of the rest; who suffered death with great courage, and resolution, making mention of BRVTVS and CASSIVS, who slew IVLIVS CÆSAR; CHEREA desiring that he might be slaine with the same sword wherewith he had slaine CALIGVLA. CLAVDIVS shewed himselfe mercifull to all which had offended him, and were opposites in his election: and disannulled all the cruel edicts made by CALIGVLA. He also commaunded to be deliuered out of prison, & to be released from banishment, all those which vniustly, or for small causes did endure the same: among which he released from banishment CALIGVLA's sisters and neeces. And to HERODE AGRIPPA King of Iudea (in requitall of the m eanes he vsed to aduance him to the Empire) he gaue the Tetrarchie of Galile, which CAIVS CALIGVLA had taken from his vncle HERODE ANTIPAS, who had put S. IOHN BAPTIST to death, and was an actor in the death of our Sauiour. This HERODE AGRIPPA was of great state, and honoured in Ierusalem: where putting S. IAMES to death, and persecuting the Apostles and Primitiue Church, he was striken by the Angell of God, and died as S. LVKE reciteth in the Acts of the Apostles. And so these three HERODS died an euill death. Of this AGRIPPA, & his vncle HERODE Tetrarcha, called ANTIPAS (who put Saint IOHN to death, and in whose time our Sauiour died; and the other HERODE the great, who slew the Innocents, in whose time CHRIST was borne) I haue twice made mention, because these HERODES commonly breed a confusion in reading of the Scriptures, not distinguishing the one from the other.

Cherea died courageously.

Herode Antipas which put S. Iohn Baptist to death, died miserably in exile at Lions in France.

Herode Agrippa a great persecutor of the Gospell, was striken by the Angell of God. Chap. 12.

Three Herodes.

Herode Ascalonita was he which murdered the Innocents, died of death naturall.

Returning to the Emperor CLAVDIVS (I say) that touching the ceremonies, names and titles, which for honour the Romanes were wont to giue to their Emperours, he shewed himselfe very discreet and temperate, & would not accept of many of them: and forbad vpon great penalties, that none should do sacrifice to him, as they had done to CAIVS CALIGVLA: and so in the beginning of his Empire, he did these and such like as a good Prince. Among which, one was, that he had an especiall care that Rome should be continually well prouided of wheat and graine, warranting the Merchants againſt all daungers and pirats by Sea: and herein (although afterwards he committed many errours) he was euer diligent and carefull during his life. CLAVDIVS was alſo a great louer of ſumptuous buildings: among which there were three ſo proud and ſtately, that it ſeemeth they excelled the moſt of all that euer were in the world; and for ſuch, PLINIE, SVETONIVS, and moſt authors doe account them. The one was a marueilous Conduit or Aqueduct of water, which after his name was called Claudia, with which none of the Conduits in Rome could compare, either for abundance of water, or for coſt and excellencie of the workmanſhip: for it was brought fortie miles from Rome, by mines and paſſages thorough mountaines; and in low valleys, by erecting moſt high Arches of a wonderful charge; and ſo was it caried & mounted to the top of the higheſt hils in Rome. The other worke was a Hauen of the Sea made by hand, in the citie of Oſtia, the which was capable of a great number of ſhips, made in the firm land; and afterwards he let the Sea into it (as DION reporteth) hauing firſt fortified and made firme the bottome thereof: in truth a marueilous worke, and ſuch as his poſteritie and thoſe which ſucceeded him were not able to maintaine. His third worke (although leſſe profitable, yet moſt coſtly of all the reſt;) was to drein and laie drie a great Lake called Fucinus, in the countrey of the Marſi, a people neere to Rome, which was the greateſt Lake in all Italie: the which he did (as ſome ſay) to bring that water into the Riuer of Tiber, to make it greater with the current thereof, and to drie vp and lay open the fields, which that water couered, to the end they might be tilled. Which to effect, among other difficulties and infinit toile, he mined through a very high mountaine of flint, three miles in length; a worke which ſeemed impoſſible, being (as I ſaid) a mine thorough a rock. Finally, how great and admirable this worke was, may appeare by the time which it continued, and the labourers which wrought therein, which (as ſom authors affirme) were 30000. men, which laboured eleuen yeeres without ceaſing; a matter which ſeemeth incredible: ſo as beſides the reſt, if EVSEBIVS (a moſt Chriſtian and true author) had not written it, I durſt not report nor beleeue it. What end this worke and labour had, ſhall be related in his place: for (as I ſayd) although it began in the beginning of his raigne, it was ended eleuen yeeres after. I alſo forbeare to ſpeake of other his buildings, which although they were excellent, yet not comparable to the aboue named.

Plin. lib. 36. cap. 15.

A wonderfull worke.

Hauing begun and continued theſe workes, he was not careleſſe for the reformation of euill cuſtomes and abuſes within Rome, and abroad, and in ſome other matters: wherein if he had perſeuered, he had bin worthily held for an excellent Prince. But afterwards by reaſon of his great liberty, and wickednes of his fauorites and ſuch as were inward with him, (by whom he was much ouerruled) he became ſo diſſolute, that it defaced and ſtained all his former actions, as hereafter ſhall be declared. Beſides that which is already ſpoken, this made the beginning of his raigne the more famous, that in the firſt, ſecond or third yeeres thereof (as EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS, BEDA, and S. ISIDORE report) S. PETER the Apoſtle came to Rome, and there ſeated himſelfe, after he had preached in diuers parts, but principally had remained in Antioch eleuen yeeres: and being come thither, remained there twentie fiue yeeres, vntill the end of the Emperour Nero, as ſhall be ſpecified: they alſo affirme, that with S. PETER came the Euangeliſt S. MARKE, and being by him informed, and enſpired with the holie Ghoſt, he wrote the Goſpell, by whoſe direction he returned to preach CHRIST in Alexandria; of whom, and of the other holie Apoſtles and Diſciples of CHRIST, of their miracles, martyrdomes, & what ſucceſſe they had, I make little mention, becauſe (as I haue ſaid) in a prophane hiſtorie, as this is, I hold it not fit to inſert diuine and holy matters, although that in briefe there ſhall be mention made of that which ſhall be moſt conuenient for the light of this hiſtorie and the generall good.

To returne to our diſcourſe of CLAVDIVS, it paſſed in this manner, that in the fourth yeer of his raigne, notwithſtanding that the Emperors power was then ſo great and ſo much redoubted, as no Nation of the world durſt beare armes againſt him: yet the inhabitants of the Iland of Britaine, which IVLIVS CÆSAR had ſubdued, did boldly riſe in armies, and denie their obedience and vaſſalage: which the Emperour CLAVDIVS tooke ſo ill, as he reſolued in perſon to vndertake the enterpriſe to ſubdue and pacifie them. For which action (beſides the ordinarie legions) he aſſembled a great Nauie by Sea, and a great armie by land; and purpoſing to goe by Sea, he embarked the ſame in the Port of Oſtia, notwithſtanding that the paſſage was farre about: but in the beginning of his voyage he was ſo ouertaken with a tempeſt, as he was in daunger to haue been caſt away. Wherefore he diſembarked his forces in the citie of Marſelles in France, and altering his determination, croſſed through France, & ſhipping himſelf againe right ouer againſt England, he paſſed into the Iland with ſo great a power, that he eaſily pacified all: yet (as DION teſtifieth) he came to a battaile with the Britains, wherin he ouercame them. But the common opinion is as I ſay, and ſo doth GILDAS, an ancient true Engliſh Hiſtoriographer of 960. yeeres continuance, record. The iourney into Britannie being ended to his content, he ſent his Nauy into the Ilands called Orcades, which lie to the North of Scotland, & are now ſubiect to the King of great Britanny, which within few daies he ſubdued & made ſubiect to the Empire: which vntill that time were vnknowne to the Romanes, as EVSEBIVS and OROSIVS record. Hauing performed all theſe things in the ſpace of ſixe months, he returned towards Rome, where he entred triumphing with the greateſt ſolemnitie that could be, & to him was giuen the name of BRITANNICVS, for ſubduing the Ile of Britanny. To the ſolemnity of this triuſph, SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS reporteth, that he not only ſuffered the Gouernours & Prefects of prouinces to come to Rome, but alſo he releaſt many others who liued in exile, from their baniſhment.

The Emperour Claudius his comming into England.

The Britaines rebelled againſt Claudius.

For this victorie, he cauſed a crowne nauall to be made, which was vſed to be giuen for victories by ſea, which crowne was of gold wrought with the prowes of gallies and ſhips, and placed ouer the gate of the imperiall palace, hard by that which ordinarily did ſtand there made of oken boughs, called Ciuica; and for the ſame reaſon he commaunded that a ſonne of his, which hee had by his wife MESSALINA, whoſe name was GERMANICVS, ſhould be called BRITANNICVS: And in this triumph he began to honor with armes & other fauours ſome of his libertines, which had been ſlaues, and were enfranchiſed and ſet at libertie, and did them ſo great honor, as men began to murmure againſt him, and thereby he made himſelfe ill beloued. For they committed many inſolencies and wrongs, by meanes of their great riches and authoritie: of which the chiefeſt and moſt ſpoken of, were ſixe or ſeauen, one named DIODONES, to whom he gaue for his armes, the triumph aforeſaid: another, whoſe name was FELIX, he made gouernour and prefect of Iudea, Samaria, and Galile, by meanes of the death of HERODE AGRIPPA, before which FELIX we reade in the acts of the Apoſtles that Saint PAVL was brought priſoner. Another called CALIXTVS, of whom PLINY, SENECA, and CONELIVS TACITVS make mention. Another was POLYBIVS, who was a learned man, whom CLAVDIVS himſelfe held for his companion, and as it were maiſter of his ſtudies; to whom SENECA wrote a conſolatorie epiſtle for the death of his brother. Another named NARCISSVS, whom hee made his Secretarie, whom SVETONIVS preferreth before all the reſt. Another was PALANTE, a man alſo very famous: to all which he did ſuch fauours and gaue ſo exceſſiue gifts, as they attained to ſuch riches, that CLAVDIVS vpon a time complaining that his treaſurie & exchequer was poore, he was anſwered, That it would be rich enough, if his freed men NARCISSVS and PALANTE would accompany him, and ſhare with him in their trade and ſtocke. Within ſhort ſpace he made himſelfe ſo ſubiect, and was ſo much ouerruled by theſe Libertines, and his adulterous and diſhoneſt wife MESSALINA, to whom he was now married (after other wiues which he had had) that by their directions and counſels he committed many diſorders, follies and wrongs, more like their ſlaue and ſubiect, then their Prince and Soueraigne, and ſuffered others to commit the like; pardoning ſuch grieuous offences and committing ſuch cruelties, as it would be long and diſpleaſing to right them all. But by that which he committed againſt his owne bloud, which I will declare, the reſt may be conſectured which I paſſe in ſilence. One of the firſt and moſt notable, was the death of APPIVS SILANVS a worthie noble Romane, who ſometimes had been gouernour of Spaine, and married with his owne mother in law, whoſe death was plotted by his wife MESSALINA, and his enfranchiſed NARCISSVS. DION writeth, that hauing no cauſe whereof to accuſe him, it ſufficed to cõmaund him to be ſlaine, for that NARCISSVS in a morning came into CLAVDIVS chamber before he was vp, faining great haſte and feare, perſwading him to ſtand vpon his guard, and to take heed of APPIVS SILANVS: for he dreamt that night he was ſlaine, and that SILANVS onely had killed him. The Emperor well pleaſed with the matter, went to the Senate, acquainting the Senators therewith; much commending & extolling the loyaltie of NARCISSVS, that he euen ſleeping had care of his life and health. After SILANVS, he alſo put to death his two ſonnes in law, LVCIVS SILANVS and POMPEY, and two of his owne neeces called LIVIÆ, one of which was the daughter of DRVSVS, and the other of GERMANICVS; no man knowing any cauſe wherefore he did it, nor admitting their defence. And ſo were a great number of others put to death, all by the counſell and practice of MESSALINA and his freed men; who bare ſuch ſway in the gouernment and counſel of eſtate, as they ſold sold offices, Captainships & dignities; and that which was worse, tooke money for absolutions, penalties, punishments and banishments: finally, all was to be sold for money. And the most part hereof was put in practice, (as some authors affirme) without the priuitie of CLAVDIVS, or being acquainted therewith; so great was their power and authoritie. And in the like manner did hee put some to death, being abused, to please and content these his fauorites; so subiect was he to be gouerned by them.

By meanes of the great disorders, murders, and grieuances, which CLAVDIVS by the counsel and practice of his libertines and his wife MESSALINA committed, he made himselfe to be hated of many, and principally of the better sort; so as some practised his death, and conspired against him: although that for his other good deeds, before repeated, hee was beloved and much esteemed of others. But as those which hated him were more, and boulder in courage: so they feared not to practise his death which they wished him; chiefly two Romane Knights resolued to kill him, and STACIVS CORVINVS and GALLVS ASINIVS, two principal Romanes conspired against him. But the one and the other being discouered, it was brought to light, and he prevented the danger by executing new cruelties upon the said parties, and upon such as had consented & participated with them: and seeing himselfe freed from this danger, he continued in his evill purposes and cruell courses. In like manner the hatred encreasing against him, it happened that FVRIVS CAMILLVS SCRIBONIANVS, who was Lieutenant, and Governor of Dalmatia (incited by many principal men of Rome) openly rebelled against him: and the legions of that Province consenting with him, he called himselfe Emperour. This put CLAVDIVS into such a feare and amazement, as hee was much dejected and base minded: and as sinne and an evill conscience is one of the chiefest causes that maketh men cowardly and fearefull, hee was so daunted, that CAMILLVS (who rebelled) writing vnto him, and perswading him to leaue the Empire and to liue priuate, he remained doubtfull what to do, and caused certaine principall men to consult thereof: So as if the matter had gone forwards, it seemeth that he would haue had small courage to haue defended the Empire. But as CAMILLVS had no more right thereto then he, & as his purpose was not to redresse the Empire and reforme the euils committed by CLAVDIVS, but to make himselfe lord & tyrant, and peraduenture do as ill or worse, God would not suffer it to take effect according to his desire: for it happened that the same legions which had raised & chosen him, repenting of what they had done, the fift day after slue him. Some Authors, (among which are SVETONIVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS) report, that herein hapned a strange accident: for the Ensigne-bearers coming to giue their oath and obedience to the new Emperour by his commaundement, were not able to remoue the Ensignes with the Eagles from the place where they were set; so as moued by this prodigious spectacle, they all concluded to submit themselues to CLAVDIVS deuotion, and to slay CAMILLVS. And so was CLAVDIVS deliuered from this danger, but not from feare and iealousie, but lined euer after in continuall disquiet and feare; insomuch as being one day in the temple offering his sacrifices (as then was the custome) and by chance finding a sword, which some man peraduenture without any ill intent had brought thither, and there forgotten it, he as a man which knew that he had deserued death, fearing all men, thinking that it was brought thither to effect some treason against him, was in such a perplexitie and feare, as presently in great haste he commanded the Senate to be assembled; and with teares in his eyes, he complained vnto them, publishing himselfe to be a man of most miserable condition and vnhappie, and that he was at no time nor in any place assured, but in danger; and so held himselfe many dayes retyred, and came not abroad.

The wickednes of Messalina.

By meanes of these things which were attempted against CLAVDIVS, MESSALINA his wife and her fauourites and confederates, tooke occasion to put many men to death, and to confiscate their goodes, vsing other cruelties to all manner of people, alleadging that they were guilty of the conspiracies aforesayd, or of some of them; and this in a most wicked manner: for many vpon suspicion without any tryall or proofe, were condemned and put to death; and to the contrarie, others which were guiltie, by bribes and gifts were freed: wherein although that for the most part CLAVDIVS was abused by those he most trusted, yet the blame was layd vpon him, and the world hated him for it. For besides the remisse forgetfulnes which he had of all things, and the trust which he reposed in such wicked people, he shewed himselfe cruell and bloudie; for oftentimes he would be present when torments were inflicted, and at the execution of these cruelties: a thing vnworthie of the state & dignitie which he held. He would sometimes also so dainely be in such a rage, as hee seemed to be out of his wits: and so SVETONIVS

NIVS accounteth his furie for follie and madnes; notwithstanding that CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth of him, that he was naturallie inclined to pitie and clemencie: so as in truth it is a strange thing to consider of the contrarietie of this mans minde. After all this (as IOSEPHVS, EVSEBIVS, and SVETONIVS affirme) in the ninth yeare of his raigne, he commaunded all the Iewes to be cast out of Rome, whereof Saint Luke maketh mention in the Acts of the Apostles: and PAVLVS OROSIVS writing the same, maketh a doubt whether they were cast out for their discord with the Christians, or whether the Christians were expelled in the like manner: for SVETONIVS saith, that they were cast out for that there was some tumult about the Christian religion. The next yeare following there was a most grieuous famine in Rome, and almost generally in all the world; whereof besides other Authors, Saint Luke maketh mention in the Acts of the Apostles.

CLAVDIVS hauing now raigned nine or tenne yeares, & matters passing there in such manner, as I haue said; yet the state and greatnes of the Romane Empire was not empaired in his dayes (for hereof it seemeth both he and those which gouerned were carefull) but it defended, and in part enlarged it selfe: For besides the pacifying of the Ile of Bruttanny, Mauritania also in his time rebelling (which is a Prouince in Africa, where there raigned Kings, friends and confederates with the people of Rome,) he made warres there by his Captaines SVETONIVS PAVLINVS, & GNEVS SIDIVS GETA, as DION witnesseth. Those countries were subdued and diuided into two tributarie Prouinces: the one was called Mauritania Cæsariensis, which for the most part is this day the kingdome of Fez, but it extended it selfe so farre as Argiers, Tunes, and Oran; and the other Mauritania Tingitana, which is much of that which we call Marocco, and Barbaria, and the coast of Zale and Azamor, euen vnto Arzil and Tanzar. At that time the Prouince of Numidia was infested by certaine barbarous Africans, which were ouercome by the ordinarie legions. In like manner the Imperiall authoritie was vpheld in the Prouinces of the East. CLAVDIVS placing therin Kings & Tetrarches at his pleasure, as DION recordeth. But besides all this, in all parts (as well as in Rome) they indured great vexations and oppressions, and the disorders which his fauorites and libertines committed, and commanded to be committed were very great: of the greatest part whereof his wife was the chiefe instrument, who was so incontinent and dishoneſt, as she was not only a common adultresse, but she also procured and brought many others to be so: and she her selfe would pray, and euen enforce men, and was of such credit with her husband the Emperour, and had such power ouer him, as no man durst make it knowne, or giue him intelligence thereof.

The two Mauritanies made tributarie Prouinces.

Mauritania Cæsariensis, the kingdom of Fez.

Mauritania Tingitana, the kingdome of Marocco.

The dishonestie of this woman mounted to so high a pitch, that iudging (as it seemed) open adulterie to be but a light sinne, she deuised a wickednes neuer heard nor thought of before in such manner as she did it, which was to be married with another, euen as she was to the Emperor; and putting it in effect, CLAVDIVS being gone forth of Rome to Ostia to doe certaine sacrifices, she married in forme and with the solemnities accustomed, with a Romane, whose name was CAIVS SILIVS; whom they affirme to haue been the faireſt and properest yong man of his time.

Messalina marrieth with Caius Silius during the life of Claudius.

The loue which CLAVDIVS bare to MESSALINA was so great, and the power she had ouer him such, as she thought that this might also passe in silence, or that he should dissemble it as he had done many other great abuses. But it now pleased God that she should receiue punishment for al her misdeedes; as he oftentimes permitteth wicked men after some great sinnes, to commit other greater, to the end at once to be punished for all. And it was so, that his great friend and fauorite NARCISSVS, a libertine before named, discouered this infamous act to CLAVDIVS, with a multitude of other villanies committed by her: who awaking in some sort out of his drousie slumber and forgetfulnes, notwithstanding that this action had put him in great feare; yet after that he was well enformed of the truth, he came to Rome, sending first before him LVCIVS GETA, who was captaine of the pretorian Cohorts, to confirme them in his seruice; and being arriued, he caused his wife MESSALINA to be apprehended, and many others which were guiltie of this action: and by the diligent industrie of NARCISSVS iustice was done both vpon her and them. And so they were put to death by his direction before that CLAVDIVS commaunded the same, notwithstanding that he had so resolued; He fearing that she with her counterfeit flatterings would so mollifie the heart of CLAVDIVS, as she might obtaine pardon, or that of himselfe he would alter his resolution, whereof he made some shew, as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth. It is a marueilous thing to thinke of the neglect and forgetfulnes of this CLAVDIVS: for although they came and told him that MESSALINA

The death of Messalina.

Claudius his monstrous forgetfulnes.

LINA was dead, he neuer spake word, neither asked by whom, nor how she died; neither then nor after that time seemed he to reioyce or to be sorrowfull for it; neither spake word good nor bad. SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS addeth another thing to this forgetfulnes, which seemeth incredible (but he and others of great authoritiy affirme the same) vvhich is, that the next day after that MESSALINA was put to death, sitting downe at the table to eate, he asked how it chanced that MESSALINA came not to dinner? The like hapned at other times concerning those which he had condemned and commanded to be slaine, that hauing put them to death one day, the next day he vvas so forgetfull, as he hath sent for them and called them to his counsell, and others to come to play with him, as they had vsed to doe.

The Emperor CLAVDIVS remaining a widdower after the death of his wife MESSALINA, by whom he had one son cald first GERMANICVS, & afterward BRITANNICVS, and one daughter whose name was OCTAVIA; hee resolved and gave it out that he would marry no more, for that hee had beene very infortunate in his wives: and therefore now in his old age hee would not try any more hazards; wherein hee spake the truth: for in his youth he had beene twice married, first with EMILIA LEPIDA, who was great grandchild to the Emperor OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS; and the second time, with LIVIA MEDVLLINA CAMILLA, of the ancient linage of the CAMILLI: the first wife, before his marriage tooke effect, hee put away; and the second died of an infirmitie the same day which was appointed for their wedding: and afterwards he married with PLAVTINA HERCVLANA, whom, after that he had by her one sonne named DRVSVS (who died a child) hee forsooke, as dishoneſt and an adultresse: and married the fourth time with ELIA PETINA, of the familie of the TVBERONES, from whom, for some causes and discontents he was also divorced, notwithstanding that he had by her one daughter called ANTONIA. All these marriages he had before hee was Emperour; and when hee tooke upon him the Empire, hee was married to MESSALINA, whose death wee now made an end to relate: and although (as I said) that hee remained a widdower, and had protested that he would marry no more, adding thereto that if he did, he gave them leave to kill him: yet afterwards forgetting himselfe (as in former time, of other matters) by the counsell of his libertine and favourite PALANTE, hee lastly married with IVLIA AGRIPPINA, who was exceeding beautifull, being his Neece, and daughter to his brother GERMANICVS, who was the widdow of DOMICIVS NERO ENOBARBVS, by whom she had a sonne named DOMICIVS NERO, as his father. And for that the marriage with his Neece within this degree of consanguinitie was prohibited and detestable among the Romanes, he procured that a law should be made whereby it should be lawfull: and his new wife tooke such order with her old husband and uncle, that within few daies after that she was married, she obtained of him that he should marrie his daughter OCTAVIA, with her sonne DOMICIVS NERO; and that he should adopt him and make him his sonne, preferring him before his owne sonne BRITANNICVS; and that in stead of DOMICIVS NERO he should be called CLAVDIVS NERO, which was performed accordingly. And not content herewith, she procured the death of certaine Romane Ladies, which had beene her rivalls for her marriage with CLAVDIVS (notwithstanding that they were favoured by NARCISSVS and CALIXTVS, his freed men) the better to maintaine her greatnes.

Claudius marries his daughter Octavia to Domicius Nero his sonne in Law.

Having in this time finished that great worke of undermining the mountaines, & making those great Caves and Mines to draw the water out of the lake Fucinus, wherein (as I said) thirtie thousand men had wrought eleven yeares; the Emperor CLAVDIVS decreed, that in memorie thereof, there should be in the same Lake a Naval battaile before that the water should bee let out, which did so much resemble a battaile in earnest, as therein were 24 Galleys, which were built there hard by for that purpose (DION writes there were fifty) which is not very unlikely; considering, the number therein, which, as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth, were 19000 men; many of which were slaves, or men condemned to death or banishment; the Emperour promising those which should prevaile and vanquish, life and liberty, and so they vvere commanded to fight to the vttermost: and to that purpose the Gallies and men were diuided into equall battailions, and their apparell, ensignes, banners, flagges and streamers were of diuers colours: the one part of them were called Sicilians, and the other Rhodians, as though the warres had been between Sicilia and Rhodes. To see this spectacle, there came an infinite number of people from all parts of Italy, and from out of Italy, which couered all the hils and mountaines neere to the sayd Lake, and the bankes thereof. CLAVDIVS with his wife AGRIPPINA, and NERO CLAVDIVS his adopted sonne and Nephew were most richly attired in in gold, stone and pearle: and so the battaile began, and was maintained betweene them most cruel and bloudie, the poore men endeuoring of either part to haue the victorie, thereby to win life, libertie and honour: and so it was obstinately fought & continued a great part of the day, the one killing and wounding the other; and most miserably, vntill at last the one part ouercame the other; and so was ended that most cruell and horrible sport. Which being ended, presently the next day CLAVDIVS commaunded the passage of the Lake to be opened: and the water beginning to issue out, it brake foorth with so great force and vehemencie, as it seemed that the earth would haue sunk; & it was so violent, as it did much harme in all the borders thereabout; and in like manner great was the feare and amazement of CLAVDIVS and his wife AGRIPPINA, who were there by, notwithstanding that they were vpon sure ground & in safetie. This was the end of this costly vanitie.

A new Iland in the Sea.

These things being past in such sort as we haue written, AGRIPPINA seeing her selfe much made of, & beloued by the Emperour CLAVDIVS, being growne prowd of the power and fauour wherein she saw her selfe (which are two things which few men can enioy and vse moderately) she became so proud, hauty & ambitious (following the foorsteps of MESSALINA) as she would commaund alone and beare all the sway in euery thing: whereupon she presently grew to be hated and enuied by some of CLAVDIVS his fauourites, yea and by himselfe; so as he began to be sorrie that euer he married her, or that euer he adopted his sonne in law NERO. Which AGRIPPINA soone discouered, as well for that he began to make much of his yong son BRITANNICVS, as for words which he spake to the same effect: for vpon a day he said, That it was true he had euer been infortunate in his wiues; but none of them had escaped vnpunished: with other speeches to the same effect. Whereat AGRIPPINA grew into such feare and suspicion, as to assure her owne life, and the succession to her sonne, she determined to procure her husbands death by poyson, and there wanted no ministers nor meanes to accomplish the same. For although that Historiographers agree not herein, yet they all concurre that poyson was giuen him, such as killed him: & the most part write, that it was in a Mushrump, which was a meate he vsed to eat with great appetite.

The Emperour Claudius poysoned by his wife Agrippina.

It was the iust iudgement of God that CLAVDIVS should die by eating: for he was so gluttonous and insatiable in eating and drinking (among his other vices) as hee thought no time nor place sufficient thereto, and did euer eate so immoderately, that most cómonly surfetting, he vsed vomits to discharge his stomacke, putting a feather into his throate, a remedy which some gluttonous men doe vse, eating vpon assurance thereof, and carrying themselues more filthily, then if they fell sicke. In which feather some authors affirme that the poyson was giuen him. He died in the sixt & fiftith yeer after the birth of CHRIST our Sauiour, in the 14. yeere of his raigne, and the 74. of his age, the 13. day of October about the breake of day, and his wife AGRIPPINA concealed his death the most part of that day: and pretending that he mended, she caused certaine vowes to be made for his health, vntill she had confirmed the Empire to her sonne NERO, according to his adoption, which (seeing they then thought CLAVDIVS to be liuing) was no hard matter to be effected.

In the time of this Emperour CLAVDIVS the Christian faith was preached, and did much preuaile in the world, the Apostle S. PETER then preaching in Rome from the beginning of his raigne, although with great contradiction and difficultie. There happened also in his time a thing which all authors affirme, and chiefly EVSEBIVS, to be very straunge and wonderfull; which was, that betweene the Ile Thera and Therasia in the Egean Sea, there was discouered a

THE LIFE AND ACTS OF THE EMPEROVR NERO, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND SIXT ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

Laudius being dead and his death published, the Senate and people of Rome sware fealtie to Nero: who by the practises and cunning of his mother Agrippina, was made Emperour. This man for the first fiue yeeres carried himselfe so well, as all men sayd that a God was sent from heauen to gouerne Rome, notwithstanding that his mother vsed much crueltie, who ruled the Empire a long time. Nero afterwards growing in yeeres, and beginning to bee disobedient to his mother, grew also in vices, and began to walke abroad by night alone, and to hurt such as hee met, whereby he was in some danger, and escaped not vnwounded. In his youth he dearely loued an enfranchised woman called Aeta, and loued Poppea Sabina, wife to his great friend Otho, whom in the end he obtained, and enioyed. And for that his mother shewed her selfe very contrarie to his humors, she became odious to her sonne: but to recouer his former fauour againe, shee made great semblance to bee in loue with him; so as it was thought that he had the vse of her bodie: but she growing euery day more odious, in the end (supposing certaine apparant signes of treason) he caused her to be slaine. After her death, he wholly let slip the reines to all shame and licentiousnes, by which example the people of Rome were also corrupted, and openly practiced the like dissonestie. He ouercame the Parthians, and subdued the Britaines: after which victories, giuing his minde to crueltie, amongst many others, he put his master Seneca to death, hauing (besides his wife Octauia) married Poppea Sabina, which he before held for his wife: in the end he made the one to be slaine, and the other he killed himselfe. He caused a young youth named Sporus to be gelded, and publikly married him: And amongst his other infamous practices, in the end he set Rome on fire, and stood with great pleasure to behold it burne. He built so huge a Palace, as it contained a very great part of the citie of Rome, and tooke vpon him to alter the name of the citie, and called it Neroniana. He so cruelly persecuted the Christians, that besides S. Peter and S. Paul, he put an infinite number of others to death. Vnder this Emperour, began the warres against the Iewes. Finally growing intolerable, and odious to God & man, first he vnderstood of the rebellion of many nations: & perceiuing the enemie to draw neere, and the sentence of the Senate pronounced against him to be apprehended, he was in such feare, that flying secretly from Rome, he was constrained miserably to kill himselfe. He liued 32. yeeres, and was Emperour 14: whose death was so gratefull to his country, to Rome, and to the whole world, as they clad themselues in ioyfull garments in steed of mourning: and in him ended the line of the Cæsars.

SVch a successor had the Emperour Claudivs, as hee deserued and made choise of, and this was Nero, the most famous man for crueltie that euer was: for although that otherwise he he was very wicked, yet in crueltie he so exceeded all measure, as you shall neuer heare any man pronounce Nero, but you shall also heare an addition thereto of Cruell; notwithstanding that he had the most wise and vertuous Schoolmaster of his time, which was Seneca, of whom in his youth he learned the liberall Sciences, wanting no capacitie; whose counsell & precepts were of force, for a time, to suppresse his bad inclination, and were the occasion that in the beginning of his raigne, he performed many parts of a good Prince, in such sort as Traiane (as many write of him) afterwards said, that for the first fiue yeeres, Nero was peereleesse. But after that time, setting all shame aside, occasions vvith with his power and libertie encreasing, he did things which did so much staine and blemish his good deeds past, as there remained no signe or spark of any goodnes in him. Yet there wanted not some authors, who in part to excuse his actions affirme, that of enuie and malice writers made his vices and faults seeme so odious, among which was Iosephvs in his booke of Antiquities; after that he himselfe had laid open many of his cruelties and parricides. I will write what I shall finde written by most approued authors, & in the order and progresse of things and time will follow Cornelivs Tacitvs, who in my opinion excelleth the rest. Claudivs being dead, through the treason of his wife Agrippina, as wee haue mentioned, after that she had by her authoritie and cunning gotten the peoples good will, and taken away all occasions that might hinder her sonne in attaining to the Empire, she published his death, which vntill then she had commaunded to be concealed. At which time Nero came foorth of the Imperiall Palace, accompanied with Byrrvs the Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts, who was very priuate with Agrippina, and also had the commaund of that Cohort which had the ordinarie guard of the Palace; and proclaiming him Emperour, they carried him to the Campe, where by all the Cohorts, he was ioyfully receiued: and hauing made a speech, and promising great donatiues to the souldiers, he was by them presently carried backe to the Senat, where all the Senators, conforming themselues to the will of the men of warre, obeyed and receiued him for Emperour with the ordinarie and accustomed solemnities, giuing him names and titles of great maiestie: among which, he refused the name of Pater patriæ, because he was of opinion that that title agreed not with his yong yeeres, being then but seuenteene yeeres old. And so Nero obtained the Empire, which he ought not to haue had; and there wanted not some which murmured, that an adopted son should be preferred before a legitimate and naturall son, and would haue had Germanicvs called also Britannicvs, and not him: But these men were not of power to withstand him: for as he was obeied in Rome, so was he in like manner in all the prouinces of the Empire. He then presently commanded the obsequies of Claudivs to be solemnized, (as the custome was) with great pompe; and according to the superstitions of that time, they canonized him among the gods.

Burrus the Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts.

Nero was Emperour at seuenteene yeeres of age.

Great was the ioy wherewith Nero began his raigne, aswell for the discontentment of the gouernment past, as for that change and innouations are euer pleasing, and desire commonly bringeth good hopes, which were confirmed by his outward shew and apparances in the beginning. First he promised to gouerne according to the rules and institutions of Avgvstvs Cæsar, and began both in word and deede to shew himselfe, or (to say better) to faine himselfe, to be liberall, pitifull, iust, milde, and tractable; doing fauours, and moderating the impositions and tributes of the prouinces, diuiding amongst the people of Rome, and the pretorian souldiers, a huge sum of money and corne, bestowing other donatiues vpon them: and to the Senators which were poore, he assigned pensions out of his eschequer; vsing all men with such humanitie and courtesie, as it seemed there was no reason to feare any thing of that which afterwards ensued. He likewise shewed great clemencie & pitie, in the execution of iustice and punishments; so as one day, a warrant being brought to him to signe, for the putting of one to death; he making shew to be verie sorrie for it, said, I would to God that I could not write: which words as though they had proceeded from a pittifull inclination; his maister Seneca doth highly praise and extol. He entertained in like manner all men louingly and friendly, and in his disports and exercises, he permitted any to be present: so as it seemed that God had sent them such a prince as they desired. And aboue all in the beginning of his raigne, he honored & bare great respect to his mother, and gaue her greater power and command in the gouernment, then indeede he ought or was fit: for the truth is, she was a cruell woman, proude and hautie: who through the counsell of Palante (one of Claudivs enfranchised men before named) without the consent of Nero, she caused Ivnivs Silanvs Proconsul in Asia, to be slaine, I for the hatred she bare him; the like she did by Narcissvs another famous Libertine, whom she also greatly hated. And her crueltie had extended further, but that Seneca and the Prefect Byrrvs, and another eminent man whose name was Afranivs (by whom Nero in the beginning of his raigne was much ruled) did oppose & crosse Agrippina in her wicked practices, as farre as in them lay: but she had such authoritie in all causes, and ouer them which had the managing thereof, as it could hardly be done, as long as she continued in good grace with her sonne.

In his second booke of clemencie.

Agrippina caused Silanus and Narcissus to be slaine throughout the course of all Palestine & Lacrime.

The state standing in these tearms, newes came to Rome, that Vologesvs King of the Parthians leuied forces to make war against the Empire, practising to make his brother King of Armenia, Warres with the King of the Parthians.

Armenia, in which prouince from the time of AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, the Romans had authoritie to place Kings at their pleasure: so as vpon this occasion the warres began in the second yeere of the raigne of the Emperor NERO; who sent VINIDIVS with new legions thither, beside the ordinarie legions which were in Asia, vnder the commaund of DOMICIVS CORBVLVS. But the war as then continued but a while; for a peace was concluded, VOLOGESVS desisting from his attempts & giuing certaine principall men in pledge for the keeping thereof, which we commonly cal hostages. About this time began NERO to shew himselfe somwhat alienated from his mother, and desirous to abate her great power and authoritie, beginning to shew her lesse obedience then formerly he had done: for he then fell in loue with a base enfranchised woman (but she was very faire) whose name was ACTA; notwithstanding that his wife OCTAVIA was verie faire and a vertuous ladie. And herein to haue his will, against the will and liking of his mother (who sought to crosse him in his loue, to the end that he should not be free from her power) he began to take into his fauor OTHO a Noble man, of whose family there had bin Consuls, and CLAVDIVS PHRENICIVS, the sonne of one of the most powerfull enfranchised men in Rome; and these wrought means for him to obtaine his beloued ACTA, which opened a passage to many other accidents which followed, whereby he began to be disobedient to his mother, who had had so great power ouer him and all others. And he commaunded the enfranchised PALANTE, (who was a great fauorite of hers) to be deposed from all gouernment in the Emperiall estate.

Peace with the Parthians.

Otho and Claudius Phenicius, Nero his fauourites.

AGRIPPINA seeing this, she attempted by al meanes possible, to recouer the grace which she had lost with her son: sometimes by giuing him counsell; at other times by entreaties and flatteries, accompanied with threatnings and feares: among which one was to do great honor, and to bestow many fauours vpon BRITANNICVS, who was the Emperor CLAVDIVS his son, and then about 14. yeeres old: imagining that through feare and suspicion of this man, NERO would returne to her obedience: but his wicked minde freed him not from that danger, by those meanes which she conceiued, for he deliuered himselfe thereof, by giuing him poison; whereof the poore BRITANNICVS died. Whereat AGRIPPINA was much amazed: but being either vnable or vnwilling to suppresse her pride, she perseuerd in this controuersie with her son, and presumed to contend with him (although vpon vnequall tearmes). Whereupon NERO setting all shame and respect apart, commaunded her guard of Germanes to be taken from her, and she to be lodged out of the palace, doing her other open disgraces, forbidding certaine persons to haue recourse vnto her, or to visit her: and he himselfe went very seldome to see her, and that very coldly, and with little respect. And being thus out of fauour (as few keepe true friendship with such as are dejected and in disgrace) the most of her friends forsook her: and one, a great Matrone whose name was IVLIA SILLANA, vpon a priuate grudge (producing false witnesses) wrongfully accused her to haue conspir'd against her son the Emperor, and that she practiced to haue made RVBELLIVS PLAVTVS, Emperor; who by his mother descended from the Emperor AVGVSTVS CÆSAR. And the matter was so handled, that AGRIPPINA was in some danger, vntill the accusation was found to be forged and the witnesses suborned, and this IVLIA the twister of this web, escaped with light punishment which was but banishment. This gaue encouragement to a wicked fellow called PETVS, to accuse PALANTE also falsely (a libertine many times before named) and BVRRVS the Prefect, who were seruants and fauorites to AGRIPPINA, alledging that they practised to depose NERO, and to make CORNELIVS SILLA Emperor: but this also was discouered to be forged and false, and for this offence PETVS and his false witnesses were only banished. All which passed in the third yeere of NERO his raigne, Saint PAVL the Apostle being then prisoner in Rome, who alittle before was sent thither by the commaundement of FESTVS, gouernour of Iudea, who succeeded FELIX aforenamed: In which imprisonment (although he went abroad at libertie) he was detained two yeeres.

The death of Britannicus.

As the Emperor NERO grew in yeeres, so began he to waxe more vaine and vicious, and to discouer his bad inclination: for by night he would goe disguised vp and downe the streetes in Rome, and would hurt and abuse such as he met, comming out of their houses; wherein he committed many notable insolencies, and offended many: and he himselfe being vpon a time vnknowne, was in danger to haue been slaine, being sore wounded. And as the vices and defects of Princes, although that in their absence thy are condemned and men murmur at them; yet in their presence they are most commonly excused, and sometimes applauded: So NERO his fauourites did not seeke to withdraw him from this dangerous vice and insolencie: but they aduised him to goe no more abroade without a guard; whereby they were the occasion of farre greater riots and disorders; then before: And some dissolute yong men (faining themselues to be the Emperor) tooke occasion to doe the like, so as there were infinite violences committed by him and them, by meanes whereof there was no small feare and all & tumult in the cittie, although that in the rest, vntill then there was indifferent good order in all things; and iustice was administred orderly in Rome and in the prouinces; and the people did dissemble or had patience with the lightnes & insolencies of NERO, by reason of the distribution of money and other things, which he made generally to all; and for certaine taxes and impositions which he commaunded to be abolished.

The fift yeere of his raigne being come, which as it seemed would haue prooued prosperous and peaceable both in particular and generall; VOLOGESVS King of the Parthians began anew to arme against the Empire, for the same reason and cause concerning the kingdome of Armenia before spoken of. And CORBVLVS, who was Proconsul in Asia, sent to intreate the Emperor that the ordinarie armie which he had, might be reinforced and increased, for that by reason of the long peace, his legions were growne more slothfull & lesse seruiceable then was needfull for so dangerous a warre; and were also diminished, some by death, and many souldiers were waxen old: for which NERO tooke order, that new companies should be leuied, and sent vnto him, and with them one of the legions of Germanie, which were euer held for the best and most experienced, as those which lay on the frontiers against the most fierce and valiant enemies. And so began the warres with the Parthians, wherein after some great encounters, and skirmishes which passed, fortune and victorie being variable, and winter being come, CORBVLVS sent a captaine whose name was PACTIVS ORPHITVS, who with a good part of the armie had the guarde of certaine straights and passages, whereby the enemie might enter the countrie, whom he cõmaunded that in any case he should not giue them battaile: and he lodged himselfe in the Plaines with the rest of the armie. But ORPHITVS, quite contrarie to that which was commaunded him, by the enemies prouocation ioyned battaile with them, and was therein ouercome with great losse to the Romanes: for which, CORNELIVS was exceeding sorrowfull, and it was no lesse grieued at in Rome. Whereupon CORBVLVS, reinforcing his legions, tooke the field before the ordinarie time, & very resolutely followed that warre: wherein passed many things which CORNELIVS TACITVS reciteth, and I for breuitie omit, to returne to NERO, of whom from henceforth there is no good to be spoken. I say then that while as his captaines made warre against the Parthians, he gaue himselfe ouer to sensualitie without contradiction in Rome, falling in loue with the wife of his great fauorite OTHO, who in time came to be Emperor, called POPPÆA SABINA, and by some POPPEIA, a most beautifull woman & of high parentage, endowed with many graces & good parts; but dishonest and incontinent; and to the end that NERO without any obstacle might haue her wholly to himselfe, giuing to her husband OTHO this reward in requitall of all his good seruices, he sent him into Spaine to be gouernor of Lusitania now called Portugall, and he freely gaue himselfe ouer vnto this POPPÆA, forgetting and abhorring his owne wife OCTAVIA, and his other aboue named friend, ACTA a Libertine whom he had much loued. Wherewith this POPPÆA became so proude, that she taking scorne to be his friend, very instantly entreated and desired the Emperor, that diuorcing himselfe from OCTAVIA, he should marrie her: and seeing that AGRIPPINA NERO's mother, who supported and defended OCTAVIA, was a great let hereto, she endeuoured all she might; to encrease the discord begun betweene the mother and the sonne. Against which, AGRIPPINA vsed all the meanes that she possibly could deuise to recouer the good will of her sonne, as to procure him to commit most detestable incest with her owne selfe, from which he was withdrawne by the meanes of SENECA, as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth: yet SVETONIVS saith, that the onely feare of his mothers power and presumptuous boldnes withheld him from it, although other authors doe not wholy cleere him from this sinne. Howsoeuer it was, by POPPÆAS great practices and his owne wickednes, he so much abhorred his mother, as he determined to kill her: but as it was a matter most odious, so he would haue it done couertly: and first he attempted & practised it with poison thrise: which taking no effect and perceiuing that she was defended by Antidotes and preseruatiues; he prouided a bedchamber for her with such an arched roofe, as being easily vnioynted, the frame might fall in peeces in the night vpon her being asleep. When this deuise could not be kept close, but was reuealed by some priuie thereunto; she then deuised a ship so artificially made as it should sodenly split in sunder, that either by the wracke or the fall of the fore-deck she might perish: This was contriued by the direction and counsell of one of his sea captaines whose name was NICETVS: and the plot was laid that shee should bee drowned in the sea on the coast of Calabria: whither NERO (fayning a reconciliation with her) caused her to goe; and vnder color to doe certaine sacrifices, he himselfe went thither also. But this plot taking no effect, wherein certaine of her company were drowned, and she with great daunger escaping, he seeing that secret practices availed not, he resolued to put her to death openly: and to that end (through the counsell of the said NICETVS) he caused it to be bruted abroade that one by whom she had sent him word of the shipwracke and daunger wherein she had been at sea, would haue killed him; & for this purpose there was a poiniard let fall at his feete, he which brought it fayning that by his mothers commaundement he came to haue slaine him. Vnder this false pretext onely, he commaunded certaine Tribunes, of which this NICETVS was chiefe, to kill her; who being come where AGRIPPINA was, she presently vnderstoode the cause of their comming: and seeing them vnsheath their swords, authors write, that shewing them her belly, she said, Strike me here first; for this part hath deserued it, seeing it conceiued and brought forth such a monster as NERO: and so she died soone of the many wounds which were giuen her. And NERO who was in a place there by, came to see his dead mother, and stood beholding her naked body as if it had been the body of a beast; praising and dispraising her parts and members. And thus did the wicked sonne murther his wicked mother, who cannot be excused, but that she for her wickednes deserued the death which she died: And it cannot be denied, but that herein NERO shewed most abominable crueltie; for nature doth abhor that a sonne should punish & be executioner to his owne mother, moued thereto by his owne wicked & euill disposition.

Nicetus tooke vpon him the charge to kill Agrippina.

Nero put his mother to death by the hand of Anicetus.

The horrible crueltie of the sonne, and diuelish ambition of the mother.

Doubtlesse, it is a strange thing to thinke of the loue vvhich this woman bare to her sonne: for it is written of her, that before he vvas Emperour, it was foretold her by an Astrologer, that he should be Emperour, and that he should kill his owne mother: whereto she answered; Let him haue the Empire, and then kill her and spare not. So great was her pride and ambition, that to the end she might be mother to the Emperour, she would put it in hazard to be slaine by her owne sonne: and so both the one and the other were accomplished. Notwithstanding that the Souldiers, Senate and people, applauded him for this foule and odious Matricide, yet was he euer after terrified with the sting of Conscience for so foule a fact; and as he often confessed, was haunted with the apparition of his Mothers Ghost, and tormented by the Furies. To this of his Mother, he added the murther of DOMITIA, his Aunt by the fathers side: who being an aged vvoman, and lying sicke of a costiuenesse, comming to visit her, and she vsing louing speeches vnto him; he commanded the Physicians to plie her still with stronger purgatiues: so he before she was fully dead, seized vpon her goods, and suppreſt her last will, that he might enioy the whole.

The Emperour NERO having performed so great an exploit as the murdering of his mother (so much are Princes blinded with flattery & adulation, that notwithstanding all the world did see and understand the matter, and how all had passed; yet most men in his presence approued and applauded the same: and there were many vowes and sacrifices made to their gods, for that he had escaped such a treason, and for the discovery thereof, making him beleeve that they held it for truth) cloaking his wickednes under this colour, he cam to Rome: where seeing himselfe at liberty, and free from the controulement of his mother (whose authority was ever great) he began to abandon all shame, giving the reins to his beastly appetite, and to all kinde of filthinesse and most abominable luxurie; which was such and so horrible, that, to keep such honest decorum in our History as is requisite, and not to offend the ears of chaste Readers, I purpose to passe it over in silence. Wherein he spending great part of the time, all the rest he employed in lascivious Comedies and other libidinous exercises, and oftentimes in banquets and feasting, which lasted all the day and the night also. He was prodigall in all things, especially in his rich and sumptuous attire. The ornaments of his Palace, and his expenses and prodigalities were such, as the like had never been seen. In Comedies and publike Shewes (most of which were most vile and dishonest) hee acted a Part in Person; and would that the Noble young men of Rome, and some of the principall yong Ladies, should be present to hear and see the same. And, above all, he was so inclined to Musick, and so much affected it, as, besides that hee was skilfull in that Art, he gloried so much in singing, as many times he refused to eat for hurting his voice; and to cleer it and make it better, he purged himselfe, and used other remedies and medicines. Some write of him, that to that effect he wore a plaister or sheet of lead upon his breast.

Princes are euer abused by flatterers.

Finally,

Finally, NERO forgetting the dignitie and maiesty of his estate, gaue himselfe ouer to base and vile exercises and vices, the which for that they were so filthy, are not at all described, and which afterwards brought him to the sinke of all sinne and cruelty, as we will declare. And as the Subiects, for the most part, do imitate the fashions and behauiour of their Princes & Lords; so presently in Rome and out of it, they began to practise and follow their vices and follies, wherein the Emperour spent his time; and the Lawes, good customes, Arts and Sciences began to be corrupted and forgotten. Wherefore, he made himselfe an enemy, and odious to all good men, although then there were but few, as if it often happeneth.

While-as hee busied himselfe in these base actions, the warres which his Generall CORBVLVS beganne with the Parthians, about the Title of the Kingdome of Armenia, never ceased. In which, after sundry exploits of war, the Romans prevailing, the Parthians were wholly driven out of the Province of Armenia: and NERO nominated and sent thither for King thereof (as a Subiect to the Empire) TIGRANES, who was nephew to ARCHELAVS sometime King of Cappadocia, having a long time continued in Rome in base and poor estate. This man was by some of the countrey received and entertained with good approbation; and others, which held for the King of Parthia, repined thereat, as commonly it useth to happen in such cases. Wherefore there was given unto him an ordinary guard of foot and horsemen, and some of the Roman Cohorts to aid him to defend that Kingdome. CORBVLVS beeing victorious came with his legions into Syria: which hapned in the seventh yeer of the Raign of NERO. About this time there was so great an Earthquake in many parts of the world, as many great Buildings fell; and the City of Laodicea was therewith wholly ruined and laid waste.

Warre with the Parthians.

Within fewe daies after, the Ile of England and Scotland, then called Britannie, rebelled against the Roman Empire, being unable to endure the insolencies and oppressions of the Roman Legions lying there in garrison, PAVLINVS SVETONIVS being their Generall: for, from the diseases and vices of the Head, Rome, did flowe disorder and corruption through all the Provinces which were members thereof. The cause of the insurrection in this Iland proceeded from hence: PAVLINVS being desirous to win honour, and envying the fame which CORBVLVS had gotten in the East, who was daily victorious in the war against the Parthians, hee wanting neither courage nor discretion to doo the like, but matter and occasion; and seeing, that in the Ile of Britannie there was neither time nor hope for his purpose, leaving such troops and garrisons there as hee thought sufficient, he went from thence with a great Fleet to make warre in an Iland neer to England, then called Mona, and now Man, which was inhabited by a fierce Nation. And notwithstanding that all succeeded well in that journey, yet, during his imploiment there, the Britains, chusing among themselves a Captain, a man of great account and reputation, called PHRASVRATVS or PRASVTAGVS, with the Title of a King, as they ordinarily had in that Iland, although it were subiect; they rebelled for their liberty, killing all the Roman souldiers they could finde, who had shut themselves up in a Temple: and, afterwards overthrowing a Legion which came to their aid, they slue the greatest part thereof, and compelled PETVS, who had the command in the absence of PAVLINVS SVETONIVS, to flee to their Camp: where they presently besieged him, and so were Masters of the Field. CALPVS (who, for the Emperour, was then Governer of the Iland) seeing himself unable to defend the same, with the greatest speed that possibly he could fled into France, and abandoned the Iland. And the Britains took such order, and used such expedition in this warre against the Romans and their Adherents, as within fewe daies in diverse places there were slain 70000 men. PAVLINVS, being advertised of this great disaster, having effected that which hee had attempted of his own authority, with all speed possible returned into the Iland with his troops; where he assembled together those which had continued constant in the Emperor's service; and the remainder of the Roman souldiers which were left; and, reprehending some, and encouraging others, without any longer delay hee went to seek his enemies, and their Captain PRASVTAGVS; who were now growne so hardy, as they cam to seek him; and did so assure themselves of the victory, as they brought their wives in Wagons and Cars, to see the battell which they meant to fight. Which, PAVLINVS SVETONIVS refused not; but, like an expert captain, took such advantage of the ground, and marshalled his men in such sort, and in the battell fought so valiantly, as hee obtained the victory; yet was it one of the most fierce battels, and fought with the greatest obstinacy, that ever was seen: for, of the Conquerers there died a great number; but of the conquered (as CORNELIVS TACITVS reports) there were slain fewe lesse than foureſcore thousand men. But GILDAS, an antient Historian born in the same Iland, sets down a far lesse number; who saith, that there were slain but thirty thousand. With this great victory, and with the new supply which NERO sent, the Romans prevailed in that Ile; so as from thenceforth it remained in peace.

While these things were in action, NERO daily increased in his vices and wickednes: and besides the above-named he began to put in practice many new cruelties, commanding many to be slain upon light occasions, and some without any; notwithstanding that his School-master SENECA, and BVRRVS the Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts, did hinder and mitigate the same all they might. But in the ninth yeer of his Raign BVRRVS died; and SENECA, being brought into suspicion with NERO (besides that vertue is ever hatefull to the wicked) began to withdraw himself from intermeddling with the affairs of the government: and as the Physician leaveth to apply medicines to the Patient, of whose recovery there is no hope; so did he forbear to converse with NERO, or give him any counsell, faining his old age and want of health to be the cause thereof. And in like manner (as saith CORNELIVS TACITVS) others, which had any spark of antient Romans in them, withdrew themselves; being unable to endure the sight of what passed, and NERO committed. At this time NERO commanded PVBLIVS SYLLA to be slain in France, who was one of the most famous men of his time; and another whose name was RABELLIVS PLAVTVS, a worthy and eminent man; in whom was found no other fault, or cause wherefore he should be slain, but that hee was vertuous, and therefore beloved of all men: and, being such, upon a time when NERO was so sick as it was thought he would have died, the people of Rome fixt their eies upon this man, naming him for NERO's Successor. Vpon which occasion, NERO banished him from Rome, and then resolved to release him from banishment by causing him to be slain. And after this maner he slue in those daies a great number of other Romans, which these Authors doo name, and I leave out as a matter odious; putting them to death through cruelty and envy, without any other cause.

A little after this, growing impudent through his customarie sinning, he divorced himselfe from his wife OCTAVIA; and not content to put her away, he took another mans wife, & presently married POPPEA, whom (as we said) he held for his friend, having first taken her from OTHO who was her husband: and not contented to put away his good and vertuous wife, he caused her to be falsely accused of adulterie, having plotted with NICETVS, his Sea-captain (who murdered his mother AGRIPPINA, who as it should seeme was a man fit for such services) that he should confesse himselfe to be the man which had committed adulterie with her. And notwithstading that this was plainely discovered to be a fiction, he for a colour banished NICETVS, and OCTAVIA was also banished, and afterwards slaine by his commaundement: so as to the innocent was given an vniust punishment, and to the traitor a fained correction. At that time he also commaunded the famous Libertine PALANTE to be slaine, for the desire he had to his estate: for in the time of NERO it was more daungerous to be rich, then to commit offences; and many were slaine because they were rich, and few were punished for their euill deeds.

Nero put away his wife, and maried another mans.

NERO committing these and many other such like enormities; VOLOGESVS King of Parthia, taking it in scorn that his Brother TYRIDATES should be dispossest of the Kingdom of Armenia, and that it should by the Romans be given to TIGRANES, beganne to levie his Forces; and, determining to renew the warre, he sent his Brother to recover that Kingdome; the which he soon effected, and seized upon many countries and parts thereof. Against whom, CORBVLVS, (who was Lieutenant in the East, and had made the last warre) with all expedition sent two Legions for a supply to King TIGRANES: and, the warre beginning very hotly on either side, the Emperour, at the earnest sute of CORBVLVS, sent new Troops to reinforce the Armie against the Parthians, and CESONIVS PETVS for their Leader; who, with the greatest speed he could, with many companies and great preparation for the warres, departed Italie; and, following his journey, came where CORBVLVS attended his coming: who dividing his Troops with CORBVLVS, each of them by himself followed the warre apart. In processe whereof, CORBVLVS governed so valiantly and with such discretion, as he not onely defended the limits of the Empire in that part which fell to his lot, but passed the River Euphrates, and surprized some houlds in his enemies Country. And SESONIVS PETVS with lesse judgement or experience, but more vain-glory, promising great matters of himself, began the warre. In the beginning whereof, with appearance of good successe, he entred Armenia; and, extending his power farther then he ought to have done, passed the Mountain Tau- rus, taking some townes without consideration whether he were able to hold the same or no; and sent of his troupes into diuers places with a desire to get and to doe more then he was able to accomplish, or was fit to be done: So that (as CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth) he gouerned himselfe so ill, that when as VOLOGESVS came against him, there fell so many disgraces vpon him, and he so vnadui sedly encamped himselfe, as he was besieged by VOLOGESVS in his camp; in such sort as being vnable to stay for the succours which came from CORBVLVS vnto him, wanting both courage and discretion to defend himselfe, hee came to a shamefull and dishonorable composition for the Romane reputation, with the King of Parthia: which was, That the King giuing him leaue to depart out of the countrie with his armie, he should abandon the prouince of Armenia, & deliuer vp all such holds as he had taken: all which was performed accordingly, and he very shamefully went out of Armenia, in great disgrace, and with no small losse of his Armie. The Emperor being aduertised hereof, sent for him to come to Rome, and to leaue his legions with CORBVLVS: and when hee was come, he inflicted no other punishment, but in a word or two called him dastard and coward; adding, that he would speedily pardon him, least the feare of punishment should kill him.

Peace with the Parthians.

CORBVLVS remaining Generall alone (notwithstanding that the Parthians were growne proud by reason of their late victorie) prosecuted the warre in such manner, as they motioned treaties of peace, and sent Ambassadors to Rome, where after sundrie Embassies and some truce taken, in the end a peace was concluded, profitable to the Parthians, although in shew and ceremonies honorable to the Romanes: which was, That TYRIDATES should remaine in possession of Armenia, but should giue ouer the title and royall ensignes, vntill he had been at Rome, and there personally receiue the same at the hands of the Emperor NERO. To confirme this agreement, he came into the Romanes campe, and in presence of all the armie, humbled, and prostrated himselfe vpon the earth before NERO his image, and taking the crowne from his head, he set it at NEROES feete: and afterwards being solemnly entertained and feasted, appointing a time for his comming to Rome, he left a daughter which he had, for assurance thereof; and so departed to visit his brothers, VOLOGESVS King of the Parthians, and PACORVS King of the Medes, and to prepare all things necessarie for his iourney. Which although it were not so soone performed as it was appointed, and that there passed some things in the meane season, as we will presently specifie, yet to the end that we leaue not this matter vnperfect, it shall be fit (although somewhat afore the time) to speak of TYRIDATES his comming to Rome, for it was a solemne matter and worthy to be remembred: which was thus.

Tyridates crowned in Rome by the Emperour Nero, with great solemnity.

As NERO was a man desirous of fame and vaine glory, so by Letters and great promises he inuited TYRIDATES to come to Rome; which he performed, being greatly accompanied, and was most honorably entertained: NERO attended his comming with sumptuous prouision made by the Senate and people, set vpon a high throne, with all the shew of maiestie and greatnes that could be deuised; at one end whereof, were all the Pretorian Cohorts and men of warre, armed with faire and rich armor. TYRIDATES comming to the place where the Emperour NERO was, being alighted from his horse, he mounted vp the staires to the scaffold where he sate, and comming neere him, fell at his feet; but NERO taking him by the right hand, raised him, and tooke from his head an ornament which he ware, and did put thereon a diadem or crown of a King, vsing herein other stately ceremonies. TYRIDATES being crowned with this solemnitie, after certaine feasts which were made in Rome, having remained there some dayes, departed towards his countrie, carrying with him, an incredible masse of money, which the Emperour gaue him for his Iourney. A peace with the Parthians being confirmed in this manner, NERO gaue himselfe more to his old vices then he did before, and to doe the same more freely, and to be at more liberty and farther off from the authority of the Senate, he departed from Rome, with the most solemne and magnificent court and attendance that euer was seene; although the greatest number were conformable to his conditions. The report of this iourney was, that he went into Gracia, to cut the necke of a land in Achaia, which is a narrow passage betweene the Egean and Ionian Seas, which makes Peloponesus, now called Morea to be as it were an Iland. And in his iourney, in Naples and in other parts, without shame, he shewed himselfe on the Theaters and Stages, and acted a part in Comedies, as one of the Actors or Players, and sung Tragedies and Fables, and wanne many prises and crownes, which were rewards giuen in those controuersies. Being come into Gracia, in this great action for which he came, he did no more but appoint a day to begin his vvork: and hauing made a speech to his people, he tooke a toole in his hand vvherewith he began to digge the earth, and making

this beginning, he suddenly (no man knowing any cause) left off what hee had begun, without order for doing any more; and presently returned to Rome. Wherein he entred in triumph, as if he had wonne some great battell, demanding it for the victory above-written: wherein hee came mounted upon the same chariot wherein OCTAVIVS AVGVSTVS had triumphed, compassed about with Musicians and Plaiers, such as represented fables and tragedies upon stages, being brought from all parts of the world for that purpose. And within fewe daies after this, he pretended another journey into the Kingdome of Egypt; and, all things beeing in a readinesse for that purpose, through a certain divination he gave over his journey. NERO, beeing come to the beginning of the eleventh yeer of his Raign, became so impudent, giving himself wholly over to sensuality, that he did any thing without blushing or changing colour, and gave leave to an infinit number of others to doo the like: and his wickednes mounted to so high a degree, that SVETONIVS testifieth of him thus;

Super ingeniorum paragogia, & nuptarum concubinatus, vestali virgini Rubriæ vim intulit. Acten libertam paulùm absuit, quin iusto matrimonio sibi coniungeret, summissis consularibus viris, qui regio genere ortam peierarent. Puer ii Sporij, exsecti is testibus etiam in mulierē naturam transfigurare conatus est, cum dote & flammeo per solennia nuptiarum celebritatis officio deductum ad se, pro uxore habuit. Extat etiq; cuiusdam non inscitus iocus, bene agi potuisse cum rebus humanis, si Domitius Neronis pater talem habuisset uxorem. Hunc Sporum Augustarum ornamentis excultum, lecticaque vectum, & circa conventus mercatusque Græcia, ac mox Romæ circa Sigillaria comitatus est, identidem exosculans. Nam matri is concubitum appetisse, & ab obtrectatoribus eius, ne ferox atque impotens mulier, & hoc gratiæ genere prævaleret, deterritum nemo dubitavit. utique post quam meretricem, quam fama erat Agrippinæ simillimam, inter concubinas recepit. Olim etiam, quoties lectica cum matre vehereetur, libidinatum incestē ac maculis vestis prodituum affirmant. That is to say, Besides his unnaturall abusing of boies free-born, and the keeping of mens wives as his concubines, he deflowred RVBRIA a Vestall Virgin. Hee would have married ACTE or ÆTA, a fleed woman; suborning some, who had been Consuls, to swear, that she was roially descended. There was a Boy called SPORVS, whose genitories he cut off, trying to transforme him into the nature of woman. Him he caused to be brought unto him as a Bride, with a Dowry and a yellow Vail, after the solemn manner of marriage, and a goodly Train attending on him; whom he maintained as his wife: whereupon one said pleasantly, that it had been happy for mankinde if DOMITIVS his father had wedded such a wife. This SPORVS, adorned with the ornaments of an Empresse, hee accompanied in a Litter through all the Cities and Towns of Greece, and afterwards at Rome, up and down the streets; SIGILLARIA killing him often. He had a desire to lie with his owne mother; but was terrified from it by some which hated her, lest that proud and insolent woman should by this favour growe too mighty, wherof no man ever made doubt; and the rather, for that afterwards he entertained a harlot among his concubines, very like (as it was reported) to AGRIPPINA. It is also said, that in former times, as often as he rode in a Litter with his Mother, he used her incestuously: the which did appear by the spots upon her garment.

Amongst all his dishonest and filthy pollutions, hee never forgat the fiercenes and cruelty of his minde, shedding bloud, and killing an infinite number of men; and made boast and vaunted thereof, saying, that none of his Predecessors in the Empire, did ever knowe their owne power, but he. And when One in his presence said, as a by-word, When I am dead let the world bee burned: Nay, quoth he, let it be before I die. Of so ill and envious an inclination was this man to all mankinde: which did fully appear by that which he did within a little while after, which was, to set the City of Rome on fire; as SVETONIVS, EVSEBIVS, EVTROPIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS, and ISIDORE, affirm: yet CORNELIVS TACITVS maketh some doubt thereof, whether it were done by chance, or by his commandement; and yet himself saith, that no man durst quench the fire for fear of him: and all affirm, that it lasted six daies and seven nights, and that NERO went up to the top of a high Tower to behould this spectacle, which was very pleasing to his sight: where he stood singing certain verses of HOMER, which contained the burning of the City of Troy. And the fire did consume so much in the City of Rome, as TACITVS writeth, that of foureteen great quarters which were in the City, onely foure escaped free; and of the ten, three were wholly consumed and burnt to the ground; and in the seven there was never a house whereof the greatest part was not burnt, and many wholly consumed. Finally, they were innumerable, and not to bee imagined, the houses, tempes, riches, the spoils of victories, the clothes and merchandizes, and other things, which this fire con-consumed. And to the end that the Reader may the better understand it, he shall consider that Rome was then the greatest and most populous citie in the world, much frequented by strange Nations, and the mostrich and bestuitoll that ever was; the which in that time did draw vnto it and swallow vp all the mony and riches of all the prouinces subiect vnto it, by taxes, tributes, impositions, briberie, and tyrannies.

This lamentable desolation being ended, there was not left in him any stitch, but all men held him to be the author thereof, although they durst not say so; and that he desired to haue the ruines, for the stones, pillars, and other things which escaped the fire, he would not suffer to be carried away by the owners, but took them for the building of his owne palace and houses, which some daies before he had built: and part therof being burned with this fire, he afterwards reedified and made without comparison fairer & greater then before; so as it seemeth in incredible matter, what PLINY, SVETONIVS, and CORNELIVS TACITVS write of the greatnes thereof; to whom I refer the Reader for the particular description of that Palace, because it is a matter wonderfull, and which onely was sufficient to shew the riches of Rome. For it stretched from Mount Palatine to Mount Esquiline, which, as it seemeth, were distant a good deale more then a mile in breadth; it contained in it ponds of water so great, as they seemed to bee gulfes of the Sea, compassed round about with buildings and lodgings; it had in it also, besides gardens and orchards, excellent hils and woods, wherein were all manner of wild beasts. Moreouer the halles and dining chambers, besides being built of Marble, Alablaster, Iaspers, Topaces, and other excellent stones; the timber-workes thereof and the seelings were inlaid with gold and Iuorie, and mother of Pearle, and some stones of price. And some of these high places and chambers were round, and made with such art, as the floore remaining firme & fixt, the roofe & vaults thereof went continually round like the skie, in such sort as some bind-vaues are made; and some of these roomes were wrought with such art, as there were in them certaine ventals and alimbiques of gold and Iuorie, which at certaine times did cast out sweete flowers, waters, and precious oyles. This house likewise had bathes of sundry waters hot and cold, and other ornaments and excellencies, such and so many as vvould be tedious to recite; wherein, and in other buildings vvhich he made, he spent an inestimable treasure, and in other vvhich he began, which were strange and marueilous, the vvhich for breuity I omit. And although (as is sayd) he had commanded the Citie of Rome to be set on fire, yet being thus burnt, he vsed all diligence to reedifie it againe, in better forme then it was before, and had determined to alter the name thereof, and to call it Neroniana, after his owne name. But this his care sufficed not to cleere him of the infamy vvhich he had purchased among the people, for commanding it to be set on fire.

A description of Nero his Palace.

After all this, the Emperour NERO by the instigation of the diuell, in whose power remained his sinnes (the number of Christians in Rome then encreasing, through the preaching of the Apostles, S. PETER and S. PAVL, who then were there) he and his like being grieued with the holines and purenes of the Primitiue Church, resolued to persecute the same: and putting it in execution a great number of Christians, both within and without it, were put to death by his cōmandement. And this was the first generall persecution which the Church suffered. And although that after the death of CHRIST there wanted no persecutors (yet was it neuer persecuted by the Emperours publike edict vntill this time. Wherein, how great the constancie of the Martyrs was, & what sundrie kindes of martyrdome they endured, CORNELIVS TACITVS an infidel Historiographer, and an enemie to Christians, yet true in his historie, besides other Christian authors, shall beare witnes: who (like a Gentile murmuring at them) recites the persecution of the Emperour NERO: whereof SVETONIVS also making mention, saith, that a verie great number of Christian men and women were put to death: And among other cruelties, burnings, crosses and other kindes of death, he reporteth that they were throwne to the dogges, to be torne in pieces: and to the end that dogges should be the more eager against them, they couered them with the skinnes of Beares and other wild beasts. This persecution of the church SVETONIVS and CORNELIVS TACITVS set downe in this place after the burning of Rome, in the eleuenth yeere of the Emperour NEROES raigne, yet EVSEBIVS and other authors note it to bee in the last yeere of his Empire, wherein died the blessed Apostles S. PETER and S. PAVL by his commandement. But it may be, & so I beleeue, that this persecution lasted till then, which was little more then three yeeres; or whether i. were only at this time, it pleased God to preserue his holie Apostles vntill the time aboue said.

The first persecution of the primitiue Church.

After that the Emperour NERO had executed this crueltie against the Christians, which was the greatest that he ever vsed, there followed in Rome, and in the marches thereof, one of the greatest plagues of pestilence that ever was in the world, by the permission of God; as it is to be helieued, for his cruelty vsed against the Christians. But there was no amendment in him, neither any repentance of that or of his other villanies: but waxing worse, he again began his intolerable extortions in all the Provinces, which were such and so many, as they became unpeopled, and many places were wholly ruinated and desolate. For the ordinary Rents (though the summe were incredible) being insufficient to maintain his prodigalities and immense expenses, because they cannot be related at large, it shall suffice to make some brief mention thereof, the better to conjecture of the rest. Besides what, without measure, hee consumed in his Buildings and vaine works, and in the curious workmanship of his famous house, which was a matter inestimable, in all the rest, his disorder and excesse was incredible. Firstly he apparelled himself with most rich attire, and ordinarily consumed at dice and at other games great summs of money: When he went a-fishing (wherein he was much affected) and for his pleasure went to the sea or any river, he commanded the nets to be made of gold-thread, and the cords of most excellent fine silk. In his progresses which he made out of Rome (which were many) besides an infinite number of people of his Court which followed him, he never had lesse than a thousand Wagons drawne with Mules for his Wardrobe, excellently wrought and garnished; and those which led and governed them were apparelled in rich attire, of gold, silver, cloth of gold and silk; even unto the Mules shoos, which were of silver. Then the games and plaies which hee presented were such and so many, as it cannot bee valued what they might cost: for, besides those which in Rome were ordinary, as, the Sword-plaiers, combats, huntings of Lions, Elephants, Bears, Panthers, Tigers, and other beasts; the Comedies and Tragedies which in the Theaters and Amphitheaters were represented, and the sports on horseback, and with chariots of diverse forms, in the circuits and places of Rome, which were many and more frequent, and with greater magnificence than ever theretofore; he invented new sports with chariots drawn with Camels, and Elephants with Castles on their backs, with other new inventions & strange devices; which to bring to passe, it behooved a man to compasse the world: as was his Naumachie, a fight with Gallies upon the water; making a Lake for that purpose by hand, which they also called Naumachia, drawing water from the Sea to fill the same; and therewith fishes to swim therein, because it should be more naturall and at life. Then, in the donatives which hee threw to the people, for him which could first catch them (which they call'd Missilia) he would not give such as were ordinary, as other Emperours did, of money, birds, and other things of small value; but therewith he commanded rich apparell, gold, silver, rich stones and pearls to be given; and, to increase this in all superfluity, of things which could not be throwne abroad in their kinde, he caused certain Tables to be cast, wherein was set down what hee should have into whose hands they came, in wheat, heards, or slaves; which extended so far as to give heritages, fields, houses, ilands, and other matters of great price. By all that which hath bin said, he that will may see his prodigality, and may imagine what his expenses might amount to in other matters. So as this accursed man had no vice wherein hee would not bee extreme; and so would he be in spending and wasting, as he was in robbing and spoiling the people: Which his prodigality as it was gratefull and pleasing to the vulgar sort, so I presume it was the cause why they so long endured his tyrannie and wicked disposition.

The excessive prodigality of Nero.

Gifts given by Nero.

But, as these things were intolerable, after the eleventh yeer of his Raign many of the prime Noble men of Rome conspired against him: the head and chief whereof was CAIVS PISO (the most Noble man by birth, parentage and vertue, which at that time was in Rome) and, according to his name, this conspiracy was called Pisoniana. But it was discovered before it took effect; and, in stead of the remedy which was hoped for, it opened the way to the Emperours cruelty: for, upon this occasion he put to death so many, and of all sorts, noble and ignoble, as well those which were guilty, as those which he would hould for suspected, as they were without number: among whom, died the witty and excellent Poet LVCAN, and his Master SENECA; albeit he had sworn to him very devoutly (when-as he often made sute for leave to depart the Court, and yeelded therewithall his goods into NERO's hands) that he had no cause to suspect him, and that he would rather lose his owne life, than do him any harm. And fear and flattery were of such power (which things commonly concurre) that the Senate determined to doo sacrifice, and to give solemn thanks unto the gods, for the health and safety of NERO, and his delivery from this conspiracy; and they ordained feasts to be made therefore, and that the Moneth of April should lose his name, and be called NERO; and that there should be a new temple temple erected to the God of health, and other such like things. After this there was another conspiracie, the captain whereof was a Romane Knight, whose name was VINDEX or VINICIVS: but as the diuel would help and support his seruant NERO, so it was also discouered, & the confederats were by him brought to their death; and many other vpon that occasion, The Conspirators had their tryall, and pleaded bound in chaines; some freely confessed it; and others added that he was beholding vnto them for it, being impossible to cure him by any other meanes (infected as he was and dishonored with all kinde of impieties) but by death. The children of the condemned were expelled the Citie, and afterward poisoned or starued. After which he grew so fearefull, and therewith so cruell, as from thence forth his greatest studie and practice was to put men to death, vpon any occasion whether forged or true, according to his phantasie. And so he slew a great number of noble men (as SVETONIVS, and more at large CORNELIVS TACITVS reports.) Being nusled in these cruelties, he forgat not his other vices and lewd exercises; among which one was to come personally into the Theater, and there to contend and striue for the prizes which were giuen to him that best could recite or sing verses and tragedies, and for other rewards of Musicke which were giuen in that time, as if hee had been the poorest Musition or singing man in Rome. And comming one day very merry for a victorie which he had obtained in these Theatrall Iusts and contentions, he took some displeasure against his beloued wife POPPEA: and as he was very proude and ill conditioned, he gaue her a spurne on the bellie, whereof being with childe she fell so sicke as she died; and he, who was the cause of her death, was exceeding sorry for it. There was no kinde of Alliance or Consanguinitie, how neere soeuer, but it felt the waight of his bloudie hand. ANTONIA the daughter of CLAVDIVS, refusing after the death of POPPEA to be his wife, hee slue, vnder colour that she went about to conspire against him; and to alter the state. Hee also murthered all others that were in any sort allied vnto him: Among the which, A. PLANCIVS was one: whose bodie hauing by force filthily abused against kinde before his death, Let my mother now, said he, kisse my successours sweete lips; giuing it out that hee was her deere darling, and that she incouraged him to aspire to the Empire. His sonne in law RVFINVS CRISPINVS, sonne of POPPEA, being yet very yong; for that it was reported of him, that in game he would play for great places of commande and dukedomes; he gaue charge to drowne him in the Sea, when he should be there fishing. After all this, in the thirteenth yeere of his raigne, the prouinces being no longer able to endure his tyranny, and much lesse the armies which were in them, they began to mutine and to thinke vpon meanes how they might rebell against him; as within short space some of them did, which was in the 13. yeere of his raigne. Moued vpon the like occasion, the Iewes rebelled against the Empire, God permitting that they should be the first, and should continue in their rebellion, for a publike and euident punishment which should be inflicted vpon them, for the putting of our Sauior CHRIST to death. For this warre which was begun against the Iewes, VESPASIAN was appointed Generall, a man very famous both in peace and warre, and who afterwards was made Emperor: he had for his lieutenant (which is the second place after the Generall) his sonne TITVS, who in processe of time was also Emperor. VESPASIAN began this war very resolutely, and it was afterwards one of the most famous that euer was in the world; wherein as shall be declared, the citie of Ierusalem was wholly destroyed. This historie is excellently well written by IOSEPHVS a Iewish historiographer, who serued in that warre, and was taken prisoner by VESPASIAN: and by EGESIPPVS a Iew by birth, but a christian by profession; besides many other authors which treate and write thereof.

The Iewes rebelled against Nero.

VESPASIAN hauing taken some Cities in Iudea; the enuie and hatred daily encreasing against NERO, with the causes which he gaue of the same, all Nations conspiring to rebell against him; the prouinces of France, and the legions which were there, began, first chusing IVLIVS VINDEX for their captain. The newes hereof came to NERO being then in the citie of Naples, whither he went for his vertuous recreations, such as he was accustomed to vse: whereat he seemed not to be much moued, and (as it was surmised) it offended him not, because that thereby he might haue occasion to rob and spoile all the prouinces of France. But the newes still encreasing, he began to stand in some doubt, and came to Rome, where he was certified that a part of Spaine called Tarragona, was also risen against him, vvith SERGIVS GALBA proclaiming himselfe Emperour; vvho vvas a man very famous for his noble linage, charges and dignities vvhich he had vvorthily executed. Which he did, as some vvrite, being perfvvaded thereto by letters from IVLIVS VINDEX vvho (as I novv said) vvas in armes in France.

Insurrection against Nero.

With these newes of Spaine, the Emperor NERO was so much troubled, as after that hee had lien a good while (as though he had been dead) without speaking any one word, he rose vp as a man desperate; and tearing his clothes, he knocked his head against the walles, not demanding, nor receiuing counsell or comfort from those which would haue giuen it him. And this furie being past, he began to take order for the leuying of forces, and to require succors and aides: but he was so much hated of all the world, as no man came very willingly to his seruice; rather perswading one another to the contrarie: Things standing in this state, as NERO busied himselfe about leuying an army, discoursing in himselfe what cruelties and punishments hee might inflict, there came certaine newes vnto him, that the legions which lay vpon the frontiers of high Germanie whose captaine was RVFVS VIRGINIVS, were also in armes against him, as well as those of France and Spaine. With this newes NERO lost all courage and hope to defend himselfe: and the Senate and people of Rome were therewith so much troubled, as without any leader, but only of their own meere motion by common consent, they determined to abandon NERO, and refuse to yeeld him any obedience: whereof ensued his death which was shamefull and vile, as he deserued; which was in this manner.

Nero despaires of himselfe.

SVETONIVS writeth, that when the newes came of the insurrection of the legions, NERO was at dinner; and that presently when he heard it, he threw the table to the ground, and in despair to defend himselfe, taking certaine poison in a boxe of gold, he withdrew himselfe to certain gardens which he had, where he deuised sundrie waies and meanes to escape this present calamitie; sometime thinking to flie out of Italie to the King of Parthia, with whom he was in a great league of friendship euer since the coronation of his brother TIRIDATES King of Armenia; otherwhiles he thought to yeeld himselfe to SERGIVS GALBA, and to craue mercy at his hands: but finding no helpe nor remedie in either (for few were they which repaired vnto him, or came at his calling) he was of opinion to goe forth into the publike places of assembly in Rome, clad in mourning attire, and there to craue pardon for his ill forepassed life; and if they should not grant him to continue in the Empire, yet at the least that they would bestow vpon him the gouernment of the kingdome of Egypt; and to this effect, were found certain orations already drawne in his closet; but he durst not put this deuice in practise, fearing to be slaine by the people; so great already was the tumult in the Citie. Passing that day and part of the night in these doubts and feares, he laid himselfe vpon his bed, although hee tooke little rest, determining with himselfe the next day to put in execution that counsell which should seeme most profitable. And hauing slept a little, he awoke about midnight, and was giuen to vnderstand that the Cohorts which had the guard of the palace were gone, and had forsaken him. Amazed at so great an alteration, he sent for certaine of his best and most confident friends to their houses: but as betweene wicked men there is no true friendship, neither was there any due to him, neither had he deserued any, so from none of them hee receiued any good answere: wherfore with some of his seruants, and those very few (protected by the darkenes of the night) he went forth of his palace, and in person went to many of their houses, at none of which they would open the doores, neither giue him any answere: so as hee who within few daies before was feared and adored of all the world; returned sorrowfull, despised, and in feare of all men. And returning to the lodging from whence he came, he found it ransackt and spoil'd euen to the very boxe of poison which he had reserued for his last refuge. Which when he saw, in despair of his life, and desiring to die, he began in great hast to call for a certain sword player which serued him, whose name was SPICILLVS MIRMILON, and commanded him to kill him. And as neither this man, neither any other would doe it, he cried out with a loud voice, saying, Now I perceiue that I haue neither friend nor enemie. And in this furie, he went with a determination to drowne himself in the Riuer Tiber: and making a stand, he asked of those which were with him, where he might hide himself, vntill that he had bethought him what to doe. Presently an enfranchised man of his, named FAON, offered to keepe him secretly hidden in a farme which he had 4 miles from Rome. And so NERO taking this for his last refuge, mounting on horsback, being barefooted and in his shirt and wastcoate, with an old sullied ouerworne cloake cast vpon him, and so holding a handkercheif before his face, in the darke of the night hee went out of Rome with foure men only, which did beare him company, in the most couert and disguised manner that possibly he could: And with great feare and trouble came to the village vvhither they carried him; and leauing his horse hidden among certaine trees, he vvent couertly through certaine Canes and Reedes; and before that hee came to the house vvhither hee vvas to goe, the same FAON vvhich brought him, counselled him to goe into a Caue vvhich which was there, where they vsed to dig sand: whereto he answered, that hee would not burie himselfe alive; in the end he went into the house, creeping in on all foure at a hole which they made through the wall; and coming into a chamber, he cast himselfe vpon a poore bed which was there, and being both hungrie and thirstie, he desired to haue something to eate: but there was nothing to be had but a peece of browne bread and a little water; the bread he would not eate, but he dranke of the water with wonderfull feare and sorrow to see himselfe in that place.

As these things passed with NERO (as I haue said) as soone as it was day, his flight was presently discouered, and the Senate assembled, and by their common consent hee was adiudged an enemy vnto his countrie; and being condemned to die, was commanded to be sought for euery where: to the execution whereof, the men of war of the Pretorian and Vrban Cohorts, consented by perswasions and promises which were made vnto them. With which newes, the determination of the Senate being published, a seruant to the said FAON which brought NERO to his farme, went out of Rome, to giue him to vnderstand thereof: for he knew the secret way. And being come where the Emperour was, hee found him making preparation to kill himself, through the perswasion of those which came with him, seeing that there was no other meanes for him to escape. He hearing the sorrowfull newes of his doome giuen by the Senate, To be an enemy to the State, and that he should be punished More Maiorum, hereupon he demanded what kinde of punishment that More Maiorum was? And when hee vnderstood that a man so condemned was to be stript naked, his head set fast in the stocks, and his bodie scourged with rods to death: He was so terrified therewith, as hee took the poiniards which he had brought thither, and feeling their points and edges, hee made shew to doe that which they had counselled him: but growing fearefull and a coward, hee put them againe into their sheaths, fayning that his fatall houre was not yet come. And sometimes he prayed and intreated some one of those which were with him, to kill himself, to the end that he might follow his example: At other times he would reprone himself for his base minde and want of courage, vntill at last hearing the noise of certain horsemen, which by the commandement of the Senate came to seeke him, he set a poinyard to his throate, wherewith, with the helpe of one of his seruants, he wounded himselfe, of which wound within a little while after, hee died; making such gestures and countenances, as made all those which were present amazed thereat. And so ended the enemy of mankinde, the venom and poison of the earth (for so PLINY calleth him) after that he had ruled the Empire fourteene yeeres, and being of the age of two and thirtie yeeres, in the seuentith yeere after the birth of IESVS CHRIST. This NERO was a man of a goodly constitution, neither high nor low, of a faire countenance though somewhat wanton; his eyes greenish, a round visage, reddish haire, with a thick and full neck, he had a great belly and little legges, and was of a sound complexion: for notwithstanding that he was giuen to all vice and excesse, yet in fourteene yeeres that hee raigned, he was neuer but three sick.

Nero slew himselfe.

His death being known in Rome, the ioy which the Senate & people conceiued, was incredible; and all came forth into the streetes to congratulate one with another, with bonnets vpon their heads, which was a signe of libertie; for so did slaues vse to weare vvhen their masters made them free. But vvith all this (as NERO had been a great feaster, a spender, a giuer, and vvas subiect to other vices, vvhich many men loued more then other mens vertues) yet there vvere some vvhich for a long time honored his sepulchre and did ordinarily set flovvers vpon it. And the King of Parthia sent his Ambassadours afterwards to Rome to confirme the peace and amitie: vvho vvith great instance, earnestly desired that the remembrance of NERO might be held in honour and reuerence. And as vaine and idle people vse to sovve false reports; many beleeued that NERO vvas not dead, but that he lay hidden and should returne againe to the Empire, as though he had been enchaunted. Saint AVGVSTINE also in his booke de ciuitate Dei saith, that some vvere of opinion that NERO vvas antichrist: vvhich vanity gaue occasion that tvventy yeeres after there rose a man in Asia, naming himselfe NERO, vvhich caused great trouble and alteration, being assisted by the Parthians: although that in truth there remained no house of NERO, neither son nor daughter, adopted or naturall, and he vvas the last Emperor of the house and familie of the CÆSARS, founders of the Empire; so in him ended his linage, notvvithstanding that the name continueth vnto this day.

In Nero was ended and extinguished the linage of the Cæsars.

SVETONIVS writes, that there were many signes fore-shewing the fall and end of CÆSARS house in NERO, but among the rest there were two most euident: As LIVIA soone after after her marriage with AVGVSTVS went to see a farme house of hers, an Eagle soaring ouer her head, let fall a white Hen into her lap, holding in her bill a Laurel branch. And thinking it fit to haue both the fowle kept, and the Laurel set in the ground, behold; of the one there came many chickens all white which multiplied daily; so as the verie house was called Ad Gallinas: And of the other there sprang so faire a row of Bay-trees, as all the CÆSARS when they did ride in triumph, gathered from thence their Garlands: and the manner was, when they had triumphed, presently to prick downe others in the same place; and it was obserued, that a little before the death of euery one, the tree, by him planted, did also die. But in the last yeere of NERO both bay-trees withered at the roote, and all the Hens died. And soone after the Temple of the CÆSARS being strooken with lightning, the heads of all their statues fell downe at once, and AVGVSTVS sceptre was shaken out of his hand.

THE LIFE OF SERGIVS GALBA, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND SEVENTH EMPEROVR of ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

SErgius Galba succeeded Nero, and in his old age was aduanced to the Empire. This man was of the Noble Family of the Sulpitij, very intemperate in his diet, and of no great good fame concerning Sodomie, and gouerned the Empire by the counsell of three of his familiars. Before his comming to the Empire he subdued many Prouinces, and was very seuere in the execution of martiall discipline. He was learned in the liberall sciences, but chiefly very expert in the lawes. He was infortunate in his children: for those which he had dyed before him; and he whom he adopted, whose name was Piso Licinianus, was slaine a little after him. This old man dyed through the iudgment of Otho, who sent certaine Souldiers to cut off his head in the publike market place, whither he came armed to represse the tumults. His bodie was left to the mercie of the people; yet in the end it was buried by one of his bondmen. He liued seuenty and three yeeres, and gouerned the Empire seauen monethes and seauen dayes. His death seemed to be verie acceptable to the people, as to those which are euer desirous to see alterations.

NERO being dead in such manner as we haue declared, to the great ioy (and with a generall consent) of all men, SERGIVS GALBA was created Emperour; who in the time of NERO was nominated and proclaimed by the Armie which was in Spaine; and hee was the first that receiued the Empire from the hands of the Armie, the Senate consenting thereto and approouing the same; hauing no Affinitie or Alliance with the House and Family of the CÆSARS, neither by Blood, nor yet by Adoption: For, alwaies vntill this time the Empire succeeded by inheritance and succession from one to another, being either kinsmen by Nature, or else by Adoption. Now to declare the life and fortunes of SER-

SERGIVS GALBA before he was Emperour, would require a large discourse; for he came to it at the age of 72. yeers, and enioyed it not one whole yeer: so as seeing that I write an Imperiall historie, I will not for so short a discourse (as was his raigne) make so long a preamble. Let it suffice for him, and so much as shall appertaine to our historie, to know, that SERGIVS GALBA was of a most noble familie in Rome, descended from the SVLPITII, by surname GALBÆ, and from other noble and ancient families; wherof, although men speake diuersly, yet he was wont to boast, that by his father he was descended from IVPITER, and by his mother from PASIPHAE, wife to MINOS king of Creta; of whom is reported that notable fable of a Bull. And you shall also know that in his life time he had obtained many Magistracies and dignities in Rome and abroad, whereby he wonne great credit both in peace and warre: for being borne about the 40. yeer of the raign of OCTAVIANVS AVGVSTVS, or within little more or lesse, he liued after in the times of TIBERIVS, CALIGVLA, CLAVDIVS and NERO; and was well knowne and honoured by them all; which could not be, without great wisedome and valour, to support and increase his honour in times of such confusion, and vnder so tyrannous Princes; although imitating them, he eschued not some of their vices, for which hee was noted and defamed. So as speaking indifferently of this Emperour, we may say, that hee was betweene good and bad, and so it seemeth that CORNELIVS TACITVS noteth him; yet PLVTARCH, who writeth his life grauely and at large, amongst other defects in his raign, laieth the fault vpon the time, and the euill conditions of men in that age, and of GALBA hee treateth as of a good Emperour. And he and others write, that he was learned in the liberall Sciences, and much inclined and giuen to learning and knowledge, particularly in the lawes and customes. He was but once married, and then with a Gentle-woman, whose name was LEPIDA: who being dead, and two sons which he had by her, he would neuer marrie any more. And this shall suffice for the notice of the person and qualities of GALBA. Now let vs speake of his raigne, which although it were short, yet it was not so in the accidents which happened.

The linage of Sergius Galba.

Galba, learned in the liberall Arts.

After that GALBA had rebelled in Spaine, in such manner as is said, and that the title of Emperour was giuen him, and by him accepted; in the meane space vntill NERO died, and a little before he knew of his death, he was in great trouble and danger: for although that presently in the beginning all went well with him, and he tooke a house and held the state of an Emperour, taking a guard, and chusing for his councell, with whom he might conferre and consult of matters of importance, certaine of the principall and wisest men of the legion whereof hee had the charge, and had giuen offices and dignities, and the inhabitants of the prouince made their repaire to him to doe him seruice: yet vpon a sodain all was in combustion; for part of the Cohorts began to repent them of what they had done, and were ready to haue abandoned him. And it also happened that a certaine seruant to one of NERO his enfranchised men, hauing been procured thereto, resolued, and mist but a little to haue slaine him, in a passage as he was going to certaine bathes. And aboue all, the death of IVLIVS VINDEX, which then ensued, troubled him most; who, as we said, rebelled in France, and had induced him to make himselfe Emperor, which VINDEX slew himself, for that his troupes had fought with RVFVS VIRGINIVS his forces, who was captain of the legions in Germany which also rebelled; which battaile was against the will of both the commanders, and IVLIVS VINDEX his forces being ouercome, and of them 22000 slaine, he therfore killed himselfe.

Newes which put Galba into despaire.

These newes, being added to the former, did so trouble GALBA, as he was in despair both of the Empire, and of his life. But about this time (for, it was in a manner all at one instant) newes came from Rome of the death of NERO, with certain notice, that the Senate and Pretorian Cohorts had chosen and accepted of GALBA for Emperor. Which news one ICELVS a Libertine brought him; for which he afterwards did him many fauours: and, messengers increasing, much people with these tidings repairing to his service, he took his way toward Rome, accompanied with men of warre. And vpon the way VIRGINIVS RVFVS, Captain of the Legions in Germanie, sent to yeeld him his obedience; who vntill then had shewed himself neutrall, attending the will of the Senate, notwithstanding that he had declared himself against NERO. This old (although new) Emperour, travelling towards Rome (as it commonly hapneth in things that are done with little consideration) his coming to Rome was nothing so pleasing as his election: for, before him there came certain newes, which gaue occasion of discontentment, that he was not onely cruell, but also couetous; as Princes are much noted both in their doings and sayings. And it was also reported, that such Cities of Spain and France as had not in time repaired vnto him to offer their service and obedience, hee had condemned in great summes of money, and had charged them with great tributes; and that of some of them hee had commanded the wals to bee throwne down, and the Governours to bee put to death. Which reports of his cruelty and covetousnes were confirmed and augmented at his first entrance into Rome: for, when he would have forced the mariners and sea-men (whom NERO had inrouled in a Legion, and made lawfull souldiers) to return again to their former estate and condition, and they (making refusall) called insolently for their Eagle, and other military Ensignes; he not onely sent a troop of horsemen among them, who trod them under their feet, but also executed every tenth man. In like manner the Cohort of the Germans, which in former times had been ordained for the guard of CÆSAR's person, and had been alwaies found very trusty and faithfull, he discharged, and sent them home into their Country, without any recompense for their service; pretending that they were better affected to CNEIVS DOLABELLA, than to him.

Being in Rome, with this secret discontentment, although with publike joy and solemnity, he began to take upon him the administration and government of the Empire, and did some things as a wise and worthy Prince, and took good order to assure himself against those which had rebelled: for, in Africa he caused CLODIVS MACER to be slain, because hee practised to make a combustion in that Country, by the means of TREBONIVS GRATIANVS; and for the same cause he commanded to be slain, in the Frontiers of Germanie, FONTEIVS a captain, whom VALENS FABIVS and CORNELIVS AQVINVS, Lieutenants to the Legions in Germanie, slue. And in Rome NEVFIDVS SABINVS, a Prefect, was put to death: who, after NERO was dead, practised to make himself Emperour. Which executions although they were not to be blamed, yet they did discontent and grieve many. Also the common people, being affected to the feasts and dissolute sports of NERO, and being accustomed thereto, loved better those his vices, than the antient vertues of GALBA.

The Pretorian and Vrbane Cohorts, seeing that the Emperor GALBA did not performe the promises which were made vnto them, began likewise to murmure; yea and to repent them to haue yeelded him their obedience. They were also much discontented, for that he had brought with him a legion of Spaniards, and lodged them certaine daies in the cittie; wherewith they held themselues wronged. But that which made him to be hated and abhorred of all men, were his fauorites, which principally were three, vnequall in conditions and behauiour, but equall in power and credit with him; the one of them was called TITVS IVNIVS, and had bin his Lieutenant in Spaine, and then was Consul; the other was CORNELIVS LACVS, an infamous man and ill beloued, whom he made Pretorian Prefect, which was the greatest dignitie and authoritie next to the Emperours; the third was ICELLVS MARCIANVS, who had brought the newes into Spaine of the death of NERO. By the counsell of these men he was gouerned, the short time that his raigne endured. And this was such, as without any constancie or resolute staiednes (as became a Prince) he did things many times one contrarie to the other, according to the will of some of them: so as sometimes he shewed himselfe seuere and rigorous; and at other times slow, remisse and negligent, condemning some vnheard, and pardoning others without any reason, at the instance of those men. And as they for their deserts were ill beloued; so commonly with the Prince which is gouerned, all those which haue not the like authoritie with him, are discontented; by this reason he made himselfe ill beloued. Whereto this was a helpe, that hee sought to moderate and diminish the excessiue gifts and rewards which NERO was wont to giue without measure or reason, seeking to applie it to his owne benefit, allowing but a tenth part out of it; and with this strict condition, That if any actors vpon the stage, wrestlers or other Champions had sold any such donations formerly giuen vnto them, the same should be taken from the buiers, seeing that the parties who had sold the same, had spent the money, and were not able to repaie it. And to encrease the peoples hatred and discontent, when as they called on him for Iustice, and to haue HALOTVS and TIGELLINVS executed, the onely men of al NEROS Instruments who wrought most mischief, he saued them from danger, aduancing HALOTVS to a Procuratorship, and rebuking the people for their crueltie against TIGELLINVS.

Galba hated, and the reason.

And besides what is alreadie said, his vnwieldie old age began to be had in contempt, so as euery man durst presume to murmure at him, and to doe any thing against his authoritie. Matters standing vpon these tearms in Rome, those abroade were in as little rest: for seeing that the Armie and prouince of Spaine had made an Insurrection and chosen an Emperour either of enuie or discontentment, there were in most parts mutinies, factions and desire of alteration, and princi-principally in the Romane armie which was in high Germanie, the captaine whereof was RVFVS VIRGINIVS before named: for these legions waxing proud, by reason of the victorie which they had obtained against the armie of IVLIVS VINDEX, and making no account of ORDEONIVS FLACCVS, who was their Commaunder, and Lieutenant to VIRGINIVS; holding themselues for suspected, and in disgrace with the Emperour GALBA, because they were the last that came to his seruice, they determined to bee the first that should leaue the same. And the first day of Ianuarie being come, wherein they did vse to sweare, and to doe homage of fidelitie to the Emperour, they refused to doe it to him, but to the Senate; and sent to the Pretorian Cohorts at Rome, to let them vnderstand, that they would not obey that Emperor who was created in Spain; & that the Senat should chuse such a one whom they thoght fit; whereto they remitted them selues: Yet SVETONIVS saith, they referer this choise to the same Cohorts. The legions in Germanie standing vpon these tearmes, those in low Germanie were as little obedient, whose captaine was VITELLIVS: who hauing founded the good wil of the souldiers (notwithstanding that hee was sent thither by GALBA, & had receiued that charge from him) through a desire to raigne violating his faith (as IVLIVS CÆSAR was wont to say, that for rule it was lawfull to breake any faith) he practised to get the Empire to himselfe. And for as much as he afterwards came to be Emperour, it shall not not be amisse to giue the reader to vnderstand what hee was. This VITELLIVS was a man of great reputation and authoritie; which hee had gotten in the offices and Magistracies which he had held in Rome, and abroad, in the time of the Emperours CAIVS CALIGVLA, CLAVDIVS and NERO, with all which he had been very priuate, more for his vices, and some abilities of his person, then for any vertues. With CALIGVLA he was in grace, for that he was a great Auriga; for so were they called which had the charge and rule of chariots and waggons: with CLAVDIVS, for that he was a great gamester: with NERO, for the same, and such like qualities. And besides this, as he was very subtill and cunning, so hee obtained in those times great dignities and offices, of Prefect, of priesthood, and also to be Viceconsul in Africa, which hee wisely executed: and in the end GALBA gaue him this command in Germanie; where succeeded that which we will declare. His principall descent was from the familie of the VITELLII; whereof because there are sundrie opinions, some making it very ancient, and others to be of later time, I will make no question thereof: the same happened to his fathers and ancestors; for some said that he was of meane degree. SVETONIVS in his life treateth thereof more at large, to whom I referre the curious reader: for, what is spoken, sufficeth for my purpose, thereby to vnderstand what shall be said hereafter.

The legions in Germany refused to doe homage to Galba.

The Emperour GALBA being aduertised of all that had passed in the armies of Germanie; and knowing that besides his age, he was not respected, for that he had neuer a sonne that might succeed him, hee resolued to put in execution what he sometimes before had proiected, which was to adopt and chuse for his sonne, some personage of such age & authoritie, as might be sufficient and capable of the Empire, & who in his life time might protect him, & after his decease succeede him. His fauorites, & such as were priuate with him, vnderstanding this his determination, each of them apart pretended to giue him a sonne of his chusing, so as there arose strife and contention amongst them vpon this occasion. OTHO gaped after it and thought to haue obtained this adoption (it was he, from whom we said, that NERO tooke his wife POPPEA and sent him into Spaine) alleaging for his desert, that presently after GALBA's rebellion against NERO, he was the first that came to his seruice. A great part also of the Pretorian and Vrban Cohorts fauoured him (which Historiographers indifferently call the Armie which lay neere to Rome) and most of all TITVS IVNIVS assisted him, who was one of GALBA his fauourits, and was Consul with him that yeere: so as OTHO did assure himselfe that no other should be adopted but hee. But GALBA being fully resolued to that which was most expedient for the good of the common-wealth, without any other respect; and likewise disliking the disposition of OTHO (which sented of NERO's conditions) he took no regard of what was said vnto him; but vpon a day when no man thought of any such matter, being in the Senate, hee tooke PISO LVCINIANVS by the hand, who was a man both wise and vertuous, and in whom did concurre all the qualities and good conditions that might seeme fit and requisite for an Emperour: and calling him sonne he adopted him, after the manner then accustomed; and with a great traine, in great pompe, he went with him to the Campe, and made the Armie to sweare obedience vnto him, and to receiue him for CÆSAR: which hee did without giuing any rewards to the souldiers, or promising them ought, whereto they were accustomed; but onely made a grave oration with great majesty, after the antient manner: and so it was coldly accepted among them, they performing more with silence, than with any signe of gladnes eyther in countenance or in speeches; and with the like coldnes he was accepted by the Senate: for, now Rome was not capable of equity, or the antient integrity. GALBA, having made this adoption, conceived that it would have been the mean to haue preserved and protected his life: but it proved in effect to be the occasion of his confusion and utter ruine. For, OTHO, seeing himself deceived in his hope of adoption, and finding the souldiers well-affected towards him, for the hatred they had conceived against GALBA, resolved to effect his purposes by force and treason: which hee presently practised by all means possible with the Pretorian souldiers, by great gifts, and greater promises which he made unto them. And he so cunningly handled the matter (for, so little faith and loyalty was used in those daies) that in lesse than eight daies hee had plotted his treason; and it was concluded, that they should rebell, and create him Emperor (as they did) with the death of poor old GALBA, which was performed in this manner:

Otho incites the pretorian Bands against Galba.

GALBA being with certaine his priuate friends in his palace doing sacrifice; this OTHO being there with him, he stole secretly away from him to a place appointed, where a number of souldiers of the Pretorian Cohorts attended his comming; who took him vpon their shoulders, calling him Emperour, and drawing their swords (to giue the greater terror to the people) went with him towards their campe. This being related vnto GALBA, who doubted not any such matter, it extreamely perplexed him; and as his counsels were sudden, so were they inconstant & variable. For some were of opinion that his best course was to put himselfe in arms, and to go publikely abroad; for with his presence he might haue staid the tumult from proceeding any further; others, that it were best for him to fortifie himself in the Capitoll, and there to stay till he should see to what issue the matter would grow. The poor old man wavered, and was doubtfull what resolution to take, the messages which were brought him were so diverse: for, some made the matter nothing; and others, very dangerous. In the end, deceived by a false report which they brought him (that the Army had not only refused to receive OTHO for Emperour, but had slain him) he rode armed with his guard, and some others which repaired unto him, even unto the principall place in Rome; where all the people were assembled to see what would be the end of so great a combustion. At that Instant there entred on the other side a great troop of horsemen which OTHO had sent from the Camp (where he was chosen Emperour) against GALBA, to kill him: who although they cam with that resolution and charge, yet coming within his sight, and knowing him, they stood amazed a pretty while, as doubting what they should doo. At this time was GALBA most perplexed, not knowing whereon to resolve; and the multitude and preasse of people was so great about him, as they swaid him sometime to one side, and sometime to the other: and, as it commonly hapneth in such accidents and tumults, that then the counsell is praised and approved when the time is past wherein it might have been put in execution; and, standing irresolute whether he should return to the Palace, or shut himselfe up in the Capitoll, having had sufficient time for either; now, when he would have done the one or the other, hee could not: For, beeing abandoned by the greatest part of those which did accompany him, they who were sent by OTHO, set upon him, after they had stood a good space doubtfull (as I said) and there slue him. PLVTARCH writes (although some others report it after another manner) that when as those which came to kill him drew neer unto him, he thrust out his head, to the end they should cut it off; willing them to doo it, if so it were expedient for the Good of the Common-wealth, and of the Roman people. And so it was stricken off, and set on the point of a Lance, and presented to OTHO, and from him was caried up and down the Camp; and his body remained in the place without a head, for any man to tread upon, untill at last it was buried by a bondman of his. And the same day, by OTHO his commandement, was PISO LVCINIANVS put to death, whom GALBA (as I said) had adopted for his sonne and successor: and so was TITVS VINIVS also, who was Consul; and others of his Favourites, whose heads were all carried to the Camp to OTHO, whom all men now obeyed for Emperor: and, being laid together with GALBA's head, every one gloried to haue embrued his hands in their bloud. No mans death did OTHO so much rejoyce at, no mans head did hee view and review so unsatiably, as PISO's; whether hee thought himself then freed from fear and care, PISO being his enemie & concurrent; or that the remembrance of Majesty in GALBA, or acquaintance with VINIVS, had moved him to compassion.

Galba was slain by the direction of Otho, and his head presented unto him upon the point of a Lance.

And so ended the life of the Emperor GALBA, having held the Empire onely seven months. His death was in the yeer of our Saviour IESVS CHRIST 71, and 73 of his age. Hee was a man of a good constitution of body, greenish eyed, hauke nosed, very balde: and by reason of the great paine of the gowt wherewith he was afflicted, his fingers and toes were weake and crooked; he was a great feeder, very incontinent, and giuen to women.

THE LIFE OF MARCVS SILVIVS OTHO, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND EIGHT ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

OTHO borne of a Noble Family, tooke the Empire after Galba, although his euill fortune would not suffer him to enioy the same long: for at the same time that Otho was made Emperour in Rome, Vitellius was proclaimed Emperour in Germanie. And for as much as the one would not giue place to the other, in the end they came to blowes: and after sundrie battailes, Otho being the losser, not knowing what other course to take in his aduersitie, slue himselfe; which act he med not answerable to the life which he had led, which was more like to the effeminacie of a woman, then the courage of a man. This man gouerned the Empire foure monethes, and dyed in the xxx. yeare of his age. He was so deere to his owne souldiers, that whilst his bodie was burning after the manner then of the Romanes, many of them slew themselues with their owne hands.

THE Raigne of GALBA (of whom we haue now ended our discourse) of OTHO, and VITELLIVS his successors, of which we are to treate, were so short, so turbulent, so confused, & gotten by such wicked and vnlawfull means, as more properly they might be called Tyrants, then Empercurs, and so some writers tearme them: neither do they put them in the catalogue of Emperours; of which are Saint ISIDORE and BEDA. And the great Magician APOLLONIVS THIANEVS, who liued in that time vsed to say, that GALBA, OTHO and VITELLIVS were Thebane Emperours: and the reason was, for that the Thebanes held the Empire a verie small time, and so did these as little the Empire of Rome. PLVTARCH in the life of GALBA, compareth them to Kings in a Tragedie, which last no longer then the time that they are represented vpon the Stage. But howsoeuer it was, they obtained the names of Emperours; whether the Senate gaue it them for feare or flattery, I will not decide: But passing on with PLVTARCH, CORNELIVS TACITVS, and the rest which write of them, I say that the same day wherein GALBA was slaine, there was no man of any account which went not to the Campe where OTHO was, to yeeld him obedience and to flatter him, as their soueraigne Lord and Emperour, commending the Cohorts and Army for that which they had done, in putting GALBA to death, and for the election of OTHO.

Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, called Thebane Emperours, and compared to Kings vpon a stage in a Tragedie.

OTHO was a man very valiant and witty, and was the sonne of LVCIVS OTHO who had bin Consul, of an ancient and honorable familie; and was so like vnto TIBERIVS in his gesture and countenance, that some held him for his sonne. His mother also was of a noble house, and so were her progenitors and auncestors. Hereof writeth SVETONIVS, and PLVTARCH in the life of him: by which and by CORNELIVS TACITVS may be vnderstood what was the course of his life before he came to the Empire, or had the name of Emperour; which in briefe I haue before declared, & therefore hold it needlesse to make repetition thereof. OTHO besides the occasions which he had to rise against GALBA, they write that he had this for one, which

which was, that an Astrologer which he carried with him when he was sent by NERO into Spaine, did foretell and assure him that he should be Emperour of Rome. Being in the Camp in such manner as before is recited, compassed about with Senators & the principall men of Rome, he came to the Senate; hauing first commanded the Pretorian Prefect of the cittie to assemble the same: where besides the ordinarie blessings and applauses, they gaue him the name of AVGVSTVS, and all the other titles and preheminences which the other Emperours desired to haue. And hauing there made a briefe Oration, wherein he set them vnderstand that he was compelled and forced to take vpon him the charge of the Empire, promising to gouerne the same by the counsell and aduise of the Senate, he went from thence through the middest of the place (which was all bloudie and full of dead bodies) to IVPITERS Capitoll, and thence to the Imperiall Palace: and so was OTHO aduanced to the Empire; who was the first that by the Cohorts (which were the Army lodged too neer the City of Rome) was chosen and made Emperour, and from whom came the custome to create Emperors, after they had forsaken GALBA: before which time they were ever the Emperours ordinary guard. This was an accursed and most pernicious introduction for the Roman Empire, and for the Emperours themselves, as experience did afterwards make manifest.

Otho was the first that was made Emperour by the Pretorian Cohorts.

OTHO, to perform his promises, and to make a good beginning and shew of a good Prince, hee commanded much confiscated goods to bee restored to their owners, and to such men as NERO had banished; and did other things in like manner, which were exceeding pleasing to all the people, in such sort, as they took such love and liking to him, that they continued evermore faithfull unto him untill his dying day, although in truth his life continued but a short time after. While these matters passed in Rome, the Legions and Army, which both in high & lowe Germanie (as I have said) were disobedient to GALBA, their Captain VITELLIVS having by gifts and promises purchased their favour and good will, after some treaties (which TACITVS and PLVTARCH describe at large) concluded to create him Emperour, and (without attending the will and pleasure of the Senate) they made him so: so as in a manner, at one instant, OTHO was advertised thereof, and VITELLIVS knew what passed in Rome.

Vitellius made Emperour by the Legions in Germany.

The German Legions, presuming that VITELLIVS (whom they had chosen) should continue Emperour, pretending that they had as great authority to create an Emperour as the Legions in Spaine; the Senate in like manner, the Cohorts, and army at Rome pretended to haue the supreme power, & that in them rested the absolute authoritie to choose and create the Emperour, which was OTHO only. And although that OTHO by this meanes seemed to haue the greatest interest and best title: yet whether his guiltie conscience did put him in feare, or that it grieued him to thinke of the euils which were likely to ensue (as he afterwards shewed) he sought meanes by letters & messengers to come to a composition and agreement with VITELLIVS; but nothing was concluded: and the dissension daily increasing betweene them, either partie made preparation for the warres. And certaine tidings being brought that VITELLIVS his forces came marching towards Italy, vnder the conduct of two Captaines, whose names were VALENS and CECINNA (VITELLIVS remaining behind them attending more aid) OTHO departed from Rome with a faire and well ordered army, of all the Romane Nobilitie, the Pretorian Cohorts, and the Legions which were in the Navies by sea vpon the coast of Italy, which he sent for to that effect, and such others as he then could leuie: and in this maner he marched from Rome verie mightie in number of men, though not much accustom'd or train'd vp to the warres, leauing FLAVIVS SABINVS, brother to VESPASIAN, for gouernour, who (as is said) followed the warres against the Iewes, and so he continued his iourney against VITELLIVS, whose forces were alreadie come to the Alpes, to the number of 70000 men, whereof fortie thousand were commanded by VALENS, and the rest by CECINNA, VITELLIVS remaining in France expecting the remainder of those in Germany, and the Legions of Britanny which also came to do him service. These two Armies drawing neere the one to the other, the ciuill war began betweene them, and was very cruell in many parts: or to say better, that warre was prosecuted which was begun betweene GALBA and NERO. Rome for a good space had not bin infested with any ciuill dissensions, although it escaped not free from sundrie calamities, by reason of the wicked Princes which raigned there; by which meanes the present miseries which were very great, brought the battailes fought betweene MARIVS and SILLA, IVLIVS CÆSAR and POMPEY, AVGVSTVS and MARCVS ANTONIVS, and others which depended thereon, into remembrance; with which these whereof we now treate may well make comparison, both for alteration in estates, for number of men, and effusion of bloud;

Warre betweene Otho and Vitellius.

I cannot say whether for continuance of time, in countries and prouinces, or no: for after these warres began, there died by the sword foure Emperours (as it hath bin, and shall be declared) which were NERO, GALBA, OTHO and VITELLIVS, besides VINDEX, and other Noble-men which were slain; and besides VINDEX Legions, which (as we said) were ouerthrowne in France, there were great encounters and battels fought, and extreme cruelties committed. And these warres lasted untill VESPASIAN came to bee Emperour, no part of the Empire remaining free from this fury; whereof I can set down but the summe and most notable accidents which hapned therein.

Foure Emperors slain in the ciuill warr.

OTHO, coming to the City of Brixellum, upon the side of the River Po, remained there, sending his Forces before him, under the conduct of good Captains; who were ill obeyed by their souldiers, being growne proud for that they had made an Emperour; imagining, that no man ought to haue the command of them. The like want of obedience was in VITELLIVS Army, and for the same reason: and, the warres waxing cruell betweene these two Commanders and their Armies, they made such haste, as leaving apart the great skirmishes and other encounters, there were within fewe daies space two or three notable battels fought betwixt them: one of which was neer to the City of Placentia; the other, neer to Cremona; and the third neer to a place called Castor, in which were slain a very great number of men: and in all these three battels OTHO his Captains and the Romans had the better, although that of either side the word was, Rome and the Empire.

Battels betwixt Otho and Vitellius.

After which, VALENS and CECINNA, who were VITELLIVS Lieutenants (which untill then had made warres apart) joined their Forces together, reinforcing their Armies with new souldiers and supplies; determining to set up their whole rest in one battell, if the enemie would give it them. At that time (as PLVTARCH reporteth) OTHO, very joyfull for the victories obtained by his Captains, came to his Army at Bebriacum (where then it lay) neer unto Cremona; and, seeing that his enemies (notwithstanding they had been put to the worse, and were routed) made shew to desire to fight again, took counsel whether that of his part he should doo the like or no. The greatest part, and wisest men, were of opinion, that he should prosecute the warres without hazarding any battell; for that his enemy endured want of many things, and with their losses past had likewise lost much reputation; and many Countries were revolted from VITELLIVS, and held for OTHO: besides that, VITELLIVS could send them little relief; and, on the contrary, his Army was well provided of all things necessary, and Rome and all Italie were wholly at his devotion. And, besides all this, the Provinces of the East stood firm for him; and the Legions in Servia, Bulgaria, Hungarie, and Austria, were upon the way coming to his aid: so as he had no reason so often to tempt his fortune, and therefore hee ought to weary his enemy by delaies, or else to stay for greater power; wherein there was no doubt of victory. But those which were haughty, and desirous to fight, alleaged many reasons to the contrary; that he ought not to lose the occasion, and the good successe of fortune, neither to suffer VITELLIVS to come to his Army, and to free it from the fear wherein it was; with many other reasons, to the end a battell might be given. And OTHO, being inclined thereto, approved it, and commanded the same to be put in execution: for, in truth, hee did so much abhorre the war, as he held it for a lesse evill to lose the victory, than long to stand in suspense. And being resolved upon this counsell, he returned to Brixelle: for, it was agreed, that hee should not personally bee in the battell; and so his Army went to seek VITELLIVS his Forces, which were not farre off. And, as of either party they were desirous to fight, so they came to a battell; where, in the beginning, OTHO his Army was deceived by a shew of peace which his enemies made: whereupon they gave the charge very slowely, and Authors report the manner thereof very diversly, as it useth to happen in the like accidents: but all affirm, that both the one and the other fought valiantly, saving the Pretorian Cohorts, which were those in whom OTHO reposed his chiefest trust; through whose default and cowardise, OTHO lost the battell, and VITELLIVS was Victor, and (with great slaughter of his aduersaries) became Master of the Field.

OTHO his Captaines with such others as by flight escaped from the battaile, retired themselues to their campe, and fortified the same, in hope to haue been relieued by their Emperour; notwithstanding that many fled to sundry parts: but he, hearing the newes of the ouerthrow of his Armie, brought by those which fled vnto him: And among the first that brought this disastrous newes was a common Souldier, who when he reported the ouerthrow of the Army, and could purchase no credit, but was taxed with vntruth, and that he had runne away through feat feare and cowardise, he fell vpon his owne sword, at OTHOES feete: at which sight he cried out: That he would no more draw such valiant souldiers, and so well deserving, into danger. Notwithstanding he knew that in the campe there were sufficient forces, and that he had oportunitie to temporize, and to stay for the legions which came out of Mysia, Hungary, Austria and Dalmatia to his aid, and were neere at hand: yet he regarded not any of those helps, but with his owne hand resolued to end the ciuill warres, which as it passed (for that it is a notable action, although I shall be somwhat tedious) I will declare as PLVTARCH and TACITVS write it, and SVETONIVS TRANQVILLVS also after the report of his owne father, who was then present, which was thus: The heauie tidings of this ouerthrow being published, all those which were in the citie) which were many and very good men, and the greatest part of the Senate of Rome) came to OTHO his lodging; fearing and suspecting that which afterwards ensued, by reason of that which they had vnderstood by him before: all which with shew of great courage offered to die for his seruice, and endeuoured to animate and comfort him: but all this (notwithstanding that he knew a great part of his armie yet remained, and that more forces were comming vnto him, and that there wanted neither courage in his souldiers, nor meanes to continue the warres) sufficed not to alter his resolutions; so much did he abhorre ciuill discord and contention. And giuing answere to all the reasons & perswasions which they vsed vnto him, he made vnto them a very notable Oration, signifying, that hee would neuer haue begun the warres against VITELLIVS, but in hope of peace, which he had sought and procured before he took Arms; and that he had no use for those legions and forces which they said came to his aid, seeing that his enemy was neither HANNIBAL nor PYRRHVS, or any other common enemy to the people of Rome; but Romans themselves, and the Lords thereof: so as the Conquerers and Conquered did wrong their Countrey if they contended any longer, seeing that the joy of the victory was to the losse and prejudice thereof: And that hee could no way so much aduance the Roman Empire by winning battels in war and contention, as by making a sacrifice of himself for the peace thereof, seeing that by his death onely a generall union and concord would ensue: wherefore he was content that VITELLIVS should bee Emperor without any more bloudshed, and he desired no reuenge nor rule, to the ruine of his Citizens, neither to diminish the Common-wealth by the losse of such Armies; and that as others had purchased honour and fame by well-governing and supporting the Empire, so hee would likewise procure himself a good name by leaving it resolutely, to the end hee would not damnifie it. And, finally, speaking these words, and giving other good reasons, permitting and perswading all those which were with him to go and serve VITELLIVS; night being come, he retired himself to his chamber: where he commanded all his money and jewels to be taken out, which he diuided among his seruants and friends. Which although they would not accept, yet he commanded them to go to their rest: and he did the like, laying first the sharpest of two Rapiers which he had, under his beds head: and, being laid in his bed, he slept part of the night, in presence of those which were in his chamber, the door standing open; and, awaking about the break of the day, and seeing one of his seruants remaining, hee commanded him to goe forth. And, then presently taking the Rapier in his hand, he thrust himself vnder the left side with such force as the wound was mortall, giuing one only groane, which was heard by his seruants, who hastily ran vnto him, and found him striuing with death, and died presently vnder their hands. By those which were present, & such as presently repaired thither from all parts of the citie to him, there was so great lamentation made for him, as it semed the heauens had rent asunder: so much was this man beloued in so few daies. And his bodie was presently burned, according as the custome then was. And so ended the Emperour OTHO manfully and resolutely, according to the opinion and law of the Romanes: scarcely foure moneths after that he had vsurped the Empire, in the 38. yeere of his age, and the 71. after the birth of CHRIST, leauing after him neither sonne nor daughter. He was a man but of a small stature, and had crooked feet; but he was so neat and curious in attiring himselfe, as the care which he tooke therein, was more beseeming a woman then a man. He euer ware a periwig, and suffered no iot of his beard to grow, shauing it e uery day, and so vsed such other effeminate toyes, much dissonant from the manly resolution which he shewed at his death. Many of his soldiers which were about him, when with abundance of reares they had kissed his hands and feet as he lay dead, and commended him for a valiant man, and the onely Emperors that euer was, presently slew themselues neere vnto his funerall fire. And many which were absent, hearing of his end, (oppreſt with greefe) slew one another. Finally, many who in his life cursed and detested him, being now dead, highly commended commended him; so as it was an ordinarie speech, That GALBA was not slaine by him for that he affected Soueraignty, but because he desired to restore the Common-wealth to her lost libertie.

The newes of his death & of the victorie was brought to his enemie VITELLIVS in France: who hauing intelligence of the losses which his captaines had received, was comming with all the forces that he was able to make, to ioyne with them, and to reinforce the armie. In those daies, LINVS who was S. PETERS successor, held the chiefe seate in the Church of Rome, where there was a Church and congregation of Christians, which made their prayers to God for those which persecuted them.

THE LIFE OF AVLVS VITELLIVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND NINTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter Otho, Aulus Vitellius, borne of a Noble Family, succeeded in the Empire, wherin he was vnfortunate: for he gouerned the same but 8. moneths. This man was of a cruell disposition, and of a bountifull minde. In his time Vespasian, being in the East, was made Emperour by his Souldiers; who comming to a battaile in Italy against Vitellius, tooke him prisoner: and binding his hands behinde him, leading him (publikely) halfe naked, and his face all durtie, they slew him with many wounds, in the same place where he had put Sabinus, Vespasians brother, to death. He liued 57. yeeres, and raigned (as is aboue said) little more then halfe a yeere. By whose misery it plainely appeareth how variable the motions of fortune are, and that oftentimes a kingdome is lost through the same meanes whereby it was vniustly gotten, as appeareth in this Emperour: for Vespasian did by him as he had done by his Predecessor Otho.

AS the contention for the Title of Emperor continued betwixt OTHO and VITELLIVS, as by that which is already said may be vnderstood; OTHO being dead, all yeelded to VITELLIVS: which hapned in this manner; The great lamentation made for the death of OTHO being ended, all the men of warre, both Legionarie and Pretorian, with all the rest, made repair to the lodging of VIRGINIVS, who had been Commander of the German Legions, who fought against VINDEX his Army when they both made a mutinie against NERO. And, being all assembled together, they entreated him to take vpon him the name of Emperour; offering him their service, and to die in the action; and if that hee pleased not to accept thereof, yet at the least that hee would be their Ambassador to VALENS and CECINNA; and obtaine their pardon of them. VIRGINIVS RVFVS, who was a wise and valiant man answered them vvith the best vvords he could deuise, alleaging that to him it seemed follie to accept of the Empire from the hands of those which were ouercome, hauing refused the same of the Germane Legions, which now were victors; when in the life of NERO they had offered it him. And as concerning the ambassade which they requested him to performe for them; he gaue them a doubtfull and vncertaine answere, still putting them in hope, vntill that he was gotten into his lodging, and out againe at a backe dore; and so retyred to a secret place where hee hid himselfe vntill that furie was past. But a certain man of note whose name was RVBRIVS

GALBAS, afterwards accepting of that iourney, went to VITELLIVS his Captaines to treate thereof; and peace and pardon was graunted, as well to these men as to the armie ouercome neere Bebriace, and so all came to the obedience of VITELLIVS in his absence. The like was done by part of the Senate which came with OTHO, and was then in Modena. And in Rome, when as the death of OTHO was known, FLAVIVS SABINVS, (being Prefect of the citie) assembled the Senate, who conforming themselues to the time (which was now to proffer seruice and to flatter) with the accustomed solemnity proclaimed VITELLIVS for Emperor, giuing him the title of AVGVSTVS, and Pater patriæ, with other honourable titles and Epithetes, resoluing to giue great thanks, and to commend the Armie for that which was done. The newes of all this came to the new Emperor VITELLIVS in Fraunce vpon the coast of Italy, which how pleasing it was to him, may easily be imagined; wherwith he hastened his way with admirable pompe and pride, his soldiers in all the cities as they passed, committing many disorders and insolencies.

Vitellius conformed Emperour by the Senate.

The German Legions which were in Italy, grown proud through the victorie which they had obtained, and for that they were the Authors of VITELLIVS his Empire, committed outrages neuer seene nor heard of in that countrie before, whereof the spoils and losse which the people sustained was inestimable, as TACITVS and SVETONIVS report: And VITELLIVS, coming full of pride for his victorie into Italy, either could not, or would not remedie these disorders. And that in some sort he might seem to doe iustice and shew himselfe a Iusticer, he caused all the Pretorian Cohorts, which had been actors about the death of GALBA, and making of OTHO Emperour, to be disarmed and depriued of the name and honor of Souldiers, and commaunded their armes to bee taken from them, and one hundred and twentie of the most guiltie he condemned to death; and being sought and found out, a iust sentence was executed vpon them, if it had proceeded from a iust Iudge. VITELLIVS, thus marching towards Rome, desired to see the place where his Captaines obtained the victorie against OTHO his Armie; and being but fortie daies after the same, the fields lay full of dead bodies which were yet vnburied; and as many of those which were with him could not endure the euill smell thereof, the cruell tyrant reproued them, saying, That there was no sweeter sent in the world, then the smell of an enemie when he is dead, and especially of a citizen: A speech doubtlesse very inhumane and cruell; the which is written to be abhorred, and ought to be read with the like affection.

The cruell speech of Vitellius.

VITELLIVS being come to Rome, as vpon the way many scandals and outrages were cõmitted by the sundrie nations which came with him, with infinite robberies and spoiles done in the countrey; so was his entry into the citie fearefull and terrible: for he entred into it as into an enemies countrey which had beene conquered, mounted vpon a great horse, clad in militarie and warlike habiliments, the Senate and people of Rome going before him as though that he had triumphed ouer them; compassed about with standards, with the Eagles, and sundrie other ensignes, and his whole Army both of foot and horse, armed in the best armour and furniture that could be gotten. In this manner he went to the Capitoll to make his prayers to IVPITER, and afterwards he went in the same manner to his Palace: and the next day commanding the Senate to be assembled, he came thither; where he made a fit speech, magnifying with little wit or discretion his acts and aduentures, and promising great goodnes of himselfe; and by them was humblie answered, obeyed and honoured as Emperour, and their soueraine Lord.

Vitellius his entrie into Rome.

Departing from the Senate and taking his way towards his palace, all the people of Rome (being accustomed to flatter and to make offers of their seruice) met him, making shew of great ioy, applauding and blessing him: and as new accidents euer bring good hopes, so all were of opinion that VITELLIVS would proue a good Emperour. These first solemnities being ended, he made himself presently to be chosen high Priest, and perpetuall Consul; and took to himself certain dignities, such as he thought good, and commanded that Magistrates should be chosen for ten yeers before hand: so absolutely and tyrannously purposed he to haue vsurped all things, if time would haue suffred him. And, thinking by his industry to haue prolonged his life, he banished out of Rome and all Italie all the Iudiciall Astrologers called Mathematicians, because they had said, that his Raign should not continue one yeer compleat. And hee was so incensed against them, as, if Information were made against any one, hee presently put him to death without hearing the Partie. Presently after the making of his Edict for their banishment by the first of October, there was a Writing set vp in the open market place, to this effect: Wee give warning by these Presents vnto VITELLIVS GERMANICVS, that by the Calends of of the said October, he be not extant in any place whersoeuer. After this, falling to his old humors and licentious inclination, he began to giue himself to the practices and vices of NERO, and such like; which were plaies and dishonest sports vpon Theatres, with publike feasts: wherin he consumed an infinite treasure, desiring to make the beginning of his Empire acceptable and pleasing. In which time he made so great banquets, as never any Emperour had done the like before him: at which, was given to his guests (which were a great number of people) such things as never were thought or heard of; wherein he spent inestimable summes. SVETONIVS writes, that he sometimes commanded one, and sometimes another, to invite him: in which feasts they spent at the least ten thousand crowns. But, above all others, one supper was most stately, made by his Brother the day he entred into Rome; at which there were two thousand choice Fishes, and seuen thousand Fowle. At which supper, to make it more magnificent, hee did consecrate a Charger of a huge capacity, and called it MINERVA'S Shield: in the which were the Livers, Brains, and Tongues, of rare Fowles; with the spawn of Mullets, which hee had caused to be fisht from the Carpathian Sea to that of Spain.

During these pleasures (and afterwards) hee executed great cruelties; in such sort, as, if his Raign had lasted long, he would have made himself equall with NERO, whom hee did imitate: for, he did put many to death contrary to all law and equity, seeking forgeries and false accusations against them; with some of which he had held strict friendship and familiarity: one of which, coming to visit him being sick, and calling for a little water to drink, he with his own hand cast poison into the cold water, and poisoned him. At another time he commanded two yong men being brothers to be slain, for no other cause, but because they came to intreat him to pardon their father, whom hee had condemned to die. And on a time a Roman Knight being caried by his commandment toward the place of execution, he commanded him to be staid, because he said he had nominated him for his heir by his Will and Testament: and seeing his Will, and finding that jointly with him he had made a bondman of his, whom hee had enfranchised, his heir with him, he commanded him to be slain, and the poor Libertine also, without any other occasion. An Vsurer, coming to salute him, and to doo his duty, he delivered him to the executioner to be put to death; and presently called for him back again: But when-as the standers-by commended him for his clemency, hee commanded the Partie to bee slain before his face; saying, that he would feed his eyes. Hee also used the like cruelties upon some poor and mean people; of which upon a time he commanded a great number to be slain, for no other occasion, but for that in certain sports which were used on horseback, and in chariots (wherein were sundry men apparelled in sundry colours) they took part with those which were clad in green, which was called the Prasian faction; hee being affected to the contrary colour, which they called Venetian, which was grey: which two colours and factions (although there were white and red also) were the chief among all the rest. And amongst these colours the good liking and favour of the Roman people was so diuided, as this affection extended it self euen to the Emperours themselves: as, now to VITELLIVS, who fauoured the grey colour; as NERO and CALIGVLA before him had affected the green: and sometime (as it shall be heerafter declared) about these vanities there followed great riots and murthers.

Cruelties committed by Vitellius.

These and other such like cruelties and tyrannies committed VITELLIVS in Rome, and some of his Captains and Fauourites did no lesse: for, hauing obtained the victory, euery one reuenged himself on him whom he hated; and sometime they fained displeasures, thereby to haue a colour under which they might rob and spoil the innocent: such are the fruits of ciuill war. Besides this, the violences and oppressions which were committed in Rome were very great, and in the marches thereof by the men of war which he brought with him, and were lodged in the Country, staying to see him settled in the Empire.

While-as VITELLIVS made so ill a beginning in the City of Rome, suffering himself to be led and governed by Libertines, and such as were odious to all men; after that Italie, Spain, France and Africa, were come to his obedience; in the East the Legions which were there for the defence thereof, although that in the beginning they refused not his Command, yet they presently did beginne to mutine, and very shortly after resolued to make VESPASIAN their Emperour, who at this time (as is aforesayd) made warre against the Iewes, which began about the end of the raigne of NERO; They hauing rebelled, beeing abused with an olde fabulous Prophecie, which they did constantly beleeue, That by the appointment of the destinies about such a time ther should come some out of Iurie, who should be Lords of the whole world: but the euent did shew it was meant by the Roman Empire. The issue therof passed in such manner as followeth.

VESPASIAN, who for his worthy acts in his life past, was much esteemed, in this war gained greater estimation: for he obtained many victories, and besieged and took many cities in India, and PALESTINA; vntill that at last being readie to besiege the cittie of Ierusalem, the Emperor NERO died: and vnderstanding of his death, and being doubtfull what would ensue, he continued the warre for a space, vntill he might see who should succeede in the Empire: and knowing that GALBA preuailed, he took no care to proceede any further or to oppresse the cittie, but preserued what he had gotten, & kept the enemie in awe, obseruing what course the new Emperor would take: and so he sent his sonne TITVS to Rome, to treate of this businesse, and to offer him his obedience. Who being hindred by contrarie weather, when he came to the coast of Achaia in Gracia, he was aduertised that GALBA was slaine by the direction of OTHO; wherefore he held it for his best course to returne to his father, and so he did: and as OTHO his raigne continued but foure moneths as is aboue said, and in the same followed the ciuill warres betweene him and VITELLIVS, VESPASIAN continued as howeuer although that he acknowledged OTHO for Emperor, vntill that VITELLIVS obtained the victorie, and OTHO was slaine; which was nothing pleasing to him, neither to the Captaines in the East, neither to their armies, for the dislike they had that so vicious a man as VITELLIVS should be Emperour: and so that day wherein they sware fealtie to their new Emperor, with the accustomed solemnitie, in presence of VESPASIAN (CORNELIVS TACITVS writeth) that the Legions performed it with great silence and heauines. And VESPASIAN prosecuting the warre with great honour and fame, and hauing now resolued to besiege the citie of Ierusalem; the murmuring and discontentment at so much increased against the new Emperour VITELLIVS, aswell in the armie which VESPASIAN commaunded, as in those in Syria, in Egypt, and other ordinarie Legions in the East; as they all fixed their eies vpon VESPASIAN, resoluing to create him Emperour against VITELLIVS: whereto was a great helpe, the certaine newes which came that the Legions in Mysia and Pannonia, had the same resolution: for (as is before related) they came to the aide of OTHO when his armie was defeated, and he slew himselfe: and continuing in the same resolution, they disobeied VITELLIVS, desiring and nominating VESPASIAN for Emperor. In such sort as vpon these motions, there passed some messages and letters betweene TIBERIVS ALEXANDER, who was gouernour of Egypt, and LICINIVS MVCIANVS gouernour of Syria; who concluded that VESPASIAN should be Emperour, although that he refused it. And this matter being begun by TIBERIVS ALEXANDER, who was gouernour of Egypt, in the citie of Alexandria; VESPASIAN was in his absence proclaimed Emperor, and al the Army confirmed the same with great applause, doing their accustomed homage: which happened the first day of Iuly in the seauentie and two yeere after the birth of CHRIST. And this was accounted for the beginning of the raigne of VESPASIAN; and within eight daies or little more or lesse his Armie did the like, entreating him first to accept thereof: and he refusing and gainesaying it (as EGESIPPVS and IOSEPHVS doe testifie) they forced and compelled him with their drawne swords threatning to kill him if he refused the same. Hauing accepted thereof and performed all the solemnities requisite in so great an accident, VESPASIAN as a valiant and excellent prince, with the like wisedome and valour as he had liued being a subiect, began to shew himselfe a Lord; and to prouide for all things with great authoritie and iudgement, sending Ambassadors, and writing letters to all parts of the world.

Vespasian made Emperor, which he refusing, was compelled to accept thereof by whom and in what manner.

And within few daies after this, all the armies and prouinces of the East came to his obedience and seruice; and the like in Europe did those of Mysia, Bulgaria, Seruia, and those of Hungarie and Austria then called Pannonia; and also those in Slauonia, then called Dalmatia and Illiricum, whose auncient names I will sometime vse vntill such time as they shall lose the same. The like I haue done and will doe in most of the prouinces of the Empire. All things happening so prosperous and luckily to VESPASIANVS, hauing resolued with MVCIANVS gouernour of Syria, TIBERIVS ALEXANDER gouernour of Egypt, and with his owne sonne TITVS what was best to bee done, it was decreed that TITVS should continue the warres against the Iewes; that MVCIANVS with the greatest part of the Legions, should with all speede take his iourney for Italie; and that VESPASIAN should goe to Alexandria in Egypt to make prouision from all parts, and with a greater power passe ouer into Italie, there to make an end of the warre, if it were not before hand finished by MVCIANVS. This being concluded, it was commanded to bee presently put in execution. But while as LICINIVS MVCIANVS was trauelling towards Italie, ANTONIE, who was Generall of the Legions in Illyricum and Dalmatia matia, hauing intelligence of what had passed, desiring to doe VESPASIAN some great seruice, and to shew the hatred which he bare against VITELLIVS, marched in great hast with his Legions, and such as he could leuie in Mysia and Pannonia, and came to make warre in Italy against the Emperour VITELLIVS, who was in armes.

Of the election of VESPASIAN and of other things (as we haue said) and of euery particular which had passed, within few daies VITELLIVS had aduertisement, who spent his time in Rome in banketting and riot, although that he could not long enioy the same. And desirous to make resistance against so great forces, he began to leuie the greatest power he was able, besides those which he had alreadie, the which he yet had not discharged: and knowing with what haste and resolution ANTONY commander of Illiricum came forwards, without staying for LICINIVS MVCIANVS, who came with as great speede, he sent VALENS and CEGINNA his Captaines before named, who had serued him in the warre against OTHO, with so great an armie and power, as seemed sufficient to make head both against him and LICINIVS MVCIANVS. He also prouided extraordinarie fleets and Captaines for the Seas. Thus the warre begun, but it would be too long to repeate all the particular accidents which happened: the effect was, that the two armies approching the one neere to the other, there grew a iealousie that CECINNA one of VITELLIVS Captaines practised some agreement with VESPASIANS Commanders: which being knowne in the armie, he was slaine by the old souldiers. ANTONY hearing this, as he had a great desire to fight before that MVCIANVS should come (after sundry great encounters and skirmishes, which happed betweene them) came to a maine battaile with the Vitellians, neere to the Citie Cremona: which was fought with such furie, and was so bloudy and cruell, that of ANTONY his side vvho vvas Conqueror, there vvere slaine 4500. men, and of the Vitellians, vvho vvere ouercome aboue 30000.

This great victorie being obtained, Italy, which vntill then had been vvholly at the deuotion of VITELLIVS and took his part, vvas suddenly diuided, and many Cities sided vvith VESPASIAN. It is an admirable thing, and vvorthy of an excellent Historie, to recite the accidents which hapned within few dayes, and the cruell vvarre vvhich CORNELIVS TACITVS vvriteth more at large then any other, the vvhich I cannot relate for breuities sake, which I obserue. But the issue vvas, that VITELLIVS Captaines, vvho vvere ouercom & escap't from the battaile, reinforcing their Army, and gathering together their Souldiers, made what resistance against VESPASIANS Captaines they vvere able, although they vvere not of force to stop their passage to Rome, as hereafter shall be declared. For, ANTONY being Victor, with the same greatnes of mind, and expedition vvherwith he began the war, endeauored to obtaine the victory, seeking means to put it in execution. As soone as VITELLIVS, being in Rome, was giuen to vnderstand of the ouerthrow of his armie, affrighted with such newes (although that hee neuer gaue ouer his vices and beastly courses) he made election of new Captaines, which were IVLIVS PRISCVS and ALPHENVS VARRO, who with thirteene Cohorts should guard the passage of the Appennine mountaines; & should also seeke to stop ANTONY his passage for Rome, and MVCIANVS also, who as it as is said, was alreadie arriued in Italy. And of the rest of his forces which he held for the guard of the cittie, he made his brother LVCIVS VITELLIVS Generall, and vsed all possible meanes to leuie men of all sorts. But the successe was such, as feare made VITELLIVS desire to come to some composition and agreement howsoeuer: And being offered by letters from ANTONY, who was victor, and also from MVCIANVS that if he would quietly resigne the Empire, his life should be graunted him, and a place with meanes sufficient for his maintenance; thereto he gaue care and took counsell thereupon, with FLAVIVS SABINVS, VESPASIAN his brother, who in all these troubles remained in Rome, and neuer withdrew himselfe from VITELLIVS, hauing also with him DOMITIANVS, VESPASIANS youngest sonne, who afterwards was Emperor: and it was concluded, in the temple of IVNO; where he sware and promised to renounce the Empire, and would presently haue put it in effect, as he twice protested openly: so great was his feare. But those which were of greatest authoritie about him did so much oppose it, and chiefly the Pretorian Cohorts, as hee took heart againe, and altred his determination.

A composition offered to Vitellius, conditionally that he should resigne the Empire.

Which when FLAVIVS SABINVS vnderstood (to whose house were drawne together a great number of the chiefest noble men of Rome, as to his brother, whom they made account should be Emperor) he was much moued therewith. And knowing that in the behalfe of VITELLIVS there came some to murther him in his house, being induced thereto by those which were with him, he went forth of his house with strong hand, although with lesse power then was requisite for so great an action, and retyred to the Capitoll (which was the chiefest strength of Rome) and seised on the same, where he was presently besieged by VITELLIVS his friends. And as it commonly happeneth, Many will giue honourable and graue counsell, but there are few will thrust themselues into danger, neither lend their hand to put it in execution: so, few of those which had perswaded him to enter into this action, came to his aide, or made any repaire vnto him. The next morning he was assaulted with great furie, in the defence whereof was no good order, but rather little agreement: and as in such misfortunes and disasters it happeneth, all will direct and command, but few will execute; so as by the meanes of ill fighting and worse direction, the Capitoll was by force entred and burned, and all those which were therein, slaine, and FLAVIVS SABINVS taken prisoner, who within a little while after was put to death by the commandement of VITELLIVS; and yong DOMITIANVS his nephew and sonne to VESPASIAN, escaped by flight, and so might SABINVS haue done that night (as CORNELIVS TACITVS reporteth) if he would haue come forth of the Capitoll: for there was no sufficient guard to haue hindred him: but he with too little iudgement, and too much presumption was lost, as is said.

After the death of SABINVS, VITELLIVS hearing that ANTONY drew neer to Rome with his forces, he again began to seek some agreement; and to that end sent letters and messengers unto him: and he grew so fearfull and dejected, as hee sent the vestall virgins, who were virgins enclosed like Nuns in a Cloister; which was the most religious and most ceremoniously guarded of any thing in Rome. But ANTONY, beeing incensed for the death of SABINVS, would give no ear to their words, neither come to any composition; but kept on his way untill he came neer Rome, where VITELLIVS his Forces attended him, resolutely determining to defend themselves. So there being, both without and within, a very great number of the best souldiers in the world, ANTONY assailed it in three parts, and VITELLIVS his people sallied out against him in as many; and there began at each of them one of the most cruell fights in the world: which CORNELIVS TACITVS describes excellently well; affirming, that it lasted the greatest part of the day. And, in the end, that City (which was the Head and Lady of the world) was taken by those which were her owne natural Subjects; and they which were subdued endured that which in like cases hapneth, and much more; as, slaughters, spoilings, violences, and extreme disgraces, as against enemies whom they deadly hated for the death of SABINVS, for that he was their Lords Brother, and for the obstinacy and fury wherwith they had fought.

Rome entred, taken, and sacked, and by whom

When VITELLIVS saw that the City was entred, thinking to escape by flight, hee went forth of his Palace; and, finding no safe way (I knowe not with what hope) he returned thither again; and, finding it abandoned without guard or defense, in the best manner he could he hid himself in a secret place: where he staid not long before he was found by a Tribune. And beeing taken by him, without attending any further determination or counsell, they bound his hands behinde him, and cast a rope about his neck: and, tearing his clothes from his back, half naked they led him through the streets of Rome, untill they brought him to the principal place; where by the way they did him an infinite number of indignities and disgraces; pulling his hair behinde him, as they used to malefactors; and, ferting a dagger under his chin, that hee might be seen of all men, some casting dirt and filth in his face, others calling him Incendiarie & glutton; and some reproaching him with the defects of his body: and there hee was slain by the souldiers (no man being able to aver for certain, who either began or ended) and cast into Tiber. And this was the end of this tyrannous Emperor, and with him died his brother LVCIVS VITELLIVS, and one only son which he had at his death. He had not been Emperor much aboue eight moneths, as most authors affirme, although that SVETONIVS setteth downe a longer time: for he maketh his account that VESPASIAN was chosen Emperor in the East, in the eight moneth of VITELLIVS his raigne, which was some moneths before his death, which was in the 57. yeere of his age, and the 72. yeere after the birth of our SAVIOVR. What hapned after his death shall be referred to the historie of VESPASIAN, seeing that it was in his time. VITELLIVS was so tall, and so corpulent of body, as he was therewith deformed. His face was verie red, by reason of the much wine which hee dranke, and was very corpulent: he went lame of one leg, through a bruise which he had receiued by a wagon.

The death of Vitellius.

Anno Dom. 72.

THE

THE LIFE OF FLAVIVS VESPASIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND TENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

VItellius being ignominiously slaine, the good Vespasian attained to the Imperiall dignity, who restored tyred Rome to such rest, as it seemed to haue recouered her ancient dignity and greatnesse, from whence the vices and wickednes of many former Emperours had made it to fall. This man, before that he attained to the Empire, was no lesse wise then valiant in Art Militarie: so as he grew to be so excellent, as notwithstanding hee was not borne of any very Noble house, yet for his vertues he deserued to be made Emperor. In his time were ended the warres of Ierusalem, vnder the gouernment of his sonne Titus. He made many Prouinces tributary to the Romane Empire, which vntill then neuer yeelded obedience. He beautified Rome, not onely by repairing the ruines, growne by the fire, made by Nero; but he also built a new Amphitheater and Temples, which hee adorned with faire marble, and most beautifull Statues: for in his time painting and carving flourished. He was very courteous and milde, and amongst his other vertues, this was one: to forget iniuries, and not to regard what malicious tongues sayd of him. He was very cleanly, and neat of his bodie. In his diet he was very temperate, and fasted one whole day in euery moneth. He was noted for no other vice but auarice, whereof he excused himselfe, alleaging, that he found the Imperiall Treasurie emptie, through the pilling of former Tyrants. He liued 69. yeeres, and raigned tenne, and dyed of the flux. Truely, it seemeth this Emperor was borne for the good of the Roman Common-wealth; to the end, that after the crueltie of so many Tyrants it should not be wholly ruinated.

AS fair weather cometh after tempests and storms: so was the Raign of VESPASIAN after the troublesome and stormy times of the detestable Emperors TIBERIVS, CALIGVLA, NERO, and the tyrannies and civill warres of GALBA, OTHO, and VITELLIVS: wherewith the Roman Empire was so divided and shaken, as it was ready to come to ruine, if VESPASIAN had not upheld and supported the same by his goodnes, valor and wisdome. VESPASIAN was of the Family of the FLAVII, mean and lowe, and not honoured with any titles and dignities. Hee had, long before these civill combustions, tokens presaging Soveraignty. First, within a Countrey Farm belonging to the FLAVII, there stood an old Oak consecrated to MARS, which at three child-births of VESPASIA, sodainly put forth a bough at every birth. The first was small, and withered soon (for, a daughter then born died within one yeer): the second grew & continued long: but the third came to the bignes of a Tree. Whereupon SABINVS (Father to VESPASIAN) tould his owne mother, that she had a Nephew born which should be CÆSAR. Being in Achaia, hee dream't that he and his should prosper, when-as NERO had a tooth drawne: and it hapned, that the day following a Barber shewed him a tooth of NERO's, newly drawn. And IOSEPHVS, being taken in the Iewish Wars, and cast into prison, maintained constantly, that hee should be shortly set at liberty by him, but he should be Emperour first. These, with many other presages, confirmed his hopes to obtain the Empire. He was 59 yeers ould when hee was chosen Emperour, and came to be knowne, and to winne reputation and credit in the times of CLAVDIVS, CALIGVLA, and NERO; and he obtained offices and dignities in the wars, and in the government of Cities. In Thracia he was Tribune of the souldiers; and, beeing Questor or Treasurer, the Ile of Creta (now Candia) fell to his lot. He was Edil and Pretor in Rome, and afterwards was Lieutenant to the Legions in Germanie: and from thence he was sent to bee

Vespasians offices & dignities.

Governour and Generall in Britanny when it rebelled, where (as EVTROPIVS and SVETONIVS report) he fought above thirty times in battels and skirmishes, in his owne person: so as for his desert there were Armes and triumphant ornaments given him, such as they did use to give to such as did triumph. After all which, he was Consul in Rome two months in the end of a yeer, and was afterward Proconsul in Asia in the time of NERO; and in the end was sent thither by him to that warre against them: the which he followed when as he was chosen Emperour against VITELLIVS, his Army compelling him thereto, as it is already observed. He had at that time two sonnes, the one called TITVS who was with him, the other DOMITIANVS who was in Rome: both which he had by FLAVIA DOMICILLA his lawfull wife, daughter to FLAVIVS LIBERALIS; by whom hee had had a daughter which was dead, whose name was DOMICILLA also.

And this is the summe of his life before he came to the Empire. But, returning to our History, it passed in this manner: VITELLIVS being so reproachfully and ignominiously slain in Rome; although with his death the warre ceased, yet the ruins and effects thereof were not ended: for, the Conquerors committed so many slaughters and spoils upon those which had taken VITELLIVS part, as there was no part of Rome wherein was not effusion of bloud; so as that City endured (by means of this battell) the like or greater misery, than in the wars and proscriptions of MARIVS and SILLA, or any other whatsoever in times past. But, as soon as MVCIANVS came to Rome, who was the chief Commander sent by VESPASIAN, and that DOMITIANVS was returned, who ever since the death of his Vncle SABINVS, and the burning of the Capitoll, lay hidden; these murders and revenges ceased, and there beganne some order to be taken in the Common-wealth.

The Senate was assembled, and the government of VESPASIAN was accepted and approoved, and there were given unto him the names and titles which were usually given to other Emperors; and messengers with all diligence were sent unto him, to advertise him of the victory, and to yeeld obedience in the behalfe of the Senate. And for that (being absent) he could not take order and provide for the estate of Rome, his sonne DOMITIANVS, MVCIANVS and ANTONIE which then were of greatest power, began to manage the government, not without confusion and emulation betweene them, vntill the comming of VESPASIAN, which by reason of the dangerous sailing in the winter time was deferred. The only thing he wanted (being as it were a new vnexpected Prince) was countenance and authoritie, and a kind of royal Maiestie, which also followed suddainly vpon this occasion: Being in Alexandria (attending a seasonable time for his passage to Rome) there was a certaine man of meane qualitie starke blinde, and another lame, both which came together when as he sate on his Tribunall, craving help for their infirmities, it beeing foretold them by SERAPIS in their dreames, that If VESPASIAN did but spet in the blinde mans eyes, hee should recover his sight; and the others leg should be made strong, if he would but touch it with his heel. He doubted much of the successe, and therefore durst not put it in practice: yet in the end, by the perswasion and importunity of his friends, before the whole Assembly he tried both the means; and they were both cured, as SVETONIVS writes.

DOMITIANVS was called CÆSAR, and made Pretor of Rome with Consulary authority; and, because he was the Emperors son, had the preeminence and chief place in all matters, although he proved not afterwards to be such as he ought to have been: for, besides that hee was vitious, he was disloyall aand disobedient to his Father. The Senates Embassadors, and others which were sent from Rome, found VESPASIAN in the City of Alexandria in Egypt, with his Legions and men of warre ready to passe into Italie against VITELLIVS (knowing nothing, that he was dead) and staied there with the King of Parthia's Embassadors, which offered him 40000 horsemen. In like manner, there were Ambassadors from other Kings and Terrarchs of the East (some subject to the Empire, and some free) which came to the like intent: but, seeing there was no such need to draw so great Forces to Rome, he gave great thanks to the King of Parthia's Legats, and the rest of the Kings for their offers, and resolved to take his passage as soon as conveniently he might: And so, as a wise Emperour, forgat not to take order for the defense and extent of the bounds of the Empire; resolving to send his son TITVS to make an end of the warres begun by him against the Iewes and the holy City of Ierusalem: to whom besides the ordinary Legions, he gave three other Legions; wherewith TITVS continued the warres with great resolution: and, by Gods permission, the Iews were in his time, by the hands of the Romans, and through their owne civill dissension, vanquished even to their totall confusion, fusion, as hereafter in briefe shall be declared. VESPASIAN could not so soone depart from Alexandria as he desired, by reason of the stormie and vnseasonable weather by Sea, vnfit for Nauigation, in which time there arose in Rome great troubles, emulations, enuie, and contentions betweene MVCIANVS and ANTONY, each seeking to be preferred before other: MVCIANVS, for that he was the chiefe commander sent by VESPASIAN, and had borne great sway in his election; and the other, for the great victories which he had gotten in his service against VITELLIVS and his Captaines. The bad practices of DOMITIANVS were also partly cause of these tumults, who could not be easily restrained, considering who he was. But the reuolts and insurrections which then were in Germany and part of France, did much more trouble them that swayed the gouernment: for all was in combustion, and in Armes against the Empire, which had a former originall in the time of VITELLIVS, although that then wee could not relate it. The originall and occasion thereof was in manner as followeth.

Tumult in Rome

In the prouince of Battauia, now called Holland (a prouince in low Germanie, which the Rhine diuiding it selfe maketh an Iland) there was an audacious man, of great credit among them, whose name was CLAVDIVS CIVILIS, who vnder colour of taking part with VESPASIAN against VITELLIVS, when the warre began between them, leuied some forces of that countrie, and induced the Frieslanders and their captaine, whose name was BRINO, to do the like: and being thus in armes, they assailed those of the Romane legions which held for VITELLIVS; and taking them at vnawares, slew many of them, being left weake by reason that VITELLIVS withdrew the greatest part of the forces from thence when hee went against OTHO as before hath been mentioned: So as they draue all the Roman garrisons out of that prouince, and there happened afterwards many encounters and skirmishes of eyther side, vntill that VESPASIAN preuailing in Italy, FLACCVS HORDEONIVS, being for VITELLIVS captain of those legions in Germany, was slaine by his owne souldiers, proclaiming VESPASIAN; & so the legions remained without order of commander. CLAVDIVS CIVILIS with the forces of Holland and Friesland, loyning with another captaine called CLASSICVS, imagined that in the confusion of those troublesome times, they might free their countries; or to say better, make themselues Lords thereof, as many haue done: and drawing to their faction certaine of the legions which remained firme for VITELLIVS, they made an insurrection against VESPASIAN, publishing that he was dead; in such sort as within few daies, some cities in Grance reuolted, so as it was feared that some great alteration would haue ensued in the Empire. Which, as I said, put MVCIANVS and ANTONIE in great doubt; for DOMITIANVS who should haue had the greatest care, spent his time in his vices and pleasures. After many counsels and consultations held about this businesse, QVINTILIVS CERIALIS was sent for Generall into those parts: who both valiantly and wisely followed the warres, and reduced those legions to the seruice of the Empire, who being abused, had ioyned with CLAVDIVS CIVILIS; and obtained notable victories although hardly gotten and very bloudie, which CORNELIVS TACITVS sets downe at large. Being in the heate of this warre, holding it to be of great importance, MVCIANVS and DOMITIANVS departed from Rome, with the greatest power they could raise, to giue relieue and ayde where neede should require; who being come to the Alps, they had intelligence that CERIALIS had obtained another famous victorie in a great battaile: by meanes whereof, and of the fame of their comming, all those countries yeelded their obedience, and the Germaines laying downe their armes, desired peace. Notwithstanding this, DOMITIAN, although there were no neede, had a desire to march forwards, and to take the gouernment and forces which CERIALIS held and commanded, and wrote sundrie letters to him requesting the same: whereupon he was suspected, that his intent was to rebell against his father, and so writeth CORNELIVS TACITVS. Others suspect that he did it of enuie against his brother TITVS, and to make himselfe equall with him: But his practices, whatsoeuer they were, took no effect. For, CERIALIS dissembled and would not yeeld his command and gouernment vnto him, and MVCIANVS hindred his passage from going any further: for CERIALIS within few dayes had pacified the countrie, and DOMITIANVS returned to Rome to receiue his father, who (he knew) was comming, and within few daies came, hauing sayled from Alexandria to Rhodes in ships, and from thence in gallies; and passing all along the coast of Græcia, visited all the cities thereof which were in his way, till his arriuall in Italy, and so came to Rome, where he was most solemnly receiued (which IOSEPHVS most elegantly relateth.) For, as his comming had had been long desired and wished for; so was it very gratefull and pleasing to all men, and he presently began to do things conformable to the desire and hope which they had conceiued of him, in ministring iustice, in reforming the lawes and customes of Rome, rewarding those which had serued him, and pardoning and punishing with singular clemencie those which were his aduersaries: in conclusion, he made a good and laudable beginning of his Empire, and persewered and ended therein, as shall appeare.

In the meane time while as the Emperor VESPASIAN parted from Alexandria and came to Rome, his sonne TITVS prosecuting the warres against the Iewes, hauing subdued the countrey round about, he came and besieged the Citie of Ierusalem, at such time as from all parts of the world an incredible number of Iewes were come into the Citie, to celebrate the feast of the Paschall Lambe. Of the siege and destruction thereof, because it was a matter of great moment, and prophecied of before, and was famous afterwards, it shall not be amisse in few words to declare the end thereof; and for as much, as in truth, it was the most strictly and obstinately besieged, and best defended Citie that euer was in the world, the Iewes persisting in their obstinacy and rebellion, by Gods permission, in reuenge of the death and passion of his only sonne IESVS CHRIST our Sauiour God and man: all which IOSEPHVS, EGESIPPVS and CORNELIVS TACITVS write at large, to which I remit the curious reader, besides many others which are more briefe: being by TITVS besieged in such manner, as no man could sallie forth, or enter into it. For the effecting whereof, not contenting himselfe with the multitude of his men of warre and prouision, within fewe dayes he compassed it round about with trenches and ramparts, such as were sufficient, making the souldiers of his army set their hands to the work: so as he besieged it in this manner the space of fiue moneths; in which time there were so many assaults, skirmishes and slaughters, as by the numbers of the dead, which we will set downe, may appeare: and such as I neuer read or heard that the like had passed before any Citie; with such obstinacy and resolution the besiegers assayled it, and the besieged defended themselues. In all which TITVS performed the dutie of a most excellent Captaine and a valiant Knight; sometime giuing direction and commanding, and also when neede required fighting, that, as IOSEPHVS testifieth, in this conquest he slew twelue Iews with his owne hands. The hunger which afflicted the Citie of Ierusalem in this siege, is wonderfull to reade: for, all ordinary sustenance being spent, although they made the greatest spare thereof that was possible, they gaue themselues to eate all things that might yeelde any taste, without any difference, good or bad, eating the flesh of horses, asses, dogs, cats, rats, snakes, adders, and other vncleane and strange things, as it seemeth incredible to all humane reason: But this glueth it the more credit, for that all writers both Christian and Heathen affirme, that there was a mother which killed and ate her owne sonne, whom she had at her breast. Finally, after the death of an infinite number by sword and famine, vpon the eight day of September (hauing been besieged about fiue moneths, and aboue foure yeeres after the warre was begun by VESPASIAN in the raigne of NERO) the Citie of Ierusalem was entred by force, and a great number of those which were therein slaine: and so had they all been, but that TITVS, moued with compassion, commanded the execution vpon women, and such as bare no armes, to cease. But although that this slaughter was stayed, yet in the prouince and the citie there died of hunger and the sword (as EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS and other authors affirme) sixe hundred thousand men able to beare armes. And if we shall giue credit to IOSEPHVS, who was an eye-witnesse to most part thereof, there died eleuen hundred thousand; and there were Captiues which were sold, nintie seuen thousand. EGESIPPVS, who is of no lesse credit and authoritie, agreeth with him in the number of the captiues; but in the number of the dead, he setteth downe 100000. lesse, which seemeth to bee an error but in the letter: both which doe yeeld the reason of so great mortalitie to be, as is said; for that so great a number was gathered together in Ierusalem to the feast at Easter, and had retired thither as to the head of all that prouince, there to die or defend the same. Also that famous Temple was burnt, and those strong and stately walles of the famous Temple of SALOMON were throwne downe, and all the Citie laid waste, desolate and wholly ruined, as sundry Prophets had before prophecied.

And this iust and deserued destruction of Ierusalem happened in the second yeere of the Emperor VESPASIAN, and the fortith yeere after the death of CHRIST our Lord, and the seuentie three after his birth, being (according to EVSEBIVS and PAVLVS OROSIVS) one thousand one hundred and two yeers after that the Temple was first built by SALOMON, and and fiue hundred nintie & one yeer after that it was reedified in the time of K. DARIVS, hauing been destroied by the Babylonians. In this account I follow EVSEBIVS his computation, to auoid disputation about the difference which is among Writers. All affirm, and it doth plainly appear by PLINY and CORNELIVS TACITVS, that Ierusalem had never been so rich, nor so populous, nor so sumptuous in walls, temples and buildings, as at the time of CHRIST his passion, and when it was destroied. And so that City and the holy Temple were ouerthrown and laid euen with the ground, not one stone remaining vpon another; according as our Sauiour CHRIST had told his Disciples; they shewing it to him, and extolling the greatnes and building of that Temple, as the holy Euangelist receiteth more at large: and so it lay untill the Emperor ADRIAN began to reedifie it, although not in the same place, neither such as it was before; as hereafter shall be declared. And so that Prouince, which had been gouerned by the Romans as their friends, and in a manner free, was made captiue and tributarie; and the Iewes being captiues were sould and dispersed through all parts of the world.

This warre being ended by TITVS in such manner as is specified, his Father and all Rome greatly rejoyced thereat, and to both them the triumph was granted by the Senate, because they both had followed that warre. And TITVS, leauing all things in good order in the East, came victorious to Rome. And, within fewe daies after, both the Father and the Sonne entred triumphing with one of the most solemn and stately triumphs that euer was seen in Rome. The which he that will see more at large, shall finde it written by IOSEPHVS in his seuenth book of the wars of the Iewes.

Vespasian and Titus came to Rome in triumph for the wars of the Iewes.

While as TITVS was busied about the siege of the City of Ierusalem, the Alanes, a people of Scythia (of whom heerafter we shall speak much) had their abode aboue the lake Meotis, neer the River Tanais: who in very great numbers abandoned their Country, it being barren and vnfruitfull, or for that it was not sufficient to sustaine them, and came into the Territory of the Medes, robbing and spoiling that Country; and marching forwards came into Armenia, where they did the like. TIRIDATES, King thereof, fought a battell with them; wherein he was ouercome, and by great good fortune escaped by flight. Which when TITVS understood, hauing then fully ended his enterprize against Ierusalem, he marched with his Forces to the relief of TIRIDATES, to assist a King who was vassall and friend to the Empire; and came to the City of Antioch, as EGESIPPVS writeth: but the Alanes, vpon the onely report of his coming, returned to their Country, contented with what they had gotten by theft. VESPASIAN being in Rome, enjoying the Empire in peace, had his son TITVS continually with him, having had good experience of his wisdome and milde disposition: he did most matters by his counsell, and after his opinion, and in all things held him for his companion in the Empire, and made him his fellow in office in the Censurie and Tribunate; and afterwards in seuen Consulships together.

Tiridates King of Armenia ouerthrowne and put to flight by the Alanes.

VESPASIAN, continuing as he had begun the whole course of his life, neuer omitted any thing that was fit for a good and excellent Emperour, as well in preseruing and inlarging the Empire, as in beautifying and reforming the same; in correcting the abuses and euill customes, as in execution of Iustice and other vertues: and chiefly he took great care for the publike edifices and buildings, wherein he spent much treasure; and made the Capitol which VITELLIVS had burnt (when his brother SABINVS was slain) to bee reedified and new built, farre more stately and beautifull than euer it had been. Hee also repaired the City of Rome of those ruines which yet remained since it was burnt in the time of NERO, as in his life wee have declared. Besides this, he built a most stately Temple to the goddesse PALLAS; the workmanship whereof was so rich, so exquisite, and so excellent, as the like had neuer been seen in Rome. For, touching the painting, caruing, and inlaying, all the most excellent workmen of the world (these Arts being then at the highest) shewed their skill, and left memorials of their handworking, as PLINIVS writes; and IOSEPHVS (who was an eye-witnes) affirms, that men came from all parts of the world to see the riches and excellencie of this Temple. VESPASIAN also built an Amphitheatre, of singular and most rare workmanship; which is yet at this day to be seen in Rome, although ruined and defaced: which is a building of marvellous and sumptuous greatnes, round in form, as if two Theatres were joined together like to half circles: in the middest of which were represented the plaies, shewes, wrestlings, fightings with wilde beasts, and also combats of sword-plaiers: And euery thing was wrought and framed in such manner, as by means of their seats it was capable of an infinite number of people, without any hindrance one to the other; which we may comprehend by the Theatre which OCTAVIANVS CÆSAR,

The good deeds of Vespasian.

SAR built in remembrance of his Nephew MARCELLVS, of which we reade that there were seates for fourescore thousand persons. And VESPASIAN did not only consume great treasure in building (whereto he was much affected) but he also bestowed great gifts and pensions vpon such as were masters and excellent workmen; and no lesse but rather greater, vpon learned men, and such as were expert in arts: and to the Rhetoricians and masters in eloquence, both in Greeke and Latin, he gaue great fees and pensions out of his Exchequer; & also vpon Poets and other excellent learned men, he bestowed notable fauours and rewards: so as it is certain that he not only shewed himselfe liberall in these things aforesaid, but to all persons and in all places. And in the Prouinces where he knew that any publike buildings were ruined or decayed, by reason of the ill gouernment in times past, he commanded them to be reedified and repaired at his own charges out of the subsidies and tributes. The like care he took for some Cities, which in his time were defaced by earth-quakes. And for that he would not forget to repaire and amend the liuing bodies aswell as the dead, he endeuoured to reforme and order the multiplicitie and tediousnes of sutes and pleas in law, chusing new iudges and Arbitrators, which should take order, and set agreement between the parties contending; and within few daies should decide and determine controuersies and pleas in sute: and he ordained and established most excellent lawes and statutes.

Prouinces brought into subiection by Vespasian.

After that the good Emperor VESPASIAN had taken such good order in all his actions, as he made the time of his raigne most happy, he was still carefull to continue and increase the same. We also reade that he made many Prouinces subiect and tributaries, which vntill then were in a manner as friends and obedient, but yeelded no tributes, or did other seruices: Among which in Asia the lesse were the Prouinces of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia; and in Asia the great, Comagena, which lieth Eastwards from Cilicia; and here in Europe, the Prouince of Thracia, and the Citie of Byzantium which is now called Constantinople, with the Iles of Rhodes and Samos; and other Countries and Prouinces which he also made tributaries. For what cause or reason he did so, I finde it not written: but duly considering the acts and proceedings of this Emperor, I presume that he did it not without iust occasion in them all. IOSEPHVS setteth downe the cause thereof in the Prouince of Comagena only, and in what sort it was made tributary, and how that ANTIOCHVS the King thereof being ouercome and taken in battaile by CESONIVS, PETO Gouernour of Syria for the Empire, was sent by the same CESONIVS, prisoner to Rome. But VESPASIAN remembring himselfe that he held friendship with this King when he liued in the East, and although that he held it fit and requisite to dispossesse him of his countrie, yet he would not deale seuerely with his person: for, being vpon the way, he sent commandement that he should not be brought to Rome, but commanded him to be carried to the citie of Lacedamonia in Græcia, and that he should liue there, and that sufficient prouision should be made to maintaine him and his children in royall estate: and so that King led his life afterwards in that Citie, and the Prouince of Comagena remained tributarie to the Empire.

Comagena made a tributarie prouince by Vespasian.

The life and maners of Vespasian after that he was Emperor.

What else happened in the time of VESPASIAN, the Authors which I follow, haue not written, peraduenture because they were of small importance. But as concerning his vertue, bountie, and good gouernment, they haue written more at large then I haue done, such and so many were they: and because I will not be too sparing and briefe in this subiect, I will say somewhat for a remembrance and an example to good Emperors. First, the manner and course of his life after that he came to the Empire was this. He awoke euery morning before day, and in his bed did reade and heare letters and instructions of diuers affaires; and then he commanded the doore to be set open for his friends and such others as would come into his chamber: in whose presence he arose and made himselfe ready, without any page or seruant to helpe him, but to bring his clothes to his hands; and then he stood a good space giuing audience to such as he had to deale withall, prouiding for all things, and making therein such dispatch as was conuenient: then he went into his litter or chariot, as the manner then was, and for his exercise went into the field of MARS or to some other place, and sometimes he went on foote. After all this, he retired himselfe to his Palace, to his exercises and pastimes: after which he vsed the bathes, whereto men in those dayes were much addicted: which being ended, he returned to his businesse, and to prouide for all thing necessarie; wherein he spent the greatest part of the day. He was very moderate and temperate in his diet, and after supper was very pleasant and merrily disposed, delighting much to vse quick and briefe speeches; whereof SVETONIVS reciteth some. He was a Prince of great modestie, patience, and singular clemency, enduring and dissembling with those which did murmure and speake ill of him, pardoning and forgetting iniuinjuries and offenses: the examples whereof (which were many) I omitte because of brevity. VESPASIAN was noted and taxed for being ouercouetous: true it is, that he caused his rents to be collected rigorously, imposing new taxes and seruices, seeking extraordinary and strange means to get money: whereof AVRELIVS VICTOR and other Authors excuse him; alleaging, that he was forced thereto, for that hee found his Exchequer poor, and the Imperiall Treasure wasted and exhausted: so as for the maintenance of his State it was very requisite to raise it to some good proportion. Which makes it seem to be true, seeing hee was very bountifull and liberall to all men, and spent and freely parted with that which hee so gathered. Finally, howsoeuer it was, he is reckoned in the number of good Emperors; for, with singular wisedome and valour he gouerned the Empire nine yeers: at the end whereof (beeing seuentie and nine yeers old) a Flux took him, and hee died in peace in the yeer of our Lord 81. Hee was a man of a middle stature, well compact in his lims, and of a good complexion, and liued euer sound and in good health: for the preseruation wherof, he ordinarily vsed frictions on his arms and legs; and euery month fasted one whole day, without eating any thing.

Vespasian noted of couetousnes.

THE LIFE OF TITVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND ELEVENTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

VESPASIAN being dead, his Sonne Titus succeeded him, who reserued his Fathers name. This man in his youth applied himself much to the study of learning and sciences; and deligh-ted so much in writing, that with great facility he counterfeited all manner of letters; beeing Generall, the tedious warres of Ierusalem were ended. Coming afterwards to the Imperiall dignity, he wholly altered his former disposition, and became very mercifull and most bountyful. His bounty was such, as he said, He had lost that day wherein hee had not done some deed of curtesie. He was also of so milde a nature, as he said to his Brother Domitian, who (it seemed) conspired against him, that he should not seek to get that by fratricide which he might obtain by loue. He liued 41 yeers, and ruled the Empire little more than two. His death was so grieuous to the City of Rome, and to all the Prouinces subiect to the Roman Empire, as all affirmed with one voice, that the Father of the Empire, and the Delight of mankinde, was departed out of the world.

AS soon as the Emperour VESPASIAN was dead, his eldest Sonne TITVS (called by his surname VESPASIANVS) without any contradiction was receiued and obeyed for Emperor; as wel for that his Father in his life-time had made him his companion in the Empire (and that, as some Authors say, he did participate with him, and that he gaue him the name of Emperor) as also for that in his Testament and last Will hee appointed him his Successor: yet his brother DOMITIANVS proudly maintained, that his Father had nominated him, and not his Brother TITVS; and that his Fathers Will was falsified. TITVS was an excellent Emperor, but his Raign was short; for, it lasted little more than two yeers: so as, for his naturall bounty and noble disposition, he was called The loue and delight of mankinde, although before hee was Emperour he was taxed vpon some occasions; some imagining, that hee would haue proued wicked and peruerse. But truth and vertue, although for a time they may bee suppressed, yet at length they will preuail, and ouercome enuy and slander: and as the cleer Sun disperseth the dark clouds; so did TITVS cleer himself of the suspicions conceiued against him, with the brightnes of his vertues and worthy actions. He came to the Empire at the age of 39 yeers, and somewhat lesse; in which he followed the warres, and gat great experience both in peace and war. First, in his infancy he was brought up in learning and other vertuous exercises, and therby grew to be very learned both in Greek and Latin, and expert in many Arts. He was a very good horseman, and most skilfull in Musick; a very good Singer, an eloquent Orator, and could make verses with wonderfull ease and facility. He had a singular memory, and was endued with an excellent wit; and was so speedie in writing in ciphers and abbreuiations, as he excelled all his Secretaries and Notaries; and would so well counterfeit any mans hand and writing, as it was said of him, that he might haue been a notable counterfeiter or forger.

Being endued with these graces and sufficiencies in his youth, before his Father came to the Empire he bore Arms in the wars, and was Tribune both in Germany and Britanny, and purchased the reputation of wise and valiant. After which, being come to Rome, hee used to plead and defend causes and actions (which was then the exercise of the most eminent men); and afterwards in time he was made Questor or Treasurer. In processe of which time hee married twice: the first, with ARRICIDIA the daughter of a Roman Knight whose name was TERTVLLVS, who had been Prefect of the Pretorian Legions; and, after her death beeing a widower, hauing neuer a childe, he married the second time with a woman of great bloud, whose name was MARTIA FVLVIA, whom hee afterwards put away, hauing first had a daughter by her.

The warres beginning against the Iewes, he went thither with his father, hauing the command and charge of a Legion: and matters succeeding in such manner as is alreadie said, he made a finall end thereof. And although that some practiced to bring him in suspicion with his father, falsely suggesting that he would haue rebelled against him; yet after those victories he came into Italy, sufficiently cleered himselfe, and triumphed of the Iewes; and (as wee haue said) obtained so much grace with his father, as hee made him his companion, and in a manner equall with him in the Empire. In his fathers life time hee purchased dislike vpon some occasions: whereof one was, that they charged him with the couetousnes and auarice of his father, for the new impositions which he laid vpon the subiects of the Empire: whereof although that he might well haue purged himselfe, yet he would not make manifest his innocencie, for that the fault should not be imputed to his father. The other was, for that he had caused AVLVS CINNA and certaine others of great note to be put to death, although hee had iust occasion to doe it; as SVETONIVS sheweth in AVLVS CINNA: and other authors, in others.

TITVS also discredited himselfe for bringing of Queene VERONICE from Iudea with him for his friend or concubine, whom hee so deerly loued, as hee entertained her in a manner as his wife: and there is an author which affirmeth that he slew AVLVS CINNA, through iealousie of her. All which being laid together, when by the death of his father hee came to the Empire, they doubted that hee would haue prooued wicked and cruell: but his clemencie and other vertues did presently disperse all those clowdes of suspicion. The first, and happely the greatest conquest was, the forcing of his will and bridling his desires and affections by withdrawing himselfe from the company of VERONICE, for the which he was taxed with infamie, although that he loued her exceedingly, and was by her beloued in the same degree. Hee also gaue ouer his other pastimes, which he held vnfit and vnbeseeming an Emperour, and began to liue and carrie himselfe very modestly and honourably, and to shew his liberalitie, clemencie, and singular curtesie. Whereof I hold it requisite (although I keepe not order, seeing his time was so short) to make some mention; that seeing his bountie, clemencie and wisdome made his Empire voide of ciuill mutinies, warres and alterations, which vsually please the readers, yet they may speake of the vertues & greatnes of this Emperour. First for a shew & ostentation to the world (which great Princes sometimes should make, because that thereby they do in som sort purchase the loue of the cómon people) he repaired & made som new great buildings, and he also presented games and sports, wherein (according to EVSEBIVS, EVTROPIVS, and SVETONIVS) were slaine 5000. wild beasts, and therein also fought a great number of Sword-players. He caused also to be represented a Naual battaile in one of the auncient Naumachias, whereof mention hath been made heretofore. And as he was by nature most noble and liberall, all the fauours, graces and rewards, which his Predecessors had giuen and granted (which none of them would confirm, but they granted some new) hee confirmed by a decree. And, moreouer, to any petition made vnto him he neuer gaue vnpleasing answer, neither suffred any any to depart from him discontented, or without hope to obtain his demand. And being reproued by some of his Councell, for promising more than it seemed hee was able to perform: hee answered them, that It vvas not fit nor vvorthy, that any man should depart from him sorrovvfull & discontent vvith his entertainment. He vvas naturally so desirous to do good and to help others, as one night after supper remembring himself, that that day he had giuen nothing, with a sad and heauie countenance he turned towards those which were in his company, and said: My Friends, I haue lost this day; which were speeches worthy to bee noted and engraven in the mindes of all great Princes. Hee was also so desirous to pleasure and giue contentment to all men (houlding alwaies his grauity and authority) as in all his speeches and discourses with any people whatsoeuer, he alwaies shewed himself affable, pleasant, courteous and tractable.

In some sinister accidents which in his time hapned in Rome, as one was (as saith PAVLVS OROSIVS) a great fire, wherewith were burned a great number of houses, and also a great plague; he not onely vsed the diligence of a carefull Prince, but also shewed the loue and affection of a pitifull Father; helping with his owne rents to repair and new-build that which the fire had consumed, and causing those which were wounded to bee cured with great diligence; and those which died of the pestilence, to be buried. The clemency and mildnes of this Prince extended to so high a degree, as he not onely pardoned many, and moderated the rigour of the lawes in cases of ordinary crimes; but two great men of Rome hauing conspired against him, and being thereof conuict, so as they could not deny the fact, he would make no other inquisition, nor put them to any torments, or otherwise punish them, but onely aduised them in secret that they should alter their euill purposes; willing them to consider, that the Empire was giuen by Gods prouidence and ordinance, and by the fates, and not by any humane industry; and if they desired any other thing, it should be more fit to sue to him, and he would not deny it: and saying this, he pardoned them, and vsed them louingly, and afterwards entertained them with other complements, which SVETONIVS writeth; so as he took such order, that they did repent and reform themselues: whereby he did better assure his life, than if hee had put them to death. For, therein he should haue had greater cause of fear, and more would haue hated him. The like temperance he held with his Brother DOMITIANVS; who neuer left to lay snares to intrap him, and to ly in wait for his life, and to practice his death, and to incense the Legions and Cohorts against him: yet for all this he would not put him to death, as he might iustly haue done, neither seclude him from him, neither diminish his reputation and authority wherein he liued; but made him his companion in the Empire, and proclaimed him for his successor. And the better to reclaim him, sometimes retiring him into a secret chamber alone, with tears in his eies he would admonish and require him, not to attempt that by treason and fratricide, which he shortly should haue voluntarily, and that which hee already enjoyed with him by his good will. And, for conclusion, this excellent Prince TITVS, in the short time that he raigned, gouerned with such wisdome and in such manner, as he was through the whole Empire extremely beloued, and generally obeyed and serued by all men: So as during his whole Raign there were no contempts, insurrections, warres, rebellions, nor contentions. But as men for their sinnes were not worthy of so good a Prince, so by Gods secret iudgement hee was taken away from among them: for, beeing taken with a strong burning Feuer, within fewe daies hee died therof in the same village wherin his Father died, neer Rome, being of the age of one and fortie yeers, two moneths and twenty daies, although EVTROPIVS sets down some months lesse, which may be through error in a letter.

Snares laid by Domitianus to entrap his Brother Titus.

The death of Titus.

As soon as his death was knowne, there was the greatest lamentation and sorrow that euer was seen in Rome: and, the Senat being assembled, there was more spoken to his honor & commendation, being dead, than was of any man that euer liued before him, or was euer spoken in his presence in his life-time: which hapned in the yeer of our Lord 83.

THE LIFE OF DOMITIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND TWELFTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

DOmitianus, brother to Titus, after his death was made Emperor; who in the beginning of his gouernment, faining much goodnesse, was milde, pitifull, and aboue all, most iust. He preuailed in all the warres he began, and in Rome finished many edifices already begun, and built many more from the ground: so as in the beginning of his raigne he purchased much reputation, and the credit of a very vertuous and good man. But afterwards altering his conditions, he became so cruell, so insolent and so couetous, that putting men to death for very small and ridiculous causes, he vsurped the goods of the dead, pretending that he was their heire. Hee persecuted the Iewes, and particularly those which were of the line of Dauid; being informed that from him should descend a man which should be Lord of the whole world. He was also a great Persecutor of the Christian Religion, so as in his time many holy men were martyred. He made such warre with flyes, as a Courtier being demanded, who was aboue with the Emperour; answered, that there was not one flye with him. He made great show of Astrologie, and was a great friend to those which made profession of that facultie: yet he dealt hardly with an Astronomer, which told him that he should dye shortly. He liued fiue and forty yeeres, ruled the Empire fifteene; and by the conspiracie of one Stephen, who was Steward of his house, and certaine others, amongst which his wife was an assistant, he was slaine in his Palace. The common people were neither sad nor glad of his death: but the Gentlemen and Senators were so well pleased with it, that euen the very same day they made all his Statues to be throwne to the ground, which he would haue of no other thing but of pure gold.

Domitianus was wicked, and farre vnlike to his brother Titus.

TO the good Emperour TITVS, his brother and successor DOMITIANVS was farre vnlike; for this Emperour was wicked and lewde, although that in the beginning of his raigne hee did some things which were pleasing, and gouerned the Common-wealth reasonable vprightly; vsing clemencie, humilitie, and liberalitie, deceiuing the world with fained bountie, cleane contrarie to future actions. When he came to the Empire, he was of the age of thirtie yeeres (little more or lesse) in his younger yeeres, he liued in meane estate, and in euill fame, for the dishonestie of his person. His father being Emperour, in his absence he was called CÆSAR, and to him was giuen the greatest dignitie and authoritie in Rome, which hee vsed licentiously and dishonestly, committing adulteries, with other vices and insolencies: vpon one day, he deposed twentie seuerall persons from their charges and gouernments, and gaue them to others: so as his father (when he vnderstood thereof) said, that he maruelled, that his sonne DOMITIANVS had not sent one, to haue succeeded him also: and warres then growing in Batauia, he attempted that which we haue related. But when his father was come to Rome, to dissemble and cloke his wicked practices he gaue himself to study, and to the exercise of poesie, although with little affection: for before that time he neuer regarded it, or any other learning, and so afterwards abhorred it according to that flattering age. For the small time which hee spent spent in poesie, SILIVS ITALICVS, QVINTILIAN, and PLINIE in the proem of his naturall historie, commend him: and MARTIAL forgetteth him not in his Epigrammes. And much lesse did DOMITIANVS giue himselfe to the practice and exercise of armes, but was much affected to shooting with bowe and arrowes; wherein hee was so skilfull, as he would oftentimes for his glorie cause a Page to spread his hand open for a marke against a butte, and he standing a good distance off, would sticke his arrowes betweene the boies fingers without hurting him; and in like manner would doe many other strange things, which SVETONIVS reporteth as an eie-witnes, wherein and in dicing was his principall delight and pastime. After the death of his father and brother, for whose sakes he came to be Emperour, without any contradiction, he gouerned the same contrarie to his naturall inclination; as may appeare by that which he did afterwards. But because we will not depriue him of the commendation, which his good deedes deserued; before that we will speake of his accursed cruelties, wee will first speake of that which was good and commendable, seeing hee liued in such manner, as his actions were intermixt with some blemishes of euill: wherein I cannot obserue any order or time, as I alwaies desire to doe, because the authors which I follow write it so confusedly and out of order.

First, he made great shew of liberalitie, and iointlie therewith of clemencie, iustice, and equitie, of either of which we will produce some examples. He shewed himselfe so free from couetousnes, and so willing to giue; that he refused certaine heritages which certaine free personages would haue giuen him; and gaue ordinarilie gifts and rewards, and forgaue penalties and tributes, and erected certaine pillers and publike buildings, which were verie excellent, and of wonderfull great cost, among which this was one: He repaired and new built the Capitoll, which againe had bin burnt, wherein he caused a sumptuous Temple to be built to his god IVPITER, and other Temples and wonderfull buildings. And to obtaine the loue and applause of the people, he ordeined so many shewes and games which were so rare and costly, as it is wonderfull to reade, and tedious to write them. First he made a Lake, for a Naumachia or battaile by sea, wrought all by mans hand, which was so great as it was sufficient to conteine many galleyes, wherein vvere such battailes, as they vvanted nothing to proue them to be in good earnest and not counterfeit. He had also a verie great number of Svvord-players, and great revvards for those which did runne with chariots. He had turneyes and battailes of horsemen and footemen, and huntings of an infinite number of wilde beasts, in such sort as other Emperours had don, and more then any other: for he had also women which like men fought with wild beasts, whereof SVETONIVS, IVVENAL, and MARTIAL, make mention. He also made games and feasts which they called secular, represented but euery hundreth yeare, which vvere the most solemne of al others: for then were accomplished a hundred yeeres since the time that OCTAVIVS AVGVSTVS had celebrated them, although that the Emperour CLAVDIVS at another time commanded them to be made, without obseruing any order or time, wherein he made the addition of the two new colours, which the horsemen did before vse to weare, whereof before hath been made mention, which were purple, and gold colour. And besides all this abouesaid, he caused disputations and arguments to be held, wherein great rewards were diuided betweene Poets and Orators both Greeke and Latin, and all kind of Musick. There were also Comedies, dumb shewes, tragedies, and wrestling games. In conclusion, there were made by his commandement all those feasts, games and reuels that euer had been seene or knowne in Rome vntill that time, besides many which were newly inuented. Among all which he made a distribution among all the Romane people, which they called Congiarij, of 300. deners to euery person: and during the time of these reuels (which was not short) he made many banquets and publike feastes, and there were throwne to the common people all kinds of coines, and clothes, with other things which were cast from out the windowes, this was called Missilia. I will not herewith forget one pleasant thing, whereof SVETONIVS writeth, which was, that in the beginning of his Empire he was wont euery day one houre to be in some chamber or secret place alone, wherin he did nothing at all but catch flies, which he afterwards filed vp vpon a stilet or long sharp needle: So as vpon a day one asking whether any bodie were within with DOMITIANVS, answere was made, that there was not so much as a flye with him; meaning, that he had killed and throwne them all avvay.

Secular games made but once in a hundred yeeres.

Domitianus delighted much in catching of flyes.

DOMITIANVS did not only those things which were pleasing to the people, as making of feasts and sports, but in all other things he took good order, shewing himselfe diligent in hearing complaints, and doing iustice, and particularly in punishing such iudges as receiued bribes and rewards, as well the Roman Magistrates, as the Presidents and Gouernors of Prouinces. And herein concerning Iudges he perseuered, not only before that he discouered his cruelty and wickednesse, but euen afterwards: and though that he were euill of himselfe, yet he forbare not to punish euill Gouernors: and so SVETONIVS affirmeth, that Gouernors were neuer so temperate, iust and vpright at any time as in his. He also caused himselfe to be chosen Censor, wherein he endeuoured to reforme and correct the abuses and euill manners of the Romans, as though that his owne conditions had been good; and so he made many other good orders, and did iustice in all things: and of the other side shewing himselfe mercifull and pitifull, in such sort that if he had perseuered in that manner of gouernment which he began, he had this day been held for a very good Emperor. But neuer any man fell from good to euill so notably, nor made so strange an alteration as he did, whereof in that which we haue before said, he gaue some indice and forewarning. For in those good things which he did, he vsed such pride and elation, and shewed himselfe so vaine-glorious, that a man of any iudgement might well perceiue, that what he did, proceeded not from any good mind, or from his naturall inclination; which he manifested in some of his words and speeches: chiefely when he was made Emperour (without shame or blushing) he vaunted in the Senate, that hee had giuen the Empire to his father and to his brother, which they had now restored vnto him; this being as false, as by the historie before doth appeare. And those his statues which they commaunded to bee set vp in the Capitoll, he would not consent that they should be made of any other thing, then of cleane gold, and so in other things hee shewed extreme pride. But hee did one thing which was so accursed and abominable, as to make mention thereof onely, is a sufficient proofe of the incomparable pride of this man: for he commaunded by a publike Edict, that in all Letters and Edicts they should write our Lord and God, which both the christian and heathen authors doe affirme: For which sinne and wickednesse it pleased God to suffer him to fall into those abominations which he afterwards incurred, as contousnesse, crueltie, and other wicked actions: whereof before that we discourse, it shall not be amisse, to treate of the warres which happened in the time of his wickednesse, although hee prosecuted them not in his owne person, which were three or foure with strange nations, and one ciuill warre.

The Iustice of Domitian.

Domitianus had his statues of pure gold.

The first warres abroade were against the Sarmates in Europe, which inuaded the Empire, with whom and also with those of Asia, there ioyned many of the auncient Scythians. That Prouince is situate in the north of Germany, and stretcheth to the sea called Mare Sarmaticum. On the East it is bounded with the riuer of Tanais, and the lake Meotis: and on the West with the riuer Vistula. Vnder this Prouince are now contained Muscouia, Russia, Polonia, Lituania, and some other Prouinces. This warre was cruell and dangerous, and in the beginning it went ill with the Romanes: for in a battaile were slaine the Generall of the Romanes, and one whole legion: but DOMITIANVS afterwards reenforcing his armies, the Sarmates were ouerthrowne and constrained with losse of many of their people to retire themselues. He had twise warres with the inhabitants of the great prouince of Dacia, the inhabitants whereof (as Plinie affirmeth) were called by the Greekes, Getæ. That prouince contained all that which is now called Walachia, and Transyluania, and other countries. Of this warre SVETONIVS, EVTROPIVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS make mention, but none of them reporteth how it passed, neither for what cause it was vndertaken, although they affirme that it was very costly to the Romanes: for in the first warre wherein OPPIVS SABINVS was Generall, who had beene Consul, whom EVTROPIVS calleth APPIVS, he was ouercome, and the greatest part of his armie slaine.

Sarmatia what countries it contained.

Dacia how it is called at this day.

And, in the second, CORNELIVS FVSCVS, Commander of the Pretorian Cohorts, had the like fortune; whom DOMITIANVS made Generall of that warre. In both the one and the other were great encounters and battels, wherein was spilt much of the Romans bloud, as PAVLVS OROSIVS relateth, and hee saith, that CORNELIVS TACITVS treateth thereof very largely and copiously in his Histories: but that perished with the rest of that Authors works, whereby we knowe not the discourse of those wars: but they all write, that DOMITIANVS triumphed of that Prouince. And hee also triumphed of a people in Germany, which they called Catti, with whom he also had a doubtfull warre. During the time of these warres, wholly discouering his wicked inclination, DOMITIANVS neuer ceased to commit murders, robberies, violences, and other vices, as hereafter you shall hear. Wherefore, hauing freed himself from the warres aforesaid, there arose a ciuill warre more dangerous: which was, that LVCIVS ANTONIVS (called also SATVRNINVS) being Generall in Germanie, rebelled belled against DOMITIANVS, vsurping the name of Emperor; making profit of this occasion, that DOMITIANVS for his euill life was ill-beloued: against which SATVRNINVS, DOMITIANVS sent APPIVS NORMANDVS for his Generall. This war was very doubtfull and much feared: but, coming afterwards to a battell, LVCIVS ANTONIVS was slain, and APPIVS remained Victor. And heerin hapned a most strange and wonderfull Accident; which was, that the same day wherein this battell was fought in Germanie, it was known in Rome how euery thing particularly did passe: and DOMITIANVS, that same day seeking to knowe the Author of those newes, could not finde him, and therefore beleeued that it was false; so as preparing himself to goe to those warres in person, messengers came which brought certaine newes of the victory, and they auouched that it was at the same instant according to the newes then in Rome.

After the warres were ended (as we haue recited) and during the time thereof, DOMITIANVS put to death many eminent men, Senators, and such as had been Consuls, for so light and fained causes, as thereby he cleerly manifested the cruelty of his minde. ELIVS LAMIA he commanded to be slain, for that he vsed pleasant speeches and iests: which although hee suspected, yet were they offensiue to none. He commanded SALVIVS COCCHIANVS also to be slain, because he celebrated the birth-day of his Vncle, the Emperor OTHO; and METIVS POMPOSIANVS, for that he heard that his constellation did prognosticate vnto him Imperiall dignity, and because he had giuen to some of his slaues the names of HANNIBAL and MAGO: And, in like manner, SALVSTIVS LVCVLLVS, for that he caused certain lances to be made of a new fashion, which (according to his owne name) he called Luculleian. He put IVNIVS RVSTICVS to death, because hee published a Treatise in praise of PETVS TRASEA, and of VIBIVS PRISCVS, very wise men; who had been of a faction contrary to his Father.

Domitianus did put many Noble-men to death, with the causes.

How little loue this tyrannous Emperour bare vnto learning, may well appear by that which SVETONIVS and other Authors write of him: for, he cõmanded to be banisht out of all Italy the Philosophers, and with them (as EVSEBIVS writes) the Astrologers; of wch banishmẽt, AVLVS GELLIVS and PHILOSTRATVS make mention: PHILOSTRATVS saith, that some fled into Spain, and others into the deserts of Libya and Scythia. And, hauing expelled the Philosophers and Wise-men, proceeding in his cruelty, hee slue an infinite number of people (as SVETONIVS reports) for very ridiculous causes: and his fury was such, that some whom he purposed to put to death the next day, he entertained ouer night in his chamber, and shewed them many fauours with a cheerfull countenance. And, among these his cruelties, he gaue himself to luxurie and incontinency, and other dishoneſt exercises, cõuersing and keeping ordinary company with dishoneſt women; and heerwith committed many robberies & strange extortions, seising vpon mens wares and goods for fained crimes; and those so light, as they deserue not to bee mentioned. He would fain himself to be heir to those which were dead, seising vpon their goods, and suborning some to depose that they had heard the deceased in their lifetime say, that they meant to leaue him for their heir. With which deuices, and as many more as he could imagine or inuent, he neuer left robbing and spoiling men, as well in Rome and Italy, as in other Prouinces subiect to the Empire. But, amongst all other nations, those which endured the greatest oppression and tyranny were the Iewes, by Gods permission for their sinnes: for, all those which were of that religion, or liued after their manner and custome, although they were not so, he made them pay a certain new and rigorous imposition and tribute by the head, ouer and aboue all that any other nation paid. And SVETONIVS and EVSEBIVS write, that as HEROD when CHRIST was born; so was he in fear, that out of the stock of DAVID one should come, which would bereaue him of the Empire: for, hee was informed that it was written, that from DAVID should descend a man who should rule and command the whole world. Wherefore he commanded with all diligence all those among the Iewes, which were of the linage of DAVID, to be sought out and slain: yet EVSEBIVS writeth, that hee pardoned two which were of that linage. And, to set his seal to all his wicked deeds, beeing induced by the diuell or some of his angels, hee gaue himself to the persecuting of the Catholick Church, and by his Letters and Edicts, both in Rome and out of it, an infinite number of Christians were banished and put to death: vpon whom hee executed horrible kindes of cruelties; written by EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS, and other Catholike Authors. And this was the second generall persecution of the Primitiue Church; in which Saint IOHN the Euangelist was banished into the Ile of Pathmos, where he saw the Vision of the Apocalypse. How long this persecution endured, I cannot say: but by EVSEBIVS it seemeth, that it lasted little more than two yeers; for afterwards, in the thirteenth Chapter of his third Book, hee saith, that DOMITIANVS did moderate this persecution, and commanded it to cease. So as by that which is written and hath been seen, DOMITIAN was one of the worst Princes that euer was in the world; and so bad, as he used to say, The vice of the flesh was but a kinde of honest recreation: and such were those wherein he used to passe his time.

For these causes, and many other which I omit, wherein DOMITIANVS spent foureteen yeers of his Raign, he came to be extremely hated and abhorred of all men. And as now it was growne to a custome in Rome, Not to endure wicked Emperors long; and as God also permitteth, that sometime wicked Princes com to euil ends: so those which were most priuate and neerest about him conspired against him; the Chiefe & Captain of which was STEPHANVS, who was steward to his wife and Empresse DOMICILLA, whom they affirm to haue been partaker in the conspiracy and practice to murder him: and they afterwards slue him in such manner as I will tell you.

Signes prognosticating the death of Domitian.

During the time this conspiracie was a plotting, there appeared certaine signes in the skies, whereof all men conceited and prognosticated, that the death of DOMITIANVS was at hand: and hee also stood in extreame feare thereof, as he which took great heede to auguries and signes, and presumed much to be an Astrologer and Diuiner. And amongst other signes which then were seene, there appeared for many daies together round about the Sunne a great bright shining Crowne that did compasse it about, which resembled the Raine-bow against foule weather; but that it was a whole Crowne and did compasse the Sunne in such manner, as it bereaued and eclipsed the same of his brightnes: Which signe all men did interpret to signifie a chaunge and alteration in the Empire, with the death of DOMITIANVS. And for as much as STEPHANVS in Greeke signifieth a Crowne, there were some which conceiued that the said STEPHANVS should kill him, notwithstanding they knew nothing of the practice. By meanes whereof, and of other things which then were seene, DOMITIANVS was in such feare and despaire, that as vpon a day there was a great tempest, and there happened certaine flashes of lightning, which hee and all others did presage to be against him: and he being very angrie, they write that he said, Let IVPITER then smite whom hee will. Whereof, the feare which I tolde you of, was the principall cause: for euen then was the time accomplished which the Astrologers, casting his constellation, had told him that he should die. But one thing aboue all the rest made him most amazed, which in truth was very strange, and for such (although it be of small importance) I will declare it, which was this: that he liuing in this feare, sent for an

An Astrologer foretold Domitian of his death, and of his owne also.

Astrologer, who at that time was very famous, and asked him many questions thereupon: who answerd him, that by his art he found that his death was neere at hand. Wherewith DOMITIAN was so wroth, that hauing determined to command this Astrologer to bee slaine, hee asked him, if hee knew what end hee himselfe should haue. The Astrologer answered him, that by his constellation hee knew, that hee should shortly be torne in pieces by dogges. And DOMITIAN thinking to make him a lier in that which hee had foretould, and that, what hee had prophecied of his owne death, should not come to passe, commanded him presently to bee slaine, and his bodie to be burnt, and his ashes to be buried, to the end that dogges should not teare him. And hauing begun to burne his bodie, there fell such a tempest & raine as quenched and dispersed the fire; and the body of the poore Astrologer remaining half vnburnt, there came certaine dogges which tare it in pieces, as he had prognosticated. Which (I thinke) was, by Gods permission, a practice of the diuel, as he which knew the secrecie of the conspiracie, which then was in hand to kill him. Now STEPHANVS and his consorts hauing agreed vpon the day, wherein they determined to giue DOMITIANVS his deserued death, one morning this STEPHEN came into his chamber, bringing a poiniard hidden vnder his arme, which for that purpose he had some daies before fained to be sore, and carried it bound: and comming to the Emperour (who was suspicious enough and verie fearefull) hauing oportunitie to come to his presence, by reason of his office, with much dissimulation he told him that he had brought him certaine intelligence of a conspiracie against him. Which when DOMITIANVS heard, as he was very iealous thereof, and beleeuing his words to be true, without any further consideration, he withdrew himselfe apart to talke with him about this matter: and standing in that manner, the rest which were of the same confederacie, being all his ordinarie seruants, and at hand, this STEPHEN gaue gim a memoriall, such as he had deuised; wherein he discouered a conspiracie, naming therein such at hee thought good. And DOMITIANVS beginning to reade it with with great attention, STEPHEN at his pleasure stabbed him into the groyne; and the Emperour feeling himselfe wounded, began to call and to cry out aloud: and as he was very strong and valiant, before that STEPHEN could giue him another wound, hee closed with him and threwe him to the ground, and striuing to take the poiniard from him, he cut and mangled his owne fingers: And by this time before that any succour could come to him, there ranne vpon him SATVRNINVS, CLODIVS, PARTHENIVS, MAXIMVS, and others which were of that conspiracie, being all his owne seruants: and there giuing him many wounds, they slew him. And so had DOMITIANVS such an end as his deedes deserued, which happened in the yeere of our Lord 98. in the fiue and fortith of his age, and the fifteenth of his raigne, leauing no sonne to succeede him: for although that in his fathers time, hee had a sonne by his lawfull wife, named DOMICILLA, that sonne died being a childe. DOMITIANVS was a man tall of stature, and in his youth of a good constitution, and pleasing countenance, great eyes, and somewhat redde: but comming to age, he lost his proportion and good grace, by reason of a long sickne, so as his legges became little and slender, and afterwards hee had a great gorcbelly, and a very bald head. His death was taken in Rome in diuers manners, for it grieued the Pretorian souldiers very much: so as if that daie they had had any Captaine that would haue but made the motion, they would haue slaine all the conspirators. The common people took it indifferently, shewing neither ioy nor sorrow. The Senate was not onely well content therevvith, but conceiued exceeding ioy thereat: and assembling themselues that same day, they caused all his statues to be throvvne dovvne, and all the inscriptions and memorials of him to cancelled and defaced.

THE LIFE OF COCCEIVS NERVA, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THIRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

HIs worthie Emperour was borne in the Citie of Narnia: it is not certainly knowne whether hee were an Italian, or of some other Nation, yet all agree that he was of a Noble house: hee was aduanced to the imperiall dignitie being old, and in the beginning of his raigne he had newes (though false) that Domitian was not dead, which much troubled him. He recalled the Christians from banishment, eased the oppressions of the citie, and made the children of poore parents to be bred vp at the publike charge: and to be briefe, did many good and vertuous deedes. There was neuer but one conspiracy against him, which had ill successe: the conspirators in his time were contumeliously slaine, which slew Domitian, though against his will: Hee adopted Traiane for his sonne, hauing none of his owne, to whom hee might commit the charge of the Empire. He held the Empire thirteene moneths onely, and dyed of choler, taken against a Senator, whose name was Regulus, which choler cast him into such a sweat that he died therof, and the same day that he departed out of this life, there was a great eclipse of the Sunne.

HE death of the Emperour DOMITIAN was not onely profitable for the Empire, being freed and deliuered from his crueltie and tyrannie, but for that it gaue meanes to NERVA to succeede him: and that afterwards TRAIAN and ADRIAN should raigne, who were most excellent Emperours, and honored and enlarged the Empire. And although that NERVA raigned but a while, yet hee did many good things: but the best that he did was, in that hee made TRAIAN his successour, as when time serueth, shall be declared. The death of DOMITIAN, as I haue said, did not grieue nor ioy the Roman people, but pleased the Senate exceedingly: who hauing commanded the remembrance of him to be cancelled, they presently tooke order to giue him a successour, before that any one should be chosen sen by the armie. COCCEIVS NERVA, being at that time for his many vertues, wisdome, experience, and age, a man of the greatest reputation and authoritie in Rome, was by the Senate chosen Emperour, hauing beene fauoured and assisted therein by PETRONIVS SECVNDVS, Captaine of the Pretorian Cohorts, & PARTHENIVS, who was one of those which killed DOMITIAN. This NERVA was of a noble family, borne in the citie of Narnia in the prouince of Vmbria in Italie, his fathers name was also NERVA. Saint ISIDORE onely saith, that he was borne in Spaine, I know no ground for it, neither haue I read it in any other auncient authour. Being receiued in the Senate and accepted to the Empire, vpon a sodaine without knowing who was the author, it was told him that DOMITIAN was liuing, and that the report of his death was vntrue. This newes did so much trouble NERVA, that all the colour went out of his face: and being vnable to speake, he had much a doe to stand vpon his feete, vntill that PARTHENIVS did encourage him, assuring him of the trueth. Whereupon he came againe to himselfe, and set a good countenance vpon the matter: presently they all came to him to doe him reuerence, and to receiue him for their Lord and Emperour, shewing great ioy, in hope of good successe. Onely ARRIVS ANTONIVS, who was a very wise and iust man and had bin his familiar friend, spake vnto him in a more strange manner then any of the rest: therefore I will relate it. Truely NERVA, in that thou art aduanced to this high degree, I will attribute the benefit and happinesse thereof vnto the Senate and people of Rome, and generally to the whole Empire (for such hath beene their good fortune) but not vnto thee. For thou hauing escaped with such honor and reputation by meanes of thy vertue, and wisedome, from the injurie of those wicked Princes past, art now made subject to infinite troubles and daungers; and aboue all, to the infamie and hatred of thy enemies, and as much or more of thy friends: for they will presume that they haue deserued all fauour, in respect of the ancient friendship which they held with thee; and if thou shalt deny them anie thing they shall aske, although it be neuer so vnjust, they will become greater and more cruell enemies vnto thee, then those which openly shew themselues to bee such. Now, as the solemnities and accustomed ceremonies for the new Emperour were ended, in the beginning of his Empyre hee began to doe most noble and excellent workes, whereof in summe wee will make a breefe relation, without distinction of time, seeing his Empire was so short, as in a manner not to be diuided. And one of the best and first was, in releasing from banishment all the Christians, which from Rome and other Cities were banished in the time of the Emperour DOMITIAN, and to permit and give liberty to every man to hould what faith and religion he would: and in this time (according to EVSEBIVS, and other Catholike historiographers) Saint IOHN the Euangelist came from the Ile of Pathmos (whither hee was banished) to the citie of Ephesus in Asia. The like humanitie did NERVA vse in all other matters: First hee released and discharged all the cities of the Empire from the new impositions, which VESPASIAN and DOMITIAN had laid upon them. And to many which by DOMITIANVS were unjustly dispossessed of their goods, hee commanded their possessors to be restored to all their moueables, which could bee found in the imperial palaces. And he not onely shewed himselfe liberal to those which were oppressed: but to all poore men which had sonnes, hee made them to bee bred up at his charges. Hee made also a distribution among all the people of Rome in greater measure then was usually done by any others. And to some poore Citizens of Rome which he knew had no wealth, hee made certaine possessions, which hee bought for that purpose, to be divided among them. And aboue all he did great fauours, and bestowed great gifts upon those which had bin his friends and allied unto him: and his liberalitie was so great, as DION writeth, that in the beginning and first comming to the Empire, hee was constrayned by necessity to sell his gold and silver plate, and other moueables of his house, to performe those his fauours and good deeds. And in this manner hee did many deeds of charitie and pietie; for it is written for certaine, that hee sware that no Senatour of Rome should by his commandement be put to death, which hee afterwards performed, although there were those which deserued the contrary. He also forbad many slanders and accusations used in those times; desiring, all men should live contented and at liberty.

Although that NERVA was so good a man (as we haue said) and vsed so milde a kinde of gouernment, so as there was nothing in him to be reproued; yet there wanted not some which murmured against him, as wicked men vse to doe against the good, alleaging that so great humilitie and mildnesse in a Prince was not profitable: so as FRONTO a principall man in Rome presumed to say openly, that it was an euil thing to haue such an one for Emperor, which would suffer no man to doe any thing that he desired; but it was a worse matter to haue such an one vnder vnder whom euery man might doe what hee listed. When NERVA was aduertised thereof, he was not angry, but forbad some things, which had giuen him cause to say so: and he desired so much to gouerne vprightly, as he did nothing of his owne head; but had alwayes about him, and sent for wise and good men, such as were of the greatest experience in Rome; by whose counsell hee provided, ordained & dispatched all matters. He also made during the small time of his Empire some very good lawes & ordinances; among which, he sharpely forbad an abuse of those times, which was, to geld men & to make them Eunuches. He also forbad that any man should marry his neece, or brothers daughter; and many other things which wanted reformation. To conclude, this Emperor had in his short time al those parts a good prince ought to have; and so cleere a conscience, that he oftentimes said, he remembred not to have done any thing (albeit he gaue ouer the Empire) why he should not liue secure, and without feare of any body. And, though all this was true, (as to the wicked, the yoke & sceptre of the just is a heavie burthē, and Rome had then got such a custome, that it could neither indure an evill Emperor, nor obey him that was good) yet there wanted not some which practised his death, and conspired against him: the motor & head therof was CRASSVS CALPHVRNIVS; but it pleased God that it tooke no effect, but was reuealed to the good Emperor; who without any rigor or bloodshed was freed therof, contenting himselfe only (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS writeth) with the banishment of those which were culpable, though the senate would haue inflicted a more rigorous punishmēt.

All these things being passed (as I haue said) and all things succeeding well and prosperously both in Rome, and all the Prouinces subject thereto, it hapned that ELIANVS CASPERIVS, who at that time was Prefect & Captain of the Pretorian Cohorts, incited the souldiers to reuenge the death of the Emperor DOMITIAN, & to put all those to death which had bin confederates therein; which they determined to put in execution, though NERVA gaue them no leave. This motion was sodaine, & NERVA was much troubled, & would haue hindred it, and haue defended those from whose hands he receiued the Empire, or haue died in the quarrel, and so he said & published openly: but the matter came to such issue, as the old Emperor was not able to resist or prevent it: & so PARTHENIVS & PETRONIVS were slain, & all those which CASPERIVS would require or nominate of those which were culpable. With this contempt NERVA was so grieved & offended, that he was very sorrowful he could not punish it as the case required; for by reason of his old age & infirmities he was not regarded by the souldiers. Wherfore to redresse the present, & prouide for that to come, he determined to adopt & make TRAIAN his successor, who was then Captain & Governour in the neather Germanie, & was at that time in the city of Colen; which charg he had executed with great honor & fame, & was the most excellent man then liuing, as well in peace as war: to whom he was no way allied, being a Spaniare, & a stranger to Rome & Italy. And although NERVA wanted not allies & kinsmen, yet hee chose TRAIAN, having more respect to the publike good, then to his owne house & posterity: wherin how justly he made his choise, this history wil hereafter manifest. Having put this his determination in executiō, & the accustomed solemnities performed, & adopted him in the Capitol, & made him CÆSAR in the Senate, he presently sent him Ambassadors with the Ensignes & Armes of the Empire, & they inuested him in the Empyre: & herewith he sent him a verse in latine, wherein he briefly exhorted him to come & succour him. The adoption of TRAIAN was so great a bridle to the mutinies which were feared, as all remained still & obedient. But it pleased not God that NERVA should long enjoy his good resolution: for as SEXTVS AVRELIVS writeth, hee liued onely three months after: in which time they write not that there passed any notable matter, neither is it understood by the historics that TRAIAN came to Rome before his death, which happened (in a manner) sodainely, through anger and displeasure which he conceiued against a Senator, whose name was REGVLVS: for as hee was old and feeble, hee gaue a great shout, and was taken with so great a sweat, that being unable to endure it, he died thereof. The same day there was a great Eclipse of the Sunne, which might be (in part) cause of his death; which was in the 100 yeer of CHRIST. He raigned 1 yeer, 4 months and odde daies; according to SEXTVS AVRELIVS, EVTROPIVS, and BEDA. About the time of his age there is some difference among Authors: for, some say, hee was 71 yeers old; others, 76. But as it imports little, so I mean not to spend much time about contrarieties of so small moment: and heerin I hold decorum with my curious Reader, to the end he condemn me not of negligence, if he finde me to differ from that which he shall reade elsewhere.

THE LIFE OF TRAIAN, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND FOVRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter the good Nerua succeeded a better Traian, born (as is said) in the citie of Italica neere to Seuil: yet some say that he was borne elsewhere, whose fathers name was Traian; and his mothers, Plotina. He was aduanced to the Empire with the good liking of all men, for that his goodnes, clemency, liberalitie, and equitie towards all men was publikely knowne; which vertues he lost not when he was Emperour, but rather seemed to haue increased the same: neither did he omit them, although he were neuer so much busied in matters of importance concerning the warres, or standing for the recreation of his minde, to behold feasts and sports. The first action he vndertook, being Emperour, was against the King of Dacia rebelling the second time: and he likewise persecuted the Christians, but afterwards he mitigated the persecution, which was the third that the Church suffered, then daily greatly increasing. He also subdued Armenia. In his time there was a very great earthquake, which was in a manner generall, but it did most harme in Antioch, where he then was. After this hee made very great voyages. In his time the Iewes rebelled, whom when he had tamed, he returned to Rome, where there was a wonderfull triumph prepared for him: but being ouerburthened with age, and infirmities, he died in the citie of Selencia, to the vniuersall sorrow and griefe of the whole world. He liued 64. yeeres; and being dead and burnt, his ashes were carried to Rome, and set vpon the top of a pillar, which is to this day to be seene in Rome, which was a wonderfull peece of worke, and truely worthy of so great an Emperour, who was a no lesse father to the countrey then to all vertues and vertuous men.

AFter the wise and good Emperour NERVA, succeeded TRAIAN, as he had ordained in his life time; who was the flower of all the heathen Emperours, and in his time was the Romane Empire at the greatest height: for neuer, either before or after, was it so great, so much feared or esteemed. The valour, vertues and excellencies of TRAIAN were so many & so great, that as SEXTVS AVRELIVS affimeth, the best writers of those times were hardlie able to expresse and declare the same. For although that I would exceede in the historie of this excellent Prince, for the loue of my countrey, of whence I might say that TRAIAN was, (as presentlie shall appeare) yet I could not doe it according to my desire and his deserts, for the breuitie of those authors which we haue at this day which wrote of him: wherefore I hold it for a better course to obserue the stile and forme alreadie begun, then by breaking it, to be notwithstanding too briefe and defectiue. I say then that TRAIAN was by nature and birth a Spaniard, whereof there is no doubt: for so do all auncient true authors affirme. EVTROPIVS in the life of him, and EVSEBIVS in his Chronicle, say, that he was borne in the towne of Italica, which is subiect and neere to Seuil: the which is also affirmed by SEXTVS AVRELIVS, although he name it not; and ANTONY LEBRISHA, whom we may alleage among the auncient authors, calleth Italica TRAIANS countrey: wherefore I cannot coniecture by what authoritie he did it, which wrote that TRAIAN was borne in Cales. This towne of Italica (according to PLINIE in his third booke) was in that time in subiection, and within the iurisdiction of Seuil: and ANTONY in his perambulation saith, that it was sixteene miles from thence: the same in a manner is gathered thered by PTOLOMIE his geographie, and that it lay Northwest from Seuil: but at what time it was ruinated, or where about it was, I could neuer certainely vnderstand: so as Seuil may glorie and vaunt it selfe to be TRAIAN his countrey: for although that he were not borne in it, yet he was borne in a place subiect and neere vnto it. TRAIAN was also of noble bloud and linage, although not very famous for any great dignities. His fathers name was also TRAIAN. When he came to the Empire, he was 42. yeares old, but not fullie compleate, and married to a woman of great account, whose name was PLOTINA. For the certaine knowledge they had in Rome of his goodnes and valour, he was by generall consent ioyfullie receiued and obeyed: and he presently beganne to put his great vertues in practice, shewing himselfe both in word and deed, good, affable, milde, mercifull, very wise, and a louer of truth and equitie, and of all other vertues; wherein he perseuered vntill the end: it shall not be amisse if I recite part thereof in the beginning, seeing that all historiographers which write of him do the like.

TRAIAN, taking vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, first endeuoured to reforme the lawes, and to cause them to be obserued, and that equitie and iustice should be vsed in all things. In publike charges and offices he tooke care to preferre noble and vertuous men; and such as were not so, he reformed and reclaimed with gentlenes and clemencie, and not with rigour and extremitie. He did so moderate and represse his wrath and choler, as he was neuer knowne to be ouercome therewith; and was most abstinent from other mens goods, and free from couetousnes. His liberalitie and bountie did exceede, bestowing benefits and fauours vpon all men, greatly relieuing the poore and needie, imitating and excelling his adopted father NERVA: Hee bestowed much cost and took great care for the bringing vp & instructing of poore mens children in Rome and in all Italy. He was a great builder of publike and necessarie Edifices; and also made an infinite number of bridges, gates and temples, and repaired high waies & causeies; as yet is to be seene in many places in Spaine; wherof one (as saith S. ISIDORE) is the bridge at Alcantara. In all his buildings hee neuer made benefit of any mans goods or labour; as some of his predecessors had done. He was to the multitude and common people milde and courteous, and the principal personages he honoured and entertained with loue and familiaritie; and chiefly those which deserued it, he admitted to priuate conuersation: whereof being vpon a time reproued, he answered, that he desired to be such an Emperour towards his subiects, as he would wish they should be to him, if he were not so. In Arts and Sciences he was not very learned, by reason of his great affaires but he neuer left to practice when hee had time; hauing for his master the excellent Philosopher and Historiographer PLVTARCH, whom, and others for their excellent wits, he loued and honoured much, as IVVENAL testifieth, besides other writers.

Traian his good deedes.

Plutarch was Traians maister.

To conclude, this Prince had all the good parts and conditions which an excellent King ought to haue: in peace he was vpright and iust, and in warre (whereto he was so affected as hereafter shall be declared) he was valiant; and in both the one and the other very wise and prudent. And for that wee will not conceale the truth, of two vices and passions he was noted, and accused: the one was, that he did eate and drinke much, and that very sumptuously; and the other, that he was much giuen to the vice of the flesh: the cause whereof was the want of faith, together with his great power and libertie; but it was neuer knowne that wine ouercame his wits, or that by meanes thereof he committed ought that might seeme vnfit; neither through the other passion, that he euer vsed violence, or forced any woman, or offended any.

With these conditions he began his raigne and Empire, gouerning it most happily for some space. As he was a most excellent and valiant Captaine, and addicted to the wars, desirous of honour and fame aboue all his predecessors, he resolued to extend and enlarge the bounds of the Empire by armes. His first enterprise was against the King and inhabitants of the prouince of Dacia, a very great and spacious countrey; wherein are now included Walacia, and Transiluania, and other prouinces, taking the occasion for the warres and spoiles which that nation had done to the Romane Empire, in the time of the Emperour DOMITIAN. TRAIAN went to this warre with an exceeding great Army, and the King of Dacia, named DECEVALVS, had leuied for his defence all his force and power, being very great: so as this war was very cruel. But the King of Dacia, being no other way able to defend himselfe, determined to come to a battaile (as he did) wherein TRAIANE had the victorie, with exceeding great losse to his enemies, and not a little to the Romanes, for the battaile was very cruell and bloudie. This victorie being obtained, and TRAIAN following the chase of his enemies, he pursued them so hard, that DECEVALVS, being in despaire, sent to him, humbly desiring peace, offering to accept any conditions conditions he should prescribe. And TRAIAN (who took as great glory in pardoning the humble and meeke, as in taming and subduing the proud and hautie) notwithstanding that hee had taken almost all his countrie, was contented to admit him to his grace and fauour; sending certaine conditions to be performed: which were, that he should presently deliuer vp all his instruments and engines of warre, and the engineirs and masters thereof, together with all fugitiues that were within his dominion, which were Romans, or their confederats, and ranne to the enemy. And that out of all the Castles and fortresses within his dominions, hee should withdraw the garrisons, and should throw downe such as should be appointed: and before all these things, that he should surrender certain lands which he held within the bounds of the Empire; and that he should euer hold for friends and enemies, those which the Senate of Rome held for such.

These articles and conditions the King of Dacia accepted and promised to accomplish, more through necessitie then for any good will; and hauing sworne to obserue them, he came to the Campe to the Emperor; where prostrating himselfe vpon the earth before him, he confessed himselfe to be ouercome, and to be his vassall. This solemnity being ended, and other things done which were expedient, TRAIAN returned victorious to Rome, where hee entred in triumph, as saith EVSEBIVS hauing raigned two yeeres, and brought with him the Ambassadors of the King of Dacia, to whom was giuen audience in the Senate; and the peace, which TRAIAN had granted, was there confirmed. And he for his victorie was called Dacicus, for that he had subdued the countrie of Dacia, as the Romans in former time had vsually done to some other excellent Captaines.

Traian came into Rome in triumph.

When TRAIAN had ordered all things in the prouince of Dacia in this maner, for ioy & honor of this victorie, and to please the Roman people, he made all manner of sports and games, which of custome were wont to be obserued by the Emperors (as is aboue said) adding thereto such other things as he thought good. But these games and sports did not withdraw him from doing iustice, neither from care of the gouernment: but rather so long as they lasted, he spent the greatest part of his time in dispatching of busines, and doing iustice, going himselfe in person to the Tribunal and publike audience, to iudge and determine many causes: which he did most iustly and wisely. Passing sometime in good quiet, rest, and generall peace, the King of Dacia being as vnable to endure subiection and seruitude, as his predecessors, began some combustions and alterations; first secretly, and afterwards publikely: repayring and fortifying his Castles, prouiding armes and engines, and leuying his neighbour forces against the Empire: whereof as soone as TRAIAN and the Senate had intelligence, he was adiudged the second time, an enemy to the Empire. And so with an equall armie, but much more incensed then formerly, TRAIAN went this second time to the warres in person: in which the King of Dacia taking warning by that which was past, refused to come to battaile, and vsed policies, stratagems and trecheries against TRAIAN; which were such and so many, as the Emperor was in danger to haue been either slaine or taken: and by trecherie (vpon a safe conduct) they took a singular good Captaine and a great fauorite of the Emperors called LONGINVS. The King of Dacia hauing so good a pawne, sent to TRAIAN to entreate a pardon, and to treate of peace, threatning that except he might obtaine the same, he would put the said LONGINVS to death. Whereto TRAIAN gaue such an answere, as the King vnderstood, that he preferred his honour and the publike good before any particular perill, and prosecuted the warres by all waies and meanes possible: During the which, within a very short space he built a bridge ouer the riuer Danubius, beyond which (parting from Italy) lieth the countrie of Dacia, which was one of the most stately bridges that euer was made in the world, all of squared stone of marueilous beautie. This bridge contained twentie Arches, each of which was one hundred and fiftie foote high, besides the foundation, and sixtie foote broad; the one Arch was distant from the other one hundred and sixtie foote, which was the compasse of the Arches of the bridge: which truely was a wonderfull worke, as well for the greatnesse thereof, as for the many difficulties, and the short space wherein it was made: Which among other things is an argument of the wealth and greatnesse of the Romane Emperours. Which bridge this Emperour made, to hold a free passage for his Armies to passe the riuer Danubius, against those barbarous nations: And ADRIAN his successor being of a contrarie opinion, to bereaue the barbarous of the like passage (as some say) commanded it to be broken. This bridge being finished, TRAIAN continuing the warre, did many things, wherein he shewed himselfe to be a valiant and excellent Captaine: and so oppressed the enemie (notwithstanding that that the countrie was great, and the people very fierce and hardie) that he conquered and subdued it all, and put their King DECEVALVS to such a straight, that to escape taking, being in great danger thereof, he slew himselfe; and his head was caried to Rome, and the countrie of Dacia was made subiect and tributarie to the Romane Empire: the greatest part whereof at this time (for our sinnes) is subiect to the Turke. After this, taking such order for all things in those parts as was requisite, TRAIAN came to Rome with great honour, bringing with him an exceeding great summe of money and wealth taken from that King and countrie, being now (as EVSEBIVS testifieth) the fift yeere of his raigne. And his name and bountie was so famous through the world, that vpon the way Ambassadours met him from the East Indies, and diuers other parts to sue for peace, and to acknowledge him for their Lord. Being come to Rome, hee entred in great triumph: and afterwards there were made great shewes and feasts for ioy of his Victorie and Returne; which did laste 120 daies, which were foure whole moneths: which being ended, he applied himselfe to the administration of iustice, and the tranquillitie of the Empire. Remaining in Rome busied in these exercises, hee made many bridges, causeies, and other publike edifices both within Italy and without. About this time there died a great friend and fauorite of his, whose name was SVRA LICINIVS, whose death he took heauily and honoured his memoriall with publike statues, which he commaunded to be erected to him, and other honors then vsed. This SVRA was so good a man, and TRAIAN reposed such trust in him, that being told one day for certaine, that SVRA meant to kill him, hee went that night to sup at his house; and commanding his guard to returne, remained there alone amongst SVRA his friends and companions, and commanded his Barber to shaue his beard with a rasor, which the Emperors then held for a custome, vntill the time of his successour ADRIAN, who wore his beard somewhat long: and hauing so much trusted and tried this SVRA LICINIVS, he returned to his Palace; and calling those vnto him which had told him thereof, he said to them, that he had made tryall of LICINIVS loyaltie, and that they should no more hold him in suspicion: and so he euer after loued him both aliue & dead, as I haue said.

The death of Sura Licinius lamented by Traian.

TRAIAN liuing in this prosperitie without blemish or disorder in any thing that might deserue reproofe, being deluded by the diuell, or some of his ministers, he resolued to persecute the Christians, and made edicts and decrees against them, commanding them to adore his Idols; so as an infinite number of them were put to death vpon that occasion. This was the third generall persecution of the Christians, wherof EVSEBIVS treating saith, that it was in the tenth yeere of his raigne, and so doth OROSIVS and other Christian authors. Which persecution TRAIAN commaunded afterwards to cease, as it appeareth by some histories, and by the Letters written by PLINIE to TRAIAN, and from TRAIAN to PLINIE, which are extant to this day: Wherein he commaunded, that if the Christians were not accused of any other crimes, they should be suffered to liue at libertie, and according to their lawes. In these and other things, and in doing iustice, TRAIAN, busied himselfe in Rome, vntill that moued with desire of fame and glorie, he resolued to make war against the King of Parthia, and against the King of Armenia, making this his occasion; that the King of Armenia had receiued the crown and ensignes of a King, from the hands of the King of Parthia (acknowledging him for his superior and soueraigne) and not from the Emperour of Rome, as he was bound to haue done, as appeareth by that which is already said. And hauing ordered his troupes, and made such prouision, as for so great an enterprise was requisite: he parted from Rome, with a very great army both by sea and land; and arriuing in Asia, he inuaded Armenia, where the fame of his coming was such, and there was so great a feare ouer all the Countrie, that but in very few places he found any resistance, aswell in Armenia as in countries adioyning. And the greatest part of the Kings, Nobles and Gouernors of the prouinces bordering thereupon, came peaceably to him, humbly confessing themselues to be his subiects, and him to be their soueraigne Lord, and bringing him many presents they made great shew of subiection. Among many other things of great price which they presented vnto him, there was brought him a horse, in greatnes, colour and shape, one of the most faire in the world: which being taught before hand, as soone as he came in the Emperours presence, kneeled downe vpon both his knees, and bowed downe his head to the earth; which although it were knowne to be artificiall, yet it made a very good shewe, and did greatly delight the beholders, being a thing rare and vnthought of.

Traian made warre against the Parthians.

A horse giuen to Traian.

TRAIAN hauing in short time subdued Armenia, and gotten the King thereof into his power, PARTAMITASIRES by name, who had submitted himself, he seised all into his hand.

And so (as EVTROPIVS and SEXTVS RVFVS testifie) the countrie of Armenia was made a tributary prouince, and at that time he gratified and gaue gifts and rewards to those Kings and Tetrarchs, which had serued him in those wars, and to many others. And others he condemned in great sums of money, according as each one had deserued. And setting all things in good order, leauing sufficient garrisons to defend the same, he marched forward with his Armie, conquering the dominions of the King of Parthia, and particularly entred into the fertile country of Mesopotamia, and took the citie of Nisibe, and other places there, and made that prouince, like Armenia, tributary and subiect to the Empire; the King of Parthia being no way able to hinder the same, therein happening many skirmishes, encounters, assaults of cities, and feates of arms, TRAIAN shewing himselfe in all things an excellent Captain, as well in trauailes and dangers, as in directing his armie, in lodging it, in marshalling his men, and marching with them according to militarie gouernment and discipline. For whom the Senate (being aduertised of his great victories and good successe) commanded great sacrifices to be made, after the manner of the Gentiles; and sent him new titles and names, signifying his victories, calling him Optimus, Armeniacus, Parthicus, and other titles, for the conquest of Armenia, and other countries of the Parthians. Hauing had in all things good successe, encreasing and enlarging the Romane Empire, desiring, for some respects, to repose himselfe for some fewe dayes, hee came to passe the winter in the Prouince of Soria; where dispersing his Armie in those marches, he lodged himselfe in the Citie of Antioch, whither came Ambassadours from many parts of the East: And being there in great prosperitie and at rest, with a full determination to returne to the wars as afterwards he did, the whol citie being full of his Court, and of Ambassadors and Princes which came to see him, and to follow their suits vnto him, there happened an earth-quake which was in a manner generall, which in that citie and in a great part of Asia (but chiefly in those quarters) was the greatest that euer was seen or heard of, which began after this manner. On the 22 of October there did rise so furious and violent a winde, as it tare and turned vp trees, made the birds fall to the earth, vncouered the roofes, and made the houses shake: then followed lightning and thunder, in such abundance, as being yet night, it seemed noone day; after which there fell from heauen such fearefull thunderbolts, as with their violence they brake downe stately buildings, and slue many men, so as it seemed the world had been set on fire, and that the earth had opened. The Sea was also wonderfully troubled; after all which there was such a violent heate, as, not able to endure it, men stript themselues, and hid them vnder ground; and the skie was so darke, and the dust so great, as one could not see another, but shocking together fell downe dead: But he that will know the wonders which passed therein, let him reade DION, and COCCEIVS in the life of TRAIAN; for many cities were ruinated, much people perished; many mountains and hils sunke and became plaine; many riuers were dried vp; and many fountaines and waters sprang where neuer had been any before. And in the Citie of Antioch, almost all the houses and buildings thereof fell to the ground; and the Emperour TRAIAN, escaped by flight, and was driuen to leape out at a window into the fields, seeing that all his palaces fell downe: in which fieldes hee remained many dayes in Tents, vntill the earth-quake was past; so great feare possessed him for that which was already happened. This misfortune being past, and this Citie and others, which endured the like calamitie, being repaired by TRAIAN, and sommer being come, gathering together all his forces, he parted from Antioch to proceede in the warre which he had begun, directing his iourney towards the East, to make a conquest of Assyria and Chaldea, with the great Citie of Babylon, head of the ancient monarchy of the Assyrians. And being to passe the riuer Euphrates, at a great turning which it maketh, he vnderwent many difficulties and dangers; for the Parthians with all their whole power endeuoured to stoppe his passage: But TRAIAN knew so well how to vse such industrie, and to proceede so warily, as making boates and bringing them in carts, from the mountaines neerest at hand, he made a bridge, and passed his Armie in despite of his enemies, although not without great slaughter and daunger to both parts: And hauing passed the riuer, he marched forwards, conquering Cities and Castles on euery side, and among other the great Citie of Arbela in Assyria, which MARCELLINVS calleth Gandabele, in whose fields ALEXANDER the Great, ouerthrew King DARIVS. And from thence he went and took other countries, wherein neuer had any Romane ensignes been displayed: And from thence without finding any that durst to giue him battaile in his march, he came to the famous Citie of Babylon, of whose greatnesse and power we read maruels; and taking it by force of armes, he did the like by all the borders: and from thence he marched by by land to the riuer Tigris, and assaulted and took by force the great citie of Thesiphonte, which is in Persia, and other townes in those parts. But in what manner TRAIAN took this Citie, and what happened in the many assaults and battailes giuen, and how long this warre continued, we finde it not written: for those authors which are come to our hands treate thereof succinctly; and the bookes of his life and famous exploites which FLAVIVS MARCELLVS and AVRELIVS VERVS wrote at large and copiously, are perished, with other notable works, which time hath consumed and wasted; by which meanes the acts of this Emperor are vnknowne. Neither is he compared with ALEXANDER the Great, or the greatest captaines of the world; notwithstanding that he was no lesse, considering the countries, the Seas, and Nations, which he trauelled, tamed and subdued, with his armie, his minde, his wisedome and bountie.

TRAIAN hauing made himselfe Lord of all those Countries, both on this side, and beyond the riuers Tigris and Euphrates, to wit, Syria, Babylon, Chaldea, and other countries and prouinces; thereto adioyning; DION writeth that he went downe the riuer Tigris, towards the Persian Sea, to subdue a mightie King, named ATHABILVS, who liued in an Iland (which that riuer maketh, diuiding it selfe into two arms) & comming to that countrie, the King and inhabitants of those countries not daring to make any resistance, yeelded all those places into his hands. But here he was in the greatest trouble and danger of all others: for, winter comming on, there fell so much raine, and there were such tempests, and the riuer Tigris made such inundations, as hee was in danger to haue lost the greatest part of his armie. After which, these authors affirme, that he rigged vp a great fleete, wherewith sayling along the Persian Sea, he came into the maine Ocean, conquering euen to the Indies, and subduing them to the Roman Empire: and finding by chance certain Merchants ships which sailed to the Indies, on this side the riuer Ganges, they write, that he informed himselfe thereof, and discoursed with such as were in those ships of all matters concerning those parts. And he sometimes said, that had it pleased God that hee had been a little yonger, and had more strength & health, he would not haue staied vntil that he had attained to the vttermost and most remote ends of the world: and that he accounted ALEXANDER the Great for very happy, in that he began to raigne when he was but yong; yet he purposed to passe further then he had done. And so he wrote from those Seas to the Senat of Rome, and sent them the relation and names of all the Nations which he had conquered and subdued; the number whereof was so great, as they could hardly be reckoned and knowne. Vpon which newes, there were made in Rome great ioys, new sacrifices, and many other things to his honor; among which was a most sumptuous Arch. But this attempt and enterprise of the Indies prospered not with TRAIAN, according to his expectation: for as those countries, which he left behinde him in the East, were newly conquered; while as he continued his Nauigation and conquest by Sea, many of those countries reuolted, and thrust out the Roman garrisons which were left in them. Besides this (wherof he was aduertised) he found not in those coasts and countries where he came, such fertilitie and abundance of victuals as he expected; neither were they answerable to the reports of writers, which fabled thereof: for he found there great scarcitie and want of many necessaries, and the enterprise seemed vnworthy of so great a Prince: for which causes, and for that that he was now old and vnwieldie, he resolued to return with his fleete to the place from whence he came.

Traian made warre in Persia and the Indies.

TRAIAN returning in this manner by the Persian gulfe, and taking land neere to the riuer Tigris, he speedily took order for the punishing of those which reuolted, and the recouerie of those countries which had rebelled, whither he sent two Captaines called LVCIVS and MAXIMVS, with two good armies, which in the beginning prospered ill; for MAXIMVS in a battaile against the Parthians was ouerthrowne and slaine: but LVCIVS afterwards reinforcing and relieuing his armie, obtained some victories against the enemie, wherein he repaired the losses receiued, and recouered againe by force of armes the citie of Nisibe in Mesopotamia, and others which had rebelled, and did the like by the citie of Edessa in the same prouince, which he set on fire and wholly ruined. While as LVCIVS was busie about these things, TRAIAN his other Captaines and Lieutenants, named EVRICIVS and CLARIVS, made warre in other parts against such as had reuolted, and took by force the citie of Seleucia, which standeth vpon the riuer Tigris, and other cities which the Parthians had recouered in those quarters: so as in short space TRAIAN not only recouered all those countries which had rebelled, but also conquered many other cities and prouinces: so as he was Lord of the greatest and best parts of Asia. His wisedome and valour was so great, that during all the time that hee followed these warres and conquests, so remote and farre from Rome, yet there was not any tumult or disorder in the Citie.

But this sage and wise Emperour seeing himselfe now old and tired, and knowing how great the Romane Empire was, and that it seemed impossible (as indeed it was true) well to gouerne a state so large and great, chiefly those prouinces which hee had conquered from the Parthians, who were so hard to be tamed and kept vnder; he resolued to settle a King in Parthia and Persia of his choosing, and in some other countries which hee had taken from the Parthians, which King should rule and gouerne the same, as before they were ruled, yet as a King which should be subiect and a vassall to the Romane Empire; reseruing to himselfe the supreame iurisdiction and soueraigntie. And with this resolution he came to the great citie of Thesiponte, which is in Persia: and calling thither the principall men of the Parthians, hee conferred with them concerning the making them a King of their owne stocke and nation; they giuing him great securitie to serue and obey the Romane Empire. This being concluded, he placed and established, in the royall throne with great solemnitie, a great man of the royall house of the Parthians, whose name was PARTHENASPATES. And afterwards (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS and EVTROPIVS record) he did the like in the prouince of Albania in Asia, neere to the Caspian Sea, seating there a King to gouerne the same: and placing gouernours and Presidents in the other prouinces, he enlarged and extended the bounds & limits of the Romane Empire beyond the riuer Tigris, where before his time the name of Romane had scarcely been heard of. And hauing ended all things in good sort in the East, with great glorie and honour (for no place could defend it selfe against him, sauing one little citie in Arabia deserta, which the Agarenes had taken, which could not long be besieged for the great sterilitie and want of water in all the fields and marches thereabout) hee resolued to direct his iourney towards Italy, and so to Rome, with greater honour and triumph, then any of his predecessors had euer obtained.

Traian in Persia.

While as TRAIAN made prouision for his iourney towards Italy, it happened that the Iewes which inhabited the prouince of Cyrene, which is in Africa, to the East of Syrtis Magna, conspired and rebelled against the Romanes and Greekes which liued in that prouince, and slew most of them. The like did those Iewes which dwelled in Egypt, and both the one and the other committed such cruelties, as were neuer seene or heard of: So as PAVLVS OROSIVS writeth, that they left the land in a manner dispeopled; and that Nation was euer so readie and apt to rebell; as those Iewes which dwelt in the Ile of Cyprus, knowing what had passed in the prouince of Cyrene, and in Egypt, rebelled also, and committed greater cruelties and excesse, then the others had done: so as DION saith (although it seemeth incredible) that there were slaine by them 200000. persons, which inhabited that Iland. Which is confirmed and made credible by that which EVSEBIVS and PAVLVS OROSIVS report, who affirme, that they slew all those which dwelt in the citie of Salamina, which is in that Iland: vpon which occasion there was afterwards an Imperiall law made, that no Iew vpon paine of death should come within the Ile of Cyprus, vpon what occasion soeuer. This law was afterwards so seuerly executed, that if any of them came thither, although through mischance or fowle-weather at sea, they were presently put to death.

The Iewes rebelled against the Romanes.

The cruelties of the Iewes.

When the Emperour TRAIAN vnderstood of this great rebellion and cruelties (being vpon his way toward Italie) as a iust prince willing and desiring to giue condigne punishment, according to the qualitie of the crime, he sent Captaines with sufficient troupes of souldiers into diuers parts, to put to death all the Iewes they should finde in those countries before named, or in any other where soeuer: which they affirme, was the greatest execution and punishment that euer was done in the world, God permitting the same for their stubbornesse, and obstinacy. This great slaughter & punishment being executed, taking the best order that might be for matters in Asia, the good Emperour began his iourney towards Italie, leauing his Nephew AELIVS ADRIANVS, who was afterward Emperor, for General of the Armies in the East, and so continued his iourney with infinite honour and ioy; there being in Rome the greatest triumph and the most solemne reception prepared for him, that had euer beene made. Comming into the prouince of Cilicia, which is in Asia the lesse, as he was old and somewhat sickely, his disease increased vpon him in such sort, as staying in the citie of Seleucia, within few daies after, he died there, of a naturall sickne, although that some suspected that he was poisoned. And so ended this excellent Emperor, hauing raigned nineteene yeeres and a half, and liued sixtie and three, in the yeere of our Lord 119. leauing neither son nor daughter by his wife PLOTINA, with whom he was married; neither would he adopt or name anie one that should succeed him, which which hee did in some mens opinion (as SPARCIANVS writes) to imitate ALEXANDER the Great, whom he euer sought to excell in honour and renown. TRAIAN's ashes were afterwards brought to Rome, and set vpon the top of a Pillar, which he had commanded to bee erected in the market-place: which Pillar was of one whole piece, containing one hundreth and forty foot in height. This Prince subdued many Countries and Prouinces, and held the greater part of the world in subiection; or, to say better, was the greatest and mightiest Prince that euer was in the world, either before or after him; as he which is curious may finde by this our History. True it is, that discoursing indifferently touching valour in Armes, and many other parts, he was not to be paralleld in greatnes with IVLIVS CÆSAR. He gouerned the Empire with such authority and so much iustice, and his vertues were so many, as he therein excelled all those which had not the light of our faith: for, therein is no comparison. And this was held for a custome in Rome after him, that, when they poured out their blessing vpon their new-chosen Emperours, they would pray that he might be as fortunate as AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, and as good as TRAIAN; accounting him to haue attained to the height of all goodnes.

It is great pity To think that so excellent a man should be lost and damned, as doubtlesse hee was: for, hee not onely was an Idolater, and held not our Christian faith (without the which there is no saluation) neither did hee confesse or professe it; but, persecuted and oppressed the Christians. And some men, being moued more with pity and compassion, than with any wit or vnderstanding, fained a fable and jest; saying, that, through the praiers of S. GREGORY, TRAIAN's soule was released out of hell (from whence is no redemption) and carried to Paradise: whereof, besides that our faith doth controul it, there is no Historiographer either antient or modern, of any authority that euer I saw, that makes any mention thereof in their Treatises of TRAIAN, and of S. GREGORIE: whereby it is cleer, that those which maintain it bear false witnes both against heauen and hell. TRAIAN was of a bigge stature, of a swarth complexion, and had thin hair on his head and beard; and likewise had a hook nose, great broad shoulders, and long hands; and, aboue all, had a very louing aspect with his eyes. He was born the one and twentith day of May, in the second yeer of the Raign of the Emperor NERO.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS AELIVS ADRIANVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

After Trajan, Adrian was aduanced to the Empire, more through the policy of Trajans wife, than by the election of the people or the Senate, or for that Trajan had adopted him. Neuertheless, after he was preferred to the imperiall dignity, he gaue so good an account of himself, as Rome had no cause to repent for hauing made him her Lord. He made very great voiages; and in his person visited in a manner all the Roman Empire. He was very studious in all arts and sciences, and caused all such as were famous and excellent in any Art, to come to Rome. He happily ended all such warrs as he began; and was very seuere to the Christians. His many vertues were accompanied with many vices; neuertheless, he could so well dissemble the passions of his minde, as he seemed to contemn those things which he chiefly toued. He liued 62 yeers, and gouerned the Empire 12. In his old age he had so grieuous an infirmity, as he desired to dye, and intreated his familiars to kill him; who hauing not the heart to commit so brutish an act, he was finally aduised by his phisitions to abstaine from meat & drinke, so as following their counsell he hastened his death by hunger.

He death of the good Emperor TRAIAN was much lamented and grieuously taken through all the Empire; beeing for his bounty and goodnes much beloued of all the people and nations subiect to the Empire. And, as he neuer had any son, either naturall or adopted, that might succeed him, and seeing his Nephew ADRIAN for his vertues, great wisdome, and the affinity between them, was much beloued and esteemed; PLOTINA, the Empresse, wife to TRAIAN, who was with him at his deceasse, for the great loue she bare vnto ADRIAN, sought means to aduance him to the Empire. To bring which her deuice to passe, she agreed with ADRIAN (who already was a man of great power, and had been very familiar with TRAIAN, and was his countriman) and took such order, that his death was concealed vntill hee had sounded the good will of the Army which he led, and of such other great Personages as were in the Emperors Court; faining (after some Writers) that TRAIAN had adopted him for his sonne, shewing a counterfeit instrument or Writing to that effect. Finally, the matter was so cunningly handled, that it took such effect as they desired, and the Army presently sware obedience and did homage to ADRIAN; notwithstanding that he was absent, in the City of Antioch in Syria, where he was left (as is said) Generall. Who being aduertised heerof, and the Legions whereof he was Generall consenting thereto, he presently wrote to the Senate, entreating to be confirmed in the Empire. When the Senate had receiued his Letters, and vnderstood what passed, his request was easily granted, and so was he of all men obeyed and held for Emperor.

Adrian being in Antioch, was chosen Emperour.

ADRIAN was TRAIAN's Nephew, as some say, by his mother; and some say, by his father: it may be that he was his kinsman of both sides, and so both the one and other may say the truth. He was also a Spaniard both by linage and birth, and according to EVTROPIVS and EVSEBIVS, was borne in the same citie of Italica: yet SPARTIANVS inferreth that his father in Rome was called ADRIAN as He was, but was borne in Italica, and his mother DOMITIA PAVLINA, was also natiue of Spaine, and borne in the citie of Cales. He was married to SABINA TRAIANS sisters daughter (as DION writeth.) And was a tall man of stature, of a good constitution and countenance; and of a very cleane strength, which he much exercised. He is reckoned among the good and excellent Emperours; and with great reason, considering his many vertues and excellencies, his knowledge and wisedome wherewith he gouerned, and the peace and iustice wherein he maintained the Empire two and twentie yeeres, that he liued therein; whereof for that all authors write briefly, I also purpose to treat therof in summe, seeing I spent so much time in the last, so as except I vse more breuitie then hitherto I haue done, the volume of this my booke will growe to a greater proportion then I purposed, or is conuenient. Wherefore I will doe, as he which within a lymited time hath determined to trauell a long iourney, and hauing taken leasure in the beginning, deeming that trauelling in this maner, he shall not bee able to attaine to that place at the time appointed, hasteneth his way with greater speede, vntill that he know that he may come to his iourneis end before the time be expired: So will I do from henceforth. At the least when I am past ADRIAN, I purpose to proceede with greater expedition then heretofore, vntill I come so farre on my way, that I may safely diuide the processe of this historie, and hold the proportion which I haue determined, presuming rather to make this inequalitie in the stile, then to make a worke so tedious and wearisome.

Adrian nephew to Traian and a Spaniard.

I say then, that when-as the barbarous nations vnderstood that TRAIAN was dead, notwithstanding they also knew of the election of his Nephew ADRIAN; the Parthians chiefly, and other nations which were lately subdued, began to mutine and rebell: and there were also some alterations in Britanny, and in some other parts. All which, ADRIAN might easily haue pacified and subdued by force of Arms, and wanted neither courage nor means thereto: but he would not seek it by the extremity of warre and rigor. For, truely, albeit these two Princes were both very valiant and excellent Captains and Gouerners, yet heerin they did much differ: for, TRAIAN, being greedy of honour and fame, desired by conquests and wars to increase and inlarge the Empire; but ADRIA's care was To preserue the antient limits without any greater ambition, and rather he diminished a great part thereof: and so presently in the beginning of his Raign, to the end he might liue in peace, he left to the Parthians, and to other Princes ces of the East, all those Prouinces beyond the Riuer of Euphrates vnto the Indies which TRAIAN had conquered; nothing regarding Armenia, Media, Assyria, Persia, Mesopotamia, nor all the rest; and he set his bound and placed his Legions at the Riuer Euphrates. Some thought and also wrote, that he did it of purpose, enuying TRAIAN's honour: but I truely attribute it to that he held it for the better and most assured course. And hauing taken such order in the East (as is said) and left CATILLIVS SEVERVS for Gouernor of Syria, and pacified the troubles lately raised by the Iewes; he took his way by land towards Italy, and sent the ashes of TRAIAN by sea: and, coming neer to Rome, hee was aduertised that they had prepared a triumph for him in the same manner as it was prouided for his Vncle TRAIAN, for that hee was in the same wars and conquests with him. But he would not accept therof, cõmanding that the same triumph and entertainment should bee made and giuen to TRAIAN's Image; and so it was done; and he (as far as I haue read) was the onely man that euer triumphed after that hee was dead. And ADRIAN was receiued and obeyed with the greatest loue and applause that could be, and presently performed many parts of an excellent Prince, conformable to the course of his life past, and the hope conceiued of him for the time to com; so as all were glad and well satisfied with his gouernment, with his manners and conditions: and truely with great reason, for he deserued no lesse. And because that the graces and excellencies of this Emperour were in the highest degree, besides the vertues and wisdome wherewith hee was adorned, I hould it fit in this place to speak therof, to the end that they may serue for an example to other Princes; whereby they may make themselues the more respected by his imitation.

Adrian sent Traians ashes to Rome.

A triumph giuen to Traians statue after his death.

First, he was naturally enclined to learne all such sciences as apperteined to wit, and to the exercise both of mind and bodie, aswell in learning, as in the exercise of armes and other vertues, wherein he sought to excell all men. It is a wonderfull matter to consider how God endued this Prince with wit and vnderstanding, capable to comprehend whatsoeuer he desired, with skill, strength and abilitie in all exercises: whereby he grew very learned in both the tongues, Greek and Latine, and compiled excellentlie well, both in verse and in prose. He pleaded causes and exercised himselfe in the art Oratorie; and so much affected the stile & phrase of auncient times, that he preferred CATO before CICERO, ENNIVS before VIRGIL, and CELIVS before SALVST. He was as skilfull in other arts as herein: for he was a singular Mathematician, Arithmetician, Geometrician, and a great Astronomer, and took great delight in iudiciall Astrologie, and would giue his iudgement: so as SPARCIANVS writeth, that the first day of the yeere he would cast the reuolution of the whole, and foretold what would ensue, and did so by the same yeere wherein he died. Hee was very skilfull in Physick, and knew the vertues and properties of hearbs and stones. Hee was expert and very politick in warres and militarie discipline, and was very strong, able and skilfull in armes both on foot and horseback: And besides all this, he could play on instruments, and sing maruelouslie well. He coulde d raw and paint, aswell as the skilfulleſt maister workeman in that art. Finally, in all things he had so great skill, as any man could haue in any one thing particularly: wherein, besides his deepe vnderstanding, his exceeding memorie did much help him: for they affirme, that he forgat not any thing that he had either read or hard. He was of such capacitie (as SPARCIANVS writeth) that he would both endite, write, and confer of busines all at one instant, and had a singular grace & promptnes in vsing quick speeches and quips, either in earnest or in iest; and the like in answering vpon the sodain, if he were touch by any. Of his quick and sharp speeches which they write of him, I will recite one, as fitting this time, although it be none of the sharpest and subtilleſt of them, which was thus: A certaine Romane Knight came to intreate a fauour at his hands, who (according to his age) had a gray beard, and full of white haires: and failing of that which he desired, within few dayes after he came againe with a new petition to the same effect: But in the meane season (it seemeth that men were then as skilfull in painting as now they are) he had dyed his beard, and looked yong againe: which was noted by the Emperour; who to guird him therewith, answered to his request, I would be very glad to do you the pleasure which you require, but a few dayes past I denied it to your father who desired the same, wherefore it seemeth to me a matter vniust, to grant that to the sonne which I would not yeeld to the Father: and so the olde man departed with shame, and in this manner he vsed many such like iests. Besides all that is spoken of him, he was very strong, and able to endure any labour; and was so actiue of his body, as he ordinarily went the greatest part of his way on foote, and bare headed, in the sunne, in the raine and mists. He was much addicted to the chace, and was a great Hunter, and excellent therein: so as with his owne hands he killed Lions, Beares, wild Boares, and

and other most fierce Beasts; he was oftentimes in great danger, falling once vnawares from a rock; where he put one of his shoulders out of joint, and brake one of his legs, with some of his ribs. Finally, there was nothing wherein the Emperor ADRIAN was not excellent, and very able, and in all things presumed to excell the wisest; as truely he did in the most. And although hee were a great reprouer of Masters in all Arts, and did often put them to their shifts with his questions and arguments, yet he did much honour them, and bestowed many gifts and rewards vpon them; and had about him Philosophers, Astronomers, Poets, Rhetoricians, Grammarians, Musicians, Arithmeticians, Geometricians, and excellent Painters and Carvers: with all which he might compare, and the most of them he did farre excell; and did vse to say, that He had not forborn to learn any thing more than other men did, that might be needfull in peace or warre, either for an Emperour, or a man of any other condition whatsoeuer.

Being endued with these qualities aboue mentioned, he was not void of other vertues & gifts of the mind, which he shewed and put in practice during the time of his raigne, more, and better then before; although in the beginning he was noted of crueltie, for that some speciall men, by his commandement and permission, were put to death. There were also some vices and bad inclinations noted to be in him: but they all affirm he did suppresse and dissemble them, and was so much master of himself, as he easily masterd his naturall euill inclination; which well appeard in his manner of gouerning the Empire, and the good vsage of his subjects, bestowing fauors vpon all men; abating the tributes and subsidies through all the Empire; ministring justice with indifferency; doing all things by the aduice and counsell of the Senate, and of wise men which he kept about him, and caried with him whithersoeuer he went: for, he not only loued to be counselled, but also to be reproued and aduised. Hee entertained all men mildely and courteously: and although to the common sort he shewed greatnes and majesty, yet men of note he honoured much, and visited them in their sicknes, and inuited them, and went to them when they inuited him. And although he euer loued and procured peace, yet all his life-time he had exceeding great care of martiall discipline; punishing the liberty and vices of men of warre; reforming errors past, and prescribing rules for time to come. In this maner (as I haue said) he had liued when he was priuate, and followed the same course after he was Emperor.

Adrian taxed for cruelty.

Northern nations rose against the Empire.

ADRIAN hauing remained some space in Rome, gouerning the Empire in good form and order, many northern Nations rebelled against the Empire, to weet, the Alanes and Scythians of Europe; and the Sarmates, which are now the Inhabitants of Russia, Muscouia, and Poland, and other Countries thereto adjoyning; which, with intent to make war in the Empire, came down into the Prouinces of the vpper Missia (now called Seruia) and the lower Bulgaria, both which at this day are in subjection to the great Turk. Against which nations, the Emperor ADRIAN parted from Rome with a mighty Army: but, coming neer to those Prouinces where the enemies were, there were certain treaties of peace propounded; and ADRIAN, who was addicted thereto, granted the same: and, making his abode for some daies in those Quarters, hee returned to Rome, leauing MARCIVS TVRBO for Lieutenant and Gouernor of Pannonia and Dacia. In this journey ther was a certain conspiracy against him; which being discouerd, foure principall men which had been Consuls (being guilty thereof) were put to death: which execution the Emperor ADRIAN afterwards denied to haue been done by his will or consent. Being comn to Rome to purge himself of the infamy and enuy thereof, he made a great congiarie or distribution of money among the people, bestowing many graces and fauours vpon all men; and commanded also infinite games and sports to bee made, such as were accustomed in Rome; not forgetting (neuertheless) the execution of justice in his gouernment. Staying at this time a lesser space in Rome than at the first, he departed with a great Court and Army to visit France, and the Prouinces neer adioining; vpon the Cities whereof, hee bestowed many graces and fauours. And from thence he went to visit the Legions and Armies in Germanie; wherin hee set good order in many things concerning militarie discipline: and, hauing remained a while in those parts, hauing resolued to visit the whole Empire (as afterwards he did) he directed his iourney into Flanders, and from thence into Britanny; where hee reformed many things, and reconciled the Inhabitants, and the Romans which liued there; as well the garrisons, as the Inhabitants and Colonies. And, for their better quietnes and security, SPARCIANVS saith, that he caused a strong wall of foure score miles long to be built, to make a diuision of the lands of the one from the other; which was a marvellous great work. And, hauing made such prouision for all things in that Iland as he thought needfull, he return'd into France: where he erected some singular Buildings, and bestowed other graces and fauours in that Countrey.

Adrian visited the Empire.

After

After that the Emperour ADRIAN had visited France and the borders thereof, and the Ile of Britannie, he directed his iourney for Spaine; where he was ioyfully receiued, as a man native and borne in that countrie: and after that he had visited some places, he went to winter in the cittie of Tarragona, where he called a parliament of all the prouinces, and ordained many things for the publike good thereof. After that the furie of winter was past, he trauelled through all Spaine, visiting the cities, and bestowing benefits vpon them: principally vnto his owne countrie Italica and Seuil, he graunted many priuiledges and exemptions, and did many great fauours, as DION writeth; but would not come thither, notwithstanding that he was in the marches thereof. Thus hauing visited all Spaine, he returned towards Rome, & at this time he set downe the limits and bounds of the Empire, from the barbarous Nations: where there were no riuers, to diuide them with notable markes of stone, pillars, trees, and other things; and his authoritie & reputation at that time was so great, that to the high Germanes who were free, he appointed a King: and at that time some tumults were punished in Africa.

He come into Spaine, and doth many fauours to his Countrie.

The Emperour ADRIAN liuing now in peace, being the seauenth yeere of his raigne; the Parthians a fierce and turbulent nation, began to arme and to make warres against the Empire; and ADRIAN making prouision for all things accordingly, passed into the East, with a sufficient Armie to follow that warre in person: but seeing that he managed it himselfe, they propounded certaine treaties of peace; which being concluded, he trauelled peaceably through all the Easterne prouinces, and came into Asia the lesse, and from thence into Grecia, where he did many fauours to the Athenians, and other cities, where he remained some space. From thence he took his passage into the Ile of Sicilia, and visited the principall places of that Iland; and desired to see mount Etna, which is so famous for the fire which it continually casteth out. Setting all things in Sicilia in such order as he thought good, being very ioyfull he returned to Rome, now the fourth time after that he was Emperour. After his last comming, he staied not long: for he had vndertaken (for the better gouernment thereof) to visit the whole Empire in person; and to that purpose preparing shippes and gallies he passed into Africa: where the ioy is incredible that was conceiued for his comming. For besides that ADRIAN was very much beloued, it happened (as SPARCIANVS and others doe write) that Africa for fiue yeeres space had endured great want of raine, and by consequence hunger and famine; but as soone as he was arrived in that Countrie, raine fell plentifully: which made his comming most ioyfull. And the time that he was in that countrie, he spent in reforming of the gouernment, in ending controuersies, and commanding certaine publike buildings to be erected: among which was the reedifying of a great part of the citie of Carthage, which (according to my author) he commanded should be called Adrianopolis, after his owne name.

Adrian in Africa.

Carthage re-edified by Adrian.

And all matters being ended in Africa at his pleasure, and hauing staied there so long as to him seemed good, he returned prosperously to Rome, where hee prouided for all other matters of the Empire: yet the time was not long that he staied there; and when euery man thought least of any iourney, hee againe prouided for his passage into the East. And within short space he went into Grecia; and trauailing through it, staied in some cities, and made those buildings & temples to be finished, which before he had commanded to be begun, and enioyned others to be built: and so continuing his iourney he went into Asia the lesse, and did there as he had done in other prouinces where he had trauailed. Being come into Syria, by letters and messengers he inuited the Kings and Tetrarchs, as well those which were friends and subiects, as others which were neighbours and strangers, to come to see & speake with him. Among which; one was the King of Parthia, to whom he freely sent his daughter, whom the Emperor TRAIAN in the former wars had taken prisoner; for which generous act, manie came to his Court to visit him and to doe him honour: all which he so friendly and courteously entertained, as such which came not did exceedingly enuie those which came, grieuing very much that they had not done the like. These meetings and feasts being ended (which in truth were very great and memorable) ADRIAN took his way towards Syria, and came into Palestina and Iudea; visiting the principall cities thereof; and from thence went forwards, and did the like in Arabia. After which, he presently went into Egypt; where he remained longer than in any other part, and there commanded a most sumptuous Sepulchre to be built ouer the great POMPEY, for that his Tomb was ruined and decaied. He also caused a City to bee founded to the name and memoriall of a most fair young youth which died there, whom hee deerly loued. And at the same time he permitted and also commanded, that the holy City Ierusalem, which (as is before said) was destroyed & laid desolate, should be reedified & new built; which was presently done with

A Sepulcher made by Adrian ouer the great Pompey.

The power of the Roman Emperors.

with admirable expedition, principally by the Iewes; and commanded, that (leauing the first name) it ſhould be called Ælia Adria Capitolina: ſo great was then the power and wealth of the Roman Emperors, that it was as eaſie a matter for them then to build Cities, as now houſes, or things of leſſer moment. And although the Iewes did greatly reioyce for the new-building and reſtoring of Ieruſalem, yet afterwards they took it very grieuouſly, that the Gentils ſhould ſointly dwell there with them; who built Temples to their gods and idols, not ſuffering the Chriſtians freely to vſe their rites and ceremonies. And this is the cauſe of the rebellion which afterwards enſued.

The peruerſe perfidy of the obſtinate Iewes.

Truely, it is a thing much to be noted in this Nation; which became ſo ſtiffe-necked, that when they were bound to keep and obſerue their law, being good and holy; for very light occaſions they would forſake it, and take ſtrange religions, and become idolaters: but after that it was aboliſhed, and ought no longer to be obſerued, they would neuer leaue it, neither receiue the holy Catholike faith; and yet, vntill this day, ſome of that generation in ſundry parts of the world obſtinately perſeuere therein.

These and many other things being ended by ADRIAN in the time of his abode in Aſia and in Egypt, he returned into Europe: and, arriuing in Gracia, he ſtaied with his whole Court in the City of Athens. Being there (which was in the eighteenth yeer of his Raign) all the Iewes rebelled, and caſt the Roman garriſons out of their Prouinces of Iudea, Galile, and the reſt; killing as many of them as they could, with a very great number of Chriſtians. This was a very dangerous warre: for, with them did conſpire all the Iewes that dwelt in any other Prouinces, which were very many. ADRIAN conſidering the importance of this accident, prouided a new Army, whereof he made IVLIVS SEVERVS Generall againſt the Iewes, cauſing him to come from Britanny, where hee commanded the Army; who came with great power, and paſſed into Syria, and made moſt cruell warre: wherein, after the ſhedding of much bloud on both ſides, the Iewes were ouercomn and deſtroied, and the whole Countrey left in a manner deſolate. So (as writeth DION) there were fifty excellent ſtrong Caſtles and Forreſſes laied euen with the ground; and nine hundred, foureſcore and fiue Townes and populous Villages burnt; and there were ſlain in skirmiſhes and battels fifty thouſand fighting men, beſides thoſe which without number died of hunger, ſicknes, and miſery of the warre: and ſo was performed the ſubduing, and (in a manner) the totall deſtruction of the Iewiſh Nation. And ADRIAN gaue commandement and made an edict, that the Iewes ſhould be perpetually baniſhed from the new Ieruſalem, and prohibited to inhabite there.

The Iewes ouerthrown and deſtroied by Iulius Seuerus. and baniſht from the new Ieruſalem by Adrian.

Within few daies after the war againſt the Iewes was ended, the Alanes and Maſagets, which are barbarous and fierce Nations of Scythia Aſiatica, came with great fury, and entred into Media making war, and afterwards into Armenia, and came as far as Cappadocia (where FLAVIVS ARRIANVS was Generall for the Empire) putting all the Countries therabouts in great fear. But ADRIAN (who euer loued peace) vſed ſuch means, as through the gifts which hee ſent to their King VOLOGESVS by his Ambaſſadors, they returned peaceably to their houſes, loaden with ſpoils and riches which they got in other barbarous Countries.

ADRIAN, hauing ended all matters to his beſt liking; after he had beſtowed many gifts and fauours vpon the Cities of Gracia, came in the end to Rome, hauing (as I haue ſaid) trauelled a long time through the world; where his coming was very gratefull to all eſtates in that City: and although he were now old and vnwieldy, yet he failed not to prouide and take as good order for all things then, as when hee was of greateſt ſtrength. But, conſidering his age, which was now aboue threeſcore yeers, that he had not any ſonne, and that a diſeaſe he ordinarily had, which was much bleeding at the noſe, did now more oppreſſe him than euer; hee took great care who ſhould bee his Succeſſor, and therefore determined to adopt ſome excellent man to ſucceed him in the Empire; and heerupon took much counſell, and made many doubts before he would reſolue. In the end, contrary to the liking of moſt of his Councell, hee adopted one LVCIVS CECINIVS COMMODVS, intituling him CÆSAR, and nominated him for his Succeſſor; which (as SPARCIANVS reporteth) had not been vſed to be done in that manner vntill then: and changing his name, after his new Father he was called ÆLIVS VERVS. The ſame day he did this, he commanded SEVERIANVS to bee ſlain (who was a great man in Rome) and FVSCVS which was his nephew, for certain euident ſignes and ſuſpicions which he diſcouerd, that they practiſed to tyrannize & vſurp the Empire: and ſo likewiſe he commanded ſome others to be put to death, and made away. After this election and adoption, and great feaſting for the ſame, this new-adopted CÆSAR was ouertaken with an infirmity, which was ſo griegrieuous, and of ſo long continuance, as ADRIAN found himſelfe deceiued: and ſeeing that now he could not liue long, he repented that he ſhould leaue ſo weake and feeble a ſucceſſor. It is written, that he often ſaid, he leaned to a rotten wall. But it ſo happened that within few daies, he was eaſed of that care: for this LVCIVS CECINIVS, whom he had adopted and called ÆLIVS VERVS, died. And notwithſtanding that this man left ſonnes behinde him, yet ADRIAN preſently adopted ANTONINVS or ANTONIVS (for I finde him written after both names) who was afterwards ſurnamed PIVS; vpon condition that he ſhould alſo adopt a ſonne of the ſayd ÆLIVS VERVS, who was called LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS, and MARCVS AVRELIVS alſo; but in the firſt place ANTONINVS, of whoſe linage hereafter mention ſhall be made, who were Noble, and verie excellent and vertuous men. This being done to the good liking, and with the conſent of the Senate, and of all the principall men in Rome, ADRIANS infirmitie encreaſing, he made himſelfe to be caried to the citie of Baias: where his griefe ſo extremely tormented him, and therewithall came ſo many paſſions and conuulſions, as he oftentimes deſired to die, and procured his owne death; and with gifts and flatteries, and ſometime with threatnings prouoked ſome to kill him: and ſeeing that no man would doe it, and that he wanted ſtrength to doe it himſelfe, for the laſt remedie of his infirmitie, by the aduice of ſome of his Phyſicians (for he had many about him) he reſolued to forbeare either to eate or drink, and ſo he died in the yeere of our Lord 140. vſing the common ſaying, Turba Medicorum interfecit Regem; which is, A multitude of Phyſicians killed the King.

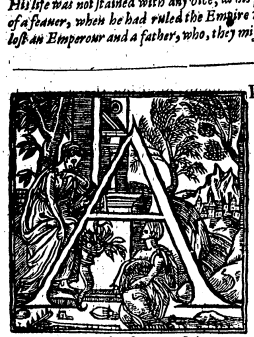
The death of the Emperour Adrian.

ADRIAN at the time of his death was ſixtie two yeeres old and fiue moneths, & had raigned twentie one yeeres and eleuen moneths: he neither left behinde him, or euer had any ſonne; he was but once married, and then with a woman whoſe name was SABINA; and after her death, he married no more. He was a man tall of ſtature and of a good preſence, and did weare his beard and haire long, and took delight therein. Hee was as excellent a Prince as euer was any, although that he had ſome vices, which with his wiſedome he couered and kept ſecret. As concerning the Chriſtian faith, although in the beginning (as an Infidell) he did hate it, and was an enemie to it, yet afterwards he ſhewed himſelfe more temperate towards the Chriſtians: for as EVSEBIVS and others doe write, QVADRATVS a diſciple of the Apoſtles, and ARISTIDES a Philoſopher of Athens and a Chriſtian, did compile certaine notable bookes in defence of our faith: wherewith ADRIAN being moued, wrote to MINVCIVS FVNDANVS who was Proconſul in Aſia, and to other parts, that no Chriſtian ſhould be compelled to renounce his faith, neither puniſhed, except he were accuſed for ſome other offence. So as the Chriſtian faith was taught and preached freely, a great part of the raigne of the Emperour ADRIAN.



THE LIFE OF MARCVS ANTONINVS PIVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND SIXTEENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

ANTONINVS was adopted by ADRIAN; and by reaſon of his adoption, ſucceeded him in the Empire: in which dignity hee liued ſo vertuouſly, as it may bee ſayd, that hee liued without example, and was compared to the good NVMA POMPILIVS. There was no great warre in the time of this good Emperour: for hee with his authority bridled all Nations, and to him came Ambaſſadours, in a manner from the furthermoſt parts of the World. Hee would neuer bee verie farre from Rome, in ſuch manner as his Predeceſſour had beene, beeing of opinion that it was moſt fit for the Emperour to remaine in that eitie, which was head of the Empire. He was liberall, courteous, iust and pitifull, and a great louer of vertuous men, so as it might be said, that he was father of the vertuous. His life was not stained with any vice, as his predecessors were. And being of the age of 72. yeeres he died in his Citie of a feauer, when he had ruled the Empire 23. yeeres whose death was much lamented by the world, for that they had lost an Emperour and a father, who, they might iustly say, was Pius.

DRIAN was not onely wise and fortunate in gouerning and ruling the Empire, the time that he held it; but he was also, in the succession whom he chose and left there: for hee prooued to be such, and so good, that after he had ended his daies, ADRIAN was not more praised and remembred for his wisedome and good gouernment, then for the succession which he left, by adopting ANTONINVS: who what he was we will presently tell you. The death of ADRIAN being knowne (which was greatly lamented) ANTONINVS PIVS, his adopted sonne, was presently without any contradiction admitted and obeyed for Emperour, accordingly as he had appointed by the consent of all the Senate, as in his life we haue written. This ANTONINVS was the sonne of AVRELIVS FVLVIVS, and Nephew of TITVS AVRELIVS FVLVIVS, who had been Consuls and had held other offices and dignities, and were Noble men and of an auncient Family, whose originall was in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lombardie. His mothers name was ARRIA FATIDILLA, the daughter of ARRIVS ANTONINVS a Noble gentleman and wise Consul. This Emperour ANTONINVS was one of the most excellent princes in vertue and bountie, that euer was in the world; and who with greatest authoritie, iustice, liberalitie, and clemencie gouerned the Empire. Hee had a good aspect, was tall, and of a good constitution of body, of an excellent witte, mild of condition, moderate in eating and drinking, well learned, and singularly eloquent, very bountifull, and willing to giue of his owne, and very abstinent from taking from others. He was a great louer of husbandrie, and delighted much in hunting; and he was so free from all manner of vices, as therein neither TRAIAN, ADRIAN, nor any of his predeecessors could compare with him: Wherefore the wisemen of his time compared him with NVMA POMPILIVS, who was second King of Rome, and deserued to bee called PIVS, for which they shew many reasons. Before that he was Emperor he had bin Questor, Pretor, and Consul, and had held some other charges and magistracies. In his time their was little warre, or at least little spoken of; and those troubles which were, he easily pacified by his Captaines: and therefore the most that Historiographers write of him, is of his good conditions and bountie: and so will I; although it will not be so pleasing to the Reader as to discourse of warres; yet to follow the truth, and principally to shew the fruite which is to be gathred out of this historie, which are examples to liue well: as for the rest there will bee sufficiently enough found in the processe of this booke, and that is not a little which is alreadie written.

Antoninus compared with Numa Pompilius.

ANTONINVS, as soone as he began to rule, he presently made shew of his naturall goodnesse: for he remoued not any of those from their offices and charges, which he found placed and established by ADRIAN; but rather confirmed them therein: and euer held it best, to suffer those which prooued good Gouernours to continue long in their charges and gouernments. He commanded also his rents and seruices (besides that they should be moderated) to be fauorably and temperately collected. He presently did so many fauours, and gaue so many gifts of his owne goods which he had before, that his wife ANIA FAVSTINA daughter to ANIVS VERVS reprooued him for it: to whom he made answere that she knew not what she said, and therefore he did let her know, that at what time he attained the Empire, he had lost all that which before he enioyed liuing priuate. In matters of equitie and gouernment, he was as vigilant, and took as good order as ADRIAN did. He resolued neuer to depart from Rome during his raigne, except it were to recreate himselfe, and sometime to hunt, being herein contrarie in opinion to his Predeecessor ADRIAN: for he sayd that the Court and people, which trauelled with the Emperour, were troublesome and preiudiciall to the Countries and Cities by which they passed: and that in visiting some parts, he was far from others; and therefore the most fit and conuenient place for the Emperor to stay and make his abode in, was in Rome, Antoninus answere to Faustine.

Rome, which was the Lady and head of the Empire, and in the midst thereof, and most fit to receiue Ambassadours and messages from all parts. So as following this counsell (which indeed prooued not ill) the Warres and Insurrections which happened, he suppressed and pacified by his Captaines; as the Britaines, which rebelling in part of that Iland, the Rebels were defeated by his Captaines, and the Iland brought to subiection.

And within a little afterwards, the like happened in the Country of Dacia, and also in Germanie, which tooke Arms; but through the victory of his Legions, peace was established: whereby he wanne so great reputation, that during the rest of his raigne, there hapned no dangerous warre, and all men feared and honoured him for his goodnesse, and therewith he was so much beloued, as he was held and esteemed, for Father, Lord and Emperor. The barbarous Nations which were vnknowne to the Romanes, did so much loue and esteeme him, as in contentions and matters in controuersie which fell out betweene them, they chose him for their Iudge and Arbitrator, submitting themselues to his censure. And so those of Hircania, (which is a Prouince of Asia, neere to the Caspian Sea) and the Bactrians which are more to the Eastwards, and both very farre and remote; and also the East Indians sent to him their Ambassadors, offering amity and obedience. And from other Countries which were exceeding far, there came some Kings to doe him honour: among which, they make mention of STANGORVS from India, and of King PHARASMANES, and others. And in other Countries, he settled Kings at his pleasure; whereto the Inhabitants did consent, notwithstanding that they were not subiect to the Empire. And the King of Parthia resoluing to make warre, being with a great power entred into Armenia, one Letter from the Emperor sufficed to make him retire and to discharge his Armie.

Ambassadours and presents from far countries came to see Antoninus.

ANTONINVS being in this manner beloued and feared by Strangers, was no lesse esteemed and beloued by his Subiects and Vassals, but rather without comparison farre more; as by those which knew and enioyed his goodnesse and equity: and seeing that he was such, he was by the whole Senate intituled, Father of his Countrie, which he much refused, but yet in the end hee accepted thereof, with great courtesie and humility: for hee was naturally milde, and Noble of condition; and therewith so courteous, as he entertained the Senators and principall men gently and louingly, with great honour and courtesie; and neuer did any thing of importance, without their counsell and consent, and towards all men generally he sought to moderate the state and maiesty of an Emperor, shewing himselfe affable and pleasant. And aboue all, he tooke order that no man should make benefit of his fauour to another; neither take bribes from such as were Suters vnto him: for he gaue audience and answere to all men himselfe in person, and in this he knew the quality and difference betweene men, vsing herein sometime the opinion of others when need required. Whereto, besides the ordinary counsell of the Senate, and his owne skill and knowledge in the lawes, he had alwaies some excellent Lawyers neere vnto him, as VLPIANVS, MARCELLVS, IABOLENVS and others: By which meanes and such others as shall be declared, the Prouinces and Cities in his time florished and grew rich, which he relieued with his owne rents towards the buildings thereof, aswell such as were necessary as others, to beautifie and adorne the same. And when any misfortune or calamity hapned, he repaired and reedefied it with mony out of his Eschequer: as, a great fire which hapned in Rome, wherewith were burnt three hundred and forty principall houses, and a great part of the Citie of Narbone in France, and the Citie of Antioch in Asia, with the Market-place in the City of Carthage. In time of great famine which was in Rome, hee prouided for their vvants, and maintained the people with bread and wine, the most of the time that the famine lasted, making Victuals to be brought from all parts, paying for the same at his proper cost: so as generally through the whole Empire, all men were well content vvith him; for he maintained them in peace, quietnesse and equity.

Great harme done by fire in seuerall places.

And doubtlesse in this place there is to be obserued (as touching the power and gouernment of humane things) how great and potent the Romane Empire then was; and how contentedly, and at what liberty the Subiect liued in the time of ANTONINVS, TRAIAN, ADRIAN, and other good Emperours; and to see the greatnesse and riches of that Court frequented by the worthiest and best men in the world: and to obserue the greatnes, buildings & wealth of that most populous Citie of Rome, beautified with the goodliest Statues and Pictures that euer Eye had seene; so as at this day her ruines are more esteemed then all the stately buildings in the world: and to consider the liberty and security wherin men might trauaile, through the world, no man being tyed to obey more then one Lord and King, and he good and iust, without feare of warres, theeues by Sea or Land, without finding euety where new Lawes, new Lords, Kings and Tyrants, needing no security or safe Conducts, without being taken prisoners, and made Captiues, or ill vsed by enemies, strangers and vnknowne persons; but vsing all men as friends and neighbours in the greatest and best parts of the World, which as a little Kingdome was quietly and iustly gouerned. One Countrey was furnished from another, with such things as in the one did abound, and the other wanted; Merchandize and Trafficke passing through the World without so many Impositions, molestations and troubles, as we see now adayes, all liuing then vnder one lawe; being in the best and most habitable parts of the Earth in vnion and peace: which they more perfectly enioyed, after that the Emperours were Christians, as hereafter shall be declared. But as this was but humane power, so could it not continue long without alteration and change: for such is the condition of this world; nothing can continue long in one estate.

A wonderfull obedience, and vniuersall peace.

But returning to our ANTONINVS, among his other vertues wherwith he made the time of his raigne happie and pleasing, one was his clemencie; wherewith he greatly moderated the rigor of the lawes, punishing offences with pitie, or pardoning them, euer desiring and procuring peace: So as to such as sometimes discoursed with him of the valour of IVLIVS CÆSAR and HANNIBALL, he did commonly answere with that saying of SCIPIO, that he more desired the preseruation of one friends or subiects life, then the death of an hundred enemies. This Emperour ANTONINVS was a great friend to Learning, and much honoured learned men, giuing them great rewards and pensions, drawing them from all the parts of the world; among which he caused to come from Chalcide a great Philosopher which was a Stoick, whose name was APOLLONIVS, whom he sent for to be Maister to his adopted sonne MARCVS ANTONINVS, who afterwards was Emperor. This Philosopher being come to Rome, ANTONINVS sent for him to come to see him, seeing that he staied long ere he did it of himselfe: whereto the Philosopher made answere, that with greater reason the scholler ought to come to the maister, then the maister to the scholler. This arrogancie did nothing offend ANTONINVS: but laughing thereat, he said to those which were with him, that he maruelled that APOLLONIVS should deeme it a shorter way from Chalcide to Rome, then from his lodging in Rome to his Palace. This Emperour, among the waightie affaires and matters of importance, forgot not to please and recreate the people; but (as the custome then was in Rome) at certaine times caused feasts and solemne sports to be made. In conclusion, he was an excellent Prince, and left nothing vndone, that was behouefull for the good gouernment of the Empire: and hauing ruled the same 23. yeeres, being aboue threescore and ten yeeres old, he was taken with a burning feauer, whereof within three dayes he died in peace and rest; first recommending the Empire to MARCVS ANTONINVS, who was his sonne in law, and married to his daughter FAVSTINA, and is commonly called MARCVS AVRELIVS, commaunding that the image of FORTVNE which the Emperours did vse to haue in their chambers, should be caried to ANTONINVS chamber, which hapned in the yeere of our Lord 163. Some time before he dyed, being a man of great stature, and by reason of his age vnable to goe vpright, but stooping, he ware vpon his breast certaine thinne boords, whereupon he made fast his clothes with such art, that it couered the defect of nature. His death was generally lamented, and the Romanes did him great honour, and made sacrifices vnto him, canonizing him for a god, and builded a Temple also vnto him, as they did to the vanitie of their other superstitious gods.

THE LIFE OF MARCVS AVRELIVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, ALTHOVGH SECOND OF THE ANTONINES, CALLED THE Philosopher, and of LVCIVS COMMODVS VERVS, ANTONINVS his companion, and seuenteenth Emperour of ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

MArcus Aurelius being adopted by Antoninus Pius, succeeded in the Empire, and was endued with so much bountie and vertue, as he was worthily called the Philosopher: and considering the many calamities which in his time oppressed the Romane commonwealth, there needed a man no lesse good and vertuous. In his time were most dangerous warres, very great earthquakes, inundations of Riuers, pestilence, and most extreame famine; all which he, through his singular wisdome, remedied. He made the Christians to be persecuted, whereby the Church indured much. He was vnhappy in his wife, and in wise children: and notwithstanding that shee was dishonest, yet he would not put her away, accounting to haue had the Empire for her dowry. This good Emperour dyed in the warres against the Germanes, taken with a most grieuous infirmitie, when hee had reigned 18. yeeres. His death was deplored through the whole Romane Empire, where he had euer shewed himselfe a good Prince, and louing father.

WHen as the Emperour ANTONINVS PIVS was dead, MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS VERVS, without any contradiction succeeded him, who was called the Philosopher, whom (as we haue said) ANTONINVS PIVS had adopted for his sonne in the time of the Emperour ADRIAN, and afterwards married him to his daughter FAVSTINA. This man when as he was confirmed in the Empire, and began to gouerne, took for his companion and equall, LVCIVS VERVS COMMODVS ANTONINVS: who together with him, was adopted, by ANTONINVS, by the cõmandement of the Emperour ADRIAN, being the sonne of LVCIVS CEIONIVS COMMODVS, whom ADRIAN had first adopted, but died before him. These two were the first that euer ruled in Rome together with equall power. This excellent Emperour MARCVS ANTONINVS was also called AVRELIVS ANTONINVS. I would that the Reader should vnderstand, that this confusion and varietie of names is caused by reason of the adoptions which then were made: for the Romanes did vse to haue three names, a forename, a name, and a surname. And to declare it more plainely, when any one was adopted for a sonne, he receiued the name and surname, and sometime changed all the three names. Sometime they held one, and changed the rest, to continue the memorie of both fathers: and from hence grew so many names, which obscure the historie, and oftentimes deceiue the Reader. To be eased of this trouble, I will call this excellent Emperour, MARCVS AVRELIVS; and his brother and companion, LVCIVS VERVS, giuing to them both sometime the surname of ANTONINVS.

Marcus Aurelius called the Philosopher.

Lucius Commodus taken by Marcus Aurelius for his companion in the Empire.

The origine of Marcus Aurelius.

MARCVS AVRELIVS was the naturall and true sonne of ELIVS VERVS, who died Pretor. And his Grandfathers name was ELIVS VERVS, who had been twise Consul and Prefect in Rome, and was enobled and made Patrician by the Emperour VESPASIAN, as IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS relateth. His mothers name was DOMITIA CAMILLA and was the daughter of CALVISIVS TVLLVS, who had been twice Consul. By his fathers side he was of so ancient a linage, as it was reported that he was descended from NVMA POMPILIVS the second King of the Romanes. This Emperor was indued with so many vertues, good qualities, and rare parts, as there will not any be found that hath excelled him, and hardly any to be compared vnto him. In his time there were such dangerous warres, and so many calamities, as there was great neede of his vertue, wisedome and valour, to resist so many perils, and to preuent so may ill fortunes. He was so addicted to the studie of Philosophie, and all Arts and Sciences, as he was surnamed the Philosopher, and he did honour and greatly enrich wise and learned men. His chief masters in Philosophie amongst others, were APOLLONIVS CHALCIDONENSIS; in the Greek tongue, SEXTVS CHERONENSIS, nephew to PLVTARCH; and in Rhetorick, FRONTO an excellent Orator in that time, by whose instructions he greatly profited. And beginning to gouerne in companie of his adopted brother L. VERVS ANTONINVS, as he did in all things farre excell him, so (in a manner) he had the administration of all matters: for which cause, of him chiefest mention is made; as also for that he liued longer, and remained alone in the Empire; gouerning them with the good liking and contentment of the whole Senate and people of Rome, for the great experience they had of his vertue and bountie. In the beginning of his raigne, there happened so great an inundation and ouerflowing of the riuer Tiber, as it ouerthrew many buildings in Rome, and drowned many people, with a great number of cattell; and spoiling the fields caused an extreame dearth and famine. Which, MARCVS AVRELIVS through his great liberalitie, with the consent of his brother LVCIVS VERVS, sufficiently repaired, relieuing and victualling the Citie at their owne proper cost and charges, making prouision of corne to be brought from all parts.

The ouerflowing of Tiber.

Warre with the Parthians.

After this, in the third yeere of his raigne, followed the dangerous warre against the Parthians (a nation which the Romans euer feared) which warre was raised by their king VOLOGESVS; who, leuying an exceeding huge Armie, came against the ordinary legions in Syria, where ATIODIVS CORNELIANVS was Captaine, and gouerned that countrie for the Empire: who hauing no sufficient Armie to make head against the Parthians, was driuen to retire, and VOLOGESVS took some Prouinces. At that time also rebelled a certaine people in the Ile of Britanny, and in Germany in like manner: and northern people called Catti, inuaded the borders of the Empire, against all which MARCVS AVRELIVS made speedie prouision. Into Britanny was sent CALPHVRNIVS AGRICOLA with new supplies; who ioyning with the ordinary legions of that Iland, pacified those troubles. Against the Catti, was sent AVFIDIVS VICTORINVS for Generall. To the warre against the Parthians, because it was important and more dangerous, it seemed requisite to the Emperors and to the Senate, that one of them two should goe, and it was concluded that LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS should vndertake the charge, because that MARCVS AVRELIVS could not be spared: for his presence was very needefull in Rome for the generall gouernment, and to prouide for all occurrents. And so LVCIVS VERVS with great prouision, and a great Court, departed, whom MARCVS AVRELIVS accompanied to the Citie of Capua: but LVCIVS fell sick by the way (as some write) through his disorders, riot, & surfetting; by reason whereof and his long lingering, the Roman legions were put to the worse, and were ouerthrowne by the Parthians, and their Generall slaine in a battaile which was fought betweene them. But LVCIVS VERVS being arriued with his great Armie, the warre was managed with apparant aduantage to the Romanes; not by the endeuour of LVCIVS VERVS, but of his Captaines ESTACIVS PRISCVS, AVIDIVS CASSIVS, and MARCIVS VERVS, valiant commanders; he giuing himselfe to his pleasures and pastimes; in Summer, in the Citie of Antioch; and in winter, in Laodicea, for foure yeeeres space, that these warres continued: wherein passed many great conflicts, skirmishes and battailes betweene the said Captaines, and the King and Nation of the Parthians. But succeeding prosperously with the Romanes, they obtained many victories in diuers parts: so as recouering what was lost in Syria, they did the like in Armenia, and entred the prouince of Media: finally, being masters of the field, they came with their Ensignes displayed, euen to the Citie of Babylon. While as these things were in action, the Emperor MARCVS

Lucius Verus against the Parthians.

CVS AVRELIVS continued in Rome, applying himself with great care to the good gouernment, prouiding all things necessary for the warres, with great wisdome and foresight; dissembling and with patience enduring the vices and neglect of his Companion LVCIVS VERVS, to whom at that time he sent his daughter LVCILLA to bee married vnto him in Syria, where he then was; which he did, the better to confirm the friendship and brotherhood betwixt them. And, during the time of these warres with the Parthians, EVSEBIVS and PAVLVS OROSIVS write, that the Christians were persecuted by the commandement of the Emperour, chiefly in Asia where LVCIVS VERVS was: which was the fourth persecution the Church endured. Wherefore (as it is to be supposed) God sent a generall pestilence, and other calamities, which afterwards ensued.

The fourth persecution of the primitiue church.

Hauing obtained so many victories against the Parthians, LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS resolued to come to Rome; leauing that Countrey quiet and in subiection: and, setting the affairs of Asia in good order, he diuided the Kingdoms among those which to him seemed to haue most right, leauing them as subjects and vassals to the Empire; and in other Prouinces and Countries hee made the Officers of his House and Court, Gouerners; which were called Comites or Earles: from whence the title and dignity of Earles now-adaies might haue the Originall. Being comn into Italie, with the new surname of PARTHICVS, for the victory attained against the Parthians, which was also giuen to MARCVS AVRELIVS, with the triumph, they both together triumphed with great solemnity: and so this enterprise was happily atchieued and ended. And although this coming of LVCIVS VERVS from the East was very joyfull, by reason of the many victories obtained by his Armies, yet was it otherwise the cause of much sorrow and heauinesse: for, when he came out of Syria, the plague was very sore there, and he dispersed the same into sundry places by the way as hee came; so as many of his Souldiers, and of his Court and Company, died thereof: and, doing the like in Italie and Rome, he infected the whole Country; in such sort, that it was the greatest and most furious pestilence that euer was seen vntill that day. For remedy whereof, MARCVS AVRELIVS vsed all care and diligence possible, as well in preseruing those which were infected, and auoiding further infection, as in curing the liuing, and burying the dead; to his great cost and hazard of his life. This calamitie being past, before it, and whil'st it continued, he omitted no time nor care that was necessary for the gouernment and good of the common-wealth; hearing and dispatching all causes in generall; seeing in person what was done in the Senate; without whose opinion (and of the principall and wisest men) hee did nothing: for, hee vsed to say, that there was greater reason he should follow the counsell of so many and so good friends, than that so many and so wise men should do after his will alone. At the meetings wherein Magistrates were chosen, he was euer present; and in all things caused the antient order and liberty to bee obserued. In Courts and Iudgements he encreased the number of the Iudges and the judiciall daies. Hee also increased the alms and rewards of his Palace; and, in a time of famine and want of corn, he spent an infinite treasure, prouiding for many Cities a sufficient quantity of grain. And in Spain (being more fruitfull than the rest) where his Predecessors had too much gleaned, he mitigated great part of the tributes, releasing many taxes and seruices.

A great plague in Rome and all Italie.

Marcus Aurelius relieued many cities with corn in time of dearth.

And herein hee was so temperate and pitifull towards his subjects, that whatsoeuer briberies and extortions were committed by his Collectors and Receiuers, hee most seuerely punished: yet in all other crimes and offenses he euer vsed great clemency, and euer inflicted lesse punishment than the lawes commanded. This Emperor not onely tasted of aduersities (as wee haue said) as, famine and pestilence, with inundations and earthquakes; but within his owne house he endured a greater plague with his wife FAVSTINA, who was (as all Writers affirm) dishonest and wonderfull dissolute; which hee sought by all means possible to reclaim, although not by such rigorous punishment as she deserued. And, being by some perswaded to put her away, and to diuorce himself from her, seeing that he would not put her to death; he remembring, she was ANTONINVS PIVS his daughter, who had left him the Empire, they write that he answered them in this manner:

Faustina, Marcus Aurelius wife, dishonest and dissolute.

If We put away FAVSTINA, We are also bound to leaue the Empire; which was the dowrie We had with her at our mariage.

There ensued so many calamities after that LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS came from the East, as well by means of the generall and cruell pestilence, as by earthquakes, famine, inundations, and caterpillers, not onely in Italie, but in other Prouinces of the Empire; as that all Writers affirm, that if it had not hapned that MARCVS AVRELIVS had been so diligent, so wise, and worthie an Emperour as he was, the Romane Empire had been ruined and rent in sunder, and barbarous Nations had subdued the greatest part thereof. For taking occasion of that which is aforesaide, seeing the Countries wasted and vnpeopled, many northren Nations conspired against it, as the Sarmates, Vandales, Marcomans, Sueuians, and in a manner all Germany: who seised vpon the Prouinces of Pannonia, which were Austria, Hungary and other countries, threatning Italy and France. Whereto the Emperour MARCVS AVRELIVS desirous to yeeld redresse, thought it not sufficient to send thither his companion, and much lesse durst he leaue him in Rome, he was so retchlesse and vicious, and therefore resolued that they would both go togither: Which putting in execution, with all prouision necessarie, it happened that vpon the way, LVCIVS VERVS ANTONINVS was taken with an Apoplexie, whereof he died suddainly, hauing raigned about nine or ten yeeres in company with his brother. And so MARCVS AVRELIVS remained alone in the Empire, who only was worthy thereof, prosecuting his iourney with his Armie, and began the warre with great courage and iudgement: in which, the infection did greater harme to his Army, then the force of his enemies; although it passed not without many battailes and encounters. And so with great difficultie by reason of the pestilence, he maintained this warre three yeeres: and wanting money to pay his souldiers (for the Prouinces, by reason of the miseries past, could not pay their taxes) he was constrained to sell all his iewels, vessels of gold and siluer, the furniture of his chamber, and his owne proper possessions, therewith to pay his Armie, which was greatly diminished of the chief commanders and valiantest men which died of the plague, whereby it receiued much more harme then by the enemie: Wherfore he was often counselled to leaue the wars and to returne. But he, willing rather to die then to lose any iot of his honour, continued it with a very great resolution, vntill that (after many great perils and extremities, which were such that Historiographers describe this warre to be as dangerous as the warres of Hannibal) he obtained the victorie, which he throughly accomplished in a great battaile. Wherein (as it was thought) through the praiers of the Christians which were in his Armie, vnto which he recommended himselfe, God shewed a most euident miracle; which was, That he and his people being ready to perish through want of water (the passages being on euery side stopt by his enemies) there fell such abundance of raine from heauen, that his Armie was sufficiently relieued with drinke: and therewith there fell such lightning and so cruell a tempest amongst his enemies, that he then setting vpon them ouerthrew and slew a great number; as EVSEBIVS and IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS report. And this being past, he recouered the Pannonies, and the rest which they had vsurped, and had done much more, but that at that instant AVIDIVS CASSIVS, before named, who was Captaine and Gouernour in the East, rose against MARCVS AVRELIVS, proclayming himselfe Emperour, taking occasion for that he was so much troubled in so doubtfull a warre: Wherefore the Emperour was constrained to leaue the best order hee could, concerning Germanie, and to returne into Italy, from thence to take his way towards AVIDIVS CASSIVS; whereupon he came to Rome, and he entred in triumph for the Germans, and ioyntly with him his sonne COMMODVS, whom he had made CÆSAR, and nominated for his successor.

The death of Lucius Verus.

A rebellion against Marcus Aurelius.

The triumph being ended, and leauing in Rome such order for the gouernment as was most expedient, with part of his victorious Armie which he brought with him out of Germanie, and with other forces which he had newly leuied, he departed towards the East, against AVIDIVS CASSIVS; where being arriued, the matter went so well of his side, as before that hee came to any conflict or battaile, the same Legions which AVIDIVS CASSIVS commanded, rebelled against him, and slew him, without the commandement or knowledge of MARCVS AVRELIVS: For, he was rather displeased therewith then otherwise; so milde and noble he was. And his head being brought vnto him, he commanded it to be honorably buried, and therewith seemed to be very sorrowfull, saying, That they had bereaued him of all meanes to shew him mercie; and that he much desired to haue had him in his power aliue, to haue giuen him his life, and to haue reproued him of his ingratitude. And those Cities which had conspired with him, he easily pardoned, and commanded that they should not be rigorously dealt withall. And of their goods, which the Senate had commanded to be confiscated, and put into his Exchequer, he would not receiue any part; but commanded that they should bee put into the publike treasurie of Rome. And being by one of the Councell reproued, for shewing such clemency in a crime so notorious, telling him that he ought not to haue done so, and that AVIDIVV CASSIVS would not haue dealt so by him if he had been ouercome, he answered swered with great constancy and assurance, that AVIDIVS had not so well serued the gods, nor liued in such sort, as to be able to haue ouerthrowne him.

BVLGACIVS GALLICANVS, who is an Author very antient, and liued in the time of the Emperor DIOCLESIAN, in the life which hee wrote of this AVIDIVS CASSIVS, reporteth, that the Emperor commanded to be giuen to his sonnes and daughters the one half of their fathers goods, and that there should not any injury or disgrace be done vnto them; and that they should be admitted to magistracies and dignities, if they were thereto chosen: and so to others which were guilty, he vsed the like clemency and grace.

This rebellion being pacified, MARCVS AVRELIVS withdrew himself to the City of Antioch in Syria, now called Soria; whither came vnto him many Kings and Ambassadors from the East; where, treating of peace & amity, and concluding the same with them, he was greatly esteemed and beloued of all men. And, setting all matters of the East in good order, being now old and wearied, hee made his return into Italie; and by the way, his wife the Empresse FAVSTINA died, whom he buried sumptuously and with great honour. Being comne to Rome, hee entred in triumph for the victory obtained against AVIDIVS; and returned to his accustomed goodnes; and vpright gouernment of the Empire, as he was wont to doo. When he thought he should now haue rested from his former toils, there began new alterations and insurrections in Germanie: which he fearing (as was reason: for, that Nation had alwaies been feared & doubted) determined in person to go to that war, and did so with a very great power, and prosecuted the same for the space of three yeers together; wherein were done many feats of Arms on either side, and he obtained some notable victories. But, being ready to haue fully concluded his conquests (they being as it were in his hand) hee was taken with a grieuous pestilent Feuer; which perceiuing to be mortall, he commanded all the principall men which were with him to come before him: to whom he made a notable speech, which HERODIANVS reciteth: wherein hee recommended vnto them the Roman Common-wealth, and his onely son COMMODVS, whom he left for his Successor; and him hee charged very effectually to end that warre which he left in so good tearms; concluding, that he should not suffer the enemy which was brought lowe, and well-nigh to confusion, to recouer force and courage. And then, being no longer able to resist his sicknes, hee died, hauing raigned eighteen yeers, in the yeer of our Lord (as EVSEBIVS recconeth) one hundred, fourescore and two, being threescore and one yeer old. Yet SEXTVS AVRELIVS saith, two yeers lesse.

Faustina the Empresse dieth.

The death of Marcus Aurelius, Anno Domini 182.

His death was extremely lamented and bewailed through the whole Army, and afterwards in Rome, and generally through all the Prouinces of the Empire: for, in them all hee was infinitely well beloued. MARCVS AVRELIVS had had another son, whose name was ANTONINVS or VERISIMVS, who died yong; and one daughter named LVCILLA, who married with a great and mighty man called POMPEIANVS.

THE LIFE OF COMMODVS ANTONINVS, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND EIGHTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

After the good Marcus Aurelius, succeeded his wicked son Commodus: who, for that he was held to be the Son of so good Father, was without any difficulty saluted Emperor: and for that when his Father died he was in Germany, when he returned to Rome all the City made great ioy. But, being come to the City, giuing himself ouer to all the wickednes that man could imagine, hee behaued himself so, as some conspired against him; which escaping, he took occasion to shew his cruelty. He was very active of his body, and so expert in casting of darts, as he would openly kill wilde beasts in the Amphitheatre. Finally, his wife Martin, finding a book wherein were written the names of such as he had resolued to put to death, and her owne name among the rest, she took order for his dispatch: and giuing him poison, whilst he was vomiting it vp again, she made him to bee stabbed. And so died that monster; to the great contentment of the whole Empire, which hee had wickedly gouerned thirteen yeers.

Commodus suspected to be a bastard.

HE good MARCVS AVRELIVS beeing dead, his Son COMMODVS was by the whole Armie obeyed and acknowledged for their Lord and Emperor; and so he was afterwards by the Senate and people of Rome, and likewise by all the Prouinces: for, no man would deny obedience to the Sonne of so good a Father. But hee proued so lewd and wicked, as he seemed not to be his sonne: and, considering the adultery of his mother FAVSTINA, hee was suspected to bee the sonne of some base fellow. The antient Authors which write of him (which are many) in a manner treat of nothing else but of his abominable vices and cruelties; which were so great, as it seemeth he exercised himself in no other thing, neither left any other memory behinde him. He came to the Empire being of the age of nineteen yeers, and was of a good constitution of body, of a very fair complexion, cleer-eied, and had a flaxen hair; all (in truth) ill bestowed vpon him, seeing that these gifts and such exquisite corporall beauty, he imployed so filthily & dishonestly; being a Gamester, incontinent, negligent, slothfull, a glutton, a drunkeard, and (aboue all) cruell.

Within some fewe daies after his Father was dead, hee came to the Camp where the Armie lay, accompanied with all the Roman Nobility; and made a good speech to the souldiers, promising a good hope of him, and matters clean contrary to that which followed; and hee gaue such donatiues to the souldiers as the new Emperors were accustomed to giue.

In these good beginnings hee continued some few daies: which being expired, through the the counsell of some lewd persons, he resolued to leaue the warres, and to return to Rome. And the aduice and counsell of POMPEIANVS, being his brother-in-law, a man of great authority, could no way perswade him to stay, neither other wise men and his loyall seruants; who were of opinion that he ought to stay, and to see an end of the war.

With this resolution he presently wrot to Rome, aduertising them of his coming; making such a truce or peace with his enemies, as was rather to their aduantage than his. HERODIANVS writes, that he bought it with mony: yet onely EVTROPIVS affirms, that he first wan a great battell. He then, leauing Captains on the Frontiers of Germany, held on his way towards Rome; and in all the Cities through which he passed, was receiued with incredible joy and solemnity, for the great loue they bare to his father, and for the hope they conceiued of him; not yet knowing his conditions. In Rome hee was receiued with exceeding great joy, triumph and blessings, generally of all men; they strewing the wayes with flowers where he went, making all the demonstratiues of joy that were possible; hoping and assuring themselues that they should haue a good Prince, being the sonne of MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS, and nephew to ANTONINVS PIVS; who were good and excellent Emperors. But it was not long before he put them out of doubt, making frustrate their good hope: for, hee openly gaue himself to vice and incontinency, going by night with others of his condition (as there neuer want those which will imitate the prince, although in doing euill) to brothell houses, and publike tauerns; spending also whole daies and nights in banqueting, feasting, bathings and most abominable luxurie. And as wicked men neuer loue any, but such as are like themselues; so hee sent for Gouernors into the Prouinces, such as were his companions in his villanies: whereto he was so much addicted, and spent so much time in them, as he took no care for the gouernment; leauing all to the disposition of a Fauourite of his, whose name was PERENIVS (whom he afterward made Pretorian Prefect, which is, Captain of the Pretorian Cohorts) who was a most couetous, vitious, and cruell man; yet very expert in the wars. This man gouerning all things, the accursed Emperor COMMODVS encreased so much in his vices and lewd life, as they write he kept three hundred Concubines, and as many boyes, for detestable vses: for which cause he grew grew to be so odious, that certaine eminent men conspired against him, resoluing secretly to haue slaine him, his sister LVCILLA who was wife to POMPEIANVS being a partaker in the action: Whereby it may well be imagined what he was; seeing that his owne sister held him worthie of death.

Lucilla, Commodus his owne sister, conspired against him.

All being concluded how it should be done, and the charge of the execution being giuen to one, whose name was QVINCIANVS (as HERODIANVS reporteth) yet LAMPRIDIVS saith, that the charge was giuen to POMPEIANVS, that he should first strike him, and should haue beene seconded by the rest of the conspirators; It happened that this man, as he was very bold and hardy, fayled in the action: for hauing had sufficient oportunitie to haue slain him, and being come neere, he would not so dispatch him, but in a brauing manner, being somwhat farre from him, he set his hand vpon his poiniard; and going towards him, said, here COMMODVS, the Senate hath sent thee this poiniard; and for any haste that he could make to stab him, with greater haste he was preuented by some of the Emperors guard, and by them was taken; so as the conspiracie was presently discouered, and a great way laid open to COMMODVS his cruelties. For after that all such as were guiltie, had been executed, together with his own sister LVCILLA, and her husband POMPEIANVS, by the hand and direction of PERENIVS, many Senators and a great number of other Noble and prime men, were also put to death, and their goods seized vpon, by producing false witnesses, which were suborned to accuse them: Wherewith PERENIVS became so rich, as he practised, and was in hope to haue made himselfe Emperour. But COMMODVS being aduertised of these and other his treacheries, made him and a sonne of his to be slaine. After which he suffered himselfe to bee gouerned by another fauorite, named CLEANDER; who was so wicked and extreme in cruelties, rapine, and briberie, that he surpassed PERENIVS. And this fellow did so exceede, as the people of Rome vnable to endure him, took Arms, and in a tumult, went to a house of pleasure in Rome, where the Emperour was, and required to haue CLEANDERS head; and notwithstanding that the Emperors guard began to make resistance, yet the matter came to such issue, that COMMODVS was constrained in despite of himselfe to deliuer him, and so were both he and his two sonnes slaine.

Cleander slain by the people.

This tumult being pacified, which COMMODVS durst not punish, he was so incensed and therewith so fearefull, that from thenceforth he trusted no man: but as a Swine drawne out of the mire, so returned he to his abominable vices, taking care for no other thing. Within a while after, according to his accustomed manner, he suffered himselfe to be abused by another fauorite, whose name was IVLIANVS, and another called REGILIVS, both which he afterwards caused to be put to death, with other his fauorites which succeeded them; together with a multitude of great men, which LAMPRIDIVS reciteth: and all things were so farre out of order, that magistracies and the gouernements of Prouinces were sold for money; and they which bought them were oftentimes slaine. Matters being thus managed by the Emperour, and by those which ruled him, he spent his time only in vices, and most dishonest and effeminate pleasures; colouring his hayre, and often bathing himselfe in company of others of his condition: whom he called by most dishonest names, to the end they should be conformable to their liues and actions. And he was not ashamed (notwithstanding these his vicious and abominable courses) to take the name and habit of a man who was a great enemy to those vices, which was HERCVLES: so as for COMMODVS ANTONINVS, sonne to MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS, he commanded himselfe to be called HERCVLES the sonne of IVPITER; and cladding himselfe in a most ridiculous manner with the skin of a Lion, and a club in his hand, like HERCVLES, he so vsed to goe abroade; whereat some laughed, and others murmured. And sometimes he went cloathed like an Amazon woman, which was more correspondent to his condition: which he did for the loue of one of his Concubines whom he much loued, whose name was MARTIA, whose picture he ware, drawne at life, vpon that habit. After this, as if he had as well deserued it as AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, he commanded the moneth of August should be called Commodus; and September Hercules; for he had taken that name: and December Amazonius, after the name of an Amazon: But this was obserued no longer then he liued.

Commodus attired like an Amazon.

This accursed man, among his vitious parts, had a strange abilitie of body, which was, to cast or hurle a dart or a launce, better then any man of his time: he was a most certaine shooter, eyther in crosse-bow, or long bow; and so skilfull, that (in certaine feasts and huntings, which according to the custome were then made in Rome, whither came an infinite number of people to to behold the same) he commanded a gallerie to be made round about the Amphitheater; within which he might runne freely and in safety; and there running round about with exceeding swiftnesse, hurling his darts or iauelins, he killed almost all the Stagges and Harts that were let loose, without missing one throw, or needing any more then one shotte; he was so sure to strike them, eyther in the heart, in the forehead, or any other part whersoeuer he would: and he did the like by Lions, Panthers, and Ounces, which to that end, were brought thither that day. With his bowe and arrowes he would kill birds flying in the ayre, and did such other actiue exercises, as in truth were very strange: Whereby it appeareth that this man wanted not witte and abilitie to haue applied himselfe to goodnesse, as well as to sinne and wickednesse. And as cruelties was the thing wherein he did principally delight, so it pleased the most mercifull King of heauen, that the same was the cause of his death. For it happened, that hauing resolued to put a great number of the best reputed Cittizens to death, he wrote a memoriall of those which he purposed should die, amongst which was his louing friend MARCIA, and AELIVS LETVS Captaine of the Pretorian Cohorts: it happened that this his beloued MARCIA vpon some occasion came to the sight of this note; who seeing her selfe condemned to death, determined with her selfe to assure her life by the death of COMMODVS. And taking counsell with AELIVS LETVS, and with another whose name was ELECTVS, who was also condemned, concerning the contents; they agreed among themselues to poyson him, which as speedily as might be, was giuen him by the same MARCIA in a cuppe of mingled wine which hee did vse to drinke: and being presently taken with a heauie slumber, MARCIA commanded all the company to goe forth of the chamber, vnder colour to suffer him to take his rest. This being done, within a little while after he awoke, extremely vomiting; and MARCIA and the rest fearing that he would again haue cast vp the poyson, in all haste called in a valiant yong man named NARCISSVS, shewing him the note, and how the Emperor would haue put him to death also; and making him large promises, they concluded that he should goe in and kill him, which he did: and so this vnhappy and wretched COMMODVS vomiting and strangely tormented with the poison, was by this NARCISSVS stabd and slaine, to the good liking of the Roman people, and generally of all the world. When his death was knowne, there was o man but did commend and approue the fact. He died, being of the age of 32 yeeres, and in the yeere of our Lord 194. hauing raigned twelue yeeres and eight moneths. The ioy which afterwards was conceiued in Rome when his death was published, was incredible: and although that at the present it was not certainly knowne, but that he died sodainly of an Apoplexie, which EVTROPIVS affirmeth in his life; They ran vp and downe the streetes that night, crying and calling one to another with ioy, and went to the Temples to render thanks to the gods for so great a benefit: and others went to the Palace to behold his dead carcasse. The Senate and Roman Nobilitie conceiued no lesse ioy then did the people, which may sufficiently appeare by the number of cursings which the Senate gaue him, when PERTINAX was chosen Emperor, and his successor: which M. MAXIMVS writeth, and AELIVS LAMPRIDIVS maketh relation thereof, which is a pleasing thing to reade.

The cruelties of Commodus was the cause of his death.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS AELIVS PERTINAX, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND NINETEENTH ROMAN EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter Commodus, Pertinax was Emperor: who being borne of base condition attained to the Imperiall dignitie, more by his vertues, then the Nobilitie of his bloud, or the glory of his auceſtors; being the ſonne of a Libertine. He was firſt a Doctor of the Law; and afterwards leauing that profeſſion, he gaue himſelf to Armes; wherein he behaued himſelfe ſo excellently, as he deſerued to be made Emperour, to which dignitie thoſe which conſpired againſt Commodus aduanced him; who went to him, he lying in his bed, expecting death death rather than the Empire. And, notwithſtanding that he carried himſelf excellently well in the gouernment of the Empire, and neuer ſought to be reuenged on thoſe which had offended him, yet there failed not ſome which enuied his goodnes, and deſired his death; which was giuen him with many wounds, when he had raigned the ſpace of three months, being of the age of ſixty ſeuen yeers: for whoſe vertues, the Senate reſolued to place him in the number of their gods.

THE good and valiant PVBLIVS ÆLIVS PERTINAX ſucceeded the wicked and tyrannous Emperor COMMODVS, being almoſt threeſcore and ten yeers old; and held the ſame but three months. The manner how he attain'd therto, I will preſently ſhew you, when we ſhall briefly haue declared the wars, the offices and troubles, which he firſt paſſed: for, they were ſuch and ſo diuerſe, as he was therefore called The wheel of Fortune. Truely this Emperor was a notable example of humane changes. He was the ſonne of a Libertine, which had been a ſlaue and made free, called ÆLIVS; and being a childe was taught to write and reade, and caſt account; which his father did, to the end hee ſhould help him in his poor Mercery-ſhop. Afterwards hee came to learne the Greek and Latine Gammar; ſo as he came to be a Maſter, and to keep a ſchool in Rome. After this he gaue himſelf to the ſtudy of the Lawes; and, by the interceſſion of LOLIANVS AVITVS who had been Conſul, and his fathers maſter, he obtained liberty to plead, and to defend mens cauſes; which hee did for ſome ſpace. But, being naturally a man of ſtrength and courage, and more inclined to Arms than Letters, he gaue ouer that exerciſe, and went to the wars; wherin he caried himſelf ſo well, as within few daies he was made Captain of a Cohort in Syria againſt the Parthians: and, increaſing in credit or eſtimation, he was ſent to the wars in Britanny, and afterwards to the warres of Miſsia, and was made a Captain of horſemen in the wars which MARCVS AVRELIVS waged againſt the Germans; and afterwards was Admirall of a Fleet in the Flemiſh Seas: and, that charge being ended, he continued in the warres of Dacia; where through ſiniſter informations he was depriued of the charge hee held, by MARCVS AVRELIVS: although afterwards he returned into grace by the interceſſion of POMPEIANVS the Emperors ſonne-in-law, and was made a Senator, but then he vſed it not: and, in recompenſe of the diſgrace paſt, the Emperour made him Colonel of a Legion; ſo as in the warres which were in the time of MARCVS AVRELIVS he performed many notable feats of Arms, as well againſt ſtrange and barbarous nations, as againſt AVIDIVS CASSIVS; who (as wee ſaid) rebelled againſt MARCVS AVRELIVS. His valiant acts were ſo many and ſuch, that hee was many times publiquely praiſed by him, and made Conſul of Rome. After that, hee had the gouernment of both the Miſsias, and of Dacia; in all which charges he caried himſelf ſo valiantly, and with ſuch equity, as the ſame Emperor honored him with the gouernment of all Syria & Aſia; which was the greateſt charge the Emperors gaue. And, MARCVS AVRELIVS being dead, and the time of his office expired, he came to Rome, after that he had gouerned foure conſulary Prouinces, and had himſelf bin Conſul; beſides other commands, gouernments, and charges of greater quality, with great renown and fame of bounty and valour. But, comming to Rome during the Raign of the wicked Emperor COMMODVS; by the inſtigation of a certain fauourite of his, he was baniſht from Rome. But, hee being dead, who was the cauſer of his baniſhment, COMMODVS ſent him into the Ile of Britanny, to reform the abuſes of an Army and certain Legions which were there; whither he went, and ſetled all in good order; but he was firſt in great danger, and hardly eſcaped with his life: for, a Legion being in mutinie ſlue ſome of his people, and vſed him in ſuch manner that hee was left for dead in the field among the dead: and, hauing eſcaped this danger, he reſolutely puniſhed the offenders, and pacified the Legions. At his eſpeciall requeſt there was one ſent to ſucceed him, and hee was ſent Proconſul into the Prouince of Africa: wherein he likewiſe paſſed many dangers in mutinies, in ſeditions of the people, and of the ordinary Legions; for, as long as COMMODVS was Emperor, there was no ſuch order in any place as was conuenient. And Writers affirm, that had it not bin for PERTINAX & ſuch other Captains as liued after the death of his father M. AVRELIVS, the Roman Empire had bin exposed to great daunger. But hauing performed his charge in Africa with honour, although not without much trouble & difficultie, being now old and spent, he came to Rome, and COMMODVS made him Prefect thereof; being in this estate, death seised vpon COMMODVS by reason of his cruelties, PERTINAX dayly expecting when COMMODVS would haue bereaued him of life. This valiant man lying one night careleslie sleeping in his bed when COMMODVS was dead; MARTIA, his friend, which had plotted his death, and AELIVS LETVS Captaine of the Pretorian Cohorts, and those which conspired with them, agreed together to cause PERTINAX to be chosen Emperour. And to this effect about midnight, before that the death of COMMODVS was published, the said Captaine AELIVS LETVS with some of his souldiers of the Cohorts, came to the house of PERTINAX, who (as I said) lay secure in his bed; and in great haste causing the dore to be opened, went vp into his chamber: whom when he saw, yea and before, when he but vnderstood that he was comming vp, he assured himselfe that by COMMODVS his commandement he came to kill him, not knowing him to be dead: and resoluing to suffer death with courage and patience, he lay still, without any shew to be moued thereat, but said vnto AELIVS LETVS; I haue for manie daies expected to end my life in this manner, and I marueiled that COMMODVS hath deferred it so long: and seeing it is so, why stand you still? Make an end with me, and do that which you are commanded.

Pertinax made Prefect of Rome by Commodus.

The speeche and great courage of Pertinax.

Whereto AELIVS LETVS answered, perswading him to put away all such feare, and not to thinke that he came to kill him, but to desire safetie of his owne life, for that the tyrannous Emperour COMMODVS was dead, and that they came to offer the Empire vnto him, who was onely worthie thereof. PERTINAX could hardlie believe what he heard with his eares: but in the end the matter being declared vnto him more at large, and the occasion which induced them to kill the Emperour, he accepted of their offer; and was carried by them to the Cohorts Camp: where the souldiers being assembled, their Captaine made a speech vnto them, conteining the wickednes and vices of the Emperour COMMODVS, and how that he by meanes of his excesse was dead of an Apoplexy; and reciting the vertues and excellencies of PERTINAX, counselled them to make him Emperour. Which they presently performed ioyfullie, and calling him AVGVSTVS, sware to him as the custome was; yet PERTINAX remained still doubtfull, and accepted thereof with feare, and against his will.

This being ended, and the day comming on, they came with him into the citie: and assembling the Senate, this old new Emperour came thither, vnwilling they should beare before him the Imperiall Ensignes, neither the fire, as the custome was; vntill such time as the Senate had agreed and giuen their consent. But when as he came into the Senate house, all the Senators saluted him Emperour, CÆSAR AVGVSTVS, and with great acclamations and blessings sware and yeelded to him obedience: which he still withstood, saying, that he deserued it not, alleaging his old age, and nominating others, which hee said were more worthie of that dignity. But in the end being ouercome and forced by them, he sate downe in the Imperiall chaire, and made vnto them a solemne oration (which HERODIANVS writeth). His oration being ended, he went forth of the Senate house (accompanied with all the Senators and Romane Nobilitie, with an infinite number of others, to the exceeding ioy of all men) to the Temples, as the custome was, and from thence to the Imperiall Palace. And so he began his raigne and obtained the Empire, to the generall good liking and contentment of all men, and was obeyed in like manner in all the prouinces of the Empire, in all which he was well knowne: and truly they had not been deceiued in their opinion and great hope which they had of him, if the wickednes of the Pretorian Souldiers had not hindred his good thoughts and resolutions.

Pertinax after many chaunges of fortune is made Emperor.

The first thing he attempted in the gouernment of the Empire, was to bridle the licentiousnes of the Pretorian Cohorts, and the insolencies and wrongs which they did to the citizens and people of Rome; by meanes of the fauour and loose life of COMMODVS. The like he also performed in all other disorders and abuses which in his time were tolerated; seeking to reduce all things to that forme and manner of gouernment which was vsed in the time of his father MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS. He entertained all men honourably and louingly, which had any occasion to negotiate with him: and he diuided the fields of Rome, and of the prouinces which lay vntilled and waste, granting that for tenne yeeres space no rent or tribute should be paid for the same. With these and such other things, this excellent and gracious Emperour so wanne the harts and loue of the common people, that al men held themselues happie in such an Emperour: for which occasion, besides the honourable titles which were giuen him by the consent of the Senate, the same Senate intituled his son, CÆSAR, and to his wife LICINIA was added the name of AVGVSTA: the good Emperour said, That his wiues name hee did accept, because her vertue was worthie thereof: But for his sonnes name, hee would that it should rest vntill that he had better deserued it. Perseuering in his good workes, all the goods and moueables, which COMMODVS had escheated and taken, he made to be restored to their owners, for which they should pay some small matter in exchange.

The Senate made Pertinax his sonne Cæsar, and his wife Augusta.

Euery day when the Senate did ordinarily sit, he went thither; and in his house he neuer refused to giue audience to any person at what time soeuer. When as the barbarous Nations and enemies to the Roman Empire had intelligence, and did certainly know that he was Emperour, they laid downe their Armes, and ceased to make warre against the Empire; and many sent Ambassadors vnto him (if they had found him liuing) to treate of peace and friendship: so as the small time he raigned, was to the generall good liking and contentment of all the world; excepting the men of warre, principally of the Pretorian Cohorts which lay about Rome; who presently began to abhorre him for that he kept them in quiet, bridling them with iustice, not suffering them to commit such riots, abuses and outrages as they did in the time of COMMODVS: and in like manner he was not beloued by the officers and ministers of the Imperiall Palace, for the like reasons. The shameleſse audaciousnesse of the souldiers grew to this height, that one day they would haue taken a Senator of a very Noble & ancient house, named TVLIANVS MATERNVS, and haue carried him to the Campe to haue made him Emperor, to the end he should haue rebelled against PERTINAX. But this MATERNVS (as a good and loyall seruant) escaping out of their hands, came to PERTINAX, and thence fled from Rome: which put the Emperor in great feare and amazement. And to content and pacifie them, hee made donatiues and distributions amongst them. But that little auailed: for they esteemed it not, but sought meanes to liue dissolutely at their libertie.

Pertinax hated by the Pretorian Cohorts.

Triarius Maternus, not to yeeld to the will of the souldiers which would haue made him Emperor, fled to Pertinax, and so from Rome.

PERTINAX raigned about three moneths: in which small time he had set all things in so good order, as the state of the Empire seemed to be changed, and not the same. And although he were so good, yet was there one whose name was FALCO, which practised his death, with a conceite to haue been Emperor: which being discouered to him, he came to the Senate, and would not endure they should proceede against him as against a tyrant. And notwithstanding that the prooфes were so plaine and manifest, as the offence was apparant, yet he pardoned him: but iustice was done vpon certain souldiers which had practised this treason; which the souldiers took so ill (their hatred and presumption daily increasing) as they concluded to kill him; and being so resolued, they cared not to conspire, or to vse any cunning or deceite. But openly a great troupe of them went from their lodgings in a tumult with their Swordes drawn, and with Halberds and other weapons, and came into Rome; and without resistance (as the matter was suddaine) they entred the Palace.

The Emperor being aduertised hereof, sent AELIVS LETVS to stay and pacifie them; who forgetting that he had made PERTINAX Emperour, cared not to performe his commandement, but rather approuing the fact, being (as some say) a partaker in the action, went forth another way to his owne lodging, at such time as the souldiers came into the Palace, where there was no meanes to make any resistance, being taken sodainly and disarmed. Wherfore the greatest part abandoned the Emperor and fled; and those which remained counselled him to flie, which he might easily haue done, and the people would haue defended him. But notwithstanding that he knew their counsell to be good and profitable, and that they spake the truth; yet would he not follow the same, alleaging it to be vnworthy the maiestie of an Emperor and his acts and life past, to saue his life by flight, or by hiding himselfe: and so he resolued to goe forth vnto them; conceiuing, that with his presence they would be ashamed, and so returne. And truely this conceite was ready to haue taken effect: for, comming forth of his chamber, and meeting with a multitude of them in the Court, they made a stand, and gaue him place to speake vnto them; which he did with great courage, without any shew of alteration; First, asking them what might bee the occasion of their comming in such a tumult, and without any respect: And afterward (without shew of any humilitie or fearefulnesse, but with as great grauitie and authoritie, as best fitted the dignity of his person) he began to say to them:

The wickednesse of Ælius Letus

The high minde of Pertinax being assailed by Souldiers and companions, if you come to kill me, and doe put in execution what you haue determined, you shall performe no act that is valiant, great, or commendable; neither very grieuous vnto me, which am now so old, and haue gotten so much honour and fame, that I regard not my life: for euery mans life hath an end. But you to whom belongeth the guard and defence of my Person, seeing your charge is to free and deliuer the Emperour from perils and treason, and shall be the first to lay your hands vpon him, consider, that for the present, it will be shamefull and odious, and hereafter in time to come, dangerous, and preiudiciall: For I haue done you no displeasure nor iniurie. If the death of COMMODVS offend you, it was no new matter to dye, seeing that he was a man: if you suspect that he was murthered, I am guiltlesse thereof; and you know that I am free from all suspicion in this case: what then passed, you knew before me; if there be any suspicion of his death, it concerneth others, and not me. But I say this, and assure you, that by reason of his death, there shall nothing be taken from you that you shall require, or that shall seeme necessary for you; requiring such things as are honest and possible, and not by force and violence.

PERTINAX hereuvith ending his speech, some of them began to alter their mindes and to depart, mooued thereto by his vvords and grauitie: but the furie of those which came behind them was so great, as they could not doe it nor defend him; so as one of them called TAVSIVS charged him and wounded him in the breast with a Launce: and hee seeing their determination, couered his head with his Robe, suffering himselfe to bee wounded by them all; and so they slew the poore and innocent Emperour. And EGNIVS LAETVS, who had been one of the chiefest in making him Emperour, going about to help to defend him, was also slaine; hauing first with great courage and resolution slaine two souldiers: and so they also slew some others which were his chamberlaines and other officers. A sonne and a daughter of his escaped, for that they were not lodged in the palace.

The miserable death of Pertinax.

This Prince in his gesture, shewed great grace and maiestie: his stature and constitution did well represent his state and dignitie. Hee ware his beard long, and his haire curled, his brest was large and full of flesh, and he was indifferently eloquent, vsing smooth and louing speeches. This Accident was so sudden, that he was slain before the people knew of any mutinie, or the coming of the souldiers: and the souldiers fearing the people, who they knew would take it grieuously, returned with as much or greater haste than they cam; and, fortifying their Camp, they set out sentinels, and held guards in the Bulwarks and Towers, fearing to be assaulted.

As soon as the death of the Emperour was knowne in the City, the sorrow and lamentation which was made for him was extreme; the people running vp and down the streets with incredible wrath and fury, seeking the murderers to be reuenged of his death. Thus they went vnaduisedly, without any certain knowledge of what passed, doing nothing but weep and complain one to another. But, when they vnderstood what hapned, they saw they neither could or durst proceed any further.

This Emperor died in the yeer of our Lord 195: some say lesse. Hee gouerned the Empire (according to EVSEBIVS) six months: IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS in his life saith, 85 daies, and no more; with whom agrees SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR. All which write, that his Successor IVLIANVS was of counsell and accessary to his death.

THE

THE LIFE OF DIDIVS IVLIANVS, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND TWENTITH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

DIdius Iulianus took the Empire, being a man proud, rich and ambitious; and, seeing that the Empire was set to sale by the souldiers which murthered Pertinax, was so presumptuous, as to go to buy it, with one other who would haue had the same for money; who was son-in-law to the murdered Emperor. But the souldiers doubting, that, making Pertinax his son-in-law Emperor, he would reuenge his death, they agreed to sell it to Iulianus; who was confirmed contrary to the will of the Senate, and in worse manner accepted by the people. Nevertheless, as though he had obtained that dignity by his vertue, or that it came to him by inheritance, he gaue himself to pleasure, respecting no mans enuie. But Septimius Seuerus, a man of much wisdome and great power, being Captain of the Legions in Germanie, hoping to be able to gette the Empire by force of Armes, came to Rome with his Army: of whom Iulianus standing in fear, would haue sent the Vestall virgins for Ambassadors vnto him. But the Senate, refusing to yeeld thereto, deprined him of the Empire, and proclaimed Septimius Seuerus, Emperor: who sending to Iulianus (the palace being abandoned, and he retired to weep) caused him to be slain, hauing been 7 months Emperor.

AFter the good ould PERTINAX, IVLIANVS succeeded in the Empire; hauing obtained the same for money from those souldiers which slue the Emperor PERTINAX. This IVLIANVS was natiue of Milan by his Fathers linage, who was called PETRONIVS DIDIVS SEVERVS: his mothers name was CLARA EMILIA: his grandfathers name was SALVIVS IVLIANVS, who had been Prefect of Rome, and twice Consul; which did enoble his house. This IVLIANVS was brought vp in the house and seruice of DOMICIA LVCILLA, mother to MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS the Philosopher; by whose fauour he attained to offices, and was made Questor, Edil and Pretor, in Rome. Afterwards hee followed the warres, and prooued a good Captain, performing many notable exploits, which in the time of MARCVS AVRELIVS were in Germany and other parts. Hee was in the beginning Captain of a Legion, and afterwards with an Army he had the charge and gouernment of Dalmatia; and then of lowe Germany; and, after that, he was made Gouerner of Bithynia in Asia, although in this gouernment hee did not bear himself with so good fame as in the rest. Hee was joyntly Consul with PERTINAX, and afterwards Proconsul in Africa; and, hauing executed these charges and offices, was now growne old, and very rich by means of his possessions and money which hee had in Rome.

The line of Didius Iulianus.

When PERTINAX was dead, hee obtained the Empire in such manner as was shamefull, and vnbefitting the greatnes of Rome. For, after that the souldiers had murdered the Emperor PERTINAX (as is said) they fortified their camp and lodgings for fear of the people: and the people durst not assail them, for that they were too strongly defensed with great bulwarks and turrets. The Senatours and Nobility knew not what to doo in this so cruell an Accident; but retired themselues to their houses, wherein they fortified themselues; and many of them went to their Castles and Possessions in the Country, holding themselues not very safe in Rome:

and so they passed that day, and the next after PERTINAX death.

The Pretorian Souldiers (as writeth HERODIANVS) seeing no man durst attempt to offend them, became yet more audacious: for, some of them, standing vpon the Ramparts of their Camp, cried out with loud exclamations, that they would giue the Empire to whosoeuer would buy the same, and pay best for it. This sale was presently published in the City, and this Proclamation was so odious and full of scandall and reproach, and also there were so few rich men left in Rome by reason of COMMODVS his cruelty and tyranny, that ther were but two merchants to be found to buy the Empire that was to be sould. The one was SVLPITIANVS at that time Prefect of Rome, a man who had been Consul, and was sonne-in-law to the late Emperor PERTINAX; and the other was DIDIVS IVLIANVS, of whom wee now speak. Truely, it is a matter worthy of great consideration, and a notable example for Princes: whereby it plainly appeares, how little constancy there is in their greatnes, and generally in all things in this life; and how little they ought to esteem the power, the kingdoms and dominions of this world, and all those other things called goods which are gotten in this world. For, considering that a Roman Emperor, being a wise old man, redoubted, beloued, and knowne to bee good and valiant by long experience, who (as we may say) was Lord of all the world (for, hee peaceably gouerned (in a manner) all that which the Kings in Christendome hould in Europe, and the Infidels in Africa, and as much as the great Turk possesseth in Asia, Gracia, and Egypt, and many other Princes and Lords besides) onely three hundred, or fewe more souldiers, sufficed to bereaue him of his life & dominion; being in Rome it self, which was the head & strength of all the Empire; and that they should escape free without any punishment, no man then seeking any reuenge of his death.

Who would regard or greatly esteem the riches and dominions of this world, or account the dignities, estates, and riches thereof to be great, and lose his owne life, and pawne his soule to get them; seeing that a Throne, and so great a power and majesty as was the Roman Empire, was set to sale at an Outcry; and there were but onely two that came to buy it, and it was sould for a little money? Truely, in my judgement, it was handled as it deserued.

And this may suffice for a warning and example to vs, that there is nothing in this world that is ought-worth, and to bee held of price; nor ought to bee gotten and held with the danger of the soule: and therefore men ought lightely to regard the losing or winning of the goods of this world, so as they may encrease the riches of the soule, and liue vertuously as Christians ought to doo. He that can attaine heerto, is rich and mighty: and all the rest without this are miserable, beggerly and vnhappy, although they command and raign ouer the whole world.

To return to our History: HERODIANVS writeth, that the fame of the souldiers proclamation cam to the house of DIDIVS IVLIANVS, being held the richest man in Rome: who with his wife and daughter sitting at dinner, very merry and pleasant in the midst of his fauourites and pleasant company, was by them all counselled, that, seeing hee had more money than any other man in Rome, he should not let slip so good a bargain, and so precious a Iewell as was the Roman Empire; but that he should go to the Camp to conferre with the souldiers, and to procure himself to be chosen and sworn Emperor: Who, presently arising from the table, went thither accompanied with his friends and seruants. ELIVS SPARCIANVS (who wrote his life) saith, that the first which perswaded him heerto, were PVBLIVS FLORIANVS, and VECTIVS APER, Tribunes. But, whosoeuer were his counsellers, they all agree, that when he came thither he found SVLPICIANVS the Prefect of Rome there before him, soliciting the soldiers to make him Emperor; promising them a great sum of mony, with other fauours and rewards: And the reason why his offers were not accepted, was, for that he was sonin-law to PERTINAX whom they had slain, and therefore they suspected him. Whereof, DIDIVS IVLIANVS put them also in minde; willing them to take heed that they made not choice of one who another day would reuenge the death of PERTINAX; Hee promising to giue them an infinite summe of money which he had in a readinesse; and that hee would restore all things to that order and form wherein COMMODVS had left the same, and would presently bring them a great summe of money to be diuided among them. His offer at last was accepted by the souldiers, and hee with ladders was receiued into the Fort, where they sware obedience vnto him: and, there hauing done certain ordinary ceremonies and sacrifices, hee went into the City, accompanied with the Pretorian Cohorts in Arms; ranged in so good order, as if they had been going to a battell: for, they were in great fear of the people. And so IVLIANVS entred the City, all the souldiers proclaiming his name, and calling him Emperor:

Didius Iulianus went to buy the Empire.

Iulianus being made Emperour came into Rome.

ror: the citizens durst not make any resistance, neither did they approue his election, as they vsed to do by other Emperors, but cursed him and threw stones at him.

IVLIANVS then went to the Senate: where assembling such Senators as were present, by their decree he was proclaimed Emperor, and they presently made his sonne in law CORNELIVS REPENTINVS Prefect of Rome, putting SVLPITIANVS out of that office: and from thence he was carried to the Imperiall Palace, and held for Emperor, more through force, then the good will of any honest men. And he as though that the Empire had descended to him by inheritance from his father, and that he had peaceably obtained the same with the good will of all men, gaue himselfe to riot and pleasures, shewing himself negligent and retchlesse in matters of gouernment. And notwithstanding that he was milde and affable, and did no harme to any man in all the time of his raigne; yet he presently began to be hated of the souldiers, for that he did not performe that which he had promised. The people of Rome hated him, because he was chosen and made Emperor by those which murthered PERTINAX whom all the world loued; and they were of opinion that he was guiltie and accessarie to his death. So as whensoeuer he went out of his Palace, the people openly powred out their curses against him; which he patiently endured, sometimes with laughter, beckening with his hand that they should come to him, making shew of loue and good will vnto them: yet it little auailed him, but rather increased their hatred; in such manner, as standing one day to behold certaine games and sports, the people of Rome proclaymed PESCENIVS NIGER who was Proconsul, and Gouernor of Syria, which was the greatest charge and gouernment of the Empire, calling to him that hee should come to their rescue and to procure their libertie; of all which insolencies, IVLIANVS made little reckoning. And it hapned that as soone as the Armies which were on the frontiers of Germany and in Syria, vnderstood how ill IVLIANVS was beloued in Rome, and how carelesly he gouerned, each of these Armies presumed to make their Generall, Emperour. In Syria PESCENIVS NIGER was Gouernor, who was a man of good yeeres, and had held great commands and gouernments, and had done very many notable feates of Armes: it was reported of him, that he was milde and wise, and seemed to imitate the life and gouernment of the Emperor PERTINAX. This man knowing the good will which was borne him in Rome, and that his Armie and souldiers loued him, determined to proclaime himselfe Emperor, and presently took the ensignes thereof: and all those nations, Kings and Potentates of Asia, yeelding obedience, came or sent Ambassadors vnto him. The Army in Germany held for their Generall SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, borne in Africa, a man of great courage and counsell, and aboue all, very double and subtile, and of great experience, who had had many gouernments, magistracies, and commands, and had been Consul in Rome, and Proconsul in the gouernments of Sicilia, Africa, and the Pannonies, and was also very well beloued of his souldiers, by whom he was importuned: and seeing the occasion and oportunitie, he resolued also to proclaime himselfe Emperour, taking vpon him the state and ensignes thereof: and publishing that he would reuenge the death of the Emperour PERTINAX, he made himselfe beloued of the men of warre in Germany, and of the Romane people: so as there were at one time three Emperours, or to say more properly, three tyrants. IVLIANVS (who was Emperour in Rome) notwithstanding that he knew what SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS did in Germany, it troubled him very much; and he dealt with the Senate to proclaime him rebell, and that they should send certaine principall men Ambassadors to procure the Army to abandon SEVERVS, and to hold him for Emperour whom the Senate had approued, which was himselfe: and he sent VALERIVS CATVLINVS to further the businesse, and to succeede SEVERVS in his gouernment. But SEVERVS had taken so good order, that this did little profit him: for he had already obtained their obedience, and had assured vnto himselfe the loue of all that countrie and the marches thereof; resoluing to march with his Army towards Rome, where he knew that IVLIANVS was not beloued. Now PESCENIVS NIGER who was called Emperour in Asia, was not so circumspect as he might haue beene: for, seeing himselfe serued by Kings, rich in gold and siluer, mightie in Armies and men of warre, confidently trusting in the loue of the people of Rome; he gaue himselfe to feasting and banqueting in Antioch.

Pescenius Niger proclaimed Emperor in Syria.

Septimius Seuerus a valiant Captain of great experience, pretended title to the Empire.

When it was knowne in Rome that SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS came thitherwards, IVLIANVS awakened from his drowsie sleep, began to put himself in Arms, and applied himselfe wholly to make prouision for the warres; and, mustering his Troops, took the Fields with the Pretorian Army which had made him Emperor; which he found very feeble, as well for want of experience and exercise in Arms, as for that they were ill paid by him: and the people of Rome repaired also vnto him with a very ill will, for that he was made Emperor against their liking: and the Cities of Italy had a long time liued in quiet and peace, and were not accustomed to the wars.

In this manner all went ill with IVLIANVS; and well with his enemy: and IVLIANVS was generally ill obeyed; whom his friends counselled, that, with the best forces he could be able to leuie, he should meet SEVERVS vpon the way, and stoppe his passage ouer the Alps: but either he would not, or durst not do so, but made the best prouision in Rome he could; and, before he was aware, he vnderstood that SEVERVS was already entred Italie, and that the most part of the Cities had receiued him, and yeelded him their obedience. The people of Rome seeing this, and that PESCENIVS NIGER whom they desired remained in Asia, began to like of SEVERVS his coming.

Seuerus refuseth to be partner in the Empire with Iulianus.

IVLIANVS, seeing himself driuen to this streight, obtained of the Senate to write and to send Ambassadors to SEVERVS, offering to make him equall and companion in the Empire with IVLIANVS. But SEVERVS, not contented with part, but with the whole, would not accept thereof, holding himself to bee of greater power than IVLIANVS, notwithstanding that vntill then the Senate held with him: but they, seeing the little counsell and lesse strength of IVLIANVS, beganne to abandon him. And although hee desired that the Vestall Virgins (which was the most precious and highly-esteemed thing in their vain religion) should be sent to pacifie SEVERVS, and to work some means of peace; yet the Senate would not yeeld thereto, alleaging that he was vnworthy to rule, who durst not defend the Empire by force of Arms. And the matter came to this passe, that disguised persons daily came into Rome from SEVERVS, and others went from thence to him; and IVLIANVS, void of all reliefe and succours, remained in his Palace generally abandoned, sauing of a very few souldiers.

The Senate abandons Iulianus.

The Senate was assembled, and by the common consent of all the Senators it was decreed, that IVLIANVS should be depriued of the Empire, and SEVERVS proclaimed Emperour; and there were of the principall of the Senators sent to SEVERVS in ambassage, to yeeld to him their obedience, with the ensignes of Emperour, CÆSAR, AVGVSTVS: and spreading a rumour abroad that IVLIANVS had poisoned himselfe, they commaunded him to be slaine in his Palace, where the infortunate Emperour was found disarmed, and with som few of his friends weeping like a child. And so was IVLIANVS slaine at the age of 57. yeeres, hauing raigned only seauen moneths, in the yeere of our Lord 195.

THE LIFE OF SEPTIMVS SEVERVS, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND ONE & TWENTITH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

SEptimius Seuerus hauing taken the Empire more by force of Armes and feare, wherein he did put the Senators and people of Rome, then for any right he had; the first thing he did, was to reuenge the death of Pertinax, by depriuing all those which had slaine him and sold the Empire, of all Military dignitie. Afterwards, entring Rome with great pompe, he perswaded the Senators and people to hope well of him, and to bend their weapons against Pescenius Niger, who was called Emperour: Whom finally after many changes of fortune, he ouercame. He likewise ouerthrew Artabanus King of Persia, and tooke the Citie of Tisphonte, wherein was all that Kings treasure, and ouercame Albinus, who was made Cæsar. This Seuerus was a man addicted to the warres warres, ambitious, ambitious, constant in his resolution to bring any thing to passe that he had once vndertaken, and therewith very wise and circumspect in all matters appertaining to the preseruation of his estate, and gouernment of the Empire. Finally, oppressed with a long infirmity, and particularly with a most deplorable paine in his feete, hee died, hauing ruled the Empire eighteene yeeres; vsing no lesse wisedome in preserning it, then hee had shewed boldnesse and courage in getting it.

AFter IVLIANVS, SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS succeeded in the Empire, who onely among all the Emperours was borne in Africa, in a citie called Leptis. His fathers name was GETA, and his mothers FVLVIA PIA. He had two Vncles by his mothers side, which were Consuls in Rome; his grandfathers name by his mother was MACER; and by his fathers side, FVLVIVS APIVS. IVLIANVS being dead in such manner as we haue declared, and SEVERVS marching with his Armie towards Rome, as against his enemies; vpon the way certaine Ambassadours met him, which in the name of the Senate and people of Rome yeelded to him their obedience, and gaue him the title and ensignes of Emperour, certifying him of the death of IVLIANVS. He receiued this Ambassage in presence of the Armie, being marshalled and in Armes, and gaue gifts to the Ambassadours; and entertaining them with great honour, continued his iourney towards Rome: where aswell the Pretorian souldiers stoode in feare of him, for that they had slaine the Emperour PERTINAX, whom they knew he loued, as also all the Romane people, for the desire they had that PESCENIVS NIGER should haue been Emperour; who in the East (as is said) was called so. SEVERVS, when he came neere to Rome, sent commandement that all the Pretorian Souldiers should come forth to receiue him, clad in shew of peace, leauing their armes in their campe; which they did, hoping thereby to haue pleased and pacified him, by ioyfully obeying his commandement. And he concealing what he purposed to doe, hauing only acquainted some of his fauorites and captaines therewith, attended their comming in field, in a place which he had chosen for that purpose; where they comming to doe him reuerence, were compassed about by his Armie: and making a short speech vnto them, he reproched them with the cruelty and treason which they had vsed in killing the Emperour PERTINAX: Which being ended, he made them to put off the clothes and apparell which they ware, and to put away their daggers and poiniards from them (for other weapons they had none) and then he pronounced sentence against them; wherein he depriued them of the honour of souldiers, and banished them from Rome and a hundred miles about. He presently sent to their Campe to take their armes from them, and the imperiall ensignes; and so they were punished and disgraced, although not so much as they deserued, for the cruell murther which they had committed, and the selling of the Empire.

The punishment of the Pretorian souldiers which slew Pertinax.

This being done, SEVERVS entred into Rome, with his whole Armie, with their Ensignes displaied, and his souldiers in armes, appparelled in the best and most solemne manner they could. The number of his men was so great, that it was a most faire and stately spectacle to behold. The Senate went to the gates of the citie to receiue him, and there saluted him after the accustomed manner: and the people receiued him with blessings and applauses; notwithstanding that it was odious vnto them to see him come armed, and in warlike manner. Hauing performed the solemnities, and visited the Temples, as the manner then was, he went to his lodging in the Imperiall palace: and the next day he commanded the Senate to be assembled, whither he also went accompanied with armed men; wherein (as he was a wise man and well aduised) hee made a very smooth speech, giuing them great hope of good gouernment, and excusing himselfe for taking vpon him the name and authoritie of Emperour, without their consent and good liking first obtained; pretending that he did it, to reuenge the death of PERTINAX, and to free them from the tyrannie of IVLIANVS: for that it was a thing vnworthie the Romane Empire, he should liue which had bought it with money. In conclusion, his words were of such efficacie, as the Senat went thence satisfied and wel content: yet some of the old Senators which better knew his condition, gaue little credit to his words; for they held him for a man that was very double, subtil and a great dissembler: and notwithstanding that he was so, yet in truth he was a most sufficient man in any thing, very valiant in armes, and before that he was Emperour had gouerned great prouinces, and attained to be Questor, Tribune, Pretor, Proconsul, and Consul; and had held Commands and charges, wherein he purchased the name nam e and reputation of a valiant, wise, and excellent Captaine. And if a man well consider how the Empire was then diuided betweene three Lords, and with what valour hee subdued the whole, with the other warres and accidents which happened in his time; he may well bee esteemed for a very valiant Emperour and excellent Captaine, and may be compared with any of those in ancient time. Besides all which, he was very learned, and a great Mathematician, a good Orator and Philosopher. But his prowesse in Armes was so great, as it cannot be written by me (considering the breuitie which I vse) but cursorily, and so to expresse such things as are most cleere, although in haste: yet will they glister in their sight which shall behold the same.

After that he had taken vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, he set speedie order for the reformation of abuses in the Citie, by reason of the dissensions and tumults passed. He also presently honoured and buried the Emperor PERTINAX: and in remembrance of that good old man, he took to himselfe his surname, calling himselfe SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS PERTINAX. He paid and gaue gifts and rewards to his men of warre, and also to the people of Rome; and as the custome of the new Emperors was, he made distributions and gaue large donatiues. He also married two daughters which he had, with two principall men, one called PROBVS, and the other ECIVS: and after that he had giuen great dowries with them, he vsed such meanes that they were both chosen Consuls. And whereas at that time there was great scarcitie of corne in Rome, he took such order, and that with such expedition, as the Citie was sufficiently prouided for and furnished: which course he held euer during all the time of his raigne, in such sort as there was neuer any want. All these things and other, concerning the gouernment of the Empire, he performed with such expedition, in thirtie dayes only that hee remained there: for from the first day that he was Emperour, hee determined to addresse his iourney towards the East with his Armie against PESCENIVS NIGER, who (as is said) was called Emperor, and was very powerfull, and an excellent Captaine. Hauing made preparation for his iourney, he sent a Captaine and new legions into the Prouince of Africa, to guard the same; to the end that by the way of Egypt and Libya, PESCENIVS NIGER should not make any profit of that Prouince. And the better to leaue all things in safety behinde him in the West (for he was in feare of CLODIVS ALBINVS a Nobleman and a Senator of Rome, who was Captaine of the Legions in Britanny, and was a man of a great parentage, rich, and well beloued, he bethought himselfe how he might compasse him and make him his friend, by giuing him the name and title of CÆSAR and his successor, whereof hee aduertised him with very louing and gracious speeches: by which meanes for that time he remained in quiet and in peace.

This being done, leauing the best order in Rome he could, and such as was most expedient (nominating and choosing companies and Pretorian Cohorts to remaine in the Citie, in the place of those which he had cashiered and degraded from the honour of bearing Armes) he departed thence, continuing his iourney with the best and greatest force he was able to leuie. PESCENIVS NIGER being aduertised of the comming of his enemie, as vntill then he had liued idle and careleslie; so now with great diligence & expedition he leuied soldiers: and beside the ordinary Armie which he had, he sent some Captaines speedily to stop the passages out of Europe into Asia the lesse; and also sent to craue aide of the Kings of Parthia, Armenia, and other Kings and Tetrarchs of the East; from whom, and from the Prouinces which were vnder his obedience, there came great power and reliefe vnto him: and so the world was diuided into two factions; so as there began one of the most cruell warres that euer had been, as well for the valour of the Captaines, as for the power and multitude of souldiers; which warre was continued in many parts, both by sea and land. SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS passed out of Europe into Asia the lesse, but with great trouble and difficultie, hauing many skirmishes, and being often assailed by PESCENIVS his troupes, who sent against him an excellent Roman Captaine called EMILIANVS, who was Generall of all his forces. This EMILIANVS hauing drawn together all the power which PESCENIVS sent him, and all the rest that he was able to leuie out of Cappadocia, Galatia, Bithynia, and other Prouinces of Asia the lesse, took the fielde, in the way where SEVERVS was to passe: where followed many great skirmishes and encounters, and in the end a most cruell and terrible battaile, wherein EMILIANVS was ouerthrowne. After this battaile, the conquered troupes which escaped, went to PESCENIVS NIGER, who with all his power was in the Citie of Antioch in Syria; from whence he departed to meete with SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS vpon the way as he was comming: and marching towards him him (after some matters of lesser importance which passed) the two Armies drew neere the one to the other in a great Plaine by the Sea side in the countrie of Cilicia (as HERODIANVS reporteth, yet SPARCIANVS and EVTROPIVS differ therein) in the same place where DARIVS was the first time ouerthrowne by ALEXANDER the Great; where (by the consent of both the Generals) they came to a battaile with the greatest numbers and best souldiers that then were in the world; which by reason of the experience, valour, and wisedome of the Captaines, was most cruell. For, fighting the greatest part of the day without any apparant aduantage, the number of the slaine and wounded was so great, that the streames of water which ranne through the fields, were so full, and died with the bloud of men and horses, as there seemed to be no water therein; A great number of disarmed people of the inhabitants thereabouts, standing vpon the tops of the hils to behold the battaile, and to see whether partie should haue the victorie. Which when either partie by all means possible had endeuoured to obtaine, in the later end of the day PESCENIVS NIGER was ouerthrowne, without failing in any point in what he ought, and was most expedient for a good Captain to haue done: for in truth SEVERVS his souldiers were more expert and better trained in the warres; and seeing there was no other remedie, he fled, but was followed and afterwards found by SEVERVS his souldiers, who smote off his head, and carried it through the Campe vpon the point of a Launce. This PESCENIVS NIGER was a man of meane parentage; yet some say that he was Noble and auncient: his fathers name was ANIVS FVSCVS, and his mother was called LAMPRIDIA. He was a man indifferently well learned, and obtained great riches. He was sharpe and quick witted, euer followed the warres, and was an excellent souldier; and afterwards performed the charge committed to him, with great discretion and courage: for, they write of him, that he was a valiant and much commended Tribune; a very singular and excellent Captaine; a most seuere and vpright Lieutenant Generall; a most wise and prudent Consul; and in all things happy and fortunate, but only infortunate in being Emperor, not knowing how to gouern himselfe therein. So as it plainly appeareth, that men doe often times desire and purchase to themselues shame and perdition, by presuming to attaine to honour and greatnesse.

The wisedome and valour of Pescenius.

SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, hauing obtained so notable a victorie, with all speede aduertised the Roman Senate thereof, and as a conqueror did his will vpon the conquered, cruelly killing many of those which had taken part with NIGER: and principally he ruined the Citie of Antioch, by reason that it (more then any other) had aided and assisted his aduersarie, whose wife and children he commanded to be banished from Rome. And to the contrary, hee gaue gifts and rewards to those which had done him seruice and assisted him; and repaired the harmes and damages which some Cities, which held with him, had received by NIGERS souldiers. For in truth this man was very cruell in punishing offences, and in persecuting his enemies; and very liberall and gratefull to his friends, and most bountifull in rewarding those which had done him any seruice. In all the Prouinces of the East, after this victorie, he found no resistance, sauing among the Parthians, the Persians, and the Adiabenians, very mightie Nations: who for the loue they bare vnto NIGER, and the ancient hatred to the Romane name, presently took Armes against SEVERVS; and hee in person went against them, and had many battailes and incounters, and obtained great victories, which I haue no time to relate: so as hee inlarged the Empire and the Romane name, and pacified the Prouinces.

SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS hauing brought all his purposes to so good and prosperous estate, being seduced by the diuel, he resolued to persecute the Catholike Christian Church, so as an infinite number of the faithfull were put to death; and this was the fift persecution of the Church. For which occasion (as PAVLVS OROSIVS noteth) God would not permit that he should long enioy the Empire in peace: for he was aduertised from Rome how that ALBINVS, who (as we said) was Captaine in great Britannie, and whom he made CÆSAR when he went for the East, was risen in Armes, and proclaimed himselfe Emperor; and that he was of very great power, and much beloued of the Romane Nobilitie: for he was natiue of Rome, and of a great and Noble Familie. But he being of a hautie minde little regarded those difficulties: and setting all things in order in the East, with his Armie, took his way towards Rome, to the end he might goe against ALBINVS, as against a tyrant and a rebell. And passing from Asia into Europe ouer the streight at Byzantium, which is now called Constantinople, he wholly ruined that Citty; for that when he went towards Asia, that Citie would not receiue him; and so he left it leuell with the ground (which was one of the most famous Cities in the world) and it it remained so desolate vntill the time of CONSTANTINE the Great; as in his time we will declare.

SEVERVS trauelling thus towards Rome, his Aduersary ALBINVS being aduertised thereof, came out of Britanny into France, where he raised a mighty Armie; part whereof hee sent to keepe the passages of the Alpes, thereby to hinder him, who was arriued at Rome, and was now vpon his way comming to meete him: before which time he put PESCENNIVS NIGERS children to death, thereby wholly to extinguish all remembrance of him. And going to the warres, he appointed his sonne BASSIANVS ANTONINVS for his successor, and intituled him CÆSAR; and changing his name, he commanded him to be called, AVRELIVS ANTONINVS. Drawing neere to his enemies, the warres began in a most cruell manner betweene them; where in the beginning in some encounters, SEVERVS his Captaines were ouerthrowne by those of ALBINVS his partie.

Seuerus put to death Nigers children.

But after that he had passed the Alpes, and was entred into France, the warre was kindled in many parts; and in many conflicts and skirmishes fortune shewed her selfe variable, the victorie inclining sometimes to one side, and sometime to the other; vntill at last neere vnto the Citie of Lions, (wherein ALBINVS was) either partie drawing together his whole power, they fought one of the most bloudy battailes that euer was written of: which continued the greatest part of the day without any apparance of aduantage. First, the victory seemed to bee of ALBINVS his side: for his Battalions were of such force, as they forced SEVERVS Troupes to retire; in such sort, as his Souldiers began to flye: and it so happened that SEVERVS horse fell with him, and euery man held him for dead; and ALBINVS his Souldiers began to crie Victorie, victorie, taking no care but to follow the execution. Then LEON, one of SEVERVS his Captaines, who vntill then had neuer charged, with a very great Troup of armed men which he brought with him, renued the fight in such sort, as SEVERVS was rescued: and being remounted vpon another horse, charged with such fury, as he tooke the victorie out of ALBINVS his Souldiers hands, who accounting themselues Victors, obserued no order: and the matter was so handled, that ALBINVS his Troupes were driuen to turne their backes; and SEVERVS followed the execution, killing them euen to the gates of the Citie of Lions.

The valour of Leon, one of Seuerus Captaines.

The number of those which were slaine and wounded, was infinite: and the citie was presently entred, and ALBINVS taken; and his head being striken off, was brought to SEVERVS. A man may well beleeue that he was not a little ioyfull when he saw it, considering that a little before he was wounded and cast to the ground, and by all men accounted for dead, and his enemies victorious; but escaping all this, he now saw himselfe an absolute Lord, and his enemies confounded. Wherefore let euery Christian reader consider how inconstant all things are in this life; and that a man neither can, or ought to repose his assured confidence in any thing in this world. Great were the cruelties which SEVERVS committed after that he had obtained this victorie: and truly if this Prince had not been so cruell and greedie of bloudie euents both in warre and gouernment as he was, I am of opinion that no man either before or after him, had excelled him; considering the actions and enterprises which he brought to an end, whereof I write but the summe.

The cruelties of Seuerus.

These things being past, SEVERVS presently wrote to the Senate and people of Rome, aduertising them of his victorie, and sending them ALBINVS his head, which he commanded should be set vpon the end of a pole in the publike place: and all those Senators which of ALBINVS his partie were slaine in this battaile, he commanded to be quartered, and those which were taken aliue, he commanded to be slaine. He was so cruell and vindicatiue (as some write) that he mounted vpon a verie furious great horse, and rode many times ouer the dead bodie of ALBINVS: which is not much to be marueiled at, considering from how cruell and barbarous a Nation he was descended. Some write, that he first caused his body to be torne in many pieces, and to be throwne into the Riuer Rhodanus. And SPARCIANVS sayth, that hee commanded his wife and children to be slaine, and did by them as he had done by ALBINVS: and so he made a number of his kinsmen and friends which were found with him in Lions to be slaine, and with them other principall Noble men of France and Spaine. He concluded the victorie which he gat neere Lions onely in Rome, there to make an end of the warre: and after this victorie he presentlie assaulted certaine cities and holds which continued friends to ALBINVS; which he subdued, not without great trouble and danger. And as he was busie in these matters, newes was brought him that one of those Legions which he had left in Arabia, did did mutine, and took part with ALBINVS before this battaile: and so he leauing France and Germany in peace and quiet, and sending into Britanny the ordinarie Captaines, to keepe the inhabitants in subiection and peace, he came triumphing to Rome, bringing his Armie with him; where he was most solemnly receiued, with great shew of ioy and contentment, although that in truth they stood in great feare of him: whither when he came, hee paid his souldiers with larger allowance, then euer had been seene; and the first day that he went to the Senate, in disgrace and despite thereof he renewed the titles and memory of the wicked Emperor COMMODVS, and made him to be canonized, and adored as a God. He also condemned to death, and confiscated the goods of a great number of Noble Personages of Rome which had beene Pretors, Consuls, and Senators, for that he found they had been friends to ALBINVS, and of his faction, shewing letters which he said were written by them, wherein they had offered their persons and goods to ALBINVS seruice; alleaging other reasons and proofes, which peraduenture were forged. Finally, he vsed great crueltie, and put many to death; whereby hee extremely enriched himselfe in treasure, whereof some he distributed and gaue to others: but principally he enriched and and aduanced in the highest degree, one whose name was PLANCIVS, a great fauorite of his, who also was an Africane, and his countrie-man, whom he made Prefect of the Pretorian Cohorts: and afterwards he married his son BASSIANVS ANTONINVS, whom he had made CÆSAR, with his daughter, whose name was PLAVTINA; and then he made him his companion and equall, and made the Sene to giue him the ensignes and prerogatiue of the Empire; by reason whereof PLANCIVS grew yet more proude and insolent. Matters standing in this estate, the cruell SEVERVS stayed but a small time in Rome: in which space he executed many cruelties vpon those which had been friends to NIGER and ALBINVS, putting to death a great number of Noble Personages most cruelly, together with many Matrons, and Romane Ladies: and to the contrary, he shewed himselfe very liberall and bountifull, and bestowed many fauours vpon others, and became also very popular, and sought to be pleasing and acceptable to all men, and to that end made the greatest and most costly feasts and games that euer were made in Rome, and diuided money amongst the people. But he stayed but a little while there, as I said: for knowing that matters were in no securitie in Asia, principally that the Parthians infested the bounds and frontires of the Empire, and desirous to be reuenged of certaine Kings, which had assisted his enimie NIGER; as hee was most valiant and desirous of honour, although olde and gowtie: yet with his accustomed celeritie hee departed towards the East; and being come into Asia sooner then any man expected him, he presently beganne the warre in Armenia, marching against BARZENIVS, King of the Atrenores, who had been PESCENIVS NIGER's friend: The King of Armenia durst not make any resistance, but sent him presents, suing for peace, and gaue him such hostages as he required. Whereupon finding no resistance, this valiant Emperour returned against Arabia felix, wherein there was a mutinie, and there took and sacked some Cities: And from thence returned to the frontires of the Atrenores, and besieged the Citie of Atras, or Atramas. But being vnable to take it, for that it was very strong and well furnished, in great fury he went against the Parthians, and the Persians, and besieged the famous Citie of Tesiphonte, wherein King ARTABANVS lay with all his power and household: and after many assaults, encounters, and slaughters of men of either side, he entred the Citie by force of Armes; and the King escaping by flight, his children and treasure fell into the hands of SEVERVS, which was held for a very great victorie: for the Romans stood in greater feare of the Parthians, then of any other nation of the world.

Seuerus came triumphing into Rome.

SEVERVS presently wrote to Rome, aduertising them of his victories and good successe, and sent them the description of the countries, cities, riuers, battailes, and assaults which hee past, drawne and painted in tables.

When he had ended all things at his pleasure, he bountifully paied his souldiers: and coming into Palestina, and from thence into Egypt, he was desirous to see the Pyramides, and other great and ancient monuments in that countrie: And from thence he returned to Rome in great triumph, loaden with the spoiles and riches gotten by his victories in the East. At this his returne hee married his eldest sonne to PLAVTINA, daughter of his great fauorite PLANCIVS, which marriage BASSIANVS ANTONINVS solemnized much against his will, and so would not conuerse or keep companie with her. Whereupon there began great dislike and dissension betweene PLANCIVS and BASSIANVS: PLANCIVS knowing himselfe the richest and most mightie man of the Empire; and seeing that SEVERVS was now old (with whom he was in great fauor) and feating that if BASSIANVS should succeed him and inherit the Empire, he should be ill intreated at his hands; hee resolued to kill both the father and the son, and to make himself Emperor, making choice (for the effecting this exploit) of a Tribune of the Pretorian Cohorts, whereof hee himself was Commander. But it pleased God that this his treason was discouered by the same Tribune. SEVERVS held this in a manier incredible, conceiuing it to be some practice of his sons, who loued not PLANCIVS. But being assured thereof by the Tribune, it was concluded, that hee should go and bring him into the Emperors chamber. The Tribune, coming to PLANCIVS, tould him that he had slain SEVERVS and BASSIANVS; and that if he would go with him, hee should see them dead: which hauing deliuered, hee made a reuerence as to the Emperour. As PLANCIVS desired their deaths, so he easily gaue credit to his words, and went with him. The Tribune (it being late in the night) brought him to the Emperors chamber; where he found him and his sonne liuing, amongst many of their confident friends, the chamber beeing full of torches. Which PLANCIVS seeing, he was much amazed: and being demanded by the Emperor what hee did there at so vnseasonable a time; not knowing what to answer, but confessing his error, and crauing pardon, he was slain by BASSIANVS.

After that SEVERVS had escaped this danger, hee spent his time in visiting some Cities in Italie, in hearing complaints and doing justice, and in most sumptuous Works and Buildings in Rome, and other Cities; and, seeking to bring vp his sonnes vertuously, and (by abating their pride) to reconcile them, and make vnity between them; for, they did ill agree, and were very vnquiet and ill-affected the one to the other. He desired to establish peace and amity between them, hauing determined that after his death the Empire should bee diuided between them; and to that end inuested them both therein. And so this poor old Emperor laboured in vain to reform the bad inclination of his sonnes. And, liuing in rest from warre, although not without domesticall care, he receiued Letters, importing, that the Inhabitants of great Britanny were in Armis and rebelled, in such sort, that his Legions there were in such danger, as they were at the point either to be ouercome and lost, or at least to flee and abandon the Countrey; wherewith he was much displeased. And to the end that the Empire in his daies should not be diminished by the losse of that Iland (it being of such importance) hee determined to go thither himself in person to pacifie the same. And, without any delaying of time, he went thitherwards with all his forces. Being arriued in Britanny, the Inhabitants conceiued such fear, by reason of his sudden coming vpon them, that, as he was a warrior, if he had been inclined to peace, they would haue come to any reasonable composition: but he, rather desiring to punish them, made cruell war against them: which was both tedious and dangerous, by reason of the lakes and many ill passages for his men in seuerall places of that Countrey; so as he was constrained to make many bridges and other deuices, with wood and timber, for his souldiers to passe. And so he obtained many victories, and subdued the Inhabitants. And to the end that his Legions from thenceforth might liue in greater safety, and that the Picts and Scots should not so freely passe their bounds (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR and EVTROPIVS report) hee commanded a strong wall to be made, which did crosse the Ile from sea to sea; which wall was two and thirty miles in length; wherein (as I conceiue) hee did but finish or repair that wall which the Emperour ADRIAN had made before: which truely was a work worthy the greatnes of SEVERVS his minde, and the mighty wealth of Rome. Which when hee at his pleasure had ended in like manner as he had done all his other enterprises, his old grief did so much torment him, that he desired and sought means to end his ovvne life: and, hauing raigned 18 yeers and ten months, he died in the same Ile of Britanny.

The Britans subdued by Seuerus.

The death of Seuerus.

This Emperor was one of those which fought as many battels, and obtained as many victories, as any other that euer ruled the Roman Empire: for, he ouerthrew and brought to confusion three Roman Emperors, and many other Kings, and subdued an infinite number of Prouinces and Cities. He took so good order for the preseruation of his treasure, and was so couetous and greedy in gathering the same together, that, notwithstanding his great expenses, and the infinite great gifts and rewards which he bestowed, yet he left more ready money and treasure in his Treasury and Exchequer than any other Emperor of his Predecessors. He paied and maintained so many Legions of souldiers, as there was no cause to fear any King or Nation in the world. Hee left in Rome so great aboundance of wheat, wine and oile, as was sufficient (as SPARCIANVS writeth) to maintain and victuall the same for fiue yeers. He erected wonderfull works and Buildings in Rome and in other parts, and in many things performed the part of a good good gouernour, and of a wise and prudent Prince: So as the Romans vsed to say of him (noting his cruelties and couetousnes; and afterwards his prouisions and victories) That it had been good that this Emperour had neuer been borne, or that he should neuer haue died: and so after his death he was highly extolled and commended. He left for his equall successors in the Empire his two sonnes, the one called BASSIANVS, and the other GETAS; and when he lay a dying, the last words he spake to those which were with him were these: When I took vpon me the gouernement of the Empire, I found it tyrannized and out of order; and now being olde and gowtie, leaue it in peace and subiection to my sonnes (if they prooue good) a firme and setled Empire: but if they prooue euill, feeble, and without force, and ready to fall. This good Prince was so temperate and spare in his diet, that he did seldome eate any flesh: for his common foode was salades, pulse and fruits of his countrie; but he vsed to drinke somewhat deepe: yet neuer so that he was at any time distempered therewith. He was of a very comely personage, representing authoritie and maiestie, and was tall of stature, and vsed to weare a long white beard; his hayre was curled and gray, and he spake with a deepe sounding voice. Finally, his personage and minde were fitting for an Emperor. He liued (as SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR and others do testifie) seuentie yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord, two hundred and three.

The words of Seuerus at his death.

THE LIFE OF BASSIANVS ANTONINVS CARACALLA (THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRTH OF those which were called ANTONINI) and of his brother GETA, being the two and twentieth Emperour of Rome.

THE ARGVMENT.

After the decease of Seuerus, his two sonnes, Bassianus Antoninus Caracalla, and Geta, tooke the Empire: which two being borne of seuer all mothers; as brothers oftentimes vse to doe, the one deadly hating the other, sought one anothers death and destruction. But Caracalla, who was a warlike man and bloudie, vnable to endure the company of his brother, who led the life of a Philosopher rather then of an Emperor: or that for his good parts he should be so much beloued by the Romane people as he was, failing to kill him secretly with poyson, in the end slew him openly in the lap of his mother in law, which was Geta his mother; remaining sole in the Empire. And knowing himselfe to be generally hated, he disposed of himselfe to visit the Empire: wheresoeuer he came, he sought to imitate the fashions of the countrie wherein he was; sometimes attyring himselfe after the Germane fashion; then after the Greeke: besides that he would be called Alexander, and be reputed another Achilles, for that he had trauailed the countries of those Princes. He was very inhumane and cruell; and so dishonest in his life, as he shamed not to marrie his stepmother Iulia, who was mother to his brother Geta, who also was so shameleſſe as to consent to so wicked a mariage. But they both ended accordingly as they deserued: for the Emperor was slaine by the practice of Macrinus, at such time as he went to ease his bodie; and she hearing the newes, falling into despaire killed herselfe, he hauing held the Empire six yeeres.

SEVERVS being dead, his two sonnes, which he had by seuerall women, according as he had ordained, remained Emperours. One of them hee had by MARTIA, which was his first wife; and the other by IVLIA, as is already said. The eldest had to name BASSIANVS ANTONINVS; and the other GETA; both very yong men, and in vertue farre vnlike to their father, chiefly BASSIANVS CARACALLA which was the eldest: Although that in his youth being but a childe, hee seemed to make better shewe of himselfe, to be of a milde condition, and of a good witte; hee profited very much in learning (as SPARCIANVS writeth) and therefore was much beloued and greatly accounted of: but afterwards, with his yeeres, and the Empire, he altred his condition, and in crueltie not only surpassed his father, but any other cruell Prince of all that euer were; as if he had been borne at one birth with NERO.

As soone as hee was sworne Emperour in England, where he then was (for his father carried both his sonnes with him, and his wife IVLIA also; which was mother to the second sonne) ANTONINVS CARACALLA practised with the Armie to chuse him Emperor alone, and to disinherit his brother GETA. But the men of warre would not consent thereto, because that GETA was chosen CÆSAR and successor to his father by them; and BASSIANVS ANTONINVS was nominated by his father SEVERVS. Whereupon being out of hope to bring his purpose to effect, accompanied with his brother and mother in law, they agreed to come to Rome, and brought with them the bodie or ashes of their father SEVERVS. But there presently grew so many iealousies betweene the two brothers, that it was daily feared the one would kill the other; notwithstanding that IVLIA (as though she had been mother to them both) vsed all possible meanes to haue pacified them, and to haue brought them to liue louingly and like brothers together: which she could neuer bring to passe, and so vpon the way either of them did lodge and eate apart; and either of them stood vpon his guard, for feare of the other. Being come to Rome, they were receiued with great solemnitie, triumph and ioy; but in their palaces they tooke their lodgings apart, and each of them had his guard and particular officers from the other: and they neuer visited, saw, or spake the one to the other, except when they went to the Senate: so great was the hatred which the one bare to the other.

The first thing they did after their comming to Rome, was to burie their father, whom they canonized for a Saint, placing him among the Gods, as the custome was to doe by those which were good Emperors. And seeing that occasion will often be giuen to reade of some Emperors which haue been deified; in my opinion it shall not be amisse, in this place to recite the ceremonies which were then vsed therein. The order which they held (the Emperor being dead) was to assemble the Senate, to consider whether such an Emperour had deserued or were worthie to be placed among the Gods or no: and finding him to haue been wicked, the Senate would not be present at the ceremonies vsed at his funerall: but if he had beene a good Prince, they all went in mourning attire to doe him honour at his consecration. The manner to consecrate him, was first to burie him without any ceremonies; then they made his image of wood, which resembled a pale sickly weake man, which they placed vpon a high scaffold ouer the entring into the Palace; which image was clothed in rich attire; and on the one side thereof, sate the Senate, and on the other side the Roman Matrons, where they continued from the Sunne rising vntill the euening, doing nothing but groane and sigh. This order they obserued the space of seuen daies, in which the Physicians came and felt the pulses of this Statue, saying, that the Emperor would surely die: at which words, they lamented and shrieked out. The sixt day the Physicians said that he was dead: then the most ancient men carried the image on horseback in a beere to a place which was called the old place; passing through that way which was called Via Sacra. In this place was erected an edifice after the fashion of a throne, with staires round about it, and vpon this throne they placed the Image: on the one side of the staires were many children, which were gentlemens sonnes of Rome; and on the other, a number of yong Roman damsels which sung some heauie and sorrowfull songs and ditties; and the boyes sung hymns in prayse of the dead Emperor. From thence they carried the Image with the beere to the field of Mars, where was another scaffold made of most drie wood, vpon which they placed this Image. Vpon that day people came from all parts of Italy to Rome to see the solemnitie: and euery one there present, was bound to cast vpon the staires, certain precious odors of sundrie sorts. After this the Senators made shew of a skirmish on horseback; and after them the two Consuls gaue a turne vpon their chariots richly adorned, being followed by the most ancient men in Rome, and those which had been Captains in the wars, on foote: all which after they had gone round about this scaffold, making sundrie shoutes and exclamations, fell to the ground. Then came he which did inherit and succeede in the Empire, and with a burning torch gaue fire to this throne or scaffold; which, for that it was made of most drie wood, in short space was set all on fire.

In what manner the Romans deified their Emperors.

The follie of the antient.

But before any of these ceremonies were performed, the Senat prouided a great Eagle: which being set on that side where the Image of the dead Emperor was, while as this image did burn, the Eagle was very cunningly let loose; which, according to her nature, mounting aloft into the aire aire, the people said that it was the Emperors soule which flew to heauen, there to dwell amongst the gods: which HERODIANVS doth write at large in the historie of these two Emperours. GETA the younger brother was of a more gentle nature: for shewing himselfe milde and courteous, he began to be generally well beloued of all men. ANTONINVS CARACALLA was sowre, and would be obeied for feare. Enuying the loue which he saw al men beare to his brother GETA, and the reputation wherein he was held, he deuised with himselfe how he might secretly kill him with poison, or otherwise howsoeuer: he also sought to get the good will of the Pretorian Souldiers, giuing them many gifts, doing them many fauours, and giuing them leaue to do what they listed. So as it was easily perceiued, what manner of gouernment there would be in the Empire, where were two Emperours with equall power and authoritie, and so contrarie in condition each to other, that being brothers they practised and desired each others death; and in matters of iustice and gouernment were euer contrarie in opinion; and for Captaines and gouernours which were to be made, each sought to preferre his friends and fauorites, and did the like in chusing of Consuls and other Magistrates: And so all things went by fauour and in contention. There were committed intolerable disorders, and wrongs, either of them persecuting the contrarie faction, without daring to punish those which were of their own partie, for feare to make them their enemies: whereof grew an vniuersall preiudice to all the prouinces, and generally to the whole Empire. Wherefore to auoide these troubles and inconueniences, some practised to make a diuision of the Empire; and that ANTONINVS BASSIANVS should remaine in Rome and gouerne the West; and that GETA should gouerne Asia & all the East. But this took as little effect; for IVLIA, mother to GETA, hindred it, thinking to draw them to some composition and make them friends: and when she thought herselfe to be in the right way to haue brought them to concord and agreement, BASSIANVS CARACALLA (who was more proud and presumptuous, and who in truth did scorne his brother, as well for that he was his younger, as for that he gaue himselfe more to his book & to ciuill discipline, then to Armes and chiualrie; hauing alwaies about him honest and learned men) resolued to kill him in what manner soeuer; which he had till then attempted to do by secret and coloured meanes, thinking with himselfe that he was and ought to be sole Emperour, and could not endure any riuall or companion in command. And with this cruell determination, as they were lodged both in one palace, GETA being one day with his mother, nothing suspecting any open violence, although he mistrusted secret practices; BASSIANVS iust at the time when euery bodie was at dinner, suddenly entred his brothers lodging, and with the aide of those which came with him, slew his brother in his mothers Armes, before that he was able to put himselfe in defence, or could be rescued. And hauing committed this detestable murder; with the like furie and haste as he had done this fact, he went forth at his palace gates, compassed about with his friends and seruants; and shewing great amazement, cried out, that his brother would haue slaine him, and he said to those which saw him, that he had escaped an extreame danger of death, but his innocencie had preserued him. And calling to his guard, he commanded them to conuay him to his Pretorian Cohorts, where he might remaine in safetie; for whileft he continued within the citie he stood in feare of his life.

Bassianus slew his brother Geta in his mothers armes.

Those which heard him, not knowing what had passed, beleeued what he said: and both those which heard him, and heard him not, followed him; and the people began to be much troubled to see their Emperour, so out of season, and in such haste and manner go to the Camp. When he came to his Camp, where in truth by reason of his former practices, he was better beloued then his brother, the first thing that he did was to go to a place apart, where their ensignes and banners were, which they held for religious and sacred; and then he began with great exclamation to say, That he gaue infinite thanks to the gods for deliuering him from such and so imminent a danger. And the souldiers flocking about him, maruelling at his so vnseasonable comming, he put himselfe in the middest of them, and with a huge voice began to implore their aid and succour, telling them that his brother would haue slaine him; and being assailed by him, was rescued, and had fought, and God had giuen him the victorie, although vvith great difficultie; and that he now fled vnto them from the furie of those which would haue slaine him. He spake and fained the matter with such efficacie, as the souldiers beleeued him: and notwithstanding that he expressed not so much, yet they plainely perceiued that he had slaine his brother, as he gaue them to vnderstād: and incōtinentlie he promised them, seeing he remained sole Emperour, that he would bestow vpon them the accustomed fauours, gifts & rewards; and presentlie sending for a mass of money which remained of his fathers treasure, he diuided it among them: wherewith having got their good wils, although som were hard to be perswaded, and did contradict it, yet in the end they proclaimed him sole Emperor, and approued the death of his Brother. GETA, pronouncing him a rebell, and an enemy to the Roman Common-wealth.

BASSIANVS, remaining all that night in the Camp among the souldiers, the next day compassed with men of warre, returned into Rome: and, assembling the Senate, he went thither, and brought in his guard with him, wherein he made a set Oration (which HERODIANVS writeth at large) excusing himself, and grieuously accusing his Brother, affirming, that he was openly assailed by him; but being rescued, in defending himself, he had slain his Brother. The Senators, some for that they were his Fauourites, and others for fear, approued his death: and he, to justifie his wickednes with greater cruelty, began to proceed against men of all estates, as though they all had been guilty, and had practised his death, committing infinite murders and cruelties. First, he commanded all his Brothers seruants to be slain, together with many Senators and Roman Knights, which had taken his Brothers part. He also made PLAVTINA, the daughter of PLANCVS, which had been his wife, to be put to death. He slue POMPEIANVS, nephew to the Emperor MARCVS AVRELIVS the Philosopher, and sonne to LVCILLA and POMPEIANVS. He caused all the Gouerners and Captains to slain, which his Brother had placed in the Prouinces. To conclude, hee murdered an infinite number of men of quality, so as in all parts of Rome most horrible murders and cruelties were committed: for which, he is accounted one of the worst and most cruell Emperors that euer gouerned the Roman Empire; and was generally hated and abhorred of all men, sauing of the Pretorian Souldiers onely, whose loue and good will hee bought with his money, and therewith did continue them for his friends, (by suffering and enduring them, and giuing them liberty in all things) permitting them to commit what soeuer outrage or insolency they would.

Cruelty vsed by Bassianus, in putting many great men to death.

Hauing exercised himself in these abominable cruelties, his owne conscience accusing him, and knowing how much he was abhorred in Rome, hee resolued to depart from thence, and to go and visit all the Prouinces of the Empire; which he did, and in his journey plaied many mad pranks, some of which in truth were very ridiculous. Purposing to go into Germany, where as Rome euer maintained great Armies against the northerly nations, who could neuer be brought to any perfect subiection; he gaue it out in speeches, that hee went to reform the Legions, and to visit the Prouinces; and, taking his way towards the Riuer Danubius, where (to winne the hearts of that Countrey-people) he followed the fashions vsed in that Countrey, hunting and killing wilde beasts, and apparelling himself like a German, praising and esteeming their fashions better than the fashions of the Romans, he chose such of the German Souldiers as seemed to be most strong and active, for his guard. Hee sought also to win the good will of other men of warre, shewing himself very affable and sociable, helping them in person in their bodily exercises; eating and drinking with them such things as they did, and dooing many other things like a souldier and a man of warre: whereby hee made himself beloued both of the one and the other, although he forbare not to commit sundry cruelties, killing certain eminent men among them.

Bassianus vseth fashions

Hauing set all matters in such order as hee thought good in Germany, taking his way towards Thracia, he passed through Macedonia, where a notable folly possessed him: for, heer hee made shew to be much affected to ALEXANDER the Great, and to publish his Noble acts; sending commandement to erect his statue in many parts of Rome: amongst which hee set vp one with two faces; the one resembling ALEXANDER, and the other himself, desiring to make others beleeue (himself being so perswaded) that he did very much resemble him; and, because he had read that ALEXANDER'S neck stood a little awry towards one shoulder, he counterfeited the like: and so within fewe daies, of an Almain, he was becomn a Macedonian in apparell, behauiour and fashion; and one squadron of his Army he commanded to bee called Phalanx (for so were they called in that Kingdome) and some of his Captains hee caused to bee called by the names of some of ALEXANDER'S Captains. Hauing made this shew in Graecia, he took his way towards Asia; where he desired to see the ruines of Troy: and, seeing the Sepulchre of ACHILLES, another humour took him, which was, to resemble ACHILLES; so as hee seemed to trauell the Countries like a Player, with Comedies and making shewes: at which his lightnes and inconstancy, the Romans which were with him, laughing to themselues, were much discontented and ashamed.

Trauelling through Asia the lesse, and thence into Soria, he went into Egypt (as he said) to see the City of Alexandria, because ALEXANDER the Great was Founder thereof: where he was was most solemnly receiued, and with great ioy; for which hee ill requited them: for although that he shewed them a pleasant countenance, yet secretly he was much displeased with them: for he vnderstood that they had vsed quips and iests of him behinde his back, and gaue him nick-names conformable to his vices, and the cruelties which he committed; Matters, in truth, not so hainous as could deserue so cruell punishment, as that which he inflicted, which was: that the people being vpon a day assembled together to see certain publike pastimes, he made them to bee compassed about by his souldiers, and an infinite number of them of all ages, conditions, and degrees to bee slaine, to the great feare, griefe, and terror of the whole Citie.

Extreme cruelty executed by Bassianus vpon the citizens of Alexandria.

After this his great inhumanitie done in Egypt, he returned by Palestina: and trauelling towards the East with a very mightie Armie, of his fathers old souldiers, he inuaded the Parthians countrie, which suspected no such matter; and did great spoile there (as SPARCIANVS SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR, and HERODIANVS doe write) for vpon safe conduct and assurance of peade which he made to the Parthians, he obtained some victories, deceiuing their King ARTABANVS, giuing him to vnderstand that he came of purpose to marrie with his daughter; and the other comming to receiue him in peaceable manner, was sodainly set vpon. But the King (by great hap) escaped by flight. And although that this his victorie were of small importance, yet he made great boast, writing to Rome tedious and proud letters thereof; and in all these actions he forbare not to be cruell: but to gouerne vprightly, and to do iustice, as he ought to haue done, he took no care. He was very gluttonous, and vnmeasurably giuen to wine, luxurie and dishonestie of life, so as he married with his owne mother in law, IVLIA: yet HERODIANVS maketh no mention thereof, but seemeth to be of a contrary opinion; for he euer speaketh of IVLIA, as though she had been mother both to BASSIANVS and GETA: But SEXTVS AVRELIVS writeth it; and also EVSEBIVS, EVTROPIVS and SPARCIANVS say, that it passed in this manner. IVLIA was a verie faire woman: and vpon a day, the mother and the sonne in law standing talking together, she carelesly or dishonestly, as it afterwards appeared, letting fall a vaile which she ware, discouered part of her breste, which when BASSIANVS saw, he said, If it were lawfull, I would haue that which I see: she, forgetting all honestie, and that she was mother to GETA whom BASSIANVS had slaine, answered, To thee any thing that thou desirest is lawfull: dost thou not know, that the Emperor maketh lawes and is subiect to none. When he heard her say so, setting aside all dutie and loyaltie which he ought to his dead father, and his liuing mother in law, he resolued to marrie her, and celebrated his nuptials with the mother of his brother, whom he had bereaued of life.

Gluttony and inconstancy of Bassianus.

But to returne to the Historie of his life, it passed in this manner; That comming from his inuasion against the Parthians, he stayed some daies in Mesopotamia: For, that countrey was very pleasant and commodious for hunting & other sports; where, within fewe daies hauing raigned full sixe yeeres, he was slaine by treason. The manner whereof HERODIANVS writeth, saying that he was much addicted to Mathematicians and Astrologians, and gaue great credit vnto them; and in all matters vsed their opinions and iudgements, and had in Rome and with him all the Astrologers that he could get; wherein he resembled his father SEVERVS, who did the like. Being fearefull of conspiracies, knowing what he had deserued; hee sent to MATERNVS who was the greatest and most confident friend he had, whom he left gouernor of Rome, commanding him secretly to assemble all the best Astrologers he could get, and demand of them what death he should die; and procure them to giue their opinions, whether any conspired or practized his death or no. MATERNVS did what the Emperor commanded in the foote of his letter, and with great haste answered him (either faining it, or being so aduertised by the Astrologers) that MACRINVS which was his Prefect, and with him in Mesopotamia, went about to kill him, and therefore he should in any case presently dispatch him; for so did the Astrologers aduise him. Which letter he sent sealed, and made it vp amongst other letters, to be the more secretly conueyed. The whole packet was deliuered to the Emperor as he was going into his chariot, to runne for a wager with other chariots; which was a kind of sport, wherein he took much pleasure, and was greatly vsed in those dayes. And hee, for that he would not giue ouer that which he had pretended, gaue his letters to the said MACRINVS to reade, and afterwards to make relation to him of the contents thereof. MACRINVS reading all these letters, met with that wherein BASSIANVS was counselled to put him to death: whereat he was much astonished; and concealing that letter, made relation to the Emperor of all the reſt. And conſidering with himſelf, that hee which wrote that Letter would doubtleſſe write another, and that length he ſhould ſurely dy; he reſolued firſt to murther the Emperour: and, ruminating vpon the matter, he bethought himſelf of a luſtie ſtrong fellow, a Centurion of the Emperors guard, called MARTIALL; who, being diſcontented, murmured againſt the Emperor, and ſecretly hated him, for that he had cauſed a Brother of his to be ſlain, and he himſelf was ill-intreated and diſgraced. MACRINVS, conceiuing this man to bee fit for his purpoſe, after ſome other diſcourſe tould him, that ſeeing he had oportunity to kill the Emperor, being euer neer vnto him hauing charge of his Perſon, hee ought to reuenge the death of his Brother, and then flee to him; who, with others of his faction, would protect and defend him againſt all ſuch as might ſeek to offend him.

Some daies after MACRINVS had laid this plot, it hapned that the Emperor, comming from a Temple wherein he had been, neer to a City called Carras, and riding ſmally accompanied towards the City, withdrew himſelf out of the way behinde a buſh, to doo ſuch things as nature required; with one Page with him to hould his horſe, the reſt for manners ſake beeing withdrawn. Which when MARTIALL perceiued, being one of them, fayning that the Emperor had called him vpon ſome neceſſary occaſion, he ran haſtily vnto him; and, before he was perceiued, ſtabbed him in behinde, whereof hee preſently fell down dead. SPARCIANVS ſaith, that, coming to help the Emperor to horſe, hee ſtabd him in with his poiniard; and that MARTIALL, returning to take horſe from which hee was alighted, by little and little withdrew himſelf from the company: but the Page bringing newes of the Emperors death, he began to flee ſo faſt as his horſe could runne; but could not make ſuch ſpeed, but that hee was ouertaken by the Germane horſemen of the Emperors guard; who preſently ſlue him.

The death of Baſſianus Caracalla.

The death of BASSIANVS being vnderſtood by thoſe which accompanied him, there grew a great tumult among them, not knowing with whom to be angry: for, as then it was vnknowne by whoſe order hee was ſlain. And, they approaching to the dead body of the Emperor, the firſt that came to haue aided him, was MACRINVS; who, weeping and lamenting, ſeemed to bee very ſorrowfull; no man ſuſpecting him or any other, all men conceiuing that MARTIALL had murdered BASSIANVS vpon paſſion, and for ſome priuate reuenge. Taking the Emperours dead body they burnt it, according to the cuſtome then; and, putting his aſhes into a pot, they ſent them to his wife and mother-in-law IVLIA; who was in Antioch; who being in deſpair poiſoned her ſelf: and ſo they both had ſuch ends as they deſerued.

BASSIANVS at the time of his death was full three and forty yeers ould, hauing raigned ſix yeers Emperour. He left one ſonne very yong, whoſe name was ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, by his wife whoſe name was SEMIRA, as SPARCIANVS writeth. AVRELIVS VICTOR calles her SEMEA, a very diſhoneſt woman, and his coſen German; who liued like a ſtrumpet. ANTONINVS BASSIANVS was by his ſurname called CARACALLA, for a certain kinde of apparell which he gaue to the people of Rome. Hee died in the yeer of our Lord 219.

THE ARGVMENT.

ONE Audentius hauing refuſed the Empire; for his excuſe, alleadged his olde age ſo vnfit for the troubles of ſo important a gouernment: but Macrinus without any ſuch conſideration accepted thereof, it being offered him by the Souldiers, notwithſtanding that hee was the Author of the death of Caracalla. He tooke the Empire, made head againſt Artabanus King of Perſia, who roſe in Armes againſt the Romanes in reuenge of the iniuries done by Caracalla; and being come to a battaile, which continued two dayes, in the end they came to an agreement; Artabanus vnderſtanding of the opprobrious death of his enemie. But fortune, which had prepared a troubleſome raigne for Macrinus, ſaw him no ſooner out of one danger, but it caſt him into another farre greater, which was this; that Heliogabalus a Youth of ſiftéene yeeres old, being by the meanes of an old woman made Emperour, it behooued him to fight with him; and being ouerthrowne, fled vnknowne through Aſia the leſſe, with an intent to come to Rome: but being ouertaken by the Souldiers which purſued him, in a Citie wherein hee fell ſicke, he was ſlaine, together with his ſonne Diadumenus; whom he had made his companion in the Empire: Hauing raigned onely fourteene monethes.

BASSIANVS being dead, a councell was held in the Armie concerning the election of a new Emperor: for there was little account made of his ſon ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS; aſwell for that he was but a child, as alſo for that his mother led ſuch a life, as it was doubted whether he were the ſonne of BASSIANVS or no. In the Army, beſides MACRINVS which was Pretorian Prefect, was AVDENTIVS, a man of good ſort and of yeeres, very expert in the warres, and an excellent Captaine: of theſe two they were in great doubt whether they ſhould chooſe, and in this doubt they continued two daies: and in the end they reſolued to chuſe AVDENTIVS, who was a diſcreet old man, and little regarded the Empire; who conſidering the perils and diſorders, would not accept thereof, excuſing himſelfe by reaſon of his great age, alleaging, that he was not able to gouerne the Empire as it ought to be, a thing ſeldome ſeene that any man would refuſe the Empire of the world. The men of warre perceiuing that AVDENTIVS would not accept of the Empire, preſently made choiſe of MACRINVS, who was the author of the murther and death of BASSIANVS; and ſo was choſen, and he gladly accepted of their election. This MACRINVS was of a very baſe ſtock and parentage, who with ſmall deſerts, and by way of fauour attained to the office of Pretorian Prefect. As ſoone as he was choſen Emperour, he made made a notable flattering Oration to the Army, and payed the Souldiers, and distributed much money among them, thereby to purchase their loue and good will, and addressed himselfe with all haste against ARTABANVS King of Parthia, who came with great power against the Romanes, to be reuenged of the iniurie which BASSIANVS had done them, knowing nothing of his death. He also presentlie nominated and chose a sonne of his for his companion in the Empire, whose name was DIADVMENVS, whom he made to be called ANTONINVS, aswell to take away the suspicion of the death of ANTONINVS BASSIANVS, as for that the name of ANTONINVS was very acceptable to the Romanes, in remembrance of the good Emperours ANTONINVS PIVS, and MARCVS AVRELIVS ANTONINVS: for all these Emperours did leaue their owne names, or together with them did take the name of ANTONINI, vntill that for the abominable and execrable life of ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, they left it, as we will presentlie declare. He also wrote long letters to the Senate and people of Rome, reciting the manner of his election, and desiring them to approue the same, with many solemne oathes that he was not guiltie of the death of BASSIANVS. The Senate being certified of the death of BASSIANVS, approued the election of MACRINVS, and the election and companie of his sonne in the Empire.

This new Emperour MACRINVS, and his sonne DIADVMENVS, going against ARTABANVS and the Parthians, who came very strong both in foote and horsemen, and also brought many camels with them, the two Armies came to a most cruell battaile which continued two daies, wherein both the Romanes and the Parthians fought so valiantlie, as in both daies the darke night parted the fray, and either partie cried Victorie, victorie, although that in truth there was none: for the slaughter and number of the dead and wounded was equall.

MACRINVS, knowing that ARTABANVS came greatly enraged by reason of the iniurie done him by BASSIANVS, sent him Heraulds and Ambassadors, certifying him of the death of BASSIANVS: and moreouer, that if he desired the friendship of the Romanes, he would graunt it. ARTABANVS, being aduertised of the death of his enemie BASSIANVS, was very ioyfully of the newes: for vntill then he had no intelligence thereof, and was also glad of the peace offered him, which he accepted, vpon condition that all such prisoners as were taken by BASSIANVS through treacherie in time of truce, should be restored; which was accordinglie performed, and they concluded a peace; and the King of Parthia returned home to his countrey; and MACRINVS, to Antioch in Syria: Where he gaue himselfe ouer to lust & sensualitie, forgetting the gouernment of the Empire, delaying his going to Rome, whither by letters from thence he was dayly sollicited to come; wherein he committed a very great errour: for if he had left his Army, and had gon to Rome, and there settled himselfe in the gouernment of the Empire, without all doubt both his raigne and life had lasted longer; but he taking no care of that which he ought to haue done, and which most concerned him, gaue himselfe in Antioch to riot, pleasures, and banketting: whereat the Romane souldiers began much to murmure, and to make little account of him, moued thereto through their desire to returne into their countrey. They also much abhorred him for that he did most cruellie punish them: for in those times loyaltie was so out of vse, and men of war had such libertie, were so audacious, and had taken such a custome to make Emperours, as they presentlie began to repine and murmure, yea and boldlie to speake ill of MACRINVS, and to wish his death, within a little more then one yeare after they had giuen him the Empire, and within few dayes after plotted the same in in this manner. In a citie of Phœnicia called Emesa, was yong ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, who had there a Grandmother, sister to IVLIA wife to SEPTIMVS SEVERVS, which afterwards married with her sonne in law BASSIANVS, sonne of the same SEVERVS. This his Grandmother, whose name was MESA, had there another nephew called ALEXIANVS, of whom more shall be said hereafter, and she also had in her companie SIMIAMIRA, mother of the said ANTONINVS, and another which was sister to ALEXIANVS.

Peace betweene Macrinus and Artabanus, vpon conditions.

The causes of the death of Macrinus.

This MESA was a very rich woman both in iewels and money: for she had been mother in lawe to two Emperours, the father and the sonne: and it is to be beleeued that in their life time there were infinite bribes & gifts bestowed vpon her, and so she remained there after the death of BASSIANVS with her daughters and nephewes. These two cosins, her nephewes, MESA made Priests in a most sumptuous Temple which she built and consecrated to the Sunne; from whence it grew that this ANTONINVS was called HELIOGABALVS, which is as much to say, as a Priest of the Sunne: for the Phœnicians did call the Sun HELIOGABALVS, to which Temple for their vaine deuotions sake came many Romane souldiers of the Legions which which lay there in garison, and many from MACRINVS his camp also; whom this MESA, Grandmother to these youths, entertained very courteously, bestowing many gifts vpon them; and shewing them her nephew HELIOGABALVS, shee vsed to tell them that this her nephew was sonne to their Emperour BASSIANVS, whom MACRINVS had slaine by treason. With these and such like effectuall speeches, she brought the matter to such passe, that what with the courtesie which she vsed towards them, and also for that the boy was a most fine child, they generallie began to affect him, some by seeing him, and others by report of him; so as the whole Armie loued him, and desired that he might be their Lord and Emperour. And to the contrarie, MACRINVS being generallie hated of all men, some Coronels and Captaines moued by the gifts and large promises made by this MESA vnto them, the greatest part agreed that she should send ANTONINVS to their Camp, and then they would proclaime him Emperour. The good old woman, who had bin accustomed to Emperors Courts, setting all other matters apart, tooke her nephew by the hand & went with him to the Camp, and he presentlie was receiued for Emperour, and they sware obedience vnto him (as writeth HERODIANVS). But IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS saith, that certaine of MACRINVS Legions being in a mutinie came to seeke HELIOGABALVS. But howsoeuer, as both the one and the other might be, HELIOGABALVS accepted of the Empire, being but fifteene yeeres old: and the matter being published abroad, the newes thereof caused great alteration in mens minds; and al men began to affect him, for that he was both sonne & nephew to Emperours, and for the names sake of ANTONINVS, which they held for sacred and happie. MACRINVS presently vnderstood these newes in Antioch, where hee then was, and made lesse account thereof then he ought to haue done, iesting at HELIOGABALVS, for that he was but a childe, and at his mother and grandmother, deeming it sufficient to send a Captaine of his whose name was IVLIANVS, with certaine Legions to besiege, and so to ruine him: which (as it was thought) hee might easily haue effected, if he had himselfe gone presently in person. When IVLIANVS with his troupes came, HELIOGABALVS forces were not of sufficient power to giue him battaile; but being in their Camp, which was well fortified and victualled, they suffered themselues to bee besieged: but the souldiers of the one side conferring with those of the other; and those of the Campe shewing young HELIOGABALVS to IVLIANVS his souldiers, putting them in minde of his father, perswaded them to follow him. Whereof it insued, that they not onely did so, but apprehending their Captaine IVLIANVS, smote off his head, and went ouer to HELIOGABALVS; and the one and the other made such such an Armie, as MACRINVS resolued with his whole power to make head against HELIOGABALVS. Doing so, they ioyned battell in the confines of Syria and Phœnicia; in which, conscience and feare made HELIOGABALVS souldiers to fight valiantly; and of MACRINVS side only the Pretorian souldiers fought wel, but al the rest of his Armie fought faintly; and a great part thereof abandoning him went ouer to HELIOGABALVS: wherefore he accounting himselfe lost and forelorne, fled from the battaile, and so HELIOGABALVS had the victorie. MACRINVS and his sonne, with certaine of their friends which would not forsake him, trauailed with the greatest speed they could make, secretly, through the citie of Asia the lesse, and came into Bithynia, with a determination to get to Rome; where MACRINVS knew that his comming was much desired. But falling grieuously sick in the city of Chalcedonia, those which HELIOGABALVS sent to pursue him, found him there; and bringing letters and commandement to the citie, through the fame of HELIOGABALVS his victorie they were obeyed; and MACRINVS lying sicke, void of all fauour and friendship, together with his sonne, was there put to death, within one yeere and two moneths after that he had been chosen Emperour. And being dead, all men fixed their eyes and thoughts vpon HELIOGABALVS.

Macrinus fell sicke in Chalcedonia, being ouertaken by such as Heliogabalus sent after him, was by them slaine.

Surely, it is a pitifull thing to consider of the infelicitie and miserie of those times, to see how many Emperours were murthred, and how wicked and vicious the most part of them were, and how little time they raigned; and that which maketh me most to admire, is, to think how lightly they were slaine, notwithstanding that they were Lords of the whole world; And how easie a matter it was for a Captaine, hauing the fauour and friendship of fiue or sixe Legions, to make himselfe to be obeyed. So as it seemeth that he which first had intelligence of the Emperors death, and was any thing friended, and therewith durst aduenture, was commonly chosen for his successor, as we said of IVLIANVS: And that which is worse, that he which murdered the last Emperour commonly became his heire; as wee see in MACRINVS and others. And touching him of whom wee now discourse, one feeble old woman, and childe of fourteene or fifteene fifteene yeeres old were sufficient to ouerthrow and ruine him, being an ancient, wise and mighty Emperor, and to bereaue him both of his life and Empire, and quietly and in peace to enjoy the same, if the contentment and rule of the wicked may be called peace and quietnes.

The seruice of God the surest command.

By this aforesaid it appears more cleer than the light, how variable and inconstant all things are in this world: and that there is no other firm and stable dominion or kingdome, but the seruice of God: whereof the faithfull Christians in those daies had especiall care, and sought no worldly dominion, Magistracies nor Empire, but to liue holily and vprightly; and so, contemning the world, attained the euerlasting Kingdome of heauen. But these vnhappy Infidels forbare not to commit any cruelty or treason whatsoeuer, so as thereby they might getre the supreme gouernment and command, although it were but for three daies. God for their sinnes permitted (for the example of others) that by the same means whereby they obtained it, by the self same they commonly lost it; being either put to death by the sword, or else by treason, as they had done by others. And, that which is worst of all, together with their bodies they lost their miserable soules: in such sort, as is said, it hapned to the Emperor MACRINVS, who died in the yeer of yeer of our Lord 220.

THE AROVMENT.

HEliogabalus, being a Priest of the Sunne, attaining to the Empire, as soon as hee had taken the Imperiall dignity became so wicked, that in filthinesse he far surpassed all his Predecessors. He was most dishoneste in his life, more than befitted a lasciuious and intemperate man; and was so addicted to women, that he granted them to build a Senate by themselues. When he was neer to the sea, he would eat no meate but such as were bred far within the land: and when he was farre from it, he would eat nothing but sea-fish; neither would hee eat of any thing that was not of an excessiue price. He was inclined to no kinde of vertue, neither regarded any but parasites, ruffians, bawds, and such like persons: and all his actions were so abominable, and his viciousnes so great, that to write the same, were to amasse an heap of villany. He made one which was his cosen german, Cæsar; a very honest and vertuous young man, whose name was Alexianus. He was slain by his souldiers; who, because they could not cast him into a most filthy ditch, trailed him through the Cities, and threw him into the riuer Tiber, he hauing held the Empire for a certain time: the truth whereof is vncertain, Writers do so much differ; and had such a death as his filthy life had deserued.

MAcrinvs dying as he deserued, ANTONINVS HELIOGABALVS, without any contradiction, was made Emperor: who in truth proued to be such, that in Histories there ought no memoriall to bee held of him, nor mention to be made of his life; to the end, that if it were possible, none should knowe that such a monster had euer attained to the Majesty of the Romane Empire, if we had not already written the liues of CALIGVLA, NERO, VITELLIVS, COMMODVS, and such others. But as one and the same ground commonly produceth vnholsome hearbs full of poyson, and which kill; and likewise good and holesome, which heale, and feedeth both sheepe and serpents: So in our Historie, in recompence of these wicked Princes, we will oppose OCTAVIAN, VESPASIAN, TITVS, TRAIAN, ADRIAN, ANTONINVS PIVS, VS, M. AVRELIVS, and (in part) SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS; who were singular Emperors, and gouerned the Empire with great wisdome and equity. And so the vices of the one are to be laied open, as well as the vertues of the other; to the end, that if any Prince of our time shall read their liues, he may see how abominable and detestable their actions were; and so, eschewing the euil, and making choice of the good, may follow the same; and may consider how short a time those cruell and vitious Emperors raigned, and what shamefull and fatall ends they had; and how that the good liued and gouerned longer time, and ended their daies in peace and quiet, dying their naturall death: except some which were murdered by traitors, to vsurp the Empire.

But, coming to HELIOGABALVS: when he had obtained the victory, and that MACRINVS was slain, and he chosen Emperor, hee wrote the most louing and kinde Letters to Rome that could be deuised. But the Senate and people of Rome did hardly digest the newes; for, they would rather haue had MACRINVS: but, daring to do nothing to the contrary, they yeelded obedience to HELIOGABALVS; of whom they presently conceiued a good hope, for that which they heard of his gallant feature, and of the good constitution of his body, and for the names sake of ANTONINVS, which in Rome was exceedingly much beloued and respected. In the beginning of his Raign (by reason of his yong age) all things were ordered by the counsell and direction of his grandmother MESA, and her fauourites: who, taking order for all matters in the East, determined to come speedily to Rome with the yong Emperor, which shee put in execution; but was driuen to stay longer than shee purposed, by reason of the winter which was very tempestuous. Wherefore she wintred in Bithynia, where he began to discouer his wicked inclination, giuing himself to most odious luxurie: and apparelling himself in such attire as was far vnfit for an Emperor, and feeding on most delicious fare, he gaue himself ouer to all sensuality: which faults his prudent old grandmother endeuoured by speech and good admonishment to reform and amend; but she preuailed nothing. Being comn to Rome, hee was most solemnly receiued; where he spent the whole time of his Raign in such manner, as wee haue nothing else to write of this Emperor, but of his abominable vices: which were such, that I neither can nor will describe them for the filthinesse thereof. The first thing he took in hand after his coming to Rome, was, To build a Temple to his god the Sun, or HELIOGABALVS, whose Priest hee had been in Phœnicia. Hee procured that the Christians (whose number at that time was infinit) should also hould that for a Temple, and therein should vse their ceremonies, make their prayers, and doo their deuotion to CHRIST. But it pleased not God to permit, that the Sun, being a creature, should in worship be made equall to the Creator. He shewed himself so effeminate, and so addicted to women, that the first time he went to the Senate, he caried his mother SYMIAMIRA with him, and took order that her opinion should be demanded in all causes; and that from thenceforth shee should bee present when any matters of importance were determined: a thing neuer seen, that any woman vntill then had any voice in the Senate of Rome. After this, hee made a Chapter-house or Senate apart; where women should meet and consult, what apparell and attire the Roman Matrones should wear. And, proceeding to a far more shamefull practice, he commanded certain Stews to be made in his Palaces, of common women, for his friends and fauourites. And, delighting himself so much in the company of such, he commanded vpon a day all the women that could be found of that name and life, to be assembled together; and hee, clad in womens attire, came into the place where they were, and made a very set and studied Oration vnto them; calling them Commilitones; a word vsed by Captains to their souldiers when they would doo them honour, by calling them their fellows and companions in Arms. The matters which there were treated of, were inuentions & means how to practise their filthinesse and abomination: and thither he brought with him ruffians and bawds, which were his Brokers in those detestable actions and assemblies. In truth, this HELIOGABALVS was so detestable in all manner of vices, that it cannot be sufficiently expressed. He was so great a spender, and so prodigall in his attire, and in the furniture of his house, in his fare and diet, and his other follies, as that which is written of him seems incredible. HERODIANVS and AELIVS LAMPRIDIVS write his life; wherein they recount most strange matters, besides what other Authors report of him. All his study and care was, To deuise how he might spend excessiuely, and to finde out such dainties and delicates as neuer had bin thought of. He neuer sate but among sweet-smelling flowrs, mixed with Amber, Musk, and other most exquisite sweet odors; neither would he eat any thing but should be of an excessiue price, and sought means to make all those things which he did eat to be most costly; and vsed to say, that that meate had no taste, which was not deare bought. He attired himselfe in cloath of gold and purple, set with pearles and most precious stones: and euen on his shooes he wore stones of inestimable value. The chamber wherein he lay and all his palace, was furnished with cloath of gold, siluer, and of silke; and his beds were of cloath of gold, of siluer, and of silke, couered with Roses and sweete flowers; among which were strawed many iewels and pearles: And all the way whereupon hee should set his feet, betweene his chamber and the place where he took horse or coach, when he would ride abroad, he made to be couered with the powder of gold & siluer: for he disdained to tread vpon the earth, as other men did. All his tables, chests, chaires, and vessels of seruice for his chamber, euen to the basest offices, as close stooles, chamber-pots, and such like, were all of fine gold. He made no account of wax light, but had in his hall and chambers great lamps, which in steed of oile burned most excellent Balsame, brought from Iudea and Arabia: and euen his very vrinals were made of Onyx and other most precious stones. His expences were so infinite and so excessiue, as no Kings reuenewes in the world were sufficient to defray the charge thereof, but his onely: for he deuoured all the reuenewes of Spaine, France, Africa, part of Germanie, Italie, England, Sicilia, Grecia, Asia, Syria, Egypt, Arabia, and of all the Ilands and prouinces of the world; and yet all this was not sufficient but that he endured want, by reason of his prodigious expences: for he neuer ware any one sute of apparell twice, being such as wee haue said. His fingers were euer full of rings; and those which he had had once put off, he neuer ware any more: and so in plate of gold or siluer, he would neuer drinke twice of one cup: which hee gaue to him that serued and attended on him that day. And the very Bathes wherein hee did vse to bathe himselfe, must be newy built, and furnished with perfumes, and most precious odours; and after once bathing they were to be throwne downe: so as they built new Bathes continually. His matteresses and beds were neither of wooll, flocks, nor feathers; but of the downe growing vnder the wings of Partriges. He made certaine feasts in Rome, which were the greatest and most sumptuous that euer were: and hee gaue to the citizens and souldiers a donatiue and distribution of money and corne, to an infinit value. After the feasts and sacrifices were ended, he gaue to the people (as HERODIANVS reporteth) great store of plate, gold, siluer, and other iewels; which truly was the cause why they endured this detestable man the the little time he liued in the Empire, for the desire of of those gifts and benefits which they enioyed by him; as also for that his grandmother, being a most wise and discreete woman, sought by all meanes to reforme his voluptuous sensualitie and rioting, and to procure a good order in the gouernment. But there were great oppressions in the prouinces; and the barbarous nations inuaded the frontiers of the Empire. For he gaue all offices and places of charge vnto wicked men, which did accompanie him in his abominations, and by their counsell he was gouerned: for, depriuing all good and vertuous men from all charge, he sent them into exile. Among which his fauorites, one whose name was ZOTICVS was so priuate, and in such fauour with him, that he was held as a Lord ouer all the rest. This mans counsell was as a law vnto him, and by his direction all offices and Magistracies were sold; and he made Consuls such as were the sonnes of slaues, and men of most base condition.

Zoticus a fauorite of Heliogabalus,

The like order he obserued in the chusing of Generals and Lieutenants, giuing those charges vnto base and simple men: for which and his other vices, notwithstanding that they made benefit of his prodigality, yet both the people & soldiers began to wish his death, so as he was oftentimes in great danger. Which when his mother & grandmother perceiued, they perswaded him to adopt his cosin germane ALEXIANVS, and to make him his companion in the Empire, who was the son of MAMEA his mothers sister, which he performed accordingly, and ALEXIANVS was called ALEXANDER SEVERVS; ALEXANDER after the name of the great ALEXANDER K. of Macedonia; and SEVERVS after SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, grandfather to HELIOGABELVS.

This young man was so vvell inclined, and so vvell bred, that during the time his Cosen led a vvicked and infamous life, hee spent his time in learning, conuersing vvith learned men, and such as vvere good and honest, and exercising himselfe in Armes and in such other practices, as vvere fit for a Knight and a vertuous Gentleman, and sought excellent masters to instruct him in all those faculties. Wherefore, all men, conceiuing good hope of him, began to loue and affect him; and the hatred vvhich they bare against HELIOGABALVS dayly encreased. Which hee perceiuing, sought meanes to kill ALEXIANVS, or at the least to depriue him of the name of CÆSAR, and his successor: But he could not effect it, by reason of the diligence vsed by his Grandmother in protecting him: and also for that that the men of warre deerely loued him; but vpon a time they would haue slaine HELIOGABALVS for that cause, as he was walking in a garden: where he escaped by hiding himselfe in a corner, so as he was not seene; and through the entreatie of ANTIOCHIANVS who was his Pretorian Prefect, the souldiers returned to their Campe, where remaining in a tumult and mutining, they threatned him; and vpon composition, they required that HELIOGABALVS should put from him, certaine vicious and wicked persons which were very priuate with him, and which sold and gaue offices for bribes; and after this manner dispatched the businesse which men had with the Emperour. They also required that certaine of their companies might haue the particular guard of ALEXANDER SEVERVS, to the end that HELIOGABALVS should not kill him; and that his fauorites and familiars should not conuerse with him, for corrupting him with their euill conditions: all which demaunds were presently put in execution.

But after that the furie of the Cohorts was pacified, HELIOGABALVS returned to his former abominable vices, gluttonies, and incredible expenses. First when he went forth of Rome (as sometimes he did) he had with him six hundred chariots and horselitters: the principall carriage was most dishoneft young boies and wenches, with bawdes and their interpreters, and all was little enough, considering his insatiable beastlinesse: for as he was most luxurious, so did he account it for a greatnes, to haue the companie of one woman but once; except her two whom he was married, and that one he neither loued nor regarded. For as HERODIANVS reporteth, he first married a Romane Ladie, of a Noble house, to whom he gaue the name of AVGVSTA, and other titles; and within a while after he forsook her and depriued her both of her name & honour; and married himselfe to a Vestall virgin: which in the vanitie of the Gentiles was held for a matter so religious, that she which had carnall knowledge of a man, was buried aliue. And so he left her and took another; behauing himselfe as a most beastly barbarous man.

Heliogabalus his wiues.

And amongst other matters, he did one thing which the diuell himselfe would neuer haue imagined, which was, he cõmanded that all businesses to be done by day, should be dispatched by night; and those that were to be done by night, should be done by day; and so he arose from his bed at the sun setting, and was then saluted as other Emperours were in the morning: and he laid him to sleepe about day breaking, so as it seemed that the world went backwards. All his studie was to finde meanes to spend excessiuely, in his diet, and in all other things. That supper which was of least price did commonly cost thirtie pound waight of gold, which after our computation, might amount to the value of aboue a thousand pounds starling; and there were some which did cost threescore thousand crownes. Sometimes he promised to giue his guests a Phenix to eate, whereof (they say) there is but one in the world, or else he would giue them a great quantitie of gold for it: which he afterwards performed. When he was neere to the sea, he would neuer eate any fish, but land fowle, and other flesh which should be brought from farre. And when he was farre from the sea, he would eate nothing but fish, which by Posts was brought fresh and aliue, to the end that it should be deere and costly. And for the same reason he would eate such things as were neuer thought of, and had a great quantitie of euery thing: as, of the combes of Cockes, the tongues of Peacockes and of Nightingales. To all his whole Court (which was without number) he made ordinarily to be giuen to eat, certaine great beasts, stuffed of farced with puddings, made of the liuers and lights of Peacockes, of small birds braines, Partriges egges, Parrots, and Phesants heads. He also kept certaine dogs and hounds, which did eate nothing but the soules of Geese: and his Lions (which were many) were fed with Phesants and other costly birds, for this was all his studie. Truly, who shall well consider of this mans expences, may coniecture what the charge might be; and how hard they were to be gotten. He also spent infinite summes of money in keeping of all kinds of the most fierce wild beasts in the world, which were brought from farre countries, as Lions, Panthers, Ounces, Tigres, Hippotames, Crocodiles and many other such like. And if he were by the sea side, hee accounted it a speciall greatnes of minde, to sinke such shipping as he should finde there laden with merchandise, paying afterwards the worth both of shippe and goods. And being vpon a time reprooued thereof by a friend, who asked him what he ment to waste and consume so much, warning him to take heede that he stood not in neede hereafter; he answered vvhat better thing can there be, then for a man to be heire to himselfe liuing: And said moreouer, that he desired not to haue any children, for that they peraduenture through desire to rule vvould conspire against him.

Heliogabalus turned the day into night, and the night into day.

Heliogabalus his diet.

Finally, the vices and leud conditions of this wicked Emperour were such; as in that kinde, none either before or after him was to be compared with him: wherefore I will not spend any longer time in so bad a subiect; for the rest of his doings were so filthie and abominable, as they neither may well be written, neither ought to be published; and so could not long be endured: neither were the meanes vsed by his grandmother MESA sufficient to protect him; nor to pacifie the wrath & rage the people had conceiued against him. Hauing (according to HERODIANVS) raigned six yeeres (yet AVRELIVS VICTOR, and EVTROPIVS say, that he raigned but two yeeres and eight monthes) the Pretorian Souldiers conspired against him. And as AELIVS LAMPRIDIVS reporteth, they came one day armed from their Camp; and hauing slaine most of his seruants, and such as were his companions in his beastly actions, they killed him in this manner. First they haled him out of a Priuie, wherein he (flying from them) had hidden himselfe; and then drawing him from thence, they threw him into a most filthie sink: from whence (for that therein was not roome enough for him) they trailed him like a dogge through the principall places of Rome, and threw him into the riuer Tiber, and tied great stones and waights about him, to the end that his body should neuer be found againe, and so want buriall. All this was done to the good liking and contentment of the people; and the Senate also approoued the same, and commanded that he should no more be called ANTONINVS; and that in detestation of him, no other Emperour should euer afterwards be called by that name; and that he should be called TIBERINVS, according to the manner of his death. HERODIANVS writeth, that he was slaine in the Campe out of Rome, whither he went with his cosen ALEXANDER SEVERVS: and that they killed his mother also, who went with them. Whersoeuer it was, it was in this manner, and he died according to his deserts, and conformable to the life which he had led: for it is the will of God, that wicked princes make euill ends. For being by his diuine prouidence made lords to gouerne and giue good example to their people, to minister iustice and equitie, and to correct and punish the wicked and malefactors; these by their owne euill example hurt and corrupt others; and protect and support the wicked. Let Kings and great Lords and Princes know, that as they haue greater power then others, so haue they lesse libertie to sinne and to commit wickednes; and so God inflicteth greater shame and punishment vpon them, then vpon other men. HELIOGABALVS, after the opinion of HERODIANVS, died at the age of twentie yeeres: for he saith that he raigned six yeeres, and all agree that at the age of fouiteene yeeres, he came to the Empire. AVRELIVS VICTOR saith, that he died in the seuenteenth yeere of his age, and is of opinion that he raigned not fully three yeeres; which (according to EVSEBIVS) was in the yeere of our Lord 224. whereby it appeareth that this Emperour raigned not aboue foure yeeres, and so the same EVSEBIVS affirmeth in his ecclesiasticall Historie.

The vituperable death of Heliogabalus.

Ann. dom. 224.

THE LIFE OF ALEXANDER SEVERVS, ONELY OF THIS NAME, SECOND OF THE SEVERI, AND FIVE AND TWENTITH EMPEROVR of ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

For the death of Heliogabalus, his cosen Alexander Seuerus tooke the Empire, vnder whom it seemed that the Romane comonwealth had a breathing for he retaining in the imperiall dignitie, those good parts which before he had learned, desired, that all things should be ordred and gouerned by wise and learned men. He was very seuere to Iudges, sharply punishing those which for bribes or other meanes had swarued from the right line of reason and equitie. In warres he was most fortunate, as a man which gouerned with wisdome; and he returned to Rome triumphing from the East, to the great contentment of the Romane people. He was no enemie to the Christians, but gaue libertie to such as would become Christian,

Christian, setting vp the image of Christ in his Temples: and he had an intent to haue erected a particular Temple to his name, but was diuerted by his Priests. Finally, the Germane souldiers, vnable to indure the seueritie of his militarie discipline, slew him, together with his mother Mammea instigated thereto by one Maximinus. His death was much deplored in Rome; for it was hoped, that seeing in his youth he gouerned so well, he would do much better when he should come to riper yeeres.

AFter the darke clowdes of the forepassed miseries and sorrowes which miserable Rome had endured, it pleased God to send them ioy, and contentment: for when this accursed HELIOGABALVS was dead; by the common consent of the Senate, and of the Romane people, and of all the men of warre, his cosin german ALEXANDER SEVERVS, was sworne and obeyed for Emperour, who was the sonne of HELIOGABALVS mothers sister called MAMMEA; and his fathers name was VARIVS, borne in Syria, in a citie called Auersa. He came to the Empire being of the age of 16. yeeres, and gouerned the same little more then 13. yeeres, with such wisedome and integritie, that he is accounted one of the best Emperours that euer hath bin in the world: whereto was a great help the discretion and good aduice of his mother, who was a good and discreet woman, vnto whom her sonne was most obedient. AELIVS LAMPRIDIVS, and HERODIANVS report so many excellencies of this Emperour, that of necessitie I must needes make some little stay, as on a pleasing subiect. First, he was much affected to learning; and hauing excellent men for his maisters and tutors, he was very skilfull in all the liberall sciences: for he was a good Mathematician, and did professedlie vnderstand the rules of Geometrie. He was much delighted with Musick, and could paint and carue very well, and had good skill in Song: but he neuer sung but in secret, in the hearing of some of his chamber. He was a very good Poet, and wrote some workes in verse, and could play on the viol, the organs & the flute, more then indifferentlie well: but after he was Emperor, no man euer saw him do it. Vnspeakeable was the ioy which was in Rome vpon the day of his election, and comming to the Empire; and infinite were the blessings which by the Senate & people of Rome were powred vpō him that day. Beginning his raigne with the loue and good will of all men, he gouerned the same with such discretion, as he rather semed a wise old man then a youth: and by the aduice & counsel of his wise mother, he chose the wisest, best, and most experienced men that could be found for his counsellers: and he neither did, nor decreed any thing without their opinion and aduice; notwithstanding that of himselfe he was of singular iudgement, and so wise, as no man could deceiue him. He had euer neere vnto him DOMICIVS VLPIANVS, a wise man and excellent Lawyer, and of a good & holie life, by whose counsel he did chiefely dispose of all matters in his gouernment: although that at that time there were of his counsell FABIVS SABINVS a iust and vpright man, who was called the CATO of his time; and with these, POMPONIVS and ALEPHENVS, AFRICANVS, VENVLEIVS, MODESTINVS, IVLIVS PAVLVS, MECIANVS, CELSVS, PROCVLVS, MARTIANVS, CALISTRATVS FLORENTINVS; all noble, vertuous and learned men in the lawes, and which had bin schollers to the great PAPINIANVS: vnto which he ioined other most noble men; as his kinseman CATILIVS SEVERVS, CAIVS MARCELLVS, AELIVS SERENIANVS, which were good and vpright men, and others whom he found out, to the end he might in all things follow their directions & aduice as he euer did; by reason whereof, his gouernment was highlie extolled and pleasing, and there was a sodaine alteration in all things: for in the time of HELIOGABALVS, and of his father BASSIANVS, many insolencies and disorders were committed and tolerated.

Wise and learned men, Alexander Seuerus his Counsellors.

Wherefore the first thing that ALEXANDER SEVERVS did, was, To reform all the offices and magistracies in his owne House and Imperiall Palace, displacing and discharging all those vitious and dishonest persons which HELIOGABALVS had established there; neither would he admit any man to his seruice, or to any office in his house, that was not an honest man, and of good fame and behauiour. The like hee did by all the Iudges which HELIOGABALVS had made; and also, in the Senate and in the order of Knighthood, hee restored to their offices and dignities those which vnjustly had been deprived. He obserued so good a rule and order in his gouernment, that all matters of justice were to bee determined by men learned in the lawes: and matters concerning the warres were managed by wise men, and such as had experience therein; and by such wise old men as were well read in Antiquities and in antient Histories. Finally, hee neuer gaue any charge to any man either for fauour or reward, but for desert and sufficiency onely; being thereto chosen by him and the Senate.

He held another custome which in my opinion was very commendable; that when hee resolued to send to any City or Prouince a new Gouerner, hee gaue them to vnderstand thereof, making his name knowne to them before hand; to the end, that if any man could except against him why he ought not to be preferred, another might be prouided; but the allegation must be just and true: otherwise, they were grieuously punished who did falsely slander or defame him. This custome it may bee he learned of the Christians of that time, who chose their Priests and Bishops by voices, for their vertues and good works; and in no case he would permit, that any office of justice, of what kinde soeuer, should be bought or sould; and he made diligent inquiry thereof, and did rigorously punish the offenders: for, said he, He that buyeth his office, must sell justice; and I cannot endure merchants of charges and offices: for, if I tolerate them, I cannot afterwards condemn their doings; and I shall be ashamed to punish him that bought, seeing I permitted him to buy.

The saying of Alexander.

Besides all this, he was a most seuere punisher of such Iudges as took bribes; and vsed to say, that he alwaies had his finger in a readinesse to pull out that Iudges eies which was partiall, or a receiuer of bribes & rewards; wherein he was so extreme, that, among other Senators, one coming to do him reuerence who had bin accused thereof, he cried out aloud, that ARABINVS (for, so was his name) did not onely liue, but hould him for senseless and of no worth, seeing he dared to appear in his presence. Also they write of him, that he, seeing an vnjust Iudge, was so troubled therewith, and choler did so much abound and ouercome him, that it made him to vomit. To the contrary, he did greatly honour those Gouerners and Iudges which were good; and, when he passed through their Prouinces, he took them into his litter or chariot with him, and bestowed many fauours and rewards vpon them; and, the better to vnderstand the truth concerning these men, he vsed singular diligence and care, the manner whereof was this: Hee had certain secret and vnknowne chosen honest men, which diligently looked into the dealings of Magistrates, and sought to knowe the truth of all that passed in all the Prouinces of the Empire. Which care I would to God the Princes of our time had; for, besides that justice should then be duely executed, they should knowe the good from the bad: and then they should bee informed of many injuries done in secret, which for fear are concealed by those which endure them; so as the truth neuer comes to light, and the errors and abuses are seldome punished.

SEVERVS desired also that good Iudges, Gouerners and Magistrates, should remain long in their offices and charges; and did vse to say, that it was not a sufficient punishment to deprive an euill Gouerner of his charge, but to giue him most seuere punishment; yea euen to bereaue him of life. When hee sent any one to succeed in the place where had been a good Iudge, hee sent to him to giue him thanks in the name and behalf of the whole Common-wealth, and bestowed rewards vpon him; as, possessions, heards of cattell, and corn, with many other things.

Alexander liberall, but not prodigall.

As for money, he gaue but little: for, this Prince although he was very liberall, yet was he nothing prodigall; and the gifts which he gaue were for the most part such goods as fell to him by confiscation, and by order of law and justice, and such things as became void by some mens death which died without issue or heirs, and so fell to him. But of his money he was euer very sparing: for, he vsed to say, that the publique rents and reuenewes ought not to be spent, but in publique Buildings, in the warres, and in publique occasions; and not vpon the Princes Fauorites and Familiars: and so both within and without Rome he built most sumptuous and stately edifices of Palaces, Baths, Theatres, Courts of Audience, and many other. He abated the ordinary charges of his house, and reduced it to a conuenient order, abolishing the superfluous Expenses of his Predecessors. He apparelled himself decently, but not costly, and neuer ware any precious stones or jewels, neither would he haue any in his chamber; houlding it for a vanity, that a thing of so small a quantity should be of so great a price. His diet was ordinary, neither delicious nor costly. He was a great feeder: for, he had a good stomach, not that he took any delight therein. In drinking he was very temperate, and neuer exceeded mediocrity. And although he were very carefull of his publique Rents, and the Reuenues of his Exchequer, yet he neuer increased the same, neither inuented any new impositions; but rather mitigated and limited those which HELIOGABALVS had imposed: so as in his time the third part of the tribute was not paid, as was in the time of his Predecessors. He also reformed the coins of gold and and siluer, and the value thereof; so as, although it cannot be denied but that he was most carefull in augmenting his treasure, and in preseruing the same, he cannot be charged to haue wronged or endamaged any man. He punished all offenses ordinarily, but without cruelty: and aboue all he was most seuere against theeues: vpon whom he had no mercy; but was very liberal to such as he knew to be poor, to the end they should haue no occasion to steal, or to couet other mens goods.

In all other actions hee was very mercifull, and shewed great clemency; in such sort, that in his time time there was not any Senator put to death, neither any other man, but that his accusation was throughly heard; and his offense sufficiently proued. Hee neuer gaue any office, or charge of gouernment, for fauour, or in reward of seruice done him, but for desert; and vsed to say, that offices and places of charge were not to be giuen to such as sought or labourced to haue them, but to those which refused them. He neuer chose any Senator, but by the voice and consent of the whole Senate: much lesse made he any man a Knight that was the sonne of a bondman, or of base condition, as other Emperors had done. Besides all this, he was so affable and milde in condition, that he admitted any man to his presence, and heard him willingly. He louingly visited all men of esteem in time of their sicknes, and permitted any man to inform him in person of his affairs: and, hauing vnderstood the demands to bee reasonable, hee performed their requests; if otherwise, hee debated the matter with them, and made them to see their error. Being sometimes reproued by his mother and wife, who was the daughter of SVLPITIVS (a man worthy to haue been, and had been Consul) alleaging, that hee beeing so priuate and familiar made his Raign of lesse authority and reputation: hee answered, that it was true; but yet it was thereby the more firm and durable.

Among all his vertues he had one which did excell; whereby it is to beleeued, that although he were an Infidell, yet God gaue him the grace to gouern well: which was, that he permitted all those that would, to become Christians; so as in all his time there was no persecution, neither were the Christians grieued: and in his Temples he had the image and picture of CHRIST, and of ABRAHAM. But, as a blinde man without knowledge, he accounted him among his other gods; and would haue acknowledged and adored CHRIST for a God, and haue built him a Temple a-part, if hee had not been dissuaded by his Priests. Notwithstanding all these good conditions wherewith this Prince was adorned, the people did not forbear to murmur against him; complaining, that he was too much ruled by his mother, who was reported to bee a most couetous woman, although in all other matters she was held for excellently wise, and very honest and vertuous.

Alexander held the image of Christ and of Abraham in his temples.

ALEXANDER, houlding so good a form and rule of gouernment in time of peace, failed not to doo the like in time of war, and in the exercise of military discipline; so as in the warres which hapned he throughly performed the office & duty of a good and most valiant Captain, especially in those which were most dangerous, as in brief I will declare; particularly in that which he had against the Persians, wherein hee obtained most noble victories: and although HERODIANVS writeth otherwise, yet in this place he is not to bee beleeued; for, all other Writers affirm the contrary. And this his notable victorie against ARTAXERXES the mighty King of the Persians, is recited by ÆLIVS LAMPRIDIVS, EVTROPIVS, SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR, EVSEBIVS, PAVLVS OROSIVS, and other antient Authors: so as HERODIANVS onely writeth this war after another manner, to the dishonour of ALEXANDER, being deceiued by false information or report; or otherwise of malice, or vpon some particular occasion.

To the end that the Reader may the better vnderstand this war which ALEXANDER had with the Persians, it shall be requisite he call to memory, that in antient time, when the mighty King CYRVS translated the Monarchie from the Medes to the Persians, ouercoming King ASTYAGES: this their Monarchie and power lasted 209 and odde yeeres, and they grew verie rich and powerfull; vntill, in the time of DARIVS, who gouerned infinite Nations and prouinces, ALEXANDER the Great took Arms against him and entred Asia: where coming to a battaile with him, DARIVS was ouerthrowne and slaine, and ALEXANDER made himselfe Lord of Asia; and so the Monarchie of the Persians ended, passing to the Grecians: and the kingdomes of Asia remained for some space vnder the successors of ALEXANDER the Great; vntill that a valiant man whose name was ARSACES, borne in the countrie of the Parthians, arose and made himselfe King; whereby the dominion of the descendents and linage of the Greekes, was transported to the Parthians; and it became a most famous kingdome, and greatly feared during the time of his successors, which lasted aboue foure hundred yeeres; and the most of them (after his name) were called ARSACIDES. With this Nation of the Parthians, the Romanes had often very daungerous warres, and they euer stood in feare of them.

Artabanus the last king of the Persians.

ARTABANVS being King of the Parthians, of whom in the life of BASSIANVS and of MACRINVS we made mention; a Persian borne, being a man of base linage, but of great courage and very politike, whose name was ARTAXERXES, took Armes and rebelled, and by little and little grew to be very powerfull; and comming to a battaile with ARTABANVS, he ouerthrew and slew him, and made himselfe a mightie King. And so he againe restored the Kingdome of the Persians, and defeated the kingdome of the Parthians: Which the Romans were neuer able to doe. And he gaue it out, that he would restore the kingdome of the Persians to their ancient power and greatnesse: and not content herewith, he began to inuade the borders of the Romane Empire, infesting the countries of Syria and Mesopotamia. These newes being brought to ALEXANDER, who was then in Rome, and had therein raigned three yeers in peace, exceedingly beloued of all men; and hauing intelligence of the power and forces of this King: duly considering thereof, and holding the action to be very honourable, he presently with all expedition made preparation for this warre, and went himselfe in person into Asia with an infinite number of men of warre. HERODIANVS writeth, that he first sent his Ambassadors vnto ARTAXERXES, requiring him to containe himselfe without the bounds of the Empire, and to liue in peace with him. Which request ARTAXERXES (seeing himselfe rich in treasure and very mightie) would not performe; perswading himselfe that it was an easie matter for him to become Lord of all Asia. SEVERVS being come into Syria, the wars began on either side to be very cruel and bloudie. In which warre he obserued so good order and discipline, that it hath not been read or heard, that any other excellent Captaine hath shewed greater iudgement, or vsed greater diligence. First, he maintained such iustice in his Army, and so seuerely punished theft, robberies, violences, iniuries and misdemeanors committed by his souldiers, that his Campe seemed to be a very well gouerned Citie. He was very carefull concerning munition and victuals, as well to prouide them, as to preserue them; and that no man should robbe or defraude any man: so as if any Captaine or Corronel detained neuer so small a quantitie of his souldiers allowance in any thing, he was condemned to die. And in other things he was very diligent and carefull, principally in curing those which were sick or wounded in the Armie. He endeuoured that all his souldiers should alwaies bee in very good order, well apparelled, and well armed, and their horses very ready and well furnished, their Enfignes and Tents very neate and good: He behaued himselfe very familiarly with his souldiers, and when he was at dinner or supper, his Pauilion stood euer open, and he sate in the view and sight of all men, hauing no other meate, but such as all the rest did eate. Besides all this, he paied his souldiers with aduantage, and bestowed many rewards vpon them: and otherwise he was very seuere in punishing offences; so as if his Armie marched among gardens and orchards, they did not any thing that might deserue to be reprehended; and he that did otherwise, was whipped with rods of iron. But if he were a man of worth and qualitie, he reproued him with sharpe and reproachfull speeches; hauing these words euer in his mouth, Doe not that to another, which thou wouldst not another should doe vnto thee: which he learned (as hee said) of the Christians. Other more hainous offences or mutinies, he punished with such rigor, that sometimes he tithed whole legions; which was, to put to death the tenth man of all the legion. He did as little endure that any Captaine or Coronell should wrong a souldier, or that hee should diminish the least part of a souldiers pay, or allowance. And if he saw that a souldier was poore and out of apparell, he relieued him with what he thought necessarie for him: for (quoth he) how can that souldier liue vnder due command, which hath not clothes on his back, and money in his purse? for hunger and penurie will put him in despaire, and make him aduenture to doe that which he ought not. For these and such like matters, which would bee long to relate, this Emperour was infinitely beloued, and feared by all his men of warre: and in his time souldiers were better ordered, gouerned and trained then in the time of any other Emperor.

What it is to tithe a Legion.

Returning to the Persian warre; during the time it lasted, there passed betweene the Armies of the one and other partie, many great skirmishes and encounters; wherein were many notable feates of Armes, vntill that at the last they came to a battaile wherein they ioyned with all their whole forces; ARTAXERXES bringing in his Armie an innumerable company of footmen men, and 130000 horsemen (a proud and bold nation, for the victories which they had lately obtained against the Parthians) and had moreouer in his Armie seuen hundred Elephants, and one thousand and eight hundred Chariots armed with sithes, which the Persians then vsed in the wars. The Emperor of the other side brought so many men, both of foot and horse, as hee who was Lord and Commander of the Roman Empire might be able to leuie. SEVERVS, in this battell performing the office of an excellent Captain, visiting euery squadron, incouraging the souldiers with most kinde speeches, calling them by their proper names, promising them great rewards, and fighting in person a great part of the day like a valiant Knight; in the euening (for, so long did the Fight continue) hee wanne one of the most fierce and cruell battels that euer was fought in the world. King ARTAXERXES escaped by flight; and there were slain in that battell ten thousand horsemen, and so many footmen that they could not be numbred: as it appeareth by the Oration which SEVERVS made in the Senate after his return to Rome; which is recited by LAMPRIDIVS. And by the same it appeareth, that there were slain by the Romans two hundred Elephants, and that three hundred were taken, with one thousand armed chariots, and a great number of Persians; which afterwards were ransomed for a great summe of money. So as after this victory, the Emperor, without any resistance, recouered those Countries which ARTAXERXES had taken: and, passing through Mesopotamia, he enlarged the bounds of the Empire; and, leauing therein such a guard as he thought fit, hee returned to the City of Antioch. Being in that City (according to the custom of the Roman Generals) hee paid his souldiers, and gaue them great rewards, diuiding the spoils of the victory among them; so as they remained infinitely ioyfull and well contented.

130000 horse-men in one army

A most great battell fought betweene the Romans and the Persians.

And so, leauing all parts of the East in peace and quiet, he returned to Rome; where hee entred in triumph with greater solemnity and pomp than euer any had triumphed before him; his chariot being drawn (to the wonder of the behoulders) by Elephants which he had taken: and all the people and Senate of Rome blessed him, and receiued him with vnspeakeable joy. At that Instant, FVRIVS CELSVS obtained a great victory against the Mauritanians and Tingitanians in Africa, which rebelled. And, in Germany, VARIVS MACRINVS had very good successe: and, from Armenia, IVNIVS PALMATVS returned with victory.

Alexander came into Rome in triumph.

The victory of Furius Celsus in Africa.

After this triumph was ended, SEVERVS made the accustomed donatiue and distribution among the souldiers and people of Rome, with the feasts and ordinary huntings; remaining in Rome certain yeers, in hearing causes and doing iustice. And in such sort hee diuided the houres, as there was no jot of time lost, and the time of leasure he spent in reading of excellent books; principally, PLATO'S Common-wealth, and TVLLIE'S Offices: and he did often vse to reade HORACE and VIRGIL.

He liuing thus in peace and tranquillity, deerly beloued of the Romans, and by all the Prouinces subject to the Empire; it being about the thirteenth yeer of his raign, the high Germans and other northerly Nations, with such fury and such infinite numbers of men (as in former time they had vsed to doo) took Arms against the Empire; so as, hauing past the riuers of Danubie and the Rhine, they put all Italie in great fear. By reason whereof, the good Emperour ALEXANDER SEVERVS with all haste departed from Rome, with the greatest forces hee then could leuie: which was not done without great grief and heauinesse of the Roman people, so deerly was he generally beloued. And then the warres began between his forces and the Germans; wherein, notwithstanding his enemies were very mighty, yet through his great diligence and valour he suppressed their fury, in such sort that they were daily put to the worse in all skirmishes and encounters. But the ordinary Legions which lay there in garrison, accustomed to raping and other disorders permitted in the time of HELIOGABALVS the Emperor was neither able to endure their insolencie, neither they his equity: for, vertue and vice cannot dwell together. Whereupon, they conspired among themselues to kill him, and to chuse one MAXIMINVS, a most valiant old souldier, for Emperor; whom SEVERVS had made a Captain of Tyrones (for, so did they call new souldiers) wch their conspiracy they afterwards put in execution. Others write, that the cause of his death was, for that following his mothers counsell in gathering of treasure, he was not so liberall to his men of war and others, as he ought to haue been; and also for that he had determined in his councell to leaue the wars of Germany, and to go into the East: for which cause the souldiers conceiued great hatred against him. But I hould the first for the most certain cause: of which opinion were LAMPRIDIVS and IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS, writing his life, and the life of MAXIMINVS. Finally, whatsoeuer the occasion were, the Legions of Germany slue him; the good Emperor being in his Tent, void void of all feare and ſuſpicion, neer to the City of Magantia or Mentz. And, together with him, they ſlue his mother MAMMEA; which they did by the counſell and aduice of the accurſed MAXIMINVS, who was afterwards his Succeſſor. HERODIANVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR write, that before they murdered him they made the other Emperor.

SEVERVS was twentie nine yeeres, three moneths and ſeuen daies old when he was murthered, and had raigned thirteene yeeres and nine daies. His death was more lamented in Rome, then euer was any Emperours before him; and all the Cities and Prouinces of the Empire were extremely grieued thereat. In this manner was this moſt excellent and vertuous Prince ſlaine by treaſon, who neuer had commanded any man to be ſlaine, in the yeere of our Lord 237. And although that we reade that he was married, yet we reade not of any children that he left behinde him.

THE LIFE OF MAXIMINVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND SIX AND TWENTIH EMPEROR of Rome.

THE ARGVMENT.

MAximinus was a Thracian borne, of a baſe and ignoble houſe: but he attained to credit through the actiuitie of his bodie, which brought him into fauour with many Emperors; yet Heliogabalus did not greatly pleaſe him, being riotous and laſciuious. But fortune, as ſhee is blinde, ſo doth ſhe blindly beſtow her benefits and fauors, and aduanced him in the end to the Imperiall dignitie: wherein he carried himſelfe ſo cruelly and tyrannouſly, that poore Rome could neuer haue had a worſe, or more wicked Prince. Firſt, vpon ſundrie occaſions hee put to death all Alexanders friends; and being aſhamed of his owne linage, he alſo ſlew all ſuch as had knowne his father, ſhewing himſelfe very courteous: he turned his ſpleene againſt the Chriſtians, and afflicted them with new and vnaccuſtomed torments. He diſcouered a conſpiracy, which he puniſhed ſeuerely; and ſought to maintaine the loue of his ſouldiers, being of opinion that it lay in them as well to ſupport him in the Empire, as it did to giue it him. He warred againſt the Germans; and was of ſo hatefull a diſpoſition and ſo cruell, that in a manner all the whole Empire rebelled againſt him: And in his life time old Gordianus was made Emperor in Africa. But aboue all the rebellions, that of Rome did moſt diſpleaſe him; againſt which, comming in a great rage, and hauing in a manner beſieged it, he was ſlain by ſome Romane ſouldiers, conſidering the miſeries which their countrie was likely to haue endured, if Maximinus obtained the victorie. And to the end that no memoriall ſhould remaine of ſo wicked and cruell a man, they ſlew his ſonne alſo; whoſe head being carried to Rome, brought great contentment to the Citie.

HOw great good, a good Prince bringeth to the world, and how preiudiciall and hurtfull it is to loſe him; the death of ALEXANDER SEVERVS did ſufficiently manifeſt to the Romane Empire; which (during his life time) enioyed all the contentment that could be deſired, for his equitie, clemency, and iuſtice: but he dying, and that cruell monſter MAXIMINVS ſucceeding (who raigned but three yeeres) in exchange of theſe and other bleſſings, there enſued diſcord, ciuill warres, inſolencies, robberies, cruelties, ſeditions and other calamities. Wherefore, in my opinion, men ought more earneſtly and with greater inſtancy pray to God to ſend them a good King and gouernor, then for health, wealth, or long life: for in the raigne of a wicked and vniuſt Prince, vices abound abound, which corrupt good cuſtomes and manners, and vertue is ſuppreſſed, and men liue in danger both of life and goods. And in the time of a good Prince and Gouernor, all theſe defects are repaired: for, the iuſt raigning, the wicked amend and become vertuous. For (as the Philoſophers ſay) Such as is the Prince, ſuch will be the ſubiects: ſo he which prayeth for a good king, may be iuſtly ſaid to pray for the benefit of the whole kingdome: For it doth often times plainly appeare, that the diligence and induſtrie of a good husbandman doth more auaile, then the fertilitie of the ſoile: and ſo we ſee that ſome places which are barren, doe abound with neceſſaries to the vſe of mans life; and to the contrarie, other places which are moſt fertil, through euill gouernment, become wild and ouergrown with weedes, yeelding little profit. And ſo hiſtories, and experience doe teach vs, that in time of good and peaceable Kings, men grow rich and mount to eſtates and dignities: And in time of troubles and calamities which happen when the Gouernement is in the handes of Tyrants, many men loſe their eſtates and liues, and ſometime their Soules, by their meanes, and all things goe to confuſion and out of order.

But comming to our Hiſtory, the good Emperour SEVERVS being dead: as he had neither ſonne nor brother that might challenge the Empire; and MAXIMINVS being the chiefe man in the Army, and of greater power then any other, they all agreed to chooſe and ſweare him Emperour, willingly yeelding obedience vnto him, which they ought not to haue done: for ſee proued wicked, cruell, and couetous; notwithſtanding that he was old and loden with yeers. And becauſe that this man was of a goodly ſtature, and came to the Empire by great aduenture, I will briefly declare the ſucceſſe of his life, which I preſume will be a pleaſing Hiſtorie.

Maximinus choſen Emperor

This MAXIMINVS was the ſonne of a man whoſe name was NICEA, borne in Gotland, and his mothers name was ABABA, of the nation of the Alanes, which liued in a village in Thracia; ſo as of either ſide he deſcended of barbarous nations: and he afterwards grew to be ſo tall of ſtature, as he ſeemed to be a Giant: for (as IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS reporteth) he was eight and a halfe Geometricall foote high; which is two foote and a halfe more then we ſee any man ordinarily to be in theſe daies. And as he had a great bodie, ſo had he all parts thereof proportionable to his greatneſſe: for he had a good face and was very faire, with great full eyes; and was ſo extremely ſtrong, that a cart heauily laden, and which two oxen could hardly moue, he would eaſily draw and turne at his pleaſure, and with his fiſt he brake a horſes leg: and (as IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS ſaith) ſtriking a horſe in the chap with his fiſt he brake out all his teeth; and with a ſpurne with his foote, he ſplit him in pieces: alſo with his fiſt hee brake a ſtone, and with his hands cleft a tree, and did many other things, which were they not recorded by very true authors, would be accounted fables. And beſides all this, he was of ſo great courage, that he was neuer knowne to ſtand in feare of any thing, and was naturally fierce, prowd and preſumptuous, and made no account of any man. His bringing vp when he was a boy, was in keeping of beaſts (for his parents were poore, and liued in the countrey) and afterwards his minde increaſing with the ſtrength of his bodie, he came to the Romane Armie to ſeeke entertainment to be a ſouldier, and to follow the warres: where by reaſon of his greatneſſe of body and his extreme ſtrength, he was ſoone knowne, and admired of all men, which was in the raigne of SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, who was father to BASSIANVS and GETA. CAPITOLINVS writeth, that SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS being in Soria with his Armie, celebrating the birth day of his ſonne GETA, with many ſports (which was a thing much vſed in ancient time) and giuing the winners for reward iewels, collars, bracelets, ſouldiers girdles, and ſuch like things; MAXIMINVS, who was but newly come to the Army, and could ſcarcely ſpeake the Latine tongue (which was then the vulgar Romane ſpeech) came before the Emperour, and intreated him to giue him leaue to try himſelfe in thoſe exerciſes. The Emperor meruailing at the vnmeaſurable proportion of his perſon, and ſeeing him ſo faire and well proportioned, granted his requeſt; but vpon condition, that he ſhould not encounter & contend with any Roman ſouldier, but with ſuch as were water-bearers, and ſeruitors of the Camp, among which were many very valiant and ſtrong men. MAXIMINVS comming to handy gripes with them, ouercame 16 of them which were of greateſt ſtrength, and ſought out for that purpoſe, without reſting, or once taking any breath, not being moued by any of them: for which victorie, the Emperor cauſed ſome iewels of ſmall price to be giuen him, but not any ſuch as were vſually giuen to the ſouldiers; and commanded alſo that he ſhould receiue pay, and be entered in the muſter role to ſerue as a ſouldier.

Vpon

Vpon a day the Emperor riding to view his Camp, hee saw this MAXIMINVS (who was yet but a raw souldier) out of order; wherefore he willed a Coronell to call him into his rank, and to instruct him in the duty that he ought to obserue in the wars: and MAXIMINVS, imagining that the Emperor spake of him, came before him, and kneeled down at his feet. The Emperor, desiring for his pastime to see whether he could runne well or no, spurred his horse, and gaue sundry turns in the field; and seeing that MAXIMINVS euer kept euen with him, and that his horse was tired, and he running afoot shewed no signe of wearinesse, hee rained his horse, and asked of MAXIMINVS whether he could wrestle: whereto he answered, that he would wrestle so long as it should please his Majesty. The Emperor, maruelling at his strength, made choice of certain of the strongest men in all his Army to wrestle with him; and MAXIMINVS, without breathing or any resting, ouercame seuen of them. Whereupon, SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS commanded a collar of gold to bee giuen vnto him, and certain peeces of siluer, and made him one of his guard, and commanded that hee should attend in the Palace: and by this means he came to be much esteemed among the Coronels and men of warre. And he daily increased both in stature and strength: for, when he came to the Camp hee was but a boy; and sometime in wrestling he would ouerthrowe twenty or thirty of the strongest men in the Army: and in battels and encounters he euer bare away the prize and chiefest honour, performing strange things. Wherfore SEVERVS fauoured him very much, and gaue him good places and charges in the wars. He did eat and drink according to the proportion of his body, or rather more: for, CAPITOLINVS writes, that he did daily vse to eat 40 pound waight of flesh, and to drink a measure of wine which contains about 6 gallons of our English measure.

SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS dying in England, as we haue said, he serued his sonne ANTONINVS BASSIANVS, and was a Coronell, and had other offices and dignities in the wars. And, after the death of BASSIANVS in Syria, he would not serue MACRINVS, because he held him guilty of the death of his Lord: but, returning to the village wherein he was born, he there purchased certain possessions, and liued there some time in rest, vntill MACRINVS was dead, and that the yong vitibus HELIOGABALVS came to the Empire. At which time he came to Rome, as to the son of BASSIANVS, and nephew to SEVERVS, both which had bin his Lords; imagining, that he should haue been as much respected by him, as hee had been by them. But HELIOGABALVS more regarding lasciuious and dishoneſt men, than such as were of worth and valorous, he found with him no such entertainment as hee expected. For, when hee came to kisse his hand, HELIOGABALVS said vnto him; MAXIMINVS, it is could me that in wrestling thou art too hard for twenty or thirty men: I would gladly know, whether thou darest in amorous assaults encounter as many women. Which speeches did so much displease MAXIMINVS, that he would presently haue abandoned the Court; but that certain of HELIOGABALVS friends (for his honors sake) staid him: for, they held it a shame to him, that one which was held to be the most valiant and strongest man of his time (and who for that cause was by some called ACHILLES, and by others AIAX) should not be entertained in his pay to serue in his Army. And so there was giuen him by HELIOGABALVS the leading of certain footmen. But MAXIMINVS, abhorring and not able to endure the behauiour of this effeminate Emperor, in all the time of his Raign after that time, neuer came into his presence; somtimes faining himself to be sick, and other times seeking occasion and means to absent himself; vntill the good ALEXANDER SEVERVS was made Emperor after the death of HELIOGABALVS; and then hee returned to Rome: where SEVERVS receiued him very gladly, commending him highly in the Senate; and made him a Coronell and Commander of the fourth Legion, which he had raised of new souldiers. MAXIMINVS accepted the charge, and performed his duty singularly well in the wars of Germany, where hee shewed great prowesse: by means whereof, and of the gifts which he vsed to bestowe vpon his souldiers, and of the Emperors fauor, he wan such honour and reputation with all men, that ALEXANDER (as we haue said) being slain by his souldiers, he was by them created Emperour: and some write, that he was one of those which conspired his death. Of such force is the desire of rule, that men forgetting the duty and loyalty they owe, and the benefits they haue receiued, practise notable villanies, and commit horrible treasons, to the end they may raign and command; not remembring, that by what means they obtain rule and dominion, by the self same they commonly lose their gouernments, and are throwne down by the same means that they mounted.

Officers giuen by Seuerus to Maximinus.

After that MAXIMINVS saw himself an Emperor; as he was naturally proud and fierce, and as base of condition as he was high of stature; so was he of opinion, that his best course was to make himself obeyed rather for fear, than for loue; and presently beganne to shew himself most cruell. His election being knowne in Rome (after they had lamented the death of ALEXANDER SEVERVS) was generally displeasing to all men: and, vpon report of his cruelty, they stood in great fear of him; insomuch that both men and women made vowes and praiers to their gods, to the end he might neuer come to Rome.

Maximinus lesseth generally disliked in Rome.

The first cruelty this fierce Barbarian committed, was, To put to death all those which had serued and been familiar with ALEXANDER SEVERVS: and then he banished an infinit number of others, and would not suffer that in the Army there should be any Captain, or in the Senate any Senator, that had been aduanced by him. And, for as much as hee was ashamed of the baſenes of his owne parentage, hee commanded all those which were neer about him, and had knowne his parents, to bee slain: among which were many who in time of their pouertie had relieued them, of compassion and in charity. And to all these his cruelties he added a greater: for, he persecuted the Christians which were fauoured by ALEXANDER; and by his commandement was the sixt persecution of the Church of God: principally those were persecuted which had the charge and gouernment of others; wherein he vsed strange kindes of cruelties, and new deuices in putting people to death; reposing such confidence in his own strength and courage, that he held no man able to kill him. Wherefore, as CAPITOLINVS reports, he held himself for immortall: yet one day in his presence vpon the Theatre these verses were recited in the Greek Tongue;

The first persecution of Christians.

Whom one man cannot bereaue of life,
many his bloud may easily spill.
Th' Elephant is great, yet done to death:
strong is the Lion, and men him kill.
If through thy valour thou fear not any one,
beware what a number may do to thee alone.

The cruelty of MAXIMINVS did principally extend it self against such as were rich, and in high degree and authority; whom hee intreated very ill, and for very slight occasions put them to death, and confiscated their goods; which the common people little regarded: for, the rich are commonly odious and hatefull to the baser sort, and to such as are poor. On the other side, he cunningly held himself in the loue and good liking of the men of war: for, besides their ordinary paies, he gaue them many pensions and rewards, and prouided all things necessary for them; and took as great paines as any ordinary souldier, with incredible courage and diligence: and as he was a strong man, and had a very able body; so he euer went armed, and vpon all occasions was as ready as any souldier in the Army, and had alwaies valiant men about him, although of base degree and condition. Finally, the effect of all his actions was, To bee feared and to command like a tyrant: which was the occasion that a noble Roman Gentleman called MAXIMVS, who had bin Consul, conspired against him, and practised with the ould souldiers which had serued SEVERVS, and with some others (to whom, MAXIMINVS behauiour and conditions were nothing pleasing) that whereas hee with his Army was to passe a Riuer vpon a wooden Bridge, as soon as hee should bee comn to the further end thereof, the Bridge behinde him should be broken or drawn away, and so he abandoned to his enemies. But this was reuealed to him: or else (as some surmised) it was a matter fained by him, thereby to haue the better colour to shadow his cruelties; which he executed in so high degree, that hee caused 3000 persons to be slain, which he said were guilty of that treason.

A conspiracy against Maximinus.

After this, a great multitude of SEVERVS old souldiers mutined; and, withdrawing themselues from the Camp, proclaimed one QVARCIANVS for Emperor (as HERODIANVS writeth): but CAPITOLINVS saith, his name was TICVS, and it may be he was called by the one and the other; who, for that hee was a man of great account, was by MAXIMINVS deposed from the charge which he held. And the souldiers (against his will) forced him to accept the Empire; which he not without great reason refused: for, one MACEDONIVS, who seemed to bee his great friend, and was one of those which had aduanced him to that dignity, within fewe daies after murdered him as he lay sleeping vpon his bed; and, hauing stricken off his head, carried the same to MAXIMINVS: who greatly rejoiced to see himself freed from so great a danger. And although hee then gaue him a good countenance which brought it, yet he afterwards put him to a cruell death, as for his treacherie he had deserued: first, for murdering his Soueraign; secondly, for being a traitor to his friend.

Quarcianus proclaimed Emperor, and shortly murdered in his bed.

With these two good fortunes, the tyranny and cruelty of MAXIMINVS encreased. But following the wars he went out of Hungarie into Germanie; and, making most cruell war against the Germans (hauing in his Army those souldiers which ALEXANDER SEVERVS had left, being many, very well trained, and of great experience) the number hee increased; so as with them he wan many battels, putting all to fire and sword where hee came, spoiling all that was in that Country: and in all the encounters that euer hapned, he euer fought in person, and performed more in Fight than any man in the whole Army.

Hauing pacified all matters in Germanie, so as he found no more resistance; by reason of winter which then came on, he returned into Hungarie: from whence hee wrote to the Senate, extolling his victories; and sent vnto them all his battels and skirmishes painted in Tables. I can-
Executions don in Rome by Maximinus order. not particularly set down the murders and cruell slaughters of men which hee commanded to be executed in Rome at this time, they were so many: for, he did put to death many men which had been Consuls, and confiscated their goods, vsing infinite other tyrannies against the noblest and of most esteem; presuming onely vpon his owne personall strength, and the power of his Army; to which he gaue many great gifts. And yet among his men of warre he forbare not to execute notable cruelties: for, he more desired to bee feared, than any thing else. Wherefore both in Rome, and in diuerse parts of the Empire, they studied how they might bee rid of him, and to finde out some other man fit to be Emperor; which began in Africa, and passed after this manner:

In the Prouince of Africa MAXIMINVS had a Procurator, who with great rigor and authority gathered his Rents and Tributes; and, being of his masters conditions, committed incredible extortions and outrages, robbing and pilling the Countrey, doing wrong to all men: and not content therewith, but as he spoiled many of their goods, so he bereaued them of their liues. And he continued so in his rapine and cruelty, that the people could no longer endure Maximinus his rent-gatherer slain in Africa. his oppression: wherefore the chief among them concluded to kill him, and did so. Afterwards considering with themselues how great and how dangerous a crime they had committed, they resolued to commit yet a greater, which was, To create an Emperor. Wherefore, conferring with the souldiers of those Legions which lay in Africa, who detested MAXIMINVS for his Gordianus chosen Emperor cruelty, they all agreed to chuse GORDIANVS, a Noble-man, who was Proconsul of Africa, and to make him Emperor, being a man welnie fourescore yeers old.

GORDIANVS (as I said) was of a Noble house; by his fathers side descended from the GRACCHI; and, by his mother, from the most excellent Emperor TRAIAN. He had been Ædil, Questor, Pretor, and Consul, in Rome; and had held many other offices & dignities, and had been Commander and gouernour of many countries and prouinces, which he had gouerned with great wisedome and authoritie; and at that time was Viceconsull in Africa, by the appointment of ALEXANDER SEVERVS, who was MAXIMINVS his Predecessor; by whom, for his deserts and vertues, hee was greatly honoured and esteemed: for, GORDIANVS was a vertuous and most temperate man in all his actions. He was a man of a tall stature, rather inclining to be fat than lean, and of a goodly presence. His face was high-coloured, representing great authority. He was in his fare and diet (as in all other matters) very temperate; and was learned, and much giuen to the study of Philosophie. He was married to the daughter of SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS, and by her had sonnes and daughters, and by chance had with him when he was chosen Emperor a son, whose name was also GORDIANVS; who had bin Consul, and was held in great honour and reputation: whom they also chose Emperor together with his Father.

The souldiers and the country-people being assembled together (wherof, one MAVRICE, a Decurion was chief & first motiue of the matter) they entred tumultuously into GORDIANVS house: who, not thinking of any such thing, in the beginning was in great fear and trouble, conceiuing that they came to haue slain him: but after that hee vnderstood wherefore they Gordianus refused the empire came (for, they tould it him) he vtterly refused their offer, excusing himself by reason of his old age. But they came so resolute, that notwithstanding his opposition, yet hee could not otherwise chuse, but he must accept of the Ensigns, and title of Emperor; which they gaue him, together with his son. GORDIANVS, although he were therto compelled, and accepted thereof against his will: yet he presently wrote with all speed, giuing the Senate aduertisement of his election, and how he had consented thereto, and accepted of the Empire, that he might free the same from the cruelty of MAXIMINVS. Hauing publisht the same in the city of Tisdro, where hee was chosen Emperor, hee took his way towards Carthage, with the magnificence, Ensignes, and and officers of the Empire, where he was with great ioy receiued. From thence he sent his Ambassadors to Rome with particular letters to many his friends and kinsmen; and likewise took order that VALERIANVS the Pretorian Prefect of the Legions & companies which lay neere Rome should be slaine: whom HERODIANVS calleth VATALIANVS (who was a most cruell man) a fauorite and great friend of MAXIMINVS. These letters were receiued with incredible ioy and gladnes, for the great hatred they bare against MAXIMINVS: and VITALIANVS or VALERIANVS was slain accordingly, by those wch were sent for that purpose.

The Senate and people of Rome approued the election of GORDIANVS and his sonne: and MAXIMINVS and his sonne (who was alreadie made CÆSAR, and named his successor) were adiudged enemies and rebels; and the people with great furie tare in pieces many ministers of MAXIMINVS his crueltie, among which were some which were not culpable. They also slew SABINVS the Prefect of the citie, for that he labored to haue hindered the approbation of GORDIANVS: and the Senate elected for CÆSAR a yong man whose name also was GORDIANVS, who was nephew to old GORDIANVS: and so there was a sodaine alteration in all things, for there was a generall feare and confusion.
Maximinus and his sonne adiudged for rebels and enemies to the Romane commonwealth.

The Senate considering then in how great danger the citie was, and what might ensue by reason of the great power of MAXIMINVS, they made great preparation, writing their letters into all the Prouinces, commanding that al those gouernours which were placed by MAXIMINVS, should be displaced, and therewith also they proclaimed GORDIANVS for Emperour. This order and direction (as HERODIANVS writeth) in the most part of all the Prouinces was obeyed, and in the most of them they slew the gouernors set there by MAXIMINVS. And in some places they did the contrarie, killing or apprehending the messengers; so as euery where was bloudshed: for the crueltie of the Emperour had made al men cruell. When as the newes of that which happened in Rome and Africa came to MAXIMINVS (CAPITOLINVS writeth) he was therewith so troubled and enraged, that he cried out like a man distempered: and running his head against the wals, he tumbled in the floore, rent his cloaths, and made many other shewes of furie and passion.

This Fit being past, the next day he assembled his whole Armie, whereto he made a speech, complaining to them of the treacherie of the Africanes, and of the lightnes and inconstancie of the Romanes, prouoking them all he could to be reuenged; and making great promises, assured them that they should possesse the goods of all those which had offended. And when he had ended his oration, he presentlie gaue them their ordinarie pay with great aduantage, shewing himselfe very bountifull: so as they all promised to serue him faithfullie, notwithstanding that many among them hated him deadlie. In this manner vsing all possible diligence, MAXIMINVS directed his iourney towards Rome, with the best souldiers, and the greatest prouision of munition he could, with intent to asswage his wrath; by the execution of his extreme crueltie: and so he began to march; not so fast as he would, for the great number of men, of cariages, and baggage which went with him, and want of victuals: for all the cities (being risen against him) had put all the victuals and fruites of the earth in safe keeping.

While as these things passed in Germany and Rome, CAPELIANVS, who was Gouernour of the Prouinces of Numidia, and Mauritania in Africa, rebelled against GORDIANVS, aswell for that they were auncient enemies, as for that CAPELIANVS was a very great friend vnto MAXIMINVS; and had been settled there by him: who, as soone as he heard that the GORDIANS were chosen Emperours, put those Legions which were vnder his command in order, leuying thereto the greatest forces he could, and took his way towards Carthage; against whom came yong GORDIANVS, with all the forces he could leuie (the old man remaining in the citie in great care and feare of that which afterwards followed) and these two Armies ioyning battaile (which was very bloudie) CAPELIANVS in the end had the victorie, and Young Gordianus slaine in a battaile. GORDIANVS was ouerthrowne and slaine: for the greatest part of his people were Bisonious, or raw souldiers, and not accustomed to the warres. The father hearing of the death of his sonne; and of the losse of the battaile, seeing no hope of relefe, and the victorious enemie at the
And old Gordianus hung himselfe in the girdle. gates of the citie, with the girdle which he ware hung himselfe: and so died he with reproach & dishonorably (hauing a few daies enioyed the name of Emperor) who had liued fourescore yeeres very honourably & in great reputation. And CAPELIANVS following his victorie entred Carthage: where he slew the principal of those which escaped from the battaile; and robbed many houses & temples, shewing great crueltie both within the citie, & abroad in the countrie; robbing & sacking towns & villages, in colour of reuenge for the wrong don to MAXIMINVS; seeking by all meanes possible to please his souldiers, with a desire to make himselfe Emperor.

The fame of this aduenture came speedily to Rome: wherewith the Romanes were incredibly troubled and perplexed, to see themselues depriued of the fauour and succour which they hoped for from GORDIANVS and his sonne. And knowing that MAXIMINVS came like an enraged lion against them (for redresse and remedie against so great a daunger) the Senate assembled in the Temple of IVPITER; and after many consultations held betweene the principal & best experienced men of the citie, they chose MAXIMVS PVPIENVS, and CLODIVS BALBINVS for Emperours; both which had held great offices, and had been valiant Captaines and gouernours, and liued with great fame. And to please the people which consented not to this election, the Senate named young GORDIANVS, nephew to that GORDIANVS who hanged himselfe in Carthage, CÆSAR, who was his daughters sonne, and of the age of eleuen yeeres.

Maximus Pupienus and Claudius Balbinus chosen Emperours, and Gordianus the nephew of old Gordianus made Cæsar.

These two being created and sworne Emperours, and hauing taken the Imperiall robes and ensignes, they leuied the greatest forces that in Rome and the borders thereof they were able. MAXIMVS PVPIENVS, who was the wiser and more sufficient man, left the citie, to make head against MAXIMINVS; who with great haste and furie came towards Italy, and had conceiued incredible ioy, for that he was giuen to vnderstand of the death of GORDIANVS and of his son, and of the victorie which CAPELIANVS had obtained against them: but after that he knew of the election of the new Emperours in Rome, his rage and wrath redoubled. And vnderstanding that PVPIENVS came against him with a sufficient Armie, he put his troupes in order; and hauing passed the Alpes, entring into Italy, where he thought to haue found great plentie of victuals, he found all cleane contrarie: for all sustenance was carried away, and those places and townes which were not fortified, and able to defend themselues, were abandoned and left desert: wherefore the souldiers for the hunger and want which they endured, began to murmure and to speake ill of MAXIMINVS; and he punishing some of them for it, grew hatefull to all.

Maximinus entred Italy.

Drawing neere to the citie of Aquileia, which hee made account to enter without difficulty, he found very great resistance: for besides that the citie was very populous and rich, there were within it for the defence thereof, two Romane gentlemen, which had been Consuls; the one was called CRISPINVS, and the other MENEFILVS: who had in such sort furnished the citie with men and munition, that MAXIMINVS with great difficultie passing the riuer, and encamping himselfe before it, gaue a very cruell assault, in which much people died of either side: but those which were within, defended themselues so valiantly, as he was enforced to alter his determination, to raise his siege, and to retire. While as MAXIMINVS lay before Aquileia, and PVPIENVS with his Armie marcht toward him, Rome endured a great affliction: for there grew a contention betweene the Pretorian souldiers and the people of Rome, about two souldiers which had beene slaine by two Senatours, whose names were GALLICANVS and MECENAS. And both parties taking Armes, there were slaughters and cruelties committed, the like whereof haue bin seldom heard of: for the city was set on fire, & a great part thereof burnt, the new Emperour BALBINVS not being able to quench or stay it: who seeing that he could not redresse so great an inconuenience, retired himselfe to his palace. So as whosoeuer shal wel consider hereof, shall finde that the three yeeres tyrannous gouernment of MAXIMINVS (for so long it lasted) was the cause that the citie of Rome and the whole Romane Empire were neuer free from warres, tumults, robberies, murthers, and all manner of calamities. And he (as I haue said) lying before Aquileia, preuailing little by the assaults which he gaue, by reason of the great resistance made by the besieged, and wanting victuals (for PVPIENVS, and the Senate had commaunded all to be carried away out of that territorie, and the borders and marches thereabouts) and ioyntly herewith his souldiers daily hearing that all the East had reuolted and rebelled against him, by letters sent from the Senate of Rome: With this feare and for the secret hatred which the old Romane Souldiers bare against him, they agreed to mutine and to kil him; seeing that Rome (wherein were their parents, their wiues, children and kinsfolkes) and also that all Italy was enemie vnto them, and had proclaimed them rebels. It happened that MAXIMINVS and his sonne one day about noone reposing themselues in his Tent, the souldiers and many others with them, came very boldly to his pauilion, and without any resistance slew him: the like they did by his sonne, saying, That of an euill fire could neuer proone good whelpe; when he had raigned three yeeres, and was sixtie and odde yeeres old; and his sonne nineteene, and somewhat more. His death was approoued by all the Armie:

Maximinus and his sonne slaine in his Tent.

Army: and as soon as it was knowne in the City of Aquileia, they opened the ports, and became all friends. They sent the heads of this tyrannous Emperor and his sons, to Rome; where with vnspeakeable ioy they were receiued: and by the way they carried them to PVPIENVS; who was in Rauenna. This hapned in the yeer of our Lord 240.

THE LIFE OF MAXIMVS PVPIENVS AND CLODIVS BALBINVS, ONELY OF THOSE NAMES, and seuen and twentith Roman Emperours.

After the death of MAXIMINVS; MAXIMVS PVPIENVS & CLODIVS BALBINVS, without any contradiction continued Emperors; which (as I said) were so already created: and PVPIENVS, who then was in Rauenna, with all speed went to Aquileia, to content the Army which MAXIMINVS had left there; where, by those of the City and of the Army, he was with great ioy receiued, sworn, and obeyed: and he paied the souldiers, and gaue them great rewards, and afterwards dispatched and sent the Legions very well contented to their Prouinces and places where they vsed to remain. And himself came to Rome with some companies of Germans for his guard, by reason of the discord between the Pretorian souldiers and the Citizens; who, vnderstanding of the death of MAXIMINVS, pacified themselues, and went with the Senate to receiue BALBINVS into the Empire, and GORDIANVS for CÆSAR, as is aforesaid: and so they were most solemnly entertained. And being comn into the Senate, besides the ordinary acclamations, blessings and applauses, in remembrance that these Emperors were created by the Senators, they vsed such like speeches: Princes, wisely chosen, rule accordingly; and those which are chosen by vnwise men, and such as knowe little, in like manner end their daies: wherein they seemed to note the men of warre, who made choice of MAXIMINVS. Which speeches the Pretorian souldiers took in so ill part, that they presently began to mislike and to be discontented with the Raign of PVPIENVS and BALBINVS; and they held themselues for scorned and disgraced, in that the Senate should seem to triumph ouer them, and to haue taken from them the authority to make Emperours: so great was their pride and ambition, that from thence-foorth they not onely wished, but practised the death of them both; who gouerned all things most excellently and prudently, and made very good and profitable lawes and ordinances; and into all the Prouinces where need required, sent ordinary Legions, doing justice to all men indifferently, greatly honouring the Senate; and generally to all men shewed themselues gentle and curteous. But all this sufficed not to get the good will of the souldiers: for, vertue and goodnes do not pacifie the hatred of the wicked; and by so much their enny & malice the more increaseth, by how much they see those whom they hate, exercise themselues in vertuous and good actions: In such sort, that as those accursed men in time of peace were not so much esteemed, neither had the liberty to liue so dissolutely and licentiously, as in the time of warres; all their care and studie therefore was (although they did dissemble it, and keep it secret) how they might without any danger to themselues, kill those two vertuous and honourable ould Princes, PVPIENVS and BALBINVS. Whereto, the emulation, jealousie and contention, betweene theſe Emperours, although in ſecret, opened the way to their determination; for BALBINVS held himſelfe for farre more Noble and of a more ancient houſe and family, then PVPIENVS: For it was three hundred yeeres or little leſſe ſince that his anceſtors came from the Iſle of Cales in Spaine, with the great POMPEY; and being made citizens of Rome had liued euer honorably and richly: and therefore as PVPIENVS was but of a new riſen family, hee made account to be more regarded then he, and diſdained him. And PVPIENVS notwithſtanding that he was a newer citizen and lately riſen: yet was he of greater courage, very graue and ſeuere, and had held many offices and magiſtracies; which with great valour and wiſedome he had diſcharged; and therefore was of opinion that in true nobilitie, which wholly conſiſteth in the vertue of the perſon, he did farre excell BALBINVS. And thus their vaine preſumption coſt them both their liues. Notwithſtanding that they ſtood vpon theſe points; yet they no way forgat ought that might concerne the good gouernment of the Empire. Theſe two wiſe Emperors agreed betweene themſelues, to goe the one into the Eaſt againſt the Parthians; or to ſay better, the Perſians, which ruled in the Eaſt, as I haue already declared, and by meanes of the ciuil diſcords paſt, had entred the bounds of the Empire, and taken certain Cities: And the other to the warres of Germanie. And as one day all the whole Citie was buſie in beholding certain games and paſtimes which were made, with them was alſo the greateſt part of the Emperors guard and houſhould; ſo as they remained in their Palaces ſmally accompanied, without any miſtruſt or ſuſpicion of any trecherie. Whereof the Pretorian ſouldiers being aduertiſed, they came with great furie fully armed in order of battaile, towards the Emperors Palace: Which when PVPIENVS vnderſtood, and that they came to kill him, hee commanded in great haſte the companies of Germanes which were his guard, to be called: the which truely had beene ſufficient to haue defended them. And he alſo gaue BALBINVS to vnderſtand thereof, deſiring him to doe the like. But BALBINVS entring into a fond ſuſpicion, that PVPIENVS ſent for his guard to haue done ſome thing againſt him, did not only leaue that vndone which was requeſted at his hands, but hindred it, ſo as the guard was not called. By which meanes the Pretorian ſouldiers had oportunitie to enter the Imperiall Palace in ſafety: and there finding none to reſiſt their furie, they took both the Emperors and diſpoyling them of their Imperial robes, vſed the poore princes with all kinde of villany, as if they had been two theeues; carrying them through the midſt of the Citty towardes their Camp: But hearing that the Almaines came to reſcue them, they ſlew them vpon the way; leauing their dead bodies in the ſtreetes. And the yong GORDIANVS meeting them by chance (who, as we haue ſaid before, at the requeſt of the people was choſen CÆSAR) was by them hailed AVGVSTVS and Emperour. And they crying to the people ſaid, that ſeeing thoſe two Emperors were dead, which in deſpite of them were choſen by the Senate; they ſhould now receiue GORDIANVS for Emperor, which they themſelues had deſired to be made CÆSAR; and ſo they went to their lodging leading the youth with them, who yet was not fully fourteen yeeres old.

The Almaines after they vnderſtood of the death of PVPIENVS and BALBINVS, ſeeing there was no hope to reſcue them, returned to their lodgings, which was in the fields neere to Rome. And ſo theſe two good Emperors ended their liues, hauing raigned two yeeres: and in reward for pacifying the Empire and deliuering the ſame from the tyranny of MAXIMINVS, theſe baſe raſcalls murthered them, which PVPIENVS (as ſaith IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS) did before Prognoſticate: for when they were choſen, he ſaid to BALBINVS; Tell me BALBINVS, what good ſhall we reape, if we kill this accurſed cruell beaſt MAXIMINVS? BALBINVS anſwered; We ſhall win the loue of the Senat, & of the people of Rome, and generally of all the world. It is true quoth PVPIENVS, but I feare me we ſhall incurre the hatred of the men of warre, and that it will coſt vs our liues. Which hapned as we haue declared, in the yeere of our Lord 242.

THE LIFE OF GORDIANVS THE YONGER; SO CALLED, FOR THAT HE WAS NEPHEW TO THE OLD GORDIANVS, being onely of this name, and the eight and twentith Emperour of Rome.

()

AFter the death of theſe two good Emperors PVPIENVS and BALBINVS; GORDIANVS being choſen by the Pretorian ſouldiers (who in their life time was CÆSAR) the Senate and people of Rome, ſeeing no other remedie, willingly approued his election; for he was generally well beloued of all men for the deſerts of his Vncle and grandfather: and through this election enſued concord and agreement betweene the ſouldiers and the citizens; and ſo he began his gouernment in good order and had good ſucceſſe. The firſt thing he did, was to make many feaſts, games and ſhewes, and to giue many donatiues and rewards both to the citizens and ſouldiers; whereby he made himſelfe exceedingly well beloued. This hapned, by reaſon that this yong Prince followed the counſell of wiſe men. Preſently in the beginning of his raigne a certain Captain named SABINIANVS rebelled in Africa: and it ſucceeded ſo well, that the Gouernor of Mauritania by the commandement of GORDIANVS, comming againſt him; thoſe which conſpired with him, tooke him priſoner, and craning pardon for their offence, brought him to Carthage; and there deliuered him into the hands of GORDIANVS his Captaines. Who beeing freed from this care, there remained yet another, which was for the warres againſt the Perſians, who (as we haue ſaid) vſurped certaine Lands of the Empire; againſt which it was concluded that the Emperor GORDIANVS ſhould goe himſelfe in perſon: and notwithſtanding that he was then very yong, hauing married the daughter of a moſt learned and eloquent Gentleman, whoſe name was MISITHEVS, whom he preſently made Prefect; the authoritie and counſell of the father in law made the raigne of the yong Emperor GORDIANVS very fortunate, and much eſteemed. For, notwithſtanding that MISITHEVS was but of a meane parentage, yet he was a man of much vertue, and ſo diſcreete and conſiderat in all his actions, as, notwithſtanding that GORDIANVS was but a childe and very yong, and ſomewhat inclined to vice and ſenſualitie, yet he made him an excellent Prince and Gouernor, both in peace and warre. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that the principall and moſt neceſſary thing that appertaineth to any King or Prince to make him good, is, to haue good and wiſe men for his Counſellors, and that his Court be repleniſhed with honeſt men, and of good conuerſation: Which the ſame GORDIANVS apparantly manifeſted in a letter written by him to his father in law, in anſwere to another written by him, wherein he had counſelled him what he ought to doe, and had reproued him for ſome thing that he had done, in this manner:

This Gordianus was Nephew of the old Gordianus who died in Africe.

Miſitheus father-in-law to Gordianus.

A Letter written by Gordianus to his father in law Misitheus.

The Emperor GORDIANVS AVGVSTVS, to his Father, and Pretorian Prefect, greeting. If the Almightie Gods had not defended and protected the Roman Empire, I had truely by this time been deceiued, and sold by these wicked and dishoneſt men: for I now know, and do very well comprehend, that I ought not to haue giuen the charge of the Roman Cohorts to FELIX, neither to SERAPIO of the fourth legion: And becauſe I will not recite all my errors, I acknowledge that I haue done many things that I ought not. But thanks be to the Gods, that thou guiding and inſtructing me, which doſt nothing for couetouſnes or reward, I haue learned and vnderſtood many things, which being ſhut vp in my palace with my ſeruants, I ſhould neuer haue learned, neither was it poſſible for me to haue knowne. For conſider a little I pray thee what I could do, being blinded, and ſold by MAVRVS, who was confederat with GVNDIANVS, REVERENDVS and MONTANVS; ſo as whatſoeuer they commended or reproued, truſting to their iudgement, I preſentlie accepted and allowed. The truth is, Father, That Prince is very infortunate, who hath not about him thoſe which may plainely tell him the truth: for, as the King cannot be among the people, neither can he know what paſſeth and what is ſaid, of neceſſitie he is to vnderſtand it by the relation of thoſe with whom he is conuerſant; and according to their information, good or euill, to gouerne and diſpoſe of all matters. God giue thee health. By this letter is confirmed that which I ſaid; and how that the good counſell of his father in law, was of great efficacie to make him a good Gouernor.

A great eclipſe of the Sun.

A great earth-quake.

In the beginning of the raigne of this good Emperour, there were ſeene certaine ſignes and tokens in the aire, and vpon the earth, whereby many men did prognoſticate that his raigne ſhould not long continue. The firſt was ſo great an eclipſe of the Sun, as the day ſeemed to be turned to night: ſo as euery where the people kindled lights, thereby to ſee to do their neceſſarie buſineſs, ſo long as the Eclipſe continued. And, about one yeere after, there was ſo great and terrible an earth-quake in a manner through all the prouinces of the Empire, that many cities and townes were deſtroyed, and ſome were ſwallowed vp by the earth, which did open in many places. This being paſt, and the loſſes repaired in the beſt manner that could bee, GORDIANVS departed from Rome towards the wars of Perſia, with great prouiſion and infinite ſummes of money to pay the ſouldiers which he carried with him, which were many in number, and excellentlie well armed and trained: for he had as good an Armie as euer had any Emperour; and marching ouer land from Italy to paſſe the ſtreight of Helleſpont, he took his way through Miſsia, to ſtay the Gothes and other nations which came downe with intent to haue inhabited Thracia: againſt which he obteined ſome victories, and left thoſe prouinces free from troubles, and in peace.

Gordianus going to the wars againſt the Perſians.

Gordianus his victory againſt Sapor King of Perſia.

Hauing paſt that ſtreight, he marched with his Armie through Soria, and came to the citie of Antioch which the Perſians had taken, and fought ſome battailes with the mightie SAPOR King of Perſia, who ſucceeded his brother ARTAXERXES in that kingdom; where obteining ſome notable victories, he recouered the citie of Antioch. From thence he went further, and conquered the great cities of Carras, and Niſibe: for being terrified with the firſt battailes, SAPOR was in ſo great feare, as notwithſtanding that he had leuied a very ſufficient Army, yet he not onely durſt not fight with GORDIANVS; but leauing the ſaid cities and others, he retired himſelfe into his kingdome, abandoning the limits and confines of the Roman Empire. In this warre all things were gouerned and managed by the counſell and direction of MISITHEVS, GORDIANVS his father in law, who was his Prefect and captaine generall: who gouerned all things ſo well, that he failed not in any thing; and ſo by his counſell and valour GORDIANVS obteined many victories: and the Romane Armie proceeded, being excellentlie well inſtructed and trained, aſwell in the diſcipline which apperteineth to ſouldiers, as in all other things which were requiſite for the warres. The like happened in all other matters, which were expedient for the good gouernment of the whole Empire: for he was ſo good and ſo wiſe a man, and therewith the good inclination and diſpoſition of the Emperour did ſo concurre, in whom wanted no ſufficiencie nor diſcretion for his age, that all the time of his raigne (which were ſixe yeeres) the Romane Empire enioyed peace, reſt, and all happineſs. And while as all things were in this eſtate, MISITHEVS fell ſick and died, IVLIVS CAPITOLINVS writeth, that he was ſecretlie poiſoned by PHILIP, who ſucceeded him in his charge, and was afterwards Emperour, and who alſo was the cauſe of the death and ruine of the Emperour GORDIANVS; who as ſoone as MISITHEVS was dead, made PHILIP his Prefect and Captaine generall, nothing ſuſpecting him of treaſon. This PHILIP was borne in Arabia, of a baſe and diſhonorable parentage; but a very valiant man, and bred vp in the warres in the Romane Armies, and had held many offices and gouernments. As ſoone as this this barbarian was aduanced by GORDIANVS to that high dignitie, he practiſed how he might obtaine the Empire for himſelfe, and ſought by all meanes to win the good will of the ſouldiers, and to make them enemies to GORDIANVS. It happened that in the Armie was great ſcarcitie of victuals; which was done by the ſecret practice of PHILIP: and the ſouldiers imagining the negligence of GORDIANVS to haue been the cauſe thereof, determined to make PHILIP equall with him in the Empire, and that he ſhould be as his tutor and gouernor: which the vertuous yong GORDIANVS patiently endured. For he could not withſtand the audacious determination of the ſouldiers: and PHILIP, ſeeing himſelfe equall with him, became preſently ſo inſolent and audacious towards GORDIANVS (by reaſon of his young yeeres, and the fauor of the Armie) as he began to commaund all, as though hee had been ſole Emperor. But GORDIANVS being vnable to endure this diſgrace (for great and Noble mindes can hardly ſuffer themſelues to be deſpiſed and oppreſſed) aſſembling the Army, complained openly to the Captaines and ſouldiers, of the pride and ingratitude of PHILIP, calling to minde the benefits which he had beſtowed vpon him, and ſought to perſwade them to depoſe him from the Empire.

The wickedneſſe and ingratitude of Philip, and the miſery of Gordianus.

PHILIP ſeeing this, ſetting all ſhame apart, aſſembling together ſuch as were of his faction, and ſeeking to get the good will of all men, brought his purpoſe to ſo good iſſue, as the miſerable Emperor GORDIANVS being abandoned, was brought to ſuch extremitie, as he ſent to intreat PHILIP, that if he would not permit him to be his equall, yet at the leaſt that he would be pleaſed to allowe him the dignitie of CÆSAR: which ſeeing he could not obtaine, he deſired that he might be his Pretorian Prefect. Which being alſo denied, he requeſted him to doe him the fauour, that he might be one of his Captaines ſo long as he ſhould liue. To this his laſt petition, his cruell minde ſeemed to yeeld: but afterwards conſidering how much GORDIANVS was beloued in Rome, in Africa, and in all the other Prouinces, as well for his naturall vertues, as for the nobilitie of the houſe from which he was deſcended, he commanded him to bee ſlaine. And this was the end of the Noble and worthy yong Emperor GORDIANVS; who raigned ſix yeers: foure alone, and two in the company of PVPIENVS and BALBINVS, in the yeer of our Lord 247, and in the twentith yeer of his age.

The death of Gordianus.

Ann. Dom. 247

GORDIANVS was of a pleaſant and very Noble condition, of gentle behauiour, very ſtudious, and giuen to learning; ſo as they write, that he had in his Library threeſcore and two thouſand Books. He was infinitely beloued of the Senate and people of Rome, and generally of all nations of the Empire, and no leſſe by the ſouldiers and men of war, who called him their ſon. Although in this ſhort ſodaine furie, after the mannner of beaſts they murthered him by the procurement, practice and treaſon of PHILIP; yet their furie being paſt, they made him a ſepulchre in the confines of Perſia, whereupon they wrote this inſcription in the Latine, Perſian, Hebrew, and Egyptian tongues, to the end that of all men it might bee read and vnderſtood:

To the ſacred GORDIANVS, who ouercame the Perſians, the Gothes, and the Sarmates, extinguiſhed the Roman Ciuil diſcords, and likewiſe ſubdued the Germanes, but not the Philippicks.

Which ſeemeth to be annexed therto, for that in the Philippick fields he was put to the worſe by the Alanes; and alſo for that he was commanded to be ſlaine by PHILIP.

THE LIFE OF PHILIP THE FIRST, AND NINE AND TWENTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

Y the subtlety and wicked practices (which we haue already before declared) this traitor PHILIP came to the Empire, and was sworne and obeyed by the whole Armie: he presently aduertised the Senate of his election, and of the death of GORDIANVS, concealing the manner thereof; alleaging that he died of a naturall infirmitie. The Senate giuing credit to his letters, approued his election, and gaue him the name of AVGVSTVS: which when he vnderstood, hauing a great desire to come to Rome, and to see himselfe Lord thereof, hee made a dishonourable peace with the Persians: and leauing vnto them the Prouince of Mesopotamia, and part of Syria, he came with his Armie towards Rome. But first he desired to visit his countrie Arabia; wherein, for a memoriall of his name, he builded a Citie, which he called Philopopolis, neere the place where he was borne; and made his sonne his companion in the Empire, whose name was also PHILIP, a childe of six or seuen yeeres old: who (as AVRELIVS VICTOR, and EVTROPIVS doe write) was naturally so sad and sowre, as he was neuer seene to laugh, neither could any man by any deuice prouoke him to laughter. PHILIP being come to Rome, although he was receiued as soueraigne Lord, yet was his comming nothing pleasing to the Senate nor Romane people, considering that he had giuen away the Prouince of Mesopotamia to the Persians. Which when he vnderstood, after that he had made a great donatiue, and distributed much money and other gifts among the people, thereby to get their good wils and loue; he sought occasion to make warre against the Persians, and proclaimed the same; with a resolution to recouer the honour which he had lost. But that warre ended before it began, without any breach of peace: for the Persians promised to restore the Prouinces without warre or any opposition.

Philip made peace with the Persians.

PHILIP hauing now raigned two yeeres (and a thousand yeeres being expired since that Rome was founded) he commanded certaine feasts and games to be made, which they called Secular, which was (as it were) to celebrate the birth day of Rome; which feasts were made in Rome euery hundred yeeres. Yet concerning the time there were many opinions; and some Emperors celebrated these feasts and shewes before their time: as, the Emperour CLAVDIVS before remembred. But the truth is, that they were called Secular, for that they could be made but once in a mans whole life time. Finally, they were the most sumptuous and solemne that were made in Rome: for so did OCTAVIVS make them, and CLAVDIVS also, as I haue said. And afterwards the Emperor DOMITIANVS, although he obserued not the iust computation of the yeeres, as did the Emperour CLAVDIVS, but followed the account of AVGVSTVS

Secular games, and why so called.

GVSTVS CÆSAR: and after that, SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS; and now this PHILIP celebrated the same, with the greatest pomp & magnificence that euer had bin seen before this time, as EVSEBIVS recordeth; who saith, That in the place called Circulus Maximus, were hunted and slaine an infinit number of wilde beasts; and there also fought two thousand Sword-players, who (as wee haue said) slew one another to giue delight to the beholders, in as furious manner as men now adaies vse to fight vpon challenges in single combats. It is also written, that in POMPEIES Theatre were such shewes and games, that they lasted three daies and three nights continually; wherein were so great lights that men might see as well at midnight as at noone-daies; whereof EVTROPIVS and POMPONIVS also make mention. In these sports and about the end of them, as they were many, there being little heed taken, POMPEIES Theatre took fire, and the greatest part of the timber worke was burnt, with other sumptuous buildings neere vnto it; which fire was hardly quenched. PAVLVS OROSIVS writeth, that this PHILIP was the first Christian Emperour that was truly baptized, and that beleeued, and receiued the faith of CHRIST. Other authors affirme, that both hee, his mother and his sonne were christened; and that ORIGEN wrote certaine letters to him; wherein he perswaded him to beleeue and to obserue the Christian faith. Others say, that he did but faine and dissemble it, thereby to make himselfe the stronger against DECIVS, through the helpe of the Christians, which DECIVS rebelled against him: But I rather beleeue OROSIVS and EVSEBIVS.

Philip baptized a Christian.

PHILIP and his sonne liuing thus in the quiet possession of the Empire, the Gothes, which in the time of GORDIANVS had infested Thracia, came now from Scythia with a very great Armie through Missia into Thracia, and did much hurt there, burning many cities and townes: against whome, the Emperour sent for Captaine one MARINVS, a man very expert in the warres, and very valiant of his person; who when he was settled in his charge, with the aide and fauour of the men of warre, whereof he before was Captaine, and of the ordinarie Legions of Illyricum, leauing the seruice wherein he was employed, resolued to rebell, and to make himselfe Emperour, holding it lawfull to betray him, that had been a traitor to another; and for such was presently sworne and proclaimed by the Armie.

Marinus rebelled against Philip.

When PHILIP vnderstood hereof, he was much troubled: and in great feare complained to the Senate of the ingratitude and presumption of MARINVS. Some write that DECIVS was there present: who being a man of great wisdom & experience, very Nobly descended, and was afterwards Emperour, did comfort and encourage him, and perswaded him not to bee grieued therewith: for (quoth he) MARINVS his presumption will shortly cost him very deare, which happened so indeede: For, within fewe daies after, the same Armie which had chosen him, being discontented with the manner of his carriage toward them, were as ready to bereaue him of his life, as they were to make him Emperor; and accordingly slew him. Which newes being brought to PHILIP, and he remembring what DECIVS had said in the Senate, gaue him the charge and command of the Armie against the Gothes and Scythians, with agreat encrease both of men and munition, and of all thing s necessarie for such an enterprise. DECIVS as a man of experience and discretion, and sufficiently able to discharge that office, came to the Army: where within fewe daies all the souldiers, as well for the worthinesse of his person, as also for that they stood in feare of PHILIP for those matters lately past, resolued to make him Emperor: and so indeede by force and against his will they made him to take the enfignes, name and dignitie of Emperor.

Decius made Emperour by the souldiers against his wil.

When DECIVS saw himselfe aduanced to so high an estate, he practised a cunning policy, which was thus; He priuily sent a secret messenger to tell PHILIP that he had accepted the title of Emperor, being perforce constrained thereto, as was well knowne; but held no man for Emperour but PHILIP; and that he therefore should not be offended: for he did assure him, that as soone as he could possibly get any libertie, he would renounce the Empire. This he did to the end that PHILIP should take no care, nor make any such preparation against him, as reason required; and finally, to temporize vntill that he might encrease his power, and make himselfe able to defend his cause. But PHILIP (whether he gaue credit to his speeches or no) forbowed not his businesse, but determined with himselfe to repose no trust in any other Captaine, but to goe against him himselfe in person: and to that end leuied many new troupes, and sent for the ordinary legions out of sundry Prouinces, threatning and sweating that he would teare DECIVS and the rebellious legions which were with him in pieces; And so departed from Rome, commanding his men of warre with such choler and in such hautie tie manner, as he became hatefull to all men. And they holding, DECIVS more worthy of the Empire, before he went out of Italy, in the Citie of Verona proclaiming DECIVS Emperour, his owne souldiers slue him, cutting his head off, by the midst of his face, iust with the vpper row of his teeth.

Philip slaine in Verona by his owne souldiers.

When as the newes hereof came to Rome, the Pretorian souldiers killed his melancholie sonne, who was neuer knowne to laugh, being (according to some writers) about the fift yeer of his and his fathers raigne; and after some other writers, the seuenth: Which happened in the yeere of our Lord two hundred, fiftie and two, after EVSEBIVS his computation.

Truly, it was the iust iudgement of God, that by the same meanes that he obtained the Empire, he lost the same: and the same souldiers by whose hands hee put his good liege Lord GORDIANVS to death, euen the very same souldiers murthered him: and, as he was a traytor and disloyall to his soueraigne; so found he none faithfull to him being Lord.

THE LIFE OF DECIVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

PHILIP and his sonne being both dead (in such manner as before is expressed) DECIVS without any contradiction was confirmed Emperor: for the Senate presently chose him in his absence, and gaue him the title of AVGVSTVS, and so did all the Prouinces and the Armies. For, all writers affirme, that morally this DECIVS was an excellent man, and was endued with many vertues and sufficiencies: hee was very wise and discreete, and of great experience, and had held many offices and dignities before hee attained to the Empire; which he obtained not by fauor or any sinister meanes; but for his deserts and goodnesse: And so gouerned the same wisely and vprightly, with singular equitie and authority. The like he did in the Empire, during the small time he enioyed the same: and aboue all, he was a most politick, valiant and excellent Captaine; so as he might iustly haue been numbered among the good Emperors, if he had not (as an infidell) persecuted the Church of God, and all Christians, with most barbarous cruelty; such, as the like thereof had neuer been seene: the which (as some writers affirme) he did of malice, and for the hatred which he bare against his predecessor the Emperor PHILIP, for that he was a Christian: And so in his time the Church of God suffered the seuenth persecution. In such sort he persecuted in his crueltie, staining therewith his other vertues, that he crowned many with martyrdome; leauing to vs examples of their holy and vertuous liues and endings endings. This Emperour was borne in a Citie called Cabali in the lower Pannonia, which wee call Hungarie, and (as we haue sayd) was of a very Noble and ancient Lineage. As soone as he saw himselfe an absolute Lord, through the desire he had to come to Rome, he made CORNELIVS LICINIVS VALERIANVS Generall of his mightie Armie, who was a wise man and of great experience: so as for his good conditions, and his age, being threescore and sixe yeeres ould, hee was of great authoritie, and to all men seemed most to bee fitte for that charge.

When DECIVS was come to Rome, he shewed himself in all things a very good Gouernor, and preserued the authority of the Senat; following their counsel in all matters of gouernment. And among other things, he permitted them to chuse a Censor at their pleasure, which was an antient Magistracy of great authority; for his office was to correct the manners and customes, and to reforme the abuses and disorders of the people, and therefore had supreme iurisdiction ouer all men: and this office, from the time that Rome came to be commanded by one head, the Emperors vsurped, and made themselues Censors. Whereupon the Senate chose the said VALERIANVS for Censor, notwithstanding that hee was absent; and, moreouer, without any request made by DECIVS, they nominated his sonne (whose name was also DECIVS) CÆSAR, and his Successor. And so he liued in the City about one yeer, gouerning all things with great wisdome and equity, by the aduice and consent of the Senate; to the great contentment of all the Roman people, excepting the Christian Common-wealth: against which, hee (as a blinde man) made generall edicts and decrees; whereby he commanded them to bee slain and persecuted, as EVSEBIVS writeth. And whereas the Goths, at this time inuading Thracia and Misia, had subdued the greatest part of those Prouinces, DECIVS determined in person to make head against them; and, carrying his sonne with him, hee left the gouernment in the hands of the Senate: and, leuying new forces, he marched against the Gothes; and, coming where his Legions were, within fewe daies after he joined battell with them: in the which although it were very doubtfull, yet in the end hee had the victorie; and slue thirty thousand of them; constraining the rest to flie to the mountaines and other places of hard accesse, not daring to come into the Plaines; and he brought them to such extremitie, as he had easily ruined them, if he had not beene betrayed, as you shall heare. For, the King of the Gothes sent him word, that if he would giue him leaue quietly to depart, he would abandon that Land, and returne to his countrie. But the Emperour hauing taken the passages, imagining that he might easily kill them, or take them prisoners, and so punish their breach of peace granted them in the time of BALBINVS, would not yeeld to the Kings request. Hauing brought them to such a streight as they could not escape out of his hands, he gaue the charge to a notable Captaine of his, whose name was TREBONIANVS GALLVS, being a Roman Gentleman & Gouernor of the frontiers of Misia, to keepe certiane passages, through which the Gothes might passe; and to that effect gaue him the command of a great number of souldiers. Who, hauing a desire to make himself Emperor by such means as then were vsed, not onely discharged his office wherein he was imploied, very ill; but gaue secret intelligence to the King of the Gothes, that he would let him passe, aduising him therewith to diuide his Army into two parts; the one half wherof he should lay in ambush, and with the other he should assault the Emperors Camp, who mistrusted no such matter; and that, faining fear, he should flee back, and draw the Emperour into his ambush, where he might in safety kill him. This contract being made, the effect followed, as writeth POMPONIVS LETVS: but IORNANDES relateth it after another manner. Yet all Authors agree, that, through the treason of his Captain GALLVS, the Emperor DECIVS came to a battell with the Gothes, to their great aduantage: wherein notwithstanding that hee and his souldiers fought most valiantly, yet both himself and his sonne therein ended their liues. IORNANDES writeth, that, before a man could well judge of the victory, the yong DECIVS was so mortally wounded with an arrow, that hee fell from his horse in sight of his father the Emperor; who with a loud voice called to his souldiers, willing them not be dismaid: for, the death of one Knight would bee no hinderance to the Common-wealth, neither to the battell. But in the end foreseeing his ruine, and that the Gothes apparantly had the victory; to the end he would not fall into his enemies hands, he clapt his spurs to his horse, and (giuing him the head) leapt into a deep lake of water that was thereby; wherin, through the waight of his armour, he was soon drowned: so as his body was neuer found. The Gothes, following the victory, made great slaughter in the Roman Army, which was put to rout; and those which escaped fled to the Legions wch TREBONIANVS GALLVS commanded, manded, who as a confederat with the Gothes, was in safety; and sought no reuenge for the death of the Emperor. And in this manner ended the life and raigne of the Emperor DECIVS, who had oftentimes deserued the same for the cruelties which he commanded to be executed vpon the Christians, which hapned in the yeere of our Sauiour 254. and in the fiftith yeere of his age, when he had raigned but two yeers. It is not knowne who was this Emperors wife, neither what his father and ancestors names were, or who they were; neither can we set downe any particularities, as we haue obserued in the liues of other Emperors, for that no author maketh any mention thereof, and all write very little of him. I say this, to the end that the reader may vnderstand, that I will not presume to write at large in a matter wherein I find such breuitie vsed by authors: for I seeke rather briefly to set downe the naked truth, then to beautifie the Historie with fictions, as I haue seene some men doe. My purpose from the beginning hath been to be briefe: for I do not properly write an Historie, but the sum and an abbridgment of Histories, containing the liues of the Emperors, whereof we will write more largely when it shall seeme more expedient; although that in the times whereof we now write, Historiographers wrote so negligently, and obserued so little order, as a man can hardly draw that little out of their writings which we treate of.

THE LIFE OF TREBONIANVS GALLVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND ONE AND THIRTITH ROMANE EMPEROR.

THE Gothes hauing by the meanes aboue mentioned obtained this victorie, wherein both DECIVS and his son died, those souldiers which thence escaped recouering GALLVS his Camp, hailed him Emperor, knowing nothing of the treason which he had committed: and he which desired nothing more, accepted the same, and took the Ensignes of the Empire. When the newes of the death of DECIVS and of his sonne came to Rome, and of the slaughter made in the Roman Armie (before that GALLVS his treason was discouered) the Senate vnderstanding that the Armie had chosen him for Emperor, and that his companies had rescued those which escaped from the battaile, confirmed his election, and gaue him the name and title of AVGVSTVS. But this GALLVS, notwithstanding that hee was a Gentleman and descended of an honourable house, was not contented with the treason which he had vsed towards his Emperour and soueraigne Lord, but through a desire to com to Rome, made peace with the Gothes; the most shamefull and dishonorable, that euer was made by any Roman since that Rome was first founded: for hee promised to pay them them yeerly a great summe of money; making that people which was held for Lord of the world, and Subduer and Tamer of all other Nations, tributarie to the barbarous: so as, to the end he might be called Emperor, he made both himselfe and the Empire tributarie and subject to the Gothes. Such power hath ambition and desire to raign, that men thereby make themselues slaues to some, conditionally that they may command and haue authority ouer others. And hee prospered as ill therewith as hee had deserued: for, the Gothes afterwards brake the peace, and did more harm in his time than in any Age before, sacking and spoiling the Prouinces of Thracia, Misia, Thessalia, Macedonia, and the Confines and Frontiers thereof: for all which he took little care. And, on the other side, the Persians in Asia, seeing the good successe of the Gothes, entred with great power into the Countries of Mesopotamia and Syria; which were prouinces of the Empire: and afterwards, passing forwards, they subdued Armenia. But GALLVS, taking no care for these things, made his son BOLVSSENVS his companion in the Empire, who was a very childe. And afterwards he not onely permitted the persecution inflicted by DECIVS vpon the Christians, but increased the same.

The Gothes breake the peace made with Gallus.

The Persians entred the prouinces of the empire

There began also in his time a most cruell generall pestilence, whereof died an infinite number of people; which beganne in Ethiopia in the Confines of Egypt, and from thence infected all parts of the world, and continued ten yeers. During which time (as PAVLVS OROSIVS recounteth) there was no Prouince, no City, nor priuate house, which was not left in a manner desolate with this vniuersall plague; whereof hee compiled a Book, as EVSEBIVS and S. CYPRIAN beat record, who liued in those times. So as all the Raign of this wicked Emperor was infortunate and mournfull; as well for the Prouinces which hee lost, as for the calamities before recited. Onely hee had one notable victory in the Prouince of Misia against the Gothes, vnder the leading of EMILIANVS a Captain of his: where he slew many thousands of them, and followed the execution for certain daies. This ouerthrowe was the ruine and totall destruction of GALLVS: for, EMILIANVS, waxing proud for so great a victory, and returning from it with an imagination of that which afterwards ensued, gaue great gifts among his souldiers; and so, getting their loue and good will, was chosen and sworn Emperor. Which when GALLVS vnderstood, with all the haste hee could make hee parted from Rome with a great Army, leading his son with him. Against whom EMILIANVS boldly cam to a battell, and had the victory: wherein GALLVS and his son were both slain, and their souldiers went to serue EMILIANVS. This hapned in the yeer of our Lord 256; GALLVS beeing then (as testifieth AVRELIVS VICTOR) at the age of seuen and forty yeers, and in the second yeer of his most vnhappy Raign.

THE LIFE OF EMILIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND TWO AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

EMILIANVS succeeded GALLVS in the Empire. Some Authors account him not in the number of the Emperours, and shew a reason for it, considering the small time that he held the same; which was rather in name than effect. But, seeing he was so, I haue thought good to make particular relation of him, for as much as EVTROPIVS and other Authours haue done the like. I say then, that the Emperor GALBVS being ouerthrowne and slain, and EMILIANVS remaining victorious; joyning both Armies in one, hee beganne to vse the name and authority which was giuen him. But, seeing the time of his Raign was so short that it lasted not aboue foure moneths, there can no worthie thing be written: for as his time was very briefe, so doe authors briefly write. He was by birth an Africane, borne in the countrie of Mauritania, of base and obscure parentage, and from his youth was bred vp in the warrs: and as he increased in yeeres, so did he in honor and offices. At length the Emperor DECIVS made him Captain General, and Gouernor of the frontiers and confines of Sarmatia; in which charge GALLVS left him, and there succeeded that which we haue recited, which was to obtaine a victorie against the Gothes, and to rebell against GALLVS; and afterwards to ouerthrow and kill both him & his son, and to make himself Emperor. When as these matters were ended he wrote with all speede to the Senat, giuing them to vnderstand of his victory and election, putting them also in mind of the negligence and euill gouernment of GALLVS, and of the Prouinces which the Roman Empire had lost in his time; promising very confidently to recouer Thracia from the Gothes, and Mesopotamia & Armenia from the Persians, and to cleere all the confines of the Empire from their enemies: which his purpose as he would haue put it in execution, he was preuented; for the Army which was in the Alps (wherof VALERIANVS, a man of Noble birth and of great authority, was General) opposed, and in no case would allow the election of EMILIANVS, but rose against him, and chose their commander for Emperor. Which when EMILIANVS souldiers vnderstood, mov'd with the reputation of VALERIANVS, which (as we will declare in his life) was very great, and to auoide ciuil wars; they resolued to confirm his election: and so in a manner by the Common consent of them al, EMILIANVS was slaine, being 40 yeers old, when he had raigned little more then 3 moneths. All his troups went to serue VALERIANVS, to whom they sware, and obeyed him for their Lord and Emperor. And this was the end of the raigne of EMILIANVS, because his end should be answerable to his beginning. And in truth, writing this discourse, and considering of the estate & condition of things in those times, I was moued with great admiration and pitie, to think of the miseries of that age: for where there was such insolency and disorder, as souldiers did daily murther their Emperors, and chose others as they pleased, and no man sought to punish them, or to reuenge the wrong; what shal a man think was done in particular prouinces? what robberies, what rapines and outrages were there vsed? What execution of iustice could that Emperor command to be done, which came to the Empire by treason, and killing his soueraigne Lord? It is easy to be beleeued, that he would willingly pardon all Offences, vpon condition that he might be obeyed; especially such as were committed by powerfull and mightie men. And moreouer, oftentimes the newes of the election of an Emperor was scarcely published, and his election confirmed, before that the like newes came, that he was slaine by those which had chosen him, or by some other personage of more power. And it may be that it happened so vnto them, for that they took no other care, nor busied themselus about ought else, but how they might support themselus in the Empire. And so the reader shall find that thirteene Emperors which preceded VALERIANVS, of which we will treat, died violent deaths; and none of them naturally, in his bed, beginning from the time of the good MARCVS AVRELIVS, vntill this man. And so the same VALERIANVS, together with his son, & other Emperors also died by the sword. In the time that this VALERIANVS & GALIENVS raigned, there were thirtie tyrants which vsurped the name of Emperor, who killing one another, or plotting it by some other means, none of them died his naturall death; so as, when one was proclaimed Emperor, he might be assured to com to an ill end; in such sort, that among all the miseries of those times, the greatest was, To be an Emperor: and the Emperours were such, and came to that dignity by such means, that by Gods just judgement they made such ends. And though in all estates there were disorders and confusion (and so it appears by the histories of those times) yet onely the holy faith and Christian doctrine encreased, as well in vertue and holines of life, as in number of people: but they escaped not free from persecution. This I thoght good to note & obserue in this place, thereby to shew that men ought not so much to blame these times wherein we now liue, as some haue done; commending the customs of antient times, diffaming and reprouing all that passeth in our time. I deny not but wee now are wicked and sinners: but let the discreet Reader make a comparison of the order now obserued in all things, with the gouernment of those times; and he shall cleerely perceiue the difference, and how farre this doth excell those times past. God grant that we may equall the good and happy times, in vertue.

Large promises made by Emilianus.

THE LIFE OF VALERIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THREE AND THIRTIETH EMPEROR OF ROME.

E haue already declared, how that VALERIANVS was chosen Emperor, by the souldiers whereof he was Generall; and how that EMILIANVS was afterwards slaine, by the hands of his owne souldiers; and that all reduced themselues vnder the seruice of VALERIANVS; and that in this manner he was held for Emperor both in Rome, and abroad, with as great fauor and good liking of all nations, as euer any had beene. VALERIANVS when he was chosen Emperor, was of great age: for all authors which write of him affirme, that he was then fullie threescore and ten yeeres old, which time he had spent with great honor and fame both vnder good and bad Emperors, by meanes of his vertuous qualities and valour; and had attained to many dignities, and had held many magistracies and offices: among which, in the time of the Emperor DECIVS he was made Censor of Rome, and was highly honored by the same DECIVS, and by all the Senate; and was also of a very Noble and ancient house and familie. Finally, in all his life time before that he was Emperor, he was honored and happie in all his doings; and so there was great hope that he should haue repaired all the calamities and miseries of his time; which happened cleane contrary. For after his ioyfull beginning, in all the rest of his age he was miserable and vnfortunate. When he came to the Empire hee had two sonnes, the one called GALIENVS, and the other (as himselfe) VALERIANVS, which he had by seuerall women. TREBELLIVS POLLIO and others say, that VALERIANVS was but his nephew. His victorie and election being knowne in Rome, and with great ioy and gladnes applauded; GALIENVS being there, was by the Senate and people chosen CÆSAR, and his fathers successor, as afterwards he was, as EVTROPIVS writeth: but SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR saith, that his father made him AVGVSTVS, which was his equall and companion with him in the Empire: both the one and the other might well be. His second sonne VALERIANVS (as some say) was made CÆSAR; and others name him not. VALERIANVS beginning to take vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, the first thing he did, was to nominate and appoint Captaines (men of experience, and that had shewed themselues valiant) chosen among many Noble men, which had serued in the warres against the Parthians, the Persians, the Gothes, and other northerly nations: and so he determined to goe himself in person (and did so) to the warres of the East, against the Persians, which was most dangerous: for SAPOR K. of Persia had inuaded & taken certain prouinces of the Empire. There was also then in the East, one CORIALVS, an audacious man, and of great account, who by the consent of SAPOR K. of Persia, proclaimed himself Emperor, seising on Cæsarea, Antioch & other cities and places in the borders; but his prosperity soon ended: for his own people of malice & fearing VALERIANVS coming, slue him ere the Emperor arriued: who, EVSEBIVS saith, in the beginning of his Raign was so milde, and so great a friend to the Christians, that he suffred not any wrong or violence to be done vnto them; but fauoured and honoured them in so high degree, that his House and Palace was as a Church and Habitacle for them: but afterward, through the policie and perswasion of a Magician or Nigromancer (who was an Egyptian born, an arrant cosener, and a notable Master in sorcerie and witchcraft) hee not onely desisted from fauouring them, but vsed extreme cruelty in all places whersoeuer he found any of them; so as in his time was the ninth persecution of the Catholick Church, whereof PAVLVS OROSIVS in his Histories maketh particular mention. For which sin it was supposed, that God plagued him with the great miseries that befell him, which were; that He passing with a great Army into the East against SAPOR King of Persia, SAPOR, who was a man of great courage, and very mighty, came to incounter him; between whom it was supposed there would haue been a very great battell: but it hapned otherwise. For, the Emperour through the negligence, as some say, of the Generall of his Army who conducted it; but, as others say, through the treason and deceit of the same Generall, was set in a place without any sufficient guard: where being compassed about by SAPOR's men of war, all the passages were taken; in such sort, that, being vnable to make any resistance, he was taken prisoner by SAPOR, who was a proud Barbarian: besides the other injuries which he vsed to the poor old imprisoned Emperor, euery time he took horse he made him to stoop down; and he, setting his foot vpon his neck, mounted on horseback.

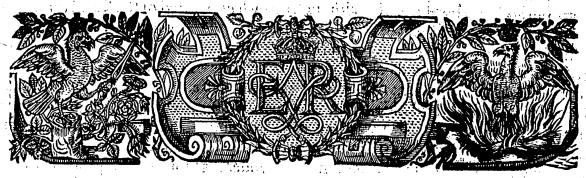
The ninth persecution of the Christians.

Valerianus taken prisoner by Sapor King of the Persians; and his vsage.

In this sorrowfull bondage and misery liued this poor old man six or seuen yeers: and his son GALIENVS took no care to procure his liberty; to the great shame and disgrace of the Imperiall Majesty.

This imprisonment of the Emperor was so much abhorred through the world, and SAPOR was so much blamed for the excessiue cruelty which he vsed towards him, that not onely those which were subject to the Roman Empire, but also the barbarous Kings which were friends to it, were greatly displeased therewith: so as presently, when they vnderstood therof, they wrote their Letters vnto him, that he should freely without any ransome set him at liberty: of which Letters, TREBELLIVS POLLIO translateth one, which I will set down verbatim; whereby it may appear, how much the power of the Romans then was by them esteemed.

A Letter from King Belsolus to Sapor King of Persia.



BELSOLVS King of Kings, to King SAPOR, greeting. If I were assured that the Romans might at any time be wholly ouercomn, I would rejoice with thee for the victory which thou hast obtained against them; whereof thou makest such vaunts, accounting thy particular good to be profitable for vs all. But, seeing that through their fortune, or their force and vertue, that Nation is so mighty; consider and take good heed, that the taking of an old Emperor (and that through treacherie) redound not to the ruine of thy self and thy successors: and consider how many people and nations the Romans, of enemies, haue made subjects and vassals to their Empire; by which in former time they haue been ouercome. We haue heard and knowe that in times past the Gaules ouercame them, and that the great and mighty City of Rome was entred, yea and burned by them; and now it is manifest, that the same Gaules are subject to the Romans. And haue not the Africans ouerthrowne them sometimes? Yet at this day they are their subjects, and do serue them. I will not make mention of any more antient and farther remote examples: onely I will say, that MITHRIDATES, King of Pontus, was Lord of all Asia; and yet in the end was ouerthrowne by them: and at this day all that part of Asia which he commanded, is subject to the Romans. If thou wilt follow my counsell, make benefit of the occasion which is offred thee, to obtain a perfect peace with them; which thou maist doo, by restoring VALERIANVS to his people. And so I conclude, that thou hast had great fortune: whereof I am glad if thou knowe how to vse it.

This is the contents of this Letter, and of others which he receiued from other Kings; which in effect do import the same. And the Bactrians, the Albanians, the Iberians, the Scythians of Mount Taurus, and other nations of the East, were so much displeased with the taking of VALERIANVS, that they would not receiue the Letters wherein SAPOR wrote vnto them of his victory: and so they sent their Ambassadors to the Captains of the Romans, offering them their aid and assistance for the deliuery of the Emperor. But all auailed not to mitigate the pride and presumption of that cruell King: for, all the time that VALERIANVS liued in his power, he vsed him worse than if hee had been the baseſt slaue in the world; and in the end (as EVSEBIVS writeth) hauing commanded his eies to be pulled out, hee died of age and sorrow in prison. And AGATHVS (an Author of no small authority) writeth, that before he died, SAPOR causeſd him to be flaied aliue: such was the pride and cruelty of this barbarous King.

The death of Valerianus.

THE ARGVMENT.

VALERIANVS being taken prisoner by the King of Persia, his sonne GALIENVS, in whose company he had ruled the Empire the space of seuen yeeres, neither made any preparation to reuenge the wrong done to his father, neither took any care to redeeme him from imprisonment with money or any other meanes: and so seeing himself alone in the Empire, wholly forgetting his father, leading a life no lesse careleſse then diſsoueſt; spending his time in banqueting, bathings, lasciuiousneſse, and in beholding sometimes bloudie and cruell, and sometimes pleasant and ridiculous spectacles. This Emperor made so small account of his owne honor; and was so careleſse of the Empire, as notwithstanding that he vnderstood of the rebellion of many Prouinces, and that many men were made Emperors; yet he seemed not to regard the same, alledging that he could liue well enough without them: In so much as a woman, Queene Zenobia, presumed to make head against him, and to defend her selfe against his Armies. Finally, going against Aureolus, who made himself e prince of Slauonia, he was beſieged in Milane, through the conspiracy of some which aspired to the Empire; and was slaine in battaile, when hee had raigned eight yeeres alone, and seuen together with his father: whose death, although it was displeasing to his souldiers, was not much lamented by the Romanes; who vnder his gouernment had seene in a manner all the whole Empire ruinated, together with his owne greatneſse.

WHen VALERIANVS was taken prisoner, his sonne GALIENVS was admitted for sole and absolute Emperour; although that in his fathers time he was but AVGVSTVS. I haue already declared how offensiue the imprisonment of VALERIANVS was, and how that all the world surmiſed that GALIENVS would haue employed all his power, for the libertie of his father, and to haue been reuenged of the injurie done vnto him: but he put no such matter in practice, for it was the leaſt part of his thought; so as it is to be presumed, and many were then of opinion, that he was rather glad that his father was a slaue to the King of Persia, then otherwiſe: for by that meanes he was sole Lord of the Empire; which he commanded fifteene yeeres: seuen yeeres in the life time of his father, although in prison; and the reſt afterwards. The Hiſtorie of which Emperors, is the moſt confuſed and hardeſt to write, of all that euer I haue read or reuewed of all, in the space of these fifteene yeers, there were more excellent men which took vpon them the name of Emperours, or were so, although tyrants, then in three hundred yeeres before, after that IVLIVS CÆSAR had oppressed the libertie of Rome. For, in the time of GALIENVS there were thirtie Emperors chosen, and obeyed in diuerse places. Let the discreete reader then consider, that where there happened so many accidents, which often came together, what order can be obserued, but that there will be confusion and obscuritie in the Historie: especially considering the breuitie I am to obserue; and hauing so little light from authors. For I say, that although many haue treated of the life of this Emperour, yet no one hath written so plaine & distinctly as he ought to haue done: and besides this, in some things the one writeth cleane contrarie to the other. Therefore I will vse my best endeuour to bring this obscuritie and confusion to light: wherewith let the Reader rest satisfied, seeing I cannot possibly doe otherwise; except I should write the matter very much at large; which were to disorder the whole, thereby to set one part in order. I say then, that in the raigne and time of GALIENVS, there were greater warres and calamities, then the Romane Empire had euer endured. For VALERIANVS (as PAVLVS OROSIVS noteth) hauing generally persecuted the Church in all places and parts vnder his iubiection, it pleased God, as well in his owne person, as in his ministers and officers, and in all those which therein were confederates, to vse publike and notable punishment in all parts, in the time of his sonne; and the greatest part thereof in his owne time, liuing in captiuitie. And notwithstanding that GALIENVS as soone as he was alone swaied the scepter of the Empire (as EVSEBIVS and OROSIVS testifie) commanded the persecution inflicted vpon the Christians to cease, sending his letters and edicts to all parts: yet as he did it as an Infidell, and for feare onely, so the diuine iustice ceased not to punish the excessiue cruelties past, for a stained present amendement. So as during the whole life time of GALIENVS, the Empire was vsurped by diuers tyrants, which were called Emperors: onely Italy and Rome continued firme to him.

In the time of Galienus were thirtie Emperours in sundrie parts.

The authors excuse.

And in that time also, strange Nations entred and inuaded the Empire with fire and sword; of one side the Germanes came downe into Italy, and passing the Alpes came as farre as Rauenna: The Gothes robbed and spoiled all Pontus, and a great part of Asia the lesse; and in Europe all Græcia, Macedonia, and their confines: The Sarmates subdued and robbed Austria and Hungary: The Germans passing through France entred Spaine, to the citie of Tarragona, which they ruined. The Persians and Parthians, alreadie possessing Mesopotamia, seised vpon the greatest part of Syria. So as in conclusion all things went so to wracke, as all writers affirme, that the Romane Empire had then ended and come to confusion, had not those tyrants, which in many places rose and called themselues Emperours (some of which were very valiant and worthie men) holpen to defend and plucke the Empire out of the hands of those strange Nations, as wee will declare. And, the Emperour to whom it belonged to prouide for all things, although that in the beginning he made some good shew of himselfe, perfourming some things as a valiant Captaine, and ouercame and slew INGENVVS a wise and valiant Knight, which rebelled and was called Emperour, being Captaine and gouernour of Hungary and Austria; and also fought a battaile wherein hee ouercame the Gothes, in which victories he vsed incredible cruelties, so as in one citie he left no man liuing, of what age soeuer: Yet afterwards hee gaue himselfe so much to vice and sensualitie, that when as the world was infested with warres and combustions, he continued the most part in Rome, taking his pleasure among whores and bawdes, compassed about with roses and flowers; seeking new delights; oftentimes bathing himselfe; studying how hee might keepe figges and other fruites greene all the yeere, and how they might last two or three yeeres; hauing ordinarily at his table most exquisite and delicate meates, and of great cost. And in such manner he passed his time, that nothing troubled him, neither took he any care for the losses which daily ensued in the territories of his Empire. It is strange, To consider, that the Romane Empire at that time was not onely molested with warres and persecutions by men, but euen the very heauens and elements did seeme to conspire, and to plague it: for TREBELLIVS POLLIO writeth, that the heauens were darkned in such sort, that for many daies space, they neuer saw the Sunne; and therewithall the earth did oftentimes shake in Rome, in all Italy, in Africa, and other countries: and with those Earthquakes, many great buildings fell downe, and slew an infinite number of people. Principally in Asia many cities were destroied, and the earth opened in many places, and shewed great vaults and caues; and there sprang out at them great streames of salt water. And there were heard thundrings and rorings in the bowels of the earth, without any thunder in the aire, as is vsuall: whereat many were so amazed, as they died died with feare. The Sea exceeded the bownds, and ouerflowed and drowned many cities; and many prodigious and wonderfull things happened. After this followed the most cruell pestilence that euer was heard or written of: so as in Rome there died in one day thereof fiue thousand persons. For all which accidents GALIENVS took so little care, as though there had been no such matter. And when it was told him that the whole kingdome of Egypt rebelled against him, he answered; And what then? Cannot we liue without the linnen cloth of Egypt? Being aduertised of the spoile and losse of other prouinces, he answered so scornefully, that he seemed not to care for any thing: which was the occasion that so many tyrants made themselues Lords and Emperours in his time. Of which it shall not be amisse to say something, seeing that we haue shewed the life and conditions of GALIENVS, and of his raigne; to the end that his historie may be the better vnderstood. If I should speak of them all at large, and describe their parentage, and all their acts; it would bee an endlesse worke: for (as I said) they were in all, thirtie. But let the reader vnderstand, that all the accidents and occurrences cannot bee set downe in order as they passed: for they were so many, and happened in so many places, and many of them at one instant, that it would bee impossible to bee well vnderstood, if I should obserue the order of the time, wherein euery thing happened: for to speake of one matter I must leaue another; so as the historie would be abrupt and very confused. And therefore we will begin with those matters which happened in the East; and when we haue briefly giuen notice thereof, wee will passe to other parts. Wherefore let him that shall reade it vnderstand, that many of these things came to passe at one instant; and sometime before those which are treated of.

VALERIANVS then (as we said in the beginning) being taken prisoner, and his sonne vsing no industrie to set his father at libertie, the souldiers and Captaines which remained in the East, went dispersed and scattered with great sorrow for the disgrace they had receiued; greatly offended with the carelesnes of GALIENVS. Wherefore BALISTA, who was Prefect and Generall of VALERIANVS Armie, an excellent man of warre, very sufficient, and diligent in making prouision for the Armie, and in all other things requisite for the warres; and another singular Captaine of great experience and age, who was of greatest estimation of any man of his time, whose name was MACRINVS, assembling the Romane Legions and cohorts together; with the consent and good liking of them all, they agreed to chuse an Emperour, to defend and preserue the bounds of the Empire, to recouer what was lost, and to set VALERIANVS (if possible) at libertie; seeing that GALIENVS took no care thereof. And after long consultation betweene BALISTA and MACRINVS, in the end MACRINVS was chosen and obeied for Emperour; and with him his two sonnes, the one named MACRINVS, and the other QVIETVS, were made his companions in the Empire: and he presently made BALISTA Prefect or Generall of his Armie. When MACRINVS saw himselfe an Emperour and mightie by reason of the Armies in the East, which he speedily drew together and put in good order; he marched with them to the confines of Persia, and in some battailes staied their insolencies by reason of their former victories. But standing in feare of a valiant Captaine whose name was VALENS, who was Proconsul in the prouince of Achaia in Græcia; hee sent against him a great Armie vnder the command of PISO, who had bin Consul, and was a Noble and valiant gentleman, to seise on that countrie, and thence to passe into Italy. When VALENS vnderstood thereof, to the end he might be of greater authoritie and power, he caused himselfe to be chosen Emperour, and took the ornaments and ensignes of the Empire: wherewith hee drew so many men vnto him, that PISO was driuen to retire with his troupes into Thessalia, and there was ouerthrowne and slaine by such as VALENS sent against him; PISO hauing first proclaimed himselfe Emperour, vsing the same policie which his enemie had done. But VALENS did not long enioy this victorie; for within few daies after, he himselfe was slaine by his owne souldiers. And MACRINVS, who raigned Emperour in the East, hauing notice what had passed concerning VALENS and PISO, not contenting himselfe with that which he held, determined with a great Armie to goe to Rome, to ruine the Emperour GALIENVS (if he were able) and other tyrants which rebelled; leauing behind him QVIETVS one of his sonnes, and with him BALISTA, with certaine troupes of his best souldiers, for feare of ODENATVS, of whom we will speake heereafter. He began his iourney with fiue and fortie thousand good men of warre: and marching ouer land through Asia the lesse, passing the streights of Constantinople, he entred into Thracia. But before all this, there arose another tyrant in Slauonia and Dalmatia, whose name was AVREOLVS, and was commander of those men, of warre, which for the Empire were in those quarters, who (as some say) against his will, was constrained by his souldiers to take vpon him the state and ensignes of the Empire. So as it appeareth, that in that small time, euery one held himselfe sufficient to be an Emperour; and that Armie which made none, was held to be of little worth and of no reputation: but truly the world paid them their due, for none of them died of their naturall death, and most of them were slaine by those which chose them. MACRINVS being to passe with his Armie through those countries which were in subiection to AVREOLVS; as both of them sought to be soueraigne Lords, they fell at variance, and MACRINVS fought a battaile with AVREOLVS his forces, whereof an excellent man called DOMICIANVS was Generall: wherein MACRINVS and his sonne were ouercome and slaine, there ending their high dessignes and great power: But before he fought this battaile (in his way passing through the prouince of Asbaia) he ouerthrew the Gothes, who had made great spoile and slaughter in the lands of the Empire: whereupon they retyred, and a little withdrew themselues. And of MACRINVS his souldiers which escaped from the battaile, 30000. went ouer to AVREOLVS; and so where AVREOLVS thought he should haue lost, from thence arose his gaine. Which newes when the lawful Emperour GALIENVS vnderstood in Rome, finding himselfe too weake to subdue AVREOLVS, he made with him a kinde of league and peace, thereby to end the warres which he had begun against POSTHVMVS, another great Captaine who rebelled in France, and was called Emperour: of whom (although this be his place) we will speake hereafter, first to make an end of the troubles in the East, notwithstanding that in all parts of the Empire there were tyrants; neither can we make an end of AVREOLVS, because he outliued GALIENVS, and died in the time of his successor CLAVDIVS. I say then, that in the East there was an excellent man, whose name was ODENATVS, who was Prince and Captaine of a certaine people called Palmerini, inhabiting a prouince in Syria, who seeing all things out of order (as all the rest did) sought to make himselfe absolute, and in the beginning (as writeth TREBELLIVS POLLIO) had the title of a King: but afterwards things succeeding prosperously, he took vpon him the name and state of an Emperour, imparting the title and dignitie with HERODE the eldest of three sonnes which he had by his first wife. This his tyrannie was both honorable and profitable to the Romane Empire: for he performed many notable exploits against SAPOR King of Persia, who held VALERIANVS prisoner: so as sauing the setting of his person at liberty (for that could not be done) in all the rest he gat sufficient satisfaction for that which was lost, and recouered what SAPOR had vsurped. For, raising many troupes of excellent good souldiers; he gaue him many battailes, in which he gat the victorie, recouered all Mesopotamia, and the noble cities of Nisibe and Carras, and compelled King SAPOR to flye (hauing first ouerthrowne him) and taking his wiues, his treasure and riches, he marched to the citie of Tesphonte, and had other great aduentures and victories. But for asmuch as his chiefest purpose was against MACRINVS and his sonnes, he sent a great present of the iewels and prisoners which he had taken from the Persians, to the Emperour GALIENVS: and GALIENVS was so inconstant and so base minded, as he not onely accepted the presents, but confirmed his election, giuing him the name of AVGVSTVS and his companion in the Empire, and he triumphed in Rome for the victorie which the other had obtained in Asia. While as ODENATVS gat these victories in the East, other great multitudes of Gothes (besides those which were alreadie entred by Thracia into Graecia and into Europe) came downe into Asia the lesse, and so in Bithynia, burning and spoiling the countries.

When ODENATVS vnderstood of the death of MACRINVS and of his sonne, (as I haue declared) he presently resolued to march against QVIETVS, who was his other sonne, whom he had left in the East with BALISTA the Prefect of his Armie, when he was proclaimed Emperor. And this iournie prouing so prosperous to ODENATVS as the rest had done, with little difficulty he gat QVIETVS into his power, and caused him to be slaine, and afterwards did the like to BALISTA. And although that some say, BALISTA was consenting to the death of QVIETVS, and that afterwards he attempted to make himselfe Emperor; yet all agree that he was put to death by ODENATVS: and in this manner remained he without any contradiction Lord of all the Prouinces of the East, and valiantly warred against the Persians. Hee had two other sonnes, the one called HERENNIANVS, and the other TIMOLAVS by his second wife ZENOBIA, the most manly and valiant woman that euer was in the World.

ODENATVS liuing in this prosperity feared of all the Princes of the world, it happened that that a cosen germane of his, whose name was MEONIVS, practised his death in hope to haue had the Empire of the East after him, and vsed such meanes that ODENATVS and HERODE, his eldest sonne (who by his fathers order was also called Emperour) were both found dead: and MEONIVS the traitor and murtherer, as he was wickedlie moued to kill ODENATVS; so it pleased God to permit him to be slaine in the like manner, who was within few daies after put to death by the same souldiers which holp him to execute his treason; being a man which no way deserued the Empire, except by being of kin to ODENATVS: for he was a most vile and wicked man. ZENOBIA, ODENATVS wife, remaining with her two yong sonnes a widow (seeming rather to haue neede of a tutor and gouernour, then to bee able to rule and gouerne others) with courage and iudgement more then manly beganne to rule, and carried herselfe therein with such wisdome and valour, as is incredible: and to the great disgrace of GALIENVS in his life time, and of CLAVDIVS his successor, she possessed the Empire of the East many yeeres, on the one side making warre against the Persians, and on the other defending herselfe against the Romane Emperours. The vertues and noble acts of this woman were so many, that I would I had longer time to describe them: but because they require a particular historie, we will with our wonted pase hold on our way; wherein of force we must returne to meet with her, because that she liued in her prosperitie vntill the time of the Emperour AVRELIANVS, of whom we are to treate hereafter, where we will speake of her fall and end, if God permit. But to the end that the excellencies and vertues of this woman may be the better knowne, seeing we recite not her acts, I say first that ZENOBIA was of an excellent good constitution of bodie, and was exceedingly faire and beautifull, not very white, but somewhat browne. Her eies were great and black, very cleere and bright, and in all parts of her body she was proportionable. And as she was verie beautifull and amiable, so had she an honest countenance, and had such white and bright teeth, that they rather resembled pearles then teeth. Her voice was cleere, but sounding deepe more like a man then a woman. Herewith she was most honest and continent, and would neuer ly with her husband after that she was conceiued with childe; neither twise, vntill that by naturall signes she knew whether she had conceiued or no. She was very wise, and learned, and spake the Latine, Greeke, and Egyptian tongues perfectly, and was very liberall and temperate in all things; somewhat seuere, and yet pitifull. In her diet she was most temperate: but yet when she inuited any guests, she would a little exceede, more to please others, then for any naturall desire. She was serued very ceremoniously, and with great honour, after the custome of the Kings of Persia.

When she made any speech to her soldiers, or sate in councell among them, she came armed with a caske vpon her head, and rode in the like manner. She delighted much in hunting, and did other things shewing strength and courage, as though she had bin a valiant and gallant Knight. She vaunted much that she descended from CLEOPATRA, and from the PTOLOMYES, Kings of Egypt; and she said, that she also descended by another line from great SEMIRAMIS Queene of Babylon. By meanes of this her prowesse and valour, she held the Empire of the East, and was callde AVGVSTA, the space of many yeeres. As for her two sonnes HERENNIANVS and TIMOLAVS, I find not written what their end was, but onely that they had the habit and ensignes of Emperors, and are reckoned in the number of the tyrants of those times. TREBELLIVS POLLIO writeth, that the Emperour AVRELIANVS caused them to be slaine. Others affirme, they died of their naturall death. When as the Emperour GALIENVS (being in Rome) vnderstood of the death of ODENATVS, thinking to make a better hand against ZENOBIA, he commanded souldiers to be leuied, and to be sent into the East against her and the Persians, and sent with them a Captaine whose name was HERACLIANVS; who with his troupes was ouerthrowne by ZENOBIAS forces. The Gothes also in those times made another incursion into Asia the lesse, sailing through the sea called Mare Euxinum, and were ouercome by ATHENVS and CLEOPHANVS, Captaines sent by GALIENVS: but yet for al that, they made great spoile in those coasts, and were also againe ouercome by sea, by another Captaine called VENERIANVS; and so that nation did much harme in the confines of the Empire, although that sometime they were ouerthrowne. About this time there was in the kingdome of Egypt another Captaine of certaine companies of Romanes, whose name was EMILIANVS, who after some tumults which happened there did as he saw others do, and proclaimed himselfe Emperour, and with great courage and audacitie seised on that most auncient kingdome. But as these buildings had but weake foundations, so small force and a little foule weather ouerthrew them, which was in this manner. GALIENVS (notwithstanding

The Authors excuſe.

I preſume, that the Reader will imagine me to be very tedious in writing the life of this Emperor, ſeeing he was ſo remiſſe and negligent; hauing briefly written the liues of others which were good and excellent. But, if he ſhall conſider, that in this Hiſtory are comprehended the liues of thirty Tyrants (whereof many did better deſerue to haue been Emperours, than GALIENVS) he ſhall haue greater reaſon to accuſe me of breuity, than of being too tedious. But, to auoid the breach of order, I will be as brief as poſſibly I may.

While matters paſſed in the Eaſt in this maner, the other Prouinces of the Empire were neither in reſt nor peace: but rather there was not any of them wherein were not wars, battels, and tyrants which called themſelues Emperors; the right Emperor GALIENVS ſolacing himſelf in Rome, contented with Italie, which onely obeyed him in peace. The reſt ſometimes obeyed him, and ſometimes they denied him their obedience: and hee, taking no care to finde any redreſſe, ſent onely certain Captains which did ſomething; whereof we will ſay ſomwhat. In this generall combuſtion Africa forbare not to make ſome alteration, although not ſo much as other Prouinces did: for, at that time there was for Captain-generall thereof, a Romane Knight called FABIVS POMPONIANVS; and for Proconſul and Gouerner, another, whoſe name was VIVVS PASSIENVS; who, for that they would haue an Emperour of their owne making, agreed to chuſe and nominate a Tribune whoſe name was CELSVS, a man much eſteemed and commended as well for his excellent good carriage, as for his vertue and juſtice, and alſo for his perſonage: for, he was exceeding tall of ſtature, and of an excellent good conſtitution. Hauing effected their purpoſe, the poor mans majeſty laſted but ſeuen daies: for, he was put to death by the order of a woman dwelling in thoſe Countries, who was a kinſwoman to the Emperor GALIENVS, whoſe name was GALIENA: and, after he was dead, they ſhewed extreme cruelty to his body. After whom, I finde not that any man rebelled againſt GALIENVS in Africa: yet great and many ſcandals, and much trouble, enſued in that Countrey.

Celſus made Emperor in Africa, and put to death by a woman.

While theſe things paſſed in the places aforenamed, in Hungarie, and the marches therof, there was a Captain of the Armies in Dalmatia and Slauonia, called REGILIANVS, which rebelled; and, with the conſent and good will of the Inhabitants of thoſe Prouinces, he was proclaimed Emperor: for, they were greatly incenſed againſt GALIENVS for the cruelties by him vſed in thoſe Countries, when he ouercame EVGENIVS; who in the beginning (wee ſay) had rebelled in that Countrey, and been ouerthrowne and ſlain by GALIENVS. Truely, it is a troubleſome peece of work, To make relation of all the Tyrants; and it is as ſtrange a thing to conſider, that of all the Captains that VALERIANVS, father to GALIENVS, made, there was not any one of them but in the time of GALIENVS was called Emperor; wherein they ſhewed little loyalty to their Countrey and their Lord: but it was growne to a cuſtome ſo to do; ſo as they ſeemed to haue right of inheritance. Neuertheleſſe, it argued the great judgement of VALERIANVS, in chuſing for his Captains men of ſo great courage and valour. There were alſo, beſides theſe Captains, others, who in this confuſion of the Empire were called Emperors: among which was one TITVS a worthy man, who in the time of MAXIMINVS had been Tribune; but he continued with this title but ſix months: for, the ſame ſouldiers which had elected him, ſlue him. And in the ſame manner began and ended CENSORINVS; a man which had been Conſul, and had held other offices and dignities. And another Captain, called TREBELLIANVS, was choſen and proclaimed Emperour by the Yſauri, which are a people inhabiting the mountains, bordering vpon Cilicia in Aſia the leſſe; who many times gouerned thoſe Quarters: againſt whom, GALIENVS ſent a Captain called GAVSIOLEVS, born in Egypt. Between which two was fought a terrible battell; wherein TREBELLIANVS was ouerthrowne and ſlain. Yet, for all this, the Yſauri continued not in peace; but rebelled many times afterwards, more for that their Countrey was of hard acceſſe, than for the valour or vertue of the Inhabitants. And, to make a concluſion, let vs write of thoſe which in France, and the marches thereof, were called Emperors, from the time of the impriſonment of VALERIANVS, vntill the death of his ſon GALIENVS: which of purpoſe I haue left till the laſt, becauſe in thoſe wars GALIENVS employed himſelf, and finally therein ended his daies.

Regilianus called Emperor in Hungary and Dalmatia.

Titus made Emperor by his ſouldiers, and ſlain by the ſame.

Cenſorinus began and ended in the ſame maner.

There was for Captain-generall of the Armies in the Prouinces of France, an excellent and valiant man, whoſe name was POSTHVMVS; of whom (ſpeaking of the Tyrant AVREOLVS) wee made mention; whom VALERIANVS did highly honour and eſteem: and for that cauſe his ſonne GALLIENVS held him in great reputation, and as ſoone as he came to the Empire, he ſent him his ſonne SALONINVS, whom hee intituled CÆSAR, to bee brought vp and inſtructed by him: But afterwards ſeeing the neglect and ill gouernment of his father GALIENVS (forgetting the loyaltie which he ought to his ſouereigne Lord) putting the ſonne to death, he ſought to get the Empire for himſelfe. Yet others write, that hee was prouoked and compelled by the inhabitants of that Countrie (which hated GALIENVS) to accept the name of Emperor; and that they ſlew SALONINVS, ſcorning to haue a boy for their Lord. But howſoeuer it was, POSTHVMVS, with great courage and diſcretion made himſelfe Lord of all France; and ſo gouerned the ſame for the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres, defending it valiantly; and obtaining many great victories againſt the Barbarians and northern nations, which continually inuaded it and made incurſions.

Saloninus ſon of Galienus put to death by Poſthumus who alſo was called Emperor.

Againſt POSTHVMVS, GALIENVS leuied an Armie, for that he was ſo neere to Italie: and notwithſtanding that he was vicious and careleſſe, yet he wanted not ſufficient courage for the warres; if he would haue followed them, as he did his pleaſures and eaſe. He went againſt POSTHVMVS, hauing with him for Generall of his Armie, a Noble man called THEODOTVS; and alſo another called CLAVDIVS, who was a man of great probitie and vertue, and was afterwards Emperour. Being come before a Citie wherein POSTHVMVS was, the French-men did not onely defend him, and the Citie, ſhewing great courage and loue; but the Emperor GALIENVS in a skirmiſh was wounded with an Arrow, by meanes whereof hee was conſtrained to rayſe his ſiege. And holding this for a very doubtfull warre, he made peace with AVREOLVS, who at that time was called Emperour in Slauonia. But that was not ſufficient to defeat POSTHVMVS: for he was ſupported by VICTORINVS, who was an excellent Captaine, and a yong man, whom POSTHVMVS made his companion in his Empire; with whoſe aide and diligence (although that moſt commonly his ſide was ouerthrowne) he defended himſelfe and prolonged the warres in ſhy daies; hauing ſometimes proſperous and ſometimes aduerſe ſucceſſe.

GALIENVS returning to Rome, as if he had left all in peace, entred in great triumph, giuing himſelfe ouer to his old courſe of life and accuſtomed pleaſures; whither daily newes were brought vnto him (beſides the ſtrange Nations which moleſted the Empire) of captaines and other notable men which intituled themſelues Emperours: whereof his wickednesſe was the occaſion; being hated and ſcorned for his little care and ſtupiditie; which are things which make wicked men audacious; and giue good men hope and meanes to ſeeke redreſſe.

The French rebelled againſt Poſthumus, & in his place choſe Lolianus. Poſthumus & his ſonne ſlaine in the warre againſt Lolianus.

POSTHVMVS liuing all this time (as I ſaid) in great proſperitie, together with his ſonne of his owne name whom he intituled CÆSAR, and afterwards Emperour, and his companion in his Empire; he gouerned with great iuſtice and ſeueritie. But the Frenchmen, deſirous of innouations, rebelled againſt him and choſe for Emperour a Captain whoſe name was LOLIANVS, a man of good ſort, very valiant and of great experience: and theſe two, warring one againſt the other, POSTHVMVS and his ſonne were ſlaine by him and them; and ſo hee was paid for the treaſon which he committed againſt GALIENVS. And LOLIANVS remayning Emperor in thoſe parts, notwithſtanding that he was very valiant and of great power, yet he could neuer attaine to that authoritie which POSTHVMVS had; as well for that he was not choſen by common conſent, as for that VICTORINVS, whom (as we haue ſaid) POSTHVMVS proclaimed Emperour and his companion, held a great part of the countrie and was called Emperor. This VICTORINVS was a womans ſonne, whoſe name was VICTORIA or VICTORINA; which was ſo valiant and manly, and ſo deſirous to raigne, that ſhee was therefore called mother of Armies, and VICTORINVS was altogether ruled by her counſell; and ſhe afterwards after the death of her ſonne, took vpon her to make an Emperor of her chooſing: ſo great was her minde and policie.

VICTORINVS with the fauour and reputation of his mother, made reſiſtance againſt LOLIANVS the new Emperour, which ſlew POSTHVMVS, ſo as VICTORIANVS obtayned a victorie againſt LOLIANVS and ſlew him; and remained ſole Lord, together with his mother whom he called AVGVSTA. To ſay the truth, VICTORINVS was an excellent and valiant Prince; yet luxurious, and therefore raigned but a little: for by the treaſon of a ſoldier (from whom he had taken his wife) he was ſlaine in the Citie of Agrippina, now called Colleine in Germanie: which when his mother vnderstood, with the aide and assistance of some of her friends she proclaimed her nephew VICTORINVS Emperour, who was the same VICTORINVS sonne. But the furie of the men of warre was such, as they presently slew the sonne as they had done the father. Yet for all this, VICTORINA gaue not ouer her desire to rule and command: for by the meanes of her friends and fauourites, she perswaded TETRICVS, a Senatour of Rome, who had a certaine gouernment in France, to proclaime himselfe Emperor, and his sonne CÆSAR; which he did, and prooued an excellent and valiant Prince, and made himselfe Lord of all France, and of the greatest part of Spaine, obtaining some victories against the Northerly nations: whose raign continued long, even vntill the time of AVRELIANVS. The right Emperour GALIENVS enioyed Rome and all Italy; which neuer forsooke him: and the other tyrants (by turnes) the one destroied the other, or else were slaine by their owne souldiers. I ghesse that I haue very neere treated of all the tyrants, except of one whose name was SATVRNINVS, and of another called MARIVS. Of SATVRNINVS I say, that the souldiers which chose him, presently bereaued him of his life: and MARIVS his Empire lasted but seuen daies.

Tetricus chosen Emperour by the meanes of Victorina.

Saturninus and Marius called Emperours, the one was slaine presently, and the other raigned 7 daies.

Through all parts and prouinces of the Empire there were committed infinite murthers, robberies, violences, insolencies, and all kinde of cruelties, tyrannies and treasons, with famine, pestilence, and other miseries and calamities, seldome heard of, but in the time of this GALIENVS; and the greatest part thereof caused through his vice, crueltie, and negligence: and so it pleased God that hee had the like end as other euill Emperours had; which was complotted in this manner. A great Captaine (whereof the warres produce abundance) called MARTIANVS, compounding with another called HERACLIANVS, and one other whose name was CERONIVS, determined to kill GALIENVS, to the end that one of them might haue the Empire; either of them pretending that they did it for the generall good of the Empire. And hauing laid their plot, they presently put it in execution: for it happened that GALIENVS went from Rome with a great Armie against AVREOLVS, who (as we haue said) was called Emperor: and they two had been companions in the Empire. But afterwards falling at variance, AVREOLVS took the citie of Milan; and GALIENVS hauing besieged it, MARTIANVS and the other traitors, which had agreed with AVREOLVS, fained that the said AVREOLVS was making a sallie, and came to charge that place where GALIENVS was: whereupon he with greater haste then good speed, went from his lodging small accompanied; but before that the rest of the Armie could come together, hee was slaine by those which came with him, together with a brother of his, whose name was VALERIANVS. And so GALIENVS ended both his life and raigne, when as the Empire was little lesse then rent in pieces and vsurped by forraine nations: for the Gothes and Scythians held a great part of Thracia, and of Macedonia in Europe, and some prouinces in Asia. ZENOBIA raigned and ruled all in the East: and in France and part of Germanie, TETRICVS and VICTORINVS: and in Slauonia and Illyricum, AVREOLVS, who was besieged in Milan; and so all the rest lived, part vnder the obedience of GALIENVS, and part vnder tyrants. The souldiers of his Armie were greatly offended with his death: for they hoped to haue had the sacking and spoile of that citie; so as MARTIANVS and his companions were driuen to satisfie them with readie money: but none of those conspirators could attaine to the desired title of Emperour. This happened in the yeere of our Saviour IESVS CHRIST 271, after EVSEBIVS, in the fifteenth yeere of the raign of GALIENVS.

AM now freed from no small labour, hauing finisht howsoeuer the life of GALIENVS; whose history is confused and out of order, and by authors written obscurely, as it appeareth: which being ended, I come now to relate the life of CLAVDIVS the second, who was one of the most vertuous and valiant Princes that euer was in the world.

As soone as the Emperor GALIENVS was dead, the Souldiers of his Armie were so displeased, as neither MARTIANVS nor any of those which conspir'd with him in his treason, could or durst take vpon him the name of Emperour; but rather by the common consent of al men, CLAVDIVS who came thither with GALIENVS, one of the most excellent Captaines of them all, as well for his bountie and vertues, as for the worthinesse of his person, and the great and notable seruices which he had done in former times, was chosen Emperour. It cannot distinctly be set downe of what linage or country he was: for some affirm, that he was born in Dalmatia; and was descended of an antient family: others say, that he was of Dardania, and descended from the bloud of the Troians: and some (as AVRELIVS VICTOR saith) affirmed, that he was the sonne of the Emperour GORDIANVS. He was a very tall man of person, his eyes were cleere and bright, and he had a great and full face, and was very strong and of maruellous force: so as in wrestling and other exercises, which young men did vse, he euer wanne the prize; he was also vertuous, and had excellent good parts. He was very chaste and continent, temperate, iust and vpright, both before that he was Emperour, and in the time of his raigne. He deerely loued his friends and kinsmen, and greatly honoured strangers. He hated the euill, and seuerely punished them; and was an extreame enemie to vnjust Iudges. He made excellent lawes and ordinances, and in very short time reformed the Common-wealth: so as when he died, it seemed to be another world. Before that he was Emperour, he did many noble feates of Armes in the seruice of GALIENVS, against POSTHVMVS in France, and against the Gothes in many parts, and likewise in other wars. Wherefore he was worthily chosen by all men to the dignitie of the Empire. For which occasion, as soone as his election was knowne in Rome, the ioy was great which was conceiued thereat by all estates: and they confirmed his election, with great applauses and blessings of the Senate.

The stature and strength of Claudius.

When CLAVDIVS was inuested in the Empire, he gouerned the same with so great wisedome and courage, as in a good Prince was requisite. The first enterprize he had being Emperour, was against AVREOLVS, who (as we said) was in Milan. Who, vnderstanding of the death of GALIENVS, fortified himselfe in such sort, as hee made account to haue remained sole and absolute Emperour. But CLAVDIVS, hauing reinforced his Armie, fought many battailes with him; amongst which, in one which was very famous, he obtained the victorie worthily, fighting therein most valiantly. Whereupon AVREOLVS retired into Milan, and from thence sought to come to some composition with CLAVDIVS, as he had done with GALIENVS: but CLAVDIVS, as a vertuous and victorious Prince, would not heare of any agreement with a tyrant; but answered, That such demands might well haue been made to GALIENVS, who could haue endured AVREOLVS his conditions, and stood in feare of him: but of him he was not to expect any vniust or vnlawfull matter. AVREOLVS was afterwards slaine, as some say, by his owne souldiers; and as others say, by CLAVDIVS his commandement, fighting at the foote of a bridge. But whereseuer, CLAVDIVS became Lord of his Armie, and of all the countries which he held: and going with this victorie to Rome, he was there receiued with great triumph and feasting; where he settled the affaires of the Empire in such sort, as could not be bettered: he did nothing without the consent of the Senate. And his goodnes comming to be knowne, he was obeied in all parts of the Empire, hauing in such as were vsurped by tyrants and barbarous nations. And as all his studie and care was, how he might restore the Empire to her former libertie, and to recouer what was lost, exposing his person to all kindes of dangers; it was debated in the Senate, and that very doubtfully and with diuers opinions, what warre was first to be vndertaken, and whether he should goe against TETRICVS and VICTORINA, which held France and Spaine; or into the East against ZENOBIA; or else against the Gothes and other nations, which also vsurped and infested sundrie partsof the Empire.

The victorie of Claudius against Aureolus.

The death of Aureolus.

But the good Emperour CLAVDIVS soone resolued them of that doubt, saying; That the first warre that he would vndertake should be against the Gothes, and other barbarous Nations, for they were enemies to the Common-wealth; but as for the Tyrants they were enemies to him only: wherefore, he was bound to reuenge a publike wrong before a priuate iniurie. This his resolution being approued by the Senate and people of Rome, he with all possible diligence raised the greatest Armie that euer was leuied by any Emperour for such a warre; and truely hee could not well haue had any lesse, considering the present necessity: for the Gothes (as IORNANDES in the acts of the Gothes, and PAVLVS OROSIVS, and others doe write) had for the space of fifteene yeeres vsurped many parts of the Empire, and had destroyed many Cities; amongst which some were very great, and of speciall note. And notwithstanding that by MACRINVS, and by CORNELIVS AVITVS, and in one place by the same CLAVDIVS in the time of GALIENVS, they had been sometimes defeated and ouerthrowne; yet neuertheless they still held all Thracia, and in a manner all Macedonia and other prouinces.

After sundrie arguments Claudius prepared himselfe to goe against the Gothes.

At such time as CLAVDIVS resolued to make warre against the Gothes, they through their greedy desire of spoile and booty, and for reuenge of some battailes which they had lost, beleeuing that CLAVDIVS would be sufficiently busied in warring against TETRICVS and other Tyrants, moued many northerly people and Nations to come against the Romans. Whereupon they ioined themselues with the Heruli, Trutungi, Virtungi, and other Nations, exceeding, in al, the number of three hundred thousand fighting men besides seruants and disarmed people: and taking their way through Hungarie, and downe the Danubie, they fraighted two thousand Barkes and Ships with men and munition. Some are of opinion (as I say) that this Fleet came downe the Danubie; and others affirme, that this was a Fleet that the Gothes had by Sea: ancient Authors wrote it so confusedly, as I continue of my first opinion, that the Gothes were neuer mighty by Sea, neither then, nor at any time before. In conclusion, they brought so many men, and so great store of Armes and victuals, as they made the whole Empire to quake for feare; only the inuincible Emperor was not dismaied, but with a gallant Army marched against them: and being ready to come to blowes with them, he wrote a briefe Letter to the Senate, wherein he shewed the great difficultie and danger wherein he was; and yet wanted not courage to assault his enemies, the effect whereof was this:

New commotions made by the Gothes.

Claudius his Letter to the Senate of Rome.

Fathers conscript, I do giue you to vnderstand, and hold it for certaine, that into the bowndes of the Romane Empire are entred three hundred and twentie thousand men of warre; I goe

I goe to fight with them; if I ouercome them, it is reason that you giue me such thankes and reward as such a deede shall deserue. But if it happen otherwise, consider I pray you that I fight after that GALIENVS hath raigned, the commonwealth being rent in pieces, and almost ruinate, and that I shall fight after the tyrannies and rebellions of EVGENIVS, REGILIANVS, LOLIANVS, POSTHVMVS, CELSVS, and many others, which in contempt of GALIENVS rebelled against their countrey and commonwealth. And wee may welll say that we now haue neither whole sword nor launce: for France and Spaine which are the sinewes and strength of the Empire, are vsurped by TETRICVS, and the crossebowes and archers (although it be a shame to speake it) ZENOBIA hath them all: so as hauing such want of all things necessarie, what soeuer small matter shall be by vs performed, is to be reputed great.

Notwithstanding all these difficulties, CLAVDIVS led with him an excellent and well gouerned Army: and by his wisedome and good direction, comming to a battaile, the Gothes were ouerthrowne, and an incredible slaughter made of them. This was one of the most noble victories that euer was gotten, wherein there was a great number of enemies slaine and taken prisoners, and great aboundance of spoile taken by the souldiers. Insomuch as the same CLAVDIVS in a letter (extant to this day) sent by him to IVNIVS BROCHVS, writeth, that he had slaine, taken, and put to flight three hundred thousand men, and taken two thousand ships: so as the houses were filled (almost to the tops) with swords, lances, shields and targets of the subdued: and the banks of riuers, the sea-shore and the fields were full of bones, and the wayes couered with the dead carcases of the enemies. For this victorie there was conceiued great ioy in Rome: and for that cause they made many vowes and supplications to their gods. In this battaile were taken many barbarous Kings, and other men of great account; and there were so many prisoners, as there was neither prouince nor citie wherein were not many slaues of that nation.

A most noble victorie obtained by Claudius against the Gothes.

After this victorie in Thracia neere to Constantinople, and in Macedonia neere to the citie of Thessalonica, CLAVDIVS his Captaines fought sundrie battailes with the Gothes which were possessed of those cities: in all which, through his good fortune, his enemies were ouercome, in such sort, as he restored to the Romane Empire all that which they had vsurped; so as the Gothes were wholly driuen out, and in long time after durst not hold vp their heads. Likewise this most valiant Prince (as EVTROPIVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR report) had another very notable victorie against the Germanes, neer to a Lake called Venacus (now Garda) the enemie being little lesse then two hundred thousand strong: so as hauing freed the Empire from strangers, and meaning to haue gon against TETRICVS and ZENOBIA, or against some other tyrants remaining, it happened that the good Emperour fell sick in such sort, that as TREBELLIVS POLLIO saith) within few daies after he died of his naturall death; a thing which I most desire to see in an Emperour, which seldome happeneth but in such as are good and iust, as this Emperour was. When he died he had raigned only two yeeres, and for his death (except TETRICVS and ZENOBIA) all were very sorry: which happened in the yeere of our Lord 279. and by a decree made by the Senate, he was honoured with all kind of honors, and placed in the number of the gods. His statue made of gold was set vp in the Capitoll, and his target of gold was set in the Senate. Truly they did in with great reason, for considering his high attempts in the beginning, without all doubt, if it had pleased God to haue giuen him longer life, CLAVDIVS had wholie defeated all the tyrants of the Empire, and had againe set it in perfect libertie.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPEROVR QVINTILIVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND SIXE AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

HIs Emperour CLAVDIVS had a brother whose name was QVINTILIVS: who as he was his brother by nature; so was he in behauiour, condition, and vertues: for he was very wise, and as expert in the warres as in ciuill gouernement: by reason whereof he was much esteemed and beloued, and was left with certaine Legions to guard Italy, when his brother went to the warres against the Gothes. The death of CLAVDIVS being published, the little Armie which QVINTILIVS commanded, moued thereto by his deserts and vertues, chose him Emperour; and his election was approued by the Senate of Rome being aduertised thereof, and they gaue him the name of AVGVSTVS, after EVTROPIVS: and hauing accepted the Empire, and beginning to make a good shew of his valour, hauing raigned onely seuenteene daies, newes was brought him that the victorious armie which his brother had with him, as soone as he was dead had made choise of a Noble man called AVRELIANVS for Emperour, of whom we will presentlie discourse. Wherefore QVINTILIVS bring out of hope to be able to make his partie good against him, as well for that he was a man of great valour and courage; as for that his Armie was the whole power of the Romane Empire, desiring to die in his estate rather then to liue depriued thereof, hauing first founded the will of his souldiers, and finding no hope in them, he caused his veines to be opened, and so died voluntarily bleeding, hauing raigned as some say, twentie daies; and as others say, but fourteene.

THE LIFE OF AVRELIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND SEVEN AND THIRTITH EMPEROR of ROME.

()

AFter QVINTILIVS, AVRELIANVS succeeded in the Empire, or to say better, after CLAVDIVS: for as soon CLAVDIVS was dead, in the same manner as the Army in Italy chose QVINTILIVS, the other great Armie which CLAVDIVS led, chose AVRELIANVS, and he remained Emperor; and was one of the most mightie that euer raigned in Rome; and is by Historiographers compared in his feates of Armes with the two greatest and best Captaines of the world, which were ALEXANDER the Great, and IVLIVS CÆSAR, for the great victories which he obtained in the small time of his raigne, and the Prouinces which he subdued with incredible celeritie, marching from one to another, as we will briefly declare; although that in his condition he was neither equall to them, neither did he any way imitate them; chiefly, he did much differ from CÆSAR in clemency, for he was cruell and bloudie: wherefore it was said of him, that he was necessarie for the Empire, but yet he was ill beloued by the greatest part. Others said, that AVRELIANVS was fit to be a Captaine, but not to be an Emperor; and so he is neither accounted among the good Princes, nor amongst the euill: for, of the one side, he set the Empire at libertie, by destroying all the tyrants; and of the other, he vsed much crueltie. Some say, that he was borne in Dacia, and others say, in Misia, the truth whereof is vncertaine: and so FLAVIVS VOPISCVS, who doth most copiously and particularly write his life, leaueth it in doubt; but all agree that he was of a meane familie, and of poore parentage. He was tall of stature, and of great strength, and had a gracious and pleasing countenance; and with his faire aspect hee seemed to be a perfect man. In his diet he did somewhat exceede ordinary. From his infancy he was inclined to the warres and militarie discipline; and in obseruing it, and making it to be obserued, he was most seuere. He was of great courage and singular strength, and exceedingly desirous to come to blowes with his enemies. Being a priuate souldier, he euer affected battailes, assaults, skirmishes and encounters: and for that there was another in the Armie whose name was also AVRELIANVS; to distinguish the one from the other, they called this, AVRELIANVS with his hand vpon his sword: for vpon all occasions he was in a readinesse with pike or sword in his hand, desiring to be doing. With which readinesse and valour hee made himselfe famous where soeuer he came, and performed notable matters in his owne person. In so much that THEOCLIVS and FLAVIVS VOPISCVS report of him, that in the warres of Sarmatia he hapned in one day to kill fortie of his enemies with his owne hands, and at seuerall times aboue nine hundred men: which made him so much esteemed among the Romanes,

The disposition of Aurelianus.

The valour of Aurelianus.

as in their dancings which they vsed in those times, among certaine sonnets and catches sung by the dancer, they vsed to pronounce this verse:

A thousand and a thousand,
one alone hath killed a thousand.
A thousand yeeres and a thousand line he, alone which killed a thousand.

He did other things, which although they seeme to be but meane and of small importance, yet they demonstrate the valour and fortitude of this man; whereby he was preferred to great offices and commands in the warres. He was many times Captaine and Tribune, and aboue forty times was Lieutenant to other Captaines and Tribunes. In which offices hee did so seuerely punish souldiers for their insolencies, and did so strictly obserue the discipline of the warres, that he was much feared of them: and did likewise many notable things in battailes and skirmishes; and principally in the warres which his predecessor CLAVDIVS had with the Gothes, hee wonne more honour then any other Captaine did; hee being Generall of the horse.

Which his doings were the occasion, that, CLAVDIVS being dead, he was by the general consent of the whole Armie chosen and made Emperor. And, QVINTILIVS being dead, who was obeied in Rome, the Senate and people of Rome approoued his election, and held him for Emperor. Hauing accepted the Empire, without any longer stay hee marched with his victorious Army against the Suevians and Sarmates, northerly nations, which had inuaded the bounds of the Empire. With whom he came to a battell, and obtained a most honourable victory: but therein befell him one mishap, whereof many inconueniences ensued; which was, that Beeing busied in this warre, the Marcomanni, and other most fierce Nations of Germanie, came down into Italie, and made great spoil and slaughter in that part which is now called Lombardie, and in the marches of Milan; whereof they were in so great fear in Rome, as they thought they should haue been wholly lost: which put all into combustion, euery man speaking ill of AVRELIANVS. But, when as he heard the newes, hee was greatly grieued, and came with all speed to the rescue of Italie. And this was so dangerous a war, that neer vnto Placentia there wanted but a little, that the Emperor had not been wholly ouerthrowne: for, joining battell with their whole powers on either side, they fought a whole day from Sun to Sun; and AVRELIANVS lost in that Fight the greatest part of all his troops: so cruell was the battell. But hee afterwards reinforcing his Armie (in three notable battels hauing the victorie) ended the warre, destroying the whole Armie of the Marcomanni; and from thence went to Rome, much displeased with those which had murmured and spoken ill of him: amongst which were some that had practised against him. And whereas he was very cruell (notwithstanding that hee was receiued with great feasting and solemnity) he vsed so cruell punishment for light offenses, and of so small importance, that any gentle or mercifull Prince would haue dissembled, and made no reckoning therof. But he would not do so; but, to the contrary, put many cruelly to death: for which cause he came to be extremely feared, and therefore generally hated. Hee enlarged the wals of Rome, and fortified the same, repairing that which was decaied; which was not lawfull for any Emperor to doo, but for such as had enlarged the Prouinces and Limits of the Roman Empire: for, by that title, AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, TRAIAN, and also NERO, enlarged the wals.

Cruelty vsed in Rome by Aurelianus, and the occasion therof.

Aurelianus enlarged the wals of Rome.

Hauing settled all matters in Rome (his chief delight consisting in Armes) hee could stay but few daies there; but speedily departed towards the East against the great ZENOBIA, accounting it a shame that a woman should hold the East Empire, to disgrace of Rome and the Emperors thereof. And, passing through Slauonia, and thence through Thracia, he had some conflicts against certain barbarous Nations which sought to resist him, and to haue stopped him in his journey. But, keeping his way, hee came to Byzantium, which is now called Constantinople; and so passed with all his Armie into Asia the lesse, which is now subject to the Turk; first pacifying the Prouince of Bithynia which then rebelled; all the nations yeelding themselues into his hands, without any battell or making resistance.

Aurelianus departed from Rome into the East against Queen Zenobie.

From thence hee marched into Cappadocia, where, for that the City of Tiana (which in that Country was an antient Colonie of the Greeks; being the Country also wherein the famous APOLLONIVS TIANEVS was born) made resistance and would not receiue him, hee sware that he would punish the Inhabitants in such sort, that hee would not leaue a dog aliue among them: which his resolution hee afterwards altered and reuoked. For, by the illusion of the the diuell (God permitting it for some vnknowne cause) there appeared vnto him in a dream (for it seemed vnto him that he saw a vision) one which could him that it was APOLLONIVS TIANEVS, which warned him to forbear to destroy his Countrey Tiana, and gaue him also further aduice. Which, as they write, was the occasion that hee not onely pardoned the Tianeans, but from thenceforth he was not so cruell as formerly hee had been. So as in Tiana hee onely put HERACLAMON to death, who betraied the City into his hands; which hee said he did, for that he which had been a traitor to his Countrey, could neuer bee faithfull to him. But his wealth which was very great he commanded to be giuen to his heirs, to the end that no man should think he had condemned him to bee executed for the desire of his goods. And to the souldiers, complaining that hee had not giuen them the spoil of the City, wherein hee had sworn that he would not leaue any liuing, no not a dogge; hee answered, I promised that there should neuer a dog remain aliue in Tiana, and I giue you leaue to kill them all.

A iust reward for treason.

When the Emperor had gotten this noble City, he from thence marched to Antioch, which bordereth vpon the Mount Taurus; where, granting a generall pardon, with one onely battell of small resistance, neer to a Wood called Daphne, he seised vpon all that Prouince. And, leauing all those Countries in peace, hee passed thence into Syria against ZENOBIA; who with another woman called ZAVALLA (in a manner as manly as herselfe) attended his coming with a very great Army of singular good Souldiers and excellent Captains, trained vp with great experience in the warres with her husband ODENATVS; and afterwards in other wars against the Persians. The two Armies coming neer the one to the other, a most cruell warre beganne between them. For, ZENOBIA, not as a woman, but as though she had bin HANNIBAL, prouided and performed whatsoeuer was fit, against the Romans. Finally, after some encounters they came to a battell neer to the City of Emesa, which bordereth vpon the deserts of Palmerina, a Prouince in Syria; which was so bloudy and doubtful, that AVRELIANVS was welneer ouerthrowne: for, his Cauallerie, being tired with fighting, began to retire, refusing the battell, and were ready to haue turned their backs, and to flee: but beeing detained by their Captains, and by the footmen constrained to stand firm, he obtained the victory, and ZENOBIA escaped by flight.

A cruell battell betwixt Zenobia and Aurelianus.

Zenobia ouerthrown and put to flight by Aurelianus.

When AVRELIANVS had obtained so noble a victory, he went into the City of Emesa, and from thence to the City of Palmyra, which is the Head of that Prouince, and ZENOBIA'S principall seat. In which way his souldiers endured many wants and difficulties, wrought by their enemies where they were to passe: and the City with such courage made resistance, that his souldiers were greatly distressed, and the Emperour himself in person incurred many great dangers; which plainly appeareth by a Letter written by him to a familiar friend of his. Whereupon AVRELIANVS, desiring to make an end of this war, thinking to induce ZENOBIA to yeeld herself into his power, sent her a Letter wherein he did assure her of her life, and that he would giue her all her treasure, her jewels and her money; and that shee should liue free and at liberty in any place or city where the Senate should appoint.

ZENOBIA, hauing receiued this Letter, in lieu of granting or requiring peace, became therewith more haughty and proud than before; answering him with another very proud Letter; which, NICOMACHVS, a Writer of those Times, translated out of the Syrian into the Greek Tongue; and FLAVIVS VOPISCVS hath left it to vs in Latin: which I will sette down, to the end that the haughty presumptuous minde of this woman may bee made knowne to the world, which saith thus:

A Letter written by Zenobia to Aurelianus.

ZENOBIA, Queen of the East, to AVRELIANVS AVGVSTVS, greeting. No other Captain vntill this day, but thou, hath required by Letter that which thou demandest of mee: for, those things (AVRELIANVS) which are to be tried by warre, by Arms and force are to be demanded and determined. Thou requirest that I yeeld and giue my self into thy power, as if thou hadst neuer read that CLEOPATRA Queen of Egypt (from whom I am descended) would rather kill herself, than liue in the power of OCTAVIANVS, in any dignity or liberty granted by him whatsoeuer. I let thee knowe, that I shall not want the relief of the Persians, which I expect. The Saracens will also come to my aid; and the Armenians fauour me. Thou dost well knowe, that the theeues of Syria were sufficient to ouerthrowe and disorder thy Army. If then the forces and succours which I expect shall come vnto mee, thou wilt abate the pride and presumption wherewith thou dost now command me to yeeld my self, as though I were absolutely ouercomn. And so she ended her Letter, glorying more in her valour, than in her eloquence.

This

This Letter being receiued by AVRELIANVS, hee made no account thereof; but drew neer with his Armie, and commanded his Captains to beſiege the City more ſtraightly, and with ſuch order and policy to aſſault the ſame, and to defend his Camp, that he failed not in any thing of the duty of an excellent Captain. For, upon the way coming to ZENOBIA, hee ouerthrew the ſuccours which came from Perſia, and did the like by certain companies of Saracens. And the forces which came from Armenia, what through fear and fair promiſes, hee drew to his ſeruice, and made them his friends; in ſuch ſort, that ZENOBIA, ſeeing herſelf ouercome, in the beſt manner ſhee could fled from the City with Dromedaries, carrying ſuch treaſure with her as the ſhortnes of the time would permit: and, trauelling towards Perſia, ſhee was ouertaken upon the way by certain horſemen which the Emperor ſent after her. And ſo AVRELIANVS tooke her, and the City of Palmyra, and afterwards all the whole eſtate of the Eaſt. And although many counſelled him, yet he would not put ZENOBIA to death, purpoſing to haue her aliue in his triumph. But he put the Philoſopher LONGINVS to death, for that it was ſaid he had penned the Letter which ZENOBIA wrote unto him. TREBELLIVS POLLIO writeth, that when this valiant woman was brought into the preſence of AVRELIANVS, he ſaid unto her; Tell me, ZENOBIA, how durſt thou preſume to contemn Emperors, and to defend thy ſelf againſt their power? Whereto ſhe anſwerd, excuſing herſelf, and honouring him, ſaying: Onely thee, AVRELIANVS, I acknowledge to bee an Emperor, for that thou knoweſt how to ouercome. But as for GALIENVS, AVREOLVS, and the reſt, I never held them for Emperors nor Princes. In this manner (as I ſaid) ended the power of ZENOBIA.

Zenobia taken priſoner by Aurelianus.

The anſwer of Zenobia made to Aurelianus.

The Emperor AVRELIANVS hauing ended this warre, leaving order and forces in the Eaſt, returned into Europe the ſame way he went: and, coming into high Germanie, he ſubdued a certain people called Carpi, which were in Arms, and ouerthrew them in battell. Vpon this occaſion he was in Rome called CARPICVS: whereat he was both angry and ſorry, that for that onely victory they ſhould giue him a ſurname; And therefore cauſed himſelf to be called GOTHICVS, SARMATICVS, ARMENICVS, PARTHICVS, ADIABENICVS, GERMANICVS, and SYRICVS, after the names of the Countries and Nations which he had ſubdued.

Aurelianus his ſurnames.

As matters ſtood vpon theſe tearms, and he being to march againſt TETRICVS the tyrant of France; newes was brought him that the Palmerins which had beene under ZENOBIA were reuolted, and did rebell, and had ſlaine SANDARIO whom he had left there for Captaine and gouernour of the Citie, with ſixe hundred archers with him; and that they had made ARCHELAVS, who was of kinne to ZENOBIA, their Prince. When AVRELIANVS vnderſtood thereof, with his accuſtomed courage and expedition (which was naturall unto him) he returned by great iournies into Aſia: and being come into Syria, he made no ſtay untill that he came to the Citie of Palmyra; which when he had taken, he inflicted moſt cruell puniſhment, by putting all ſorts of people to death, men, women, old folkes and yong children, without leaving any liuing creature therein. And afterwards he left the whole Citie deſolate, and almoſt all the other Cities, which conſented and conſpired therewith in the rebellion. Without any long abode in Aſia, in great haſte he returned into Europe, where he happily pacified all matters; ſo as there remained no part, but all was in obedience. Neuertheleſſe, for as much as the people were accuſtomed to the libertie and evill cuſtomes permitted vnder the gouernment of GALIENVS, a certaine Captaine called FIRMVS, who was in Egypt, aroſe, and made all that Kingdome to rebell; and, as ſome write, made himſelf Emperor: and, as others write, crying Liberty, hee promiſed to maintain the liberty and priuiledges of that Country. Which when this warlike Emperor underſtood (who, for expedition in the wars, was a ſecond IVLIVS CÆSAR) he would put no man elſe but himſelf in truſt, and returned the third time into Aſia, and thence came into Egypt: and at his firſt entry with great difficulty hee recouered all that Kingdome, and left it in peace and quiet.

The Palmerins rebelled.

The Egyptians rebelled.

At that time (as AVRELIVS VICTOR and EVTROPIVS report) there was a Captain in Dalmatia whoſe name was SEPTIMIVS, who alſo rebelled, and proclaimed himſelf Emperor. But AVRELIANVS needed not to come againſt him: for, the ſame legions and ſouldiers which choſe him, conſpired againſt him and ſlue him. So as there reſted nothing for AVRELIANVS to do, but to defeat TETRICVS, who held a great part of France and Spain with title of Emperor, as is before ſaid. Whereof AVRELIANVS made great account, and came from Egypt with intent to go againſt him; this warre being in all mens opinion very doubtfull: neuertheleſſe AVRELIANVS tooke ſo good order therein, as it was ſoone ended. The reaſon was, that TETRICVS being a tyrant, and no lawfull Emperour, the legions and men of warre vnder his command, became ſo diſſolute and preſumptuous, as he was no longer able to endure their inſolencie and pride, but choſe rather to liue a ſubject to the Emperour AVRELIANVS, then to be an Emperour ouer ſuch ſubjects, with vexation toile and reproach. Wherevpon hee ſecretly wrote to AVRELIANVS, and brought it ſo to paſſe, that hee voluntarily yeelded himſelfe; and ſo all became in peace and quiet, ſubject vnto AVRELIANVS.

Tetricus ſubmitted himſelfe to Aurelianus.

And as at other times the legions had betrayed their Captains & Emperors: ſo now the Emperor to be rid of trouble deliuered vp his legions to another: which is a great example & proof of the miſeries, ielouſies, and troubles, into which they are involved, which vniuſtly and tyrannouſly hold dominions; daily expecting and fearing death, and to be diſpoſſeſſed of their gouernments; whereof ancient Hiſtories are full: and in our time we haue ſeene with our eyes, that although they eſcape for a time; yet there is no day wherein they are not vexed with the inſolencies and diſſolutenes of thoſe, by whoſe aide they maintaine their tyrannies: and moſt commonly they are by them brought into greateſt danger. And ſo to keepe themſelues on foot, they vſe great cruelty againſt their ſubiects; and ſhew themſelues partiall, remiſſe; and humble to their fauorites and friends. And above all, the ſecret martyrdome and remorſe of conſcience doth torment them: whereof DIONYSIVS, MARIVS, SYLLA, and other famous tyrants which haue been, are fayre preſidents: who, vpon their ſubiects, committed moſt horrible cruelties, and of their friends and companions endured incredible inſolencies and intolerable audacious preſumptions. Which TETRICVS knowing well, although he were not vnprouided nor deſtitute of power, courage or valour; yet he voluntarily yeelded himſelfe to AVRELIANVS, holding it for a more difficult thing to commaund with trouble, then to ſerue with quiet. Which diſcreete advice may ſerue for a rule and admonition to flie and eſchew a vanitie much vſed by thoſe which in townes and common-wealths maintaine factions and diſcords, and will command and tyrannize ouer that which is none of their owne; who thereby vainely and fooliſhly make themſelves ſervile and ſlaves to very baſe fellowes, flattering them and giuing what they will have; becauſe they will not endure the companie of thoſe which are their equals: then which there can be no greater madneſſe. It proued no evill courſe that TETRICVS tooke: for he liued many yeers after in great honour and peace, and ended his dayes as we will declare: whereas otherwiſe if he had perſiſted in his tyrannie, he had made ſuch an end as all ſuch had: which was eyther to haue been ſlaine by his enemies, or by his owne ſouldiers; and the time which he ſhould haue liued, would haue been full of continuall feare and Ielouſie.

AVRELIANVS having fully ſubdued and pacified all the Prouinces of the Empire, and reduced the ſame to the antient power and reputation, by taming and ſubduing the tyrants, and by expelling the ſtrange and barbarous Nations with force, felicitie, and admirable expedition, hee reſolued to come to Rome to receiue the triumph for his victories: which was giuen him with the greateſt ſolemnity and pompe that could be deuiſed, which in reſpect of my accuſtomed breuity cannot particularly be recited. It may ſuffice to ſay in briefe, that it was one of the moſt ſtately triumphs that euer was made in Rome, wherein were led an infinite number of Priſoners and Captiues of diuers and ſundry Nations, great variety of wild Beaſts, as Tigres, Lions, Ounces, Elephants, Dromedaries, Beares, and ſuch like. There was alſo aboundance of Armes taken from thoſe which were overcome, and moſt rich and ſumptuous chariots: one, which had beene of ODENATVS, ZENOBIAS husband; another which ſhe herſelfe had made: and another which the King of Perſia voluntarily ſent to AVRELIANVS for a preſent.

A moſt ſtately triumph prepared for Aurelianus.

There went alſo in that triumph the great ZENOBIA, moſt richly attired, in cloth of great price ſet with pearle and ſtone, in manner of a priſoner bound with chaines of gold. There were in the number of them, of whom AVRELIANVS triumphed, TETRICVS and his ſonne, whom the father had intituled Emperor. AVRELIANVS entred in another chariot, which had beene the Kings of the Gothes, drawne by foure ſtagges: and after him came all the victorious legions both of foote and horſe, moſt rich and gallantly armed, bearing boughes of lawrell or of palme in their hands: there were alſo many other things of great Pomp. And he in this maner went to the Capitol to do his ſacrifices according to the cuſtom, & thence to his Palace, and the next day were made in Rome all kinds of ſports and feaſts, ſuch as were wont to be made, made, with addition of many things aboue ordinary, and more than other Emperors had don. He likewise gaue many gifts to the people, as the custome was at such times. TETRICVS he made Governer of Lucania, Calabria, Puglia, and Campania, with other Prouinces of Italie; and did him great honour together with his sonne. To ZENOBIA he gaue lands and possessions, the rents whereof sufficed to maintain her honourably: and so she lived and died, being highly honoured and commended of all men; still preserving her antient reputation, and the honour of her person.

Prouinces giuen to Tetricus by Aurelianus.

His bounty to Zenobia.

AVRELIANVS being victorious, and in this prosperity (as his chiefest delight was in the warres, and to bear Arms) resolued to leuie a choice and selected Armie, and therewith to goe into the East to make warre against the Persians, in reuenge of the injurie done to the Empire by the imprisonment of the Emperor VALERIANVS; and within short space he marched thitherwards. And as he was valiant, wise, and a most excellent Captain; so had he without doubt performed great matters, had not death (through the secret judgement of God) by the way made frustrate his high attempts and desseigns: which (as OROSIVS and EVSEBIVS testifie) God permitted for a punishment of his wickednes. For, hauing raigned six yeers, fauouring, or at least wise tolerating the Christians to liue free and at liberty, he suffred not the Catholick Church to be molested or persecuted: wherefore, notwithstanding that he was an Infidell, our Lord God (who leaueth no desert vnrewarded) gaue him so many victories, and so good successe in all his actions. But in the end, deluded by the Diuell, and the counsell of wicked men, he determined to persecute the Christians, and sent abroad his Letters and Edicts to that effect; which was the tenth persecution of the Church. But, beeing ready to signe the same, there suddenly fell a thunderbolt from heauen so neer vnto him, that all men thought hee had been slain: yet, besides this signe and warning giuen him to desist from his wicked resolution, God permitted his death; and that his owne seruants, in whom hee reposed most trust, should kill him, which was thus: As he was euer cruell, and had put many to death for light occasions; his principall Secretarie, who managed his most secret affairs (whose name was MENESTHEVS) being in fear of his life, for that AVRELIANVS had threatned him for a matter of smal importance, resolued to practise the death of his Lord: which to effect, hee presently wrote a forged memoriall, wherein it seemid that AVRELIANVS had set down the names of certain persons which he would cause to be slain: among which he wrote his owne name, and shewed this memoriall to all those (or to the greatest part of them) which were contained therein: many of which were odious to the Emperor; which made the matter the more likely to bee true. And as the Secretary was of great credit by reason of the place hee held, and they knowing the Emperors cruelty, presumed as much, and throughly beleeued it: whereupon, they speedily agreed to make an end of the Emperor, for fear that hee otherwise would haue done the like by them. And, hauing resolued vpon the manner, they slue him as he went one day with a small guard from Heraclea in Thracia (for, many Cities are so called) towards Byzantium, now Constantinople.

The tenth persecution of the primitiue church

Menestheus procured the death of Aurelianus.

The death of Aurelianus.

He died (according to EVSEBIVS computation) in the yeer of our Lord 278, and in the sixt yeer of his Raign; a small time truely, considering his great and noble acts. He left neither sonne nor nephew, but one onely daughter. The Senate was very sorrie for his death; but the people, much more: for, they liued in greater security, and without danger of his cruelty. And for his noble acts they canonized him, and numbred him among their holy Emperors. When the treason of MENESTHEVS was discouered, they draue a stake through him, and did cast out his body to the dogs, and to bee deuoured by wilde beasts. It is not written that the rest were punished, because peraduenture they were prime men; and so great, that no man durst procure their punishment.

THE LIFE OF TACITVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, AND EIGHT AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

THE warlike and inuincible Emperor AVRELIANVS being dead, as we haue said, who with such valour brought all the Prouinces of the Empire to peace and tranquillity; and in so short a time, that it seems the fear and reuerence which they bare him in his life time, held the same authority euen after his death [For, no man attempted to make himselfe Emperor in any of the Prouinces wherein Legions lay in garrison, as at other times they were wont to doo; neither durst the Armie which was with him chuse an Emperor, he had in such manner tamed the Prouinces and the pride of the people: And the Captains which then were with him were also better aduised, and took warning by the death and confusion of those which in the time of GALIENVS had vsurped the name of Emperors] Therefore, for that they deemed none worthy of the Empire; they desiring to auoid the like inconueniences as befell in times past, and to the end that a good Emperor might be chosen, who with his authority might preserue and maintain the present estate, the men of warre of AVRELIANVS his Armie sent word to the Senate, that (as reason was) they should chuse and name an Emperor; and that they would obey him, and confirm his election.

The Armie sent to the Senate to chuse an Emperor.

The Senate, knowing that the Armie was not wont to bee contented with a Prince of their chusing, made answer, that they should name and make choice of one, and that the Senate would approue their doings. In this straining of courtesies, six moneths passed (which may serue for a wonder to him that hath read the former Histories); in which the world was without an Emperor, and the Empire was gouerned by the Senate, and such Officers as AVRELIANVS had left. At the end of which time, ouercomn by the entreaties and Ambassages from the Armies, the Senate made choice of TACITVS, a Noble-man, who had been Consul, and was a good man, and of great age, who earnestly refused the same; so as there were many complements between them about the matter. But in the end he accepted thereof, to the great ioy of the Senate and Roman people, and also of the Pretorian Cohorts which ordinarily lay neer to Rome. And so he performed the solemnities, donatiues, and gifts which the new Emperors were accustomed to make. TACITVS was very ould when hee came to the Empire; but of great experience in magistracies and offices of charge, and had euer liued a vertuous life. Hee was very temperate in all things, milde and kinde, and a louer of iustice and equity.

Tacitus chosen Emperor.

When as TACITVS had taken vpon him the gouernment of the Empire (as a good Prince free from ambition) he did all things by the aduice and counsell of the Senate; and held such a course in all his actions, that the whole Empire was in peace and tranquillity, and iustice was euery where administred with quietnes: and to that end he made excellent lawes and ordinances, abolishing certain abuses and euill customes in Rome. But, for any notable matters which Readers commonly desire in Histories (as, wars, battels, great aduentures and accidents) there were none in his time; as well for that he found all in peace and in good order, as for that hee raigned but a small time; which was but six moneths, and those not fully expired. What death hee died, the Authors doo not certainly set down. Some say, that his owne souldiers slue him vpon the way trauelling towards Asia, whither he was going with an Army to make war against the Persians: but SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR and others write, that hee died of a burning Feuer in the City of Tharsus; which seemeth most likely to be true: for, he was a vertuous man, and much beloued. Among his other vertues, hee was very temperate in his diet, and in all other things; so as hee would not allow his wife the Empresse to wear any pretious stones or jewels of any great price: and he much honoured the memory of good Emperours. His countrey or linage I finde not written. He left no son, either naturall or adoptiue.

The originall of the heresie of the Manichees.

In those times sprang the famous Hereticks of the Manichees; whose Originall and Maister was a wicked man called MANES: who with his Followers were so wicked and such Infidels, that they presumed to say, that there were two Gods, the one good, the other euill; adding thereto, that the one was the Originall of all goodnes; and the other, of all euill. And this horrible and diuelish Heresie lasted in some wicked men aboue two hundred yeers: against which, Saint AVGVSTINE and other holy Doctors opposed themselues. The life of this TACITVS is written by FLAVIVS VOPISCVS, whom I haue followed, and the other Authors aboue-named.

THE LIFE OF FLORIANVS, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND NINE AND THIRTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

AS soon as TACITVS was dead, a brother of his named FLORIANVS, trusting in the neernesse of bloud to the last Emperor, without any authority or election took vpon him the name of Emperor: which hee did through the fauour of part of the Armie, and of certain principall men which were with him. But his estate continued but a small time: for, when the Armies in the East vnderstood of the death of his brother TACITVS, they made choice of PROBVS, of whom we will speak heerafter; who was a man of such authority, and so well beloued, that FLORIANVS vpon the newes thereof held himself forlorn. And, knowing that all the martiall men would abandon him (as, many of them alreadie had done) he made his veins to be opened (imitating QVINTILIVS, who, as we haue said, did the like); and so he died (as the other did) bleeding, about two months after hee had taken vpon him the name and title of Emperor. Wherefore, he could doo no such notable matter as might be worthy writing. He was a man very like his brother TACITVS; as well in condition and goodnes of life, as in the shortnes of the time he held the Empire. He died in the yeer of our Lord 279.

THE LIFE OF PROBVS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND FORTITH EMPEROR of ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

ALthough Probus were of no very Noble Family, he was so honest a man and so vertuous, that, in consideration of his vertuous deeds, he worthily deserued to be chosen Emperor. After that he was confirmed in that dignity, he shewed himself to be so affected to the people, and so kinde and louing to the Senate, that by common consent and a publique decree hee was called Pater patriæ; and to him moreouer were granted all the titles and dignities that might enoble and make him famous. In his time arose infinite wars and troubles, so as hee spent all his life time in managing of Armes: wherein being victorious, he entred Rome in triumph, hauing tamed and vanquisht the Frenchmen and the Germans, and subdued some which would haue made themselues Emperors: amongst which was one Saturninus, a valiant and politick man. And, seeing that all the Empire was in peace and vnder obedience, he vsed to say, that within a while there would be no need of martiall men: which when they vnderstood, they began to murmure and to conspire against him; principally, because he would not permit them to line in their accustomed liberty. And going with great preparation towards the wars against the Parthians, he was slain by them vpon the way. His death was greatly lamented in Rome, and generally through the whole Empire; missing such a father as in euery respect did worthily deserue to be called Probus.

PROBVS succeeded FLORIANVS (or rather TACITVS) in the Roman Empire; who was chosen Emperor by the Legions & the Armie in the East, presently when as they vnderstood of the death of TACITVS, to the end they would not stay for one to be chosen at the pleasure of the Senate. But this PROBVS was so valiant a man, and so excellent a Captain, and so held and reputed for such by all men, that the Senate and people of Rome presently confirmed his election.

There hapned, in the time of this excellent Prince, such and so many wars, as well against tyrants as strangers, and he obtained so many victories, that hee might very well be compared to AVRELIANVS; of whom a little before we haue written: and in like manner wee may parallell him with HANNIBAL, with CÆSAR, or with any other great and famous Captain of antient time; whose acts seem greater than the acts of this Prince, by reason they were so fortunate, as to haue them registred by those eloquent and excellent Writers which celebrated the same. Which ornament failed in those which wrote the liues of the Emperors of these times, and a hundred yeers before: and in long time after there were not found any so eloquent; or rather, neuer since. And although they write the truth of the History, yet oftimes it is written so abrupt, and so brief, as it makes their acts to seem lesse than they were. But the discreet Reader, considering the acts of some of those Emperors which we haue already written, and which we are to write heerafter, shall certainly knowe, that the deeds and prowesse of some of these Princes, were no way inferiour to theirs which were so famous; but in some sort might rather seeme greater, if they well consider what nations and people they were, against which they fought. Which as they were no lesse valiant or fierce, then those of ancient times; so were they more expert and of greater skill in the warres, and in aught else that was requisite.

The origine of Probus.

But to returne to our good Emperour PROBVS: he was borne in Hungary in a citie called Sirmio, of noble parentage, principally by his mothers side. His fathers name was MAXIMVS, a man very famous, and one which followed the wars, and had had the leading of martiall men; and being Tribune, died in Egypt; His wife liuing after him, with this sonne and one daughter, which was his sister. This young PROBVS prooued to be so vertuous and so valiant a young man, as the Emperour VALERIANVS who died prisoner in Persia, made him a Tribune, being so young as hee then had no signe of any beard. He performed in the time of VALERIANVS, and of his sonne GALIENVS, and of AVRELIANVS, and CLAVDIVS (wherein happened great warres, with many battailes and conflicts) such notable seruices, both as a souldier and a Tribune, and afterwards when he was a Captaine; that he was held and reputed for a most valiant man, and make men now to admire him, which reade his doings. In giuing assaults to cities, he was many times the first man vpon the scaling ladders, and the first that entred the enemies camp or fortresses. He was victorious in many single combats, man to man, and in battailes freed many Romane citizens from death: wherefore according to his deserts, there were giuen to him many ciuical crownes, collars, braceles, launces and banners, with other ensignes, deuices and martiall priuiledges. And afterwards being a Captaine of Legions, and Generall gouernour of prouinces; there was almost no nation but was subdued by him, in the infinite warres which were in those times.

In Africa hee subdued a people called Marmarides, and ouerthrew some mightie tyrants and rebels. In Egypt being a captaine, he fought against the Palmyrines, who would haue vsurped that countrie and kingdome; but he brought them to quietnes with great part of the East, in the seruice of AVRELIANVS. In the time of CLAVDIVS, he ouercame the Gothes in many battailes; and in the time of AVRELIANVS, the Sarmates and Germanes; and often was victorious in many other parts. And with these victories and noble acts, with the goodnes of life and behauiour hee made the discipline and knowledge of Armes equall: So as he was in all, a good and a valiant Souldier, Captaine, and Emperor.

Many letters (recited by FLAVIVS VOPISCVS) written by GALIENVS, CLAVDIVS, AVRELIANVS, TACITVS, and other Emperours and Princes of that time, beare record of that which is said of him; in which they extoll the vertues, valour, and excellencie of this man: wherefore he was infinitely beloued, and honored generally. Which plainely appeareth by the manner of his election: for the Armie which was in the East desiring to make haste in choosing an Emperour, being aduertised of the death of TACITVS; the Captaines, and Coronels drew their souldiers into the field: and without any former request, practice or agreement, they began to shew vnto them, that it was requisite to make choise of an Emperor, a man which should be valiant, honest, religious, good, pitifull, wise, and adorned with all vertuous qualities: which speech they vsed in sundrie squadrons and parts of the Armie. The souldiers without any priuate conference cried out with one voice, Let PROBVS be Emperour AVGVSTVS, God keepe and preserue thee PROBVS, and with such other words and applauses, shewing the great loue and affection they bare vnto him.

Probus proclaimed Emperour.

When PROBVS had accepted of the Empire, he presently wrote a briefe letter to the Senate, but yet with great honor and respect, approuing what was done the last yeere in the election of his predecessor TACITVS: and excusing himself for hauing accepted of the Empire, without the knowledge and confirmation of the Senate, he laid all the fault vpon FLORIANVS, who for that he had taken vpon him the name of Emperour, the Armie was therefore forced to make choise of him. His letters being read, there was made great shew of ioy, and they applauded his election with many blessings, and gaue him the name of AVGVSTVS, Father of the countrey, and they also made him high Priest, and gaue him tribunall power and authoritie.

When PROBVS had receiued this decree from the Senate, he was very glad: and taking good order for all things, and leauing sufficient garrison in the East, he came into Europe; where he was receiued by the Armies; which sware to be faithfull vnto him. The first thing he did after his comming, was, to leuie the greatest Armie hee could; wherewith hee went into France, which euer after the death of AVRELIANVS was subject to the Germans, who made themselves Lords and masters of all the chiefest Cities of that countrie. After that he came into to his enemies countrie (whose number was infinite) there began a most cruel and bloudie war: for the souldiers of either side were very valiant and expert. There passed (as saith VOPISCVS) many bloudie battailes betweene them, whereof one continued two daies together: so as each day the darknes of the night parted the fight, the victorie seeming to incline sometimes to the Romanes, and sometimes to the Germanes, which is found written in the antient Chronicles of Germany, as witnesseth HENRICVS MVTIVS a modern writer: but in the end through the good prouision, and direction of PROBVS, he preuailed after that he had obtained many victories against the Germanes, wherein died 400000 of their men and a great number of the Romane Army. He wrested out of their possession sixtie principall cities, and draue them out of all that which they had vsurped: and passing forwards he took other cities, and his Armie made great spoile and hauocke. Being thus ouercome, they yeelded obedience, and became vassals to the Empire: which without my particular relation will plainely appeare by a letter written by PROBVS to the Senate, which saith thus.

A Letter written by Probus to the Senate.

I giue thanks (fathers conscript) to the immortall Gods, seeing they haue approued your iudgement of me, shewing it to be reasonable and true. For, know that I haue conquered, and subdued all Germany, and that nine Kings of sundrie Nations and Prouinces haue prostrated and humbled themselues at my feete, or to say more rightly, at yours; and are now become subjects, and fight in our armie against other barbarous Nations more northerly. You shall (fathers conscript) make your accustomed prayers vnto the Gods, seeing that we haue slaine foure hundred thousand of your enemies, and sixteene thousand men very well armed haue yeelded themselues vnto us; and we haue recouered threescore Cities which they held, and all the Prouinces of France. All the Crownes of gold which the French Cities gaue vnto me for presents, I send vnto you, to the end that by your hands they may be consecrated, and offered to the most good and mightie IVPITER, and to the rest of the immortall Gods. The prey that we haue taken, is greater then all the harmes that they haue done vnto us. The fields in France are ploughed and tilled with Oxen taken from the barbarous, &c.

And so in his letter he proceedeth, signifying vnto them his victories: for which, in Rome, was made great ioy, feasting, and supplications to their gods, according to their rites and customes. After this conquest, he came with his forces into the Provinces of Slauonia, inuaded by the Sarmates, which are the inhabitants of Muscouia, Russia, Polonia, and others as is aforesaid, and had the same in possession; which warre was no lesse dangerous then the last, for the great multitude and fiercenes of those Nations with which he fought certain battailes: Wherin he shewed himselfe a most prudent, hardie, and valiant Captaine; and hauing wholly subdued them, he forced them to flie out of the bounds and confines of the Empire, the greatest part of them being either slaine or taken. And from thence with great expedition hee marched with his Armie into Thracia, which with the rest is now called Gracia, wherein is the great Citie Constantinople; and marched farther towards the North, with a resolution to make warre against the Gothes in their owne countrey, and wholly to subuert that Nation for reuenge of the harmes and spoiles which they in time past had done in the Empire. He was of such reputation, and all Nations stood in such feare of him, that whersoeuer he came, he found no resistance: for they sent to yeelde their obedience, and bound themselues to be confederats and friends to the Empire. Whereupon leaving Europe in peace, he went into Asia, with a resolution to haue made warre against the Persians and NARSEVS, who then was King of Persia and Parthia: and passing so through Asia the lesse, he inuaded the Province of Isauria, which is a part thereof, bordering vpon Cilicia, which (as in the life of GALIENVS we said) is mountanous, craggie, and hard to be assaulted, ill to be conquered, and easy to defend, wherein were many theeues and tyrants which sought to make themselues Lords of that Countrie; all which the valiant Emperour subdued, not without great toile and danger: for the inhabitants being fortified by the naturall situation of that countrey, defended themselues courageously, so as there passed dangerous battailes and conflicts betweene them; but PROBVS in short space pacified all. And they say, that entring the countrey he desired to see the naturall and artificiall fortifications thereof: which he much meruailed at, and said, that the countrie was hard to be wonne, and easy to be defended. He diuided the fields which he there took from the tyrants, among his old souldiers, and such as had borne themselues valiantly in that service. After that he had pacified al that region, he marched into Soria, and into the Eastern parts: but first he went against a certaine people which they called Blemij, which came out of Ethiopia, and had taken part of Arabia, of Palestina, of Iudea, and the Cities of Ptolomais, and Ioppa, now called Probus draue the Sarmates out of Slauonie.

Iaphe, which was then a famous cittie. And hauing ended this iourney, he marched towards Persia against NARSEVS King of the Persians and Parthians; who was the most powerfull King of the world, and whose predecessors euer troubled the Romane Empire. But PROBVS (of whom we now treate) was so much feared and esteemed, as NARSEVS durst not oppose against him, but by all meanes procured peace, restored what he had vsurped, gaue him other great gifts, and yeelded to such conditions as PROBVS required. So as hauing no enemie against whom he might wage warre, he returned againe into Europe, leauing the whole state of the East in peace and vnder good gouernment. Comming into Thracia, which countrie was dispeopled, through the warres and spoile which the Gothes, Sarmates and other barbarous nations had made; and for that many nations which were wont to be enemies, had now submitted themselues to do him seruice, and desired him to giue them som land to inhabit, where they might be his subiects; he gaue vnto them the prouince of Thracia and the marches thereof; diuiding fields by lottes amongst them, where they should inhabit and till the earth. These were of many Tribes and nations, as Vandals, Gothes, Guntanes, and other people, whose number was infinit. But this counsell proued afterwards very dangerous, and preiudiciall, as hereafter you shall heare.

Narseus King Persia yeelded to Probus.

In this time was a generall peace through the whole Empire, and there was no King of forraine nation, that durst attempt any alteration. But as mens harts are commonly (euen from their infancie) more inclined to euill then good through the corruption of our nature, wanting forraine enemies, there arose some domesticall cumbustions; and those which were wont to make head against forraine enemies, made themselues enemies.

There was in the East parts a Captaine whose name was SATVRNINVS, who was both valiant, expert in the warr, discreete and of great iudgement, and in the time of AVRELIANVS had been Generall of those frontiers, being by birth a French-man. This man comming to Alexandria in Egypt about some matters of importance which wee know not; without his knowledge or imagination, the Egyptians, as they were euer vnquiet, rebellious and desirous of innouations, by a common and general consent, hailed him Emperor; and called vpon his name with so great obstinacie as he durst not refuse it, neither forbear to say that he consented thereto. But imagining that through his absence this tumult would haue bin pacified, he departed from Egypt and came into Palestina. But they neuer giuing ouer what they had begun, and as those troupes whereof he had the commaund, did not onely consent thereto, but were very glad thereof; He himselfe standing in feare of PROBVS, clad himselfe in purple, which was the impetiall colour (but some say crimson; which was the colour of the imperiall robe) accounting it the safest way. But it is written, that when his Captaines and souldiers came to sweare obedience, and to doe him such honour as was accustomed in such actions; SATVRNINVS entertained them weeping, saying vnto them, Let it not my brethren ond companions in Armes be imputed vnto me for pride and presumption, what I now shall say vnto you; for this day doth the common-wealth lose in me a necessarie member; for I was the chiefest man in restoring France. I being a free Captaine recouered Africa from the Moores. I pacified Spaine, and did other things to the honour of the Empire; but what auaileth it to haue done all this? for with this daies worke all is lost. And as his Captaines and Coronels encouraged and entreated him to be merrie, this wise man, who well knew what it was to raigne with tyrannie, answered them, saying; My friends, you know not what it is to raigne. But I will make you vnderstand it in my selfe: for from henceforth there will daily hang ouer my head, threatning me and putting me in feare of my life, swordes, gleaues, shields, and on euery side I see my selfe assaulted with halberts, launces, and other weapons; and I begin to stand in feare of those which haue the guarde of me, and to suspect those which keepe me companie. I shall not eate any thing that shall taste well, neither without suspicion. I can trauaile no way in safetie. I shall not vndertake any warre to my owne liking, neither shall I beare Armes for exercise, but forced: and although I did assure my selfe to the contrarie, yet truly it is impossible for any Emperour to please and content all his subiects. For if he be an old prince; they will say that he is insufficient and an vnprofitable dotard: if he be young, they will say, he is rash and furious, and hath not wit enough to be a soueraigne. And so there will neuer want imputations to blemish him. Beleeue me my friends, in that you make me Emperor, you binde me to death. But one thing doth some thing recomfort me; which is, that I shall not die alone. But seeing that you will haue it so, I pray to the Gods that the time come not wherein you will be as sorrie for what you haue done, as I am at this present. These speeches are recited by FLAVIVS VOPISCVS; who writeth that he vnderstood them by the report of his Grandfather, who was present when they were spoken.

Saturninus made Emperor against his will.

The miserable condition of tyrants.

SATVRNINVS, although (as a wise man) he knew and foresaw into how great danger he thrust himselfe (seeing he could not desist) was nothing dismaied, but with great courage prouided all things necessary for the preseruing of the estate which he had taken vpon him. And notwithstanding that he was made a Tyrant against his will, yet he desired rather to ouercome, then to leaue to be. But as the Emperour PROBVS was no lesse wise and valiant then himselfe; so when he was aduertised what had passed, with the greatest Forces he was able to leuy, he returned into Asia, ordering all things after a new manner with great care, being very iealous of this warre, in respect of the quality of the Captaine and Souldiers. Both Armies being come into one Countrey, they made of either side cruell warre, and the battailes were verie fierce and bloudie; yet the Emperor PROBVS sought to haue come to some composition with SATVRNINVS, promising to pardon him, and to intreate him well. And it is supposed, that SATVRNINVS would willingly haue accepted thereof, but his souldiers would neuer yeeld thereto; holding themselues thereby to be in no security, seeing they had forced him to take vpon him the name of Emperour. But in the end, SATVRNINVS being apparantly ouercome, he was besieged in a Castle, and there was slaine by the Souldiers against the Emperors will, who would rather haue forgiuen him.

Warres between Saturninus & Probus.

After this Victorie, which was held so doubtfull, PROBVS returned into Europe, and the Souldiers & Legions remained so quiet, and in such obedience, as it grew to be a common by-word; that the Mise did not dare to gnaw for feare of PROBVS. But as he was busie in this action (the successe whereof was doubtfull); in France and Germanie were two Captaines, the one called BONOSVS, who was the chiefe; and the other PROCLVS: who raising mightie Armies in France and in Britannie (where PROBVS was ill beloued, for the Victories which he had obtained there) and hauing also some Spaniards, besides the ordinarie Legions of their gouernments; they both tooke vpon them the name of Emperors, and the purple Robe. But for that it would be a long Storie, particularly to recount all that passed; it shall suffice to know, that PROBVS neuer rested: so as according to the small time of his raigne, which was but fixe yeeres, it may seeme a wonderfull thing to consider the warres and voyages which he made. But in the end, he found out these Tyrants, and inuaded them both; of which, the warre against BONOSVS (as they write) was very dangerous and lasted long: but in the end PROBVS had the victory, and BONOSVS falling into despaire hung himselfe. PROCLVS being likewise ouercome, fled into the Countrey, where the Germanes (thereby to winne PROBVS loue) deliuered him: and so he had an entire and compleat Victorie ouer all.

Bonosus and Proclus called Emperors.

Bonosus in despaire hung himselfe.

This PROCVLVS was borne in a place among the Alpes neere to Geneua, and BONOSVS was a Britaine, bred vp in Spaine; of whom they write, that he would drinke so much wine, as tenne great drinkers could not drinke so much; and that therewith he had two wonderfull properties: the one was, that how much soeuer he dranke, he was neuer drunke; the other that when it pleased him, he could pisse as fast as he did drinke, without containing any iot within his bodie: wherefore the Emperor AVRELIANVS was wont to say of him, that BONOSVS was not borne to liue, but to drinke.

Proclus was fame by his owne Souldiers.

After that PROBVS had defeated these two great Captains and Tyrants, it might haue bin held reasonable, that Arms should haue giuen him leaue to haue reposed himselfe in Rome; for now his yeeres and trauailes required no lesse: but it hapned otherwise; for the Nations and people which he left (as we haue sayd) to inhabit Thracia, notwithstanding that the Bastarnari remained in peace and quiet: yet the Vandales and other Nations seeing the Emperour pestered in the warres (trusting in their strength and multitude) resolued to make no longer abode there, but to inuade all the Prouinces of the Empire, robbing and stealing all they could lay hands vpon: and their number was so great, that no City or Countrey could make head against them, but they spoiled and burned all where soeuer they came. Which, when the Emperour had well considered, imagining that whatsoeuer he had formerly done for the good and liberty of the Empire, was to no effect or purpose if he suffered this plague to goe on, hee resolued to put himself in hazard, and to go in person into al those parts which these people inuaded. And for that (by reason of their multitudes) they could not march together, he fought with them in sundry places: wherein many were slaine of either side, and the Emperor himself was sometime wounded, and in danger of death. But in the end he ouercame them all, and took such order, that he compelled those which by flight escaped from the battels, to flee out of the confines and frontiers of the Empire. And, very joyfull and victorious, finding now no resistance in the world, hee came to Rome; whereinto hee entred in triumphy which truely was well deserued: for, in Rome there was a law that the triumph should not be granted but for great victories obtained. Which being so, I see not that either CÆSAR or POMPEY could or did better deserue it, than PROBVS. For, if we consider the number of battels and victories (although they be not at large described) which he fought and wanne before that he was Emperor, and those also after; I knowe not when we should make an end of reciting them.

Probus came into Rome in triumph.

There was neuer a Prouince in the Empire when it was furthest extended, which was not conquered anew or pacified, and brought into subiection by him. CÆSAR was much commended for expedition, surprising his enemies suddenly and vnprouided: PROBVS was no lesse diligent and actiue than CÆSAR; and although his enemies were prouided for him, yet he ouerthrew them and put them to flight. It is said, that CÆSAR slue in diuerse battails a-boue a million of men: and PROBVS, in the first warre hee made being Emperor, slue foure hundred thousand; and France (wherein CÆSAR made warre ten yeers before he could subdue it) PROBVS conquered in one yeer. As for the other battels which he fought when hee was but a Commander, I hold the number of those which were slain therein, as innumerable as the wars were dangerous and desperate. But if we come to the ciuill wars which CÆSAR made against the Romans; I conceiue those which PROBVS maintained against three tyrants with their ould Legions, to be no way inferiour. So as I knowe no reason why wee should not as much extoll the actions of some of those Emperors, as of POMPEY or CÆSAR. But, not to swarue from the common opinion, against which we may not contend, giuing to CÆSAR and such excellent men the first place; yet it is reason we should also make an honourable mention of those which were vertuous and valiant, and that we should preserue the memoriall of them for an example to posterity. Which wanted no other thing (as I said in the beginning) but Writers; who might eloquently, and in a good stile, haue particularly written their acts, which the others had: for, if of PROBVS, and of some others of whom we haue already treated, and are to treat hereafter, there had been any which had eloquently written the Histories, relating all their acts and valiant deeds in particular (their bold attempts, their counsels, their orations, their aduertisements, their wonderfull policies, stratagems, and other matters of importance) which, doubtlesse hapned without number in such and so great enterprises and battels; wee should not onely bee content to giue vnto these men the second place, but peraduenture wee should contend for the first; considering, they were no lesse excellent in vertue and bountie, than in Arms and valour.

A comparison betwixt Probus and Iulius Cæsar.

Probus his triumph in Rome.

But, leauing this disputation apart (for, in the end, the world will giue Sentence in the behalf of CÆSAR, and of those famous men of antient times) our PROBVS entred Rome, triumphing of the Germans, of the Blemij, and of many other Nations and Tyrants. His triumph was most solemn; and his men of warre entred with him: among which were Germans, Spaniards, and other Nations which had serued him in the warres, as well as the Romans. There were also some excellent and great Captains: of which the most noble were, LEONIDES, DIOCLESIANVS, CARVS, CONSTANTINVS, ANABALLIANVS, MAXIMINIANVS, PISONIANVS, HERCVLEVS, CECROPIVS, and others; whereof some were afterwards Emperors.

This triumph being ended, the next day (according to the antient custome) began the feasts, games and sports; wherein were huntings of sauage beasts; more, and more strange, than euer before that time were seen in Rome: for which purpose he caused, in a place called Circulus Maximus, a great Groue of wood and a Mountain to bee made, full of very great trees; set in such sort, that they seemed naturally to haue growne there. The place was so capable and so large, that therein were hunted a thousand Ostriches, a thousand Stags, a thousand mountain Goats, a thousand wilde Boars, a thousand fallow Deer, and other kindes of beasts: and the people were permitted to kill and take thereof at their pleasure. Afterwards there were killed with Lances three hundred Bears; and, in a maner, as many Lions, of those of Libya and of Syria: which was a spectacle representing more maiesty and greatnes, than delight or pleasure.

The next day came three hundred Sword-plaiers; which were men (as wee haue alreadie said) who slue one another to make the people sport; and those which suruiued, gained reward and liberty.

These feasts being ended, the Emperor made certain laws, and took care for the good gouernment of the Empire; and all men liued in such peace and quietnes, that PROBVS vsed to say, that he would speedily take such a course, that there should be no more neede of any men of war. Wherfore, as also for that he would neuer suffer his soldiers to be idle, but imploid them in labours and necessarie edifices, they began to hate him and to wish his death; as men which had been accustomed to robbe and steale, and to liue licentiously. And hauing taken order for all matters concerning a peaceable gouernment, he determined to goe into the East, to subdue and wholly to subuert the kingdome of the Persians and Parthians: for there now remained no other power that he needed to care for, to confirme that peace which hee resolued to settle through the Empire. And vndertaking this enterprise, with greater preparation, then euer was made in any other (for now nothing letted him) it seeming to his souldiers that it was not good to haue a Prince so valiant, in whose time they were compelled to liue in such subiection and were punished, and could not follow their old course and former libertie; they resolued to kill him; and in secret many of them conspired against him: So as when hee passed through Sluonia, they murthered him by treason; when he had raigned (after EVTROPIVS) sixe yeeres and foure moneths; which (as I said of AVRELIANVS) was a very short space, for the accomplishing of such and so great acts and enterprises, as his were. And some authors write that he raigned not so long. His death was much lamented in Rome, both by the Senate and Roman people. The armie stood not vpon the punishing of the offenders; for no man durst attempt the same: but they erected to this inuincible Emperor a most honorable Sepulchre, whereon was engrauen this Epitaphe.

Proclus slaine by his owne soldiers.

Here lieth the Emperor PROBVS; iustly for his goodnesse called PROBVS; of all the barbarous nations and tyrants a Conqueror.

This passed (as EVSEBIVS testifieth) in the yeere of our Lord 285. He left neither sonne nor kinseman that durst make challenge to the Empire: and so there remained not any man that sought to eternize the memorie of so great and excellent a man.

THE LIFE OF CARVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND ONE and fortith Emperor of Rome. And of CARINVS and NVMERIANVS, his sonnes, which were also called AVGVSTI.

NOW were the souldiers againe in possession of authority to chuse Emperors. For, as it appeareth by the processe of this Historie, they euer hated that Emperour which was chosen by the Senat. And although that in diuers parts of the Empire there were Armies and ordinary Legions; yet that Armie wherein the Emperor was at the time of his death euer pretended to haue greatest right: and he that was chosen by them, seemed to haue the best title, and was held for right Emperor. And for as much as PROBVS was dead and buried, as we haue said, the souldiers began to consult about the election of a new Emperor: and they all desired to make choise of such a man as might seeme to deserue the same; so as neither the Senate nor other Armies should haue any just cause to except at his election. And in the opinion of the greatest part, CARVS (whom PROBVS had made Pretorian Prefect) was thought very sufficient, as well for that he was a man of great worth, as for that he was of great experience in gouernment, by reason of the charge and offices which he had held: and finally they chose him Emperor, and sware obedience vnto him, to the great good liking of the whole Armie.

The men of warr euer hated those Emperors, which were chosen by the Senate.

Carus chosen Emperor.

When his election was published in Rome, the Senate was nothing pleased therewith: not in respect of himselfe; for of his good conditions and vertues they were very well assured; but for that he had two sonnes, the eldest of which expected to be his successor, whose name was CARINVS, who was a wicked and most vicious man: but they durst not denie their obedience, and so approued his election, through the desire they had to preserue the peace and quietnes wherein PROBVS had then left them. Whence, or of what countrie this Emperor CARVS was, I finde not written in any author. FABIVS CECILIANVS, which wrote the Historie of his time (as VOPISCVS reporteth) saith, that he was borne in Slauonia, but by descent he was an African. ONESIMVS saith, that he was born in Rome, and that his father was a Slauon; neuertheless, he was held for a Roman: which he sheweth in some letters that are by VOPISCVS mentioned. But AVRELIVS VICTOR, EVSEBIVS, and PAVLVS OROSIVS make him a Frenchman, born in Narbone. It little importeth whence he was: but as soone as he was chosen Emperour, hee made his two sonnes CÆSARS, CARINVS and NVMERIANVS, with the name and authoritie of AVGVSTI, and hee receiued them as his companions in the Empire. NVMERIANVS was valiant, wise, learned, a great Musician, and a Poet: But CARINVS was wicked, dishonest, insolent, and giuen to all kinde of vice.

Hauing ended these things, he presently began to make most diligent search for those which had murthered PROBVS; whom he seuerely punished: which, together with the loue which PROBVS in his life time did shew him, took away the suspicion which some conceiued that he had been consenting to his death. Hauing done iustice, and written his ordinary letters to the Senate, he marched with his Armie to make warre against the Sarmates, who as soone as they vnderstood that PROBVS was dead, came with great furie into Pannonia, and with such pride, as they threatned all Italy, and the rest of the Empire: where, after some conflicts, he came to a battaile, wherein he had the victorie, slue of them sixteene thousand, took twentie thousand prisoners, and put the rest to flight.

Carus his victory against the Sarmates.

After this victorie, he vnderstood that in the East, the Persians made some alterations. Wherefore, to effect what PROBVS had intended, he resolued to march presently thither, leauing to his eldest sonne CARINVS the gouernment of France and Spaine, and NVMERIANVS, he took with himselfe; and went with such power and so great an Armie, as he presently tooke all the countrie of Mesopotamia, meeting not any man to make defence or head against him. And passing further, he besieged the Citie of Thesiphonte, where the Persians sallied forth to encounter him with a sufficient Armie, between which (as EVTROPIVS writeth) was a most cruell battaile; wherein CARVS ouerthrew them; and following his victorie, he tooke by force the famous Cities of Selencia and Thesiphonte. And as he was of a great spirit, and experience in the warres (if death had not surprised him) it was then conceiued, that he would haue wholly ruined the power of the Persians: for at that time they were at ciuill warres among themselues. But comming with his Armie to the bankes of the riuer Tigris; through his trauell and heate, he fell extremely sick. Wherwith being much oppressed, there happened one day a great tempest of thunder and lightning, and there fell a thunderbolt into the Emperors tent, wherewith some of those which were about him were slaine, and among them the Emperour himselfe, having raigned but two yeares, which hee spent in continuall travaile and warres, in the yeere of our Lord 287, in the beginning thereof. Notwithstanding that CARVS was a great and mighty Prince, yet the thunderbolt had no respect of him; and I see, that those good Princes had as ill fortune as the most base and wicked. I haue read the Chronicles of Kings, and of other great Princes of many Kingdomes and Provinces: but I never heard nor read, that the like deaths ever happened vnto any as to the Romane Emperours, at least so commonly: for it is certaine, that no kinde of death, how vile or strange soever, but hath bin inflicted vpon some Romane Emperour. For amongst them, some have bin slaine by treason, and commonly by the sword: some by thunderbolts from heaven, as CARVS: some were burnt with fire, as we will tell you of VAIENS: Others were hanged, as before we told you of

Carus ouerthrew the Persians.

Carus slain with a thunderbolt.

Sundry kindes of death hapned to the Roman Emperors.

BONO-

BONOSVS, who was called Emperor in the time of PROBVS; and before him, old GORDIANVS in Africa: others tormented and dragged along the ground, as we told you of HELIOGABALVS and VITELLIVS: others were poisoned, as some before named: others Captiues and throwne into prison, like most base and vile slaues, and so VALERIANVS dyed: others opened their veines and bled to death, as QVINTILIVS and FLORIANVS: others vvere drowned, as DECIVS; and to others hapned other kinds of death. So as hauing not written the liues of aboue forty or forty one Emperors, it seemeth that death hath made experience in them, that there be as many conditions of death, as of dead men: among which may be numbred the deaths of CARINVS and NVMERIANVS, sonnes to the Emperor CARVS, who were called AVGVSTI: from whose life we will presently begin; and the processe of the history will shew others no lesse strange and fearefull.

Of CARVS his two sonnes, which he made CÆSARS with power and authority of AVGVSTI; the younger, whose name was NVMERIANVS, was with his father when hee dyed: who as well for the worth and deserts of his father, as for his owne, was much beloued of all the Armie and Romane people: wherefore by common consent, as soone as his father was dead, he was chosen Emperour, and for such was generally obeyed. He was maried to the daughter of a rich and mightie man, whose name was ARRIVS APER. This new Emperour greatly lamenting the death of his father, and imagining that in that warre at that time there was no more to be done, raised his Camp, and began to retire: and for that he was diseased in his eies, and could not endure the light; he made himselfe to be caried in a close Litter, so as he could not be seene. But as the desire to raigne is the most violent of all other passions; so his father in law ARRIVS APER forgetting the dutie which he ought to his soueraigne Lord, and the loue to his daughter and sonne in lawe, resolued to kill him, and by meanes of his great wealth and friends to procure the Empire for himselfe: which he might easily bring to passe, for that he was allowed to come to him when he pleased: so as by his hand (or some other mans by his direction) NVMERIANVS was slaine in his Litter; and to the end it should not be reuealed, they left him therein: and giuing it out that hee could not indure to see any man, they caried him dead two or three daies, practising in the meane time what they had proiected: but as the dead bodie began to smell, the treason was discouered sooner then ARRIVS would, and there was so great a confusion and sorrow in the whole Armie, that euery man took Armes and said, that they would choose an Emperour which should punish so great a treason. But first of all ARRIVS APER was brought prisoner before the Imperiall Iudgement seat: for it was presently knowne that he had committed this murther.

Numerianus slaine by his father in lawe.

The Armie being in this confusion and tumult, by the common consent of all men DIOCLESIANVS was chosen and saluted Emperour, who was the chief man in the Armie, and one of the most excellent Captaines in the time of PROBVS: he was (as it were) the Emperours steward, and had the rule and gouernment of his household. He was borne in Dalmatia of obscure parentage, in so much as some say that his father was a Notarie: and others say, that he was the sonne of a bondman. But he was a man of a great courage, very wise, a great defender and louer of the common-wealth, of a quicke wit and vnderstanding to make prouision for any occasion that might be offered, according to the time and season: and was of great experience in affaires and charges of importance. He was also a man of high conceites, which he put in execution; but with great wisedome and discretion.

Diocletianus chosen Emperour.

DIOCLESIANVS seeing himselfe called by all men Emperour, with great courage accepted the Empire: and clothing himselfe with the Imperiall robe, he set him in the tribunall seate; and being saluted AVGVSTVS, the first thing he did, was to make inquirie, how NVMERIANVS came to his death, notwithstanding that he alreadie knew the same. The treason and practice being discouered vnto him, he made the wicked ARRIVS APER to be brought before him; and with his owne sword slew him; so much was he displeased therewith: And afterwards he made those which were his complices and partakers to be slaine. In this manner was the death of the good Emperour NVMERIANVS reuenged. CARINVS the other brother, who was left CÆSAR and was gouernour of France and Spaine, was very vnlike vnto him: for as this was noble, vertuous and giuen to all vertuous actions and exercises; and besides all his other excellencies, we read, he was the best poet of his time, and an excellent Orator; so was CARINVS dishonest, luxurious, an adulterer, and giuen to all kind of vice: wherfore, he was generally abhorred of all men; in so much that his own father hated him, and being aduertised of his behauiour, said, he held him not his sonne, purposing to depriue him of the Empire.

Hee

He then remaining in France, hauing put from him all the good and vertuous men which his father left with him, conuersing altogether with such as himselfe vnderstood of the death of his father, and of his brother, and also of DIOCLESIANVS his election. And as (although wicked and vitious) he was valiant and of great courage, without amending any of his euil conditions, but rather with his liberty encreasing the same; so he leuied the greatest forces he was able, and with great diligence made prouision to make head against DIOCLESIANVS, hoping to remaine sole Emperor. Whereof when DIOCLESIANVS was aduertised, he with great expedition came out of the East into France against him. And as of either side there was both great power and courage; so they had sundry skirmishes, which were very fierce and cruell; but in the end, each of them setting vp his rest, they came to a battell, which was the last and most cruell; wherein CARINVS was justly ouerthrowne and slain. And in this manner remained DIOCLESIANVS at that time sole Lord and Emperor, which was in the yeer of our Lord 288.

THE LIFE OF DIOCLESIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND OF MAXIMINIANVS, THE TWO AND FORTITH EMPEROVR OF ROME.

DIocletianus, for his vertue, deserued the dignitie of the Romane Empire: to whom the gouernment seeming heauie and burthensome, he took for his assistant and companion Maximinianus; who carried himselfe with such loue, loyaltie and so much reuerence towards him, and he towards Maximinianus, as they seemed to be rather two most louing brothers then Emperors. He made Constance and Galerius Armentarius, Cæsars; to which hee gaue the charge of managing sundrie warres, which he could not himselfe follow in person: and hauing obtained many victories, and triumphed together with his Cæsars and his Augustus; in the end he resolued to leaue the Empire, being growne old; and he perswaded Maximinianus to doe the like; wherewith he was well content, and neuer after could be induced againe to accept of that dignitie and gouernment; notwithstanding that he was by many men much entreated. He was very cruell against the Christians and destroyed many of their Churches, because they should not haue conuenient meanes and places to assemble together. In the end being very old, it is said that he killed himselfe with poyson, for feare to be put to some soarefull death. An end vnworthy truly of his glorious life.

THE originall of DIOCLESIANVS, and the manner of his election we haue aboue expressed; together with his wisedome and valour: It remaineth now to declare the successe of his life, and acts, in such manner, as PAVLVS OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, and other ancient authors haue left it in wrighting. Before which I will tell you one thing of DIOCLESIANVS, which I doe not vse to obserue in the liues of other Emperours, for that I hold it a vaine thing; although recorded by those authors which I follow in this Historie: which was, the augurie or forewarning that each of them had, that he should be Emperor before he was so. Which I will set down for that it seemeth pleasing; and a little to withdraw the readers minde from too much thinking of serious matters, of greater importance. FLAVIVS VOPISCVS writeth in in the life of NVMERIANVS, sonne to the Emperor CARVS, that DIOCLESIANVS being a poore souldier, and in his youth seruing in the warres of France, was lodged in a womans house which was a Magician or southsayer; or as we say, a cunning-woman, one of those which by the French-men were called Druides: Which woman was his hostesse and did dresse his meate. And making his reckoning with her for his diet (which he did euery day) as he was very sparing of his purse, this woman said vnto him; Thou art very sparing with me DIOCLESIAN, and truely art too very a niggard. DIOCLESIAN in iest answered her; Pardon me in that I am so sparing in my expences, for I am but a poore souldier: but I promise thee, that when I am an Emperor, I will be very liberall vnto thee. Quoth this woman vnto him; Do not iest with me: for thou shalt be Emperor when thou hast slaine a Boare. DIOCLESIAN took this for a iest: and, as he was of a very hautie mind, he neuer forgat these speeches: and although that he alwaies followed the warres, yet he gaue himselfe much to hunting, and to kill wilde Boares; mou'd thereto by her words. Afterwards in processe of time, AVRELIANVS, PROBVS, TACITVS and CARVS came to be Emperors, and he had already killed and daily did kill Boares; and sometime vsed to iest at the prophecie of this Druid, saying; I doe daily kill wilde Boares, but others eate the flesh. At the last, when with his own hands he had slaine the father in law to NVMERIANVS, whose name was APER, which signifieth a Boare; it is written that he then said; Now is my prophecy expired and accomplished: for I haue killed the Boare which did prognosticate to me the Empire: and so he held the Druids prophecy fulfilled. It is said, that he came downe from his throne of purpose to kill ARRIVS APER with his owne hand: although it seemed not fitting his greatnes to do so vile a deede, yet he did it to confirm the prophecy. It is so written by these authors: and although I thinke not but that it happened so; yet I hold it but a iest: for this Southsayer did not know what she said, and this which hapned was but by chance; and so much the more, for that DIOCLESIAN was not made Emperor when he had killed one Boare, but after that he had slaine many: and in the end he was made Emperor when he had slain a man whose name was APER, which in English signifieth a Boare. And for that all the prophecies which I finde written of these Emperors are after this manner, I forbeare to write them: for that they bring no fruit with them, but rather hurt and danger, inticing Christians to haue regard to Southsayings; a thing truly very pernicious, which the infidels obserued through the instigation of the diuell. As soone as DIOCLESIAN saw himselfe free from the warres of CARINVS, beginning to take the gouernment of the Empire into his hands, an infinite number of people which were laborers and pezants, rebelled in France, in manner of a communalty; the captaines were men fitting their humors, whose names were AMANDVS and HELIENVS: wherfore accounting that war vnworthy of himselfe, he sent thither MAXIMINIANVS, whom he had already made CÆSAR, for that hee was a man of much worth and very valiant in Armes, who (although with great danger) put to flight and slew a great number of them, so as all places there were in peace and quietnes. But other wars and tyrants rising, holding himselfe alone insufficient for so great a charge, he now made MAXIMINIANVS (whom before he had made CÆSAR) AVGVSTVS, Emperor his companion and equall with himselfe in the Empire; as some other Emperors had done the like. And truly it was a wonderfull matter to see, that they agreed so well together: for MAXIMINVS was not only a good and loyall companion in the Empire, but there was neuer any son more obedient vnto his father, then he was to DIOCLESIAN; and so in loue and concord they gouerned the Empire a great space, and obtained many noble victories against their enemies. When DIOCLESIAN had made this choise, he took his way towards the East, for that there was a certain Captayn in Egypt, whose name was ACHILLEVS, who had seised on that kingdom, and was called Emperor, being mighty and of very great power; and MAXIMINIANVS went also into Africa, where all the legions and old soldiers were drawn together in a mutinie, and so other nations with their Captains very orderly rose with the countries, and enioyed the rents and tributes; and these for their continuance were called QVINGENTIANI or QVINQVAGENARII. These two enterprises were held to be most important, wherein they had good successe, as we will presently declare. But before those wars began, there hapned other of no lesse importance: for a principall captain called CRAVSIVS, or (as others say) CARAVSIVS, rebelled in Britanny, possessed himself of that Iland, and was called Emperor. And NARSEVS King of Persia and Armenia, taking the benefit of the time, began to war against the Empire, and inuaded Mesopotamia. One IVLIANVS also in Italy rebelled, and would haue made himselfe Emperour: But seeing how small meanes he had to maintaine the same, he stabbed himselfe with his poinlard, and fell into a fire; as AVRELIVVS VICTOR reporteth. For which occasions the two Emperours agreed that each of them should name one to be CÆSAR and his successor, which should be such a man, as should be of qualitie able to helpe to preserue and defend the Empire, which they did: and DIOCLESIAN chose one GALERIVS MAXIMINVS, who by his surname was called ARMENTARIVS. This man was of so base a linage, that they report him to be the sonne of a Cowheard, and born in Dacia; but was a most valiant man, very wise, and an excellent Captain; yet very seuere, and of a churlish disposition. MAXIMINIANVS named another called CONSTANTIVS, and by his surname CLORVS; a man very vertuous, wise, a valiant Captain, and a Roman Gentleman, born of high and Noble parentage. His fathers name was EVTROPIVS, and his mothers CLAVDIA; Neece to the Emperour CLAVDIVS who had the great victory against the Gothes: and, to bee the better assured of them, they caused them to put away the wiues they had, and to marrie others. CONSTANTIVS did put away HELEN, by whom hee had already one sonne called CONSTANTINE, who afterwards was an excellent Emperor; and he married with THEODOSIA, the daughter-in-law of MAXIMINIANVS.

Constantius Clorus made Cæsar by Maximinianus.

When they had made this prouision, diuided the Empire among them, and leuied their Armies, the Emperor MAXIMINIANVS went into Africa; and DIOCLESIAN into Egypt, against ACHILLEVS. GALERIVS ARMENTARIVS went into the East against the Persians. CONSTANTIVS CLORVS CÆSAR remained in France, to make head against CARAVSIVS, who called himself Emperor in Britannie; and against the incursions of the Northerly Nations. Which warres, although some of them hapned at one instant and together, I will relate in such manner as shall seem most expedient. And to begin with the Emperors: I say, that DIOCLESIAN being arriued in Egypt, ACHILLEVS attended his coming with a great and mighty Armie: and joyning battell (notwithstanding that ACHILLEVS fought very valiantly) DIOCLESIAN had the victorie; and ACHILLEVS, saluing himself by flight, recouered the City of Alexandria: where, seeking to repair his forces, hee was besieged by DIOCLESIAN; and in the time of eight moneths (for, so long the siege lasted) there hapned many battels, skirmishes, and encounters: but in the end the City was taken by force, and ACHILLEVS by DIOCLESIAN'S commandement was cast to be deuoured by Lions and other wilde Beasts. And so in all that Kingdom he vsed cruell & extreme punishments, putting to death many thousands of men; but principally of those which had bin leaders and motiues of this rebellion, or had consented thereto.

MAXIMINIANVS the other Emperor, who went into Africa against the Quingentiani, in the beginning warred very doubtfully, and with great difficulty: but the greatest part of that people fighting with his power, he vanquished, and constrained the rest to sue for peace; and afterwards went into diuerse parts, destroying the tyrants and theeues which were in those Countries: wherefore he was called MAXIMINIANVS HERCVLEVS, for that HERCVLES trauelled many parts of the world, doing the like. And DIOCLESIAN by a new surname was called IOVIVS, of IVPITER; who, they said, did ouercome and kill the Giants. And so hee and his companions (in his name) ouercame and slew the tyrants. The other wars made by the CÆSARS proued not so well at first: for, CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, who was left to make head against CARAVSIVS; as CARAVSIVS was valiant and wily, and possessed of all Brittannie, so could he no way preuail against him, but was rather forced by the Germans that came down against him, to conclude a peace with CARAVSIVS. And so CARAVSIVS remained peaceable Lord of Britannie 7 yeers. Yet afterwards his companion and familiar friend called ALECTVS, slue him, and took the rule of the countrey to himself, which he held 3 yeers. But he at last was ouerthrown and slain by ASCLEPIODOTVS, or ASCLEPIVS DOTVS, a Pretorian Prefect: and so Britanny was again recouered, after it had bin vsurped by rebels 10 yeers. When CONSTANTIVS made peace with CARAVSIVS, hee had a dangerous war with the Germans & barbarous nations: with whom, among other battels, he fought one very memorable; wherein, in one same day, he was ouerthrown, and Conqueror; which hapned thus: Coming to a battell with them in the morning, neer a city of the Ligones or Cigones in Gallia Belgica, part whereof is now called Flanders; his troops fought so ill, as they were constrained to turn their backs, and to retire to the City: and CONSTANTIVS CLORVS was forced to do the like. But when he came to the gates of the City, he found them fast locked; and was in such a streight, that if they had not let downe a rope wherewith hee was drawn ouer the wall into the City, he had then been slain by the enemie. When he was within the

the city he call'd the souldiers together, and made such a speech vnto them, as they were greatly ashamed at their dishonor: so as in the euening within fiue houres after the first fight (the enemy mistrusting no such matter) he commanded all the gates to be opened, and sallied out suddenly, setting vpon his enemies with such courage, that after a long fight they were ouerthrown and cut in peeces, being fewe lesse then 60000 men.

In like manner hapned many great accidents to CONSTANTIVS in those parts. And while as DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMINIAN. Emperors, and CONSTANTIVS CÆSAR followed these warres, GALERIVS began a warre no lesse dangerous, against NARSEVS King of Persia: against whom (as we haue said) he went. For, besides that it continued long, there were many men slaine on eyther side, without any aduantage or hope of victory to either party, vntill at the last they came with their whole power to a set battaile neere to the city of Carrãs; into which GALERIVS CÆSAR entred with lesser forces then hee ought to haue done or was requisite: and fighting with greater courage then discretion, hee was ouerthrowne, and losing almost his whole Armie, he escaped by flight. Wherat the Emperor DIOCLESIAN was so much grieued, that GALERIVS coming to his presence into Mesopotamia, meeting him vpon the way alighted from his horse, and came to the litter wherein the Emperor was, to do him honor: but DIOCLESIAN suffered him to go a great while ouer the fields on foote, without staying or willing him to take his horse; blaming him, that he had with so little discretion suffered himselfe to be ouerthrowne in battaile. In the end, he gaue him leaue to depart, inioyning him to leuie a new Armie, and to endeuor to recouer his lost honor, and to defend his prouince. Which GALERIVS (parting from him much ashamed) with all diligence put in execution; DIOCLESIAN remaining with his troups in Mesopotamia in the meane time, to the end the Persians should not inuade it. And so GALERIVS with all speede went into Europe to leuie souldiers; and bringing with him the legions of Slauonia, Dacia, and Mesia, he returned into Asia, and went into the greater Armenia, whither NARSEVS the King of the Persians, by whom he had been ouerthrowne, was already come, with whom hee beganne the warre againe in very good order, with good aduice, and no lesse courage. The two Armies came so neere the one to the other, as by a mutuall consent of their Generals they ioyned battaile: The one presuming on the victorie past, and to preserue the honor which they had gotten; and the other to recouer their losses. And so the souldiers for these reasons, fought with incredible courage and resolution; which made the battaile very cruell and bloudie: But the Romane Armie consisting of more choise men, and better trained, obtained the victorie; but not without great difficultie and danger. The King escaped by flight, and GALERIVS following the execution entred his camp; where he found great riches, and tooke his wiues, his children, his sisters, and many Noble and principall men of the Kingdome of Persia. And marching forwards with his forces, he inuaded his countrie, and did great spoile therein, not finding any man that durst to make resistance against him. And from thence he went into Mesopotamia to see DIOCLESIAN, where he was receiued as in a triumph: and DIOCLESIAN himselfe went to meete him, and entertained and embraced him cheerefully, doing him great honor.

All matters in the East being pacified, and the Persians & Parthians ouerthrown; hauing therin spent many yeers, they returned into Europe, where MAXIMINIANVS, called HERCVLEVS, Emperor and his companion, and CONSTANTIVS CÆSAR were, who were busied in the wars before recited; all being (in truth) gouerned and directed by the wisedome of DIOCLESIAN: whose valour, policie, and courage was such, as there was not any that durst disobay him, no not his equall MAXIMINIANVS; so as they all seemed to be his sons and his Captains, rather then Emperors and his companions.

These men held the Empire in peace in three parts, to wit, East, West, and South: but the Northerly parts could neuer be throughly subdued, as well for their fierceneſs, courage, and valor, as for that when they were ouerthrown and put to flight, they withdrew themselues into most cold, barren, and inaccessible places, which they could well indure being born vnder that climate: so as the Roman Captaines held it impossible to passeany further with their Armies, contenting themselues to haue chased them out of the bounds of the Empire; but they would afterwards returne again with more furie then at the first, and were euer troublesom and feared. Now the Scythians, the Goths, the Sarmates, the Alans, the Carpi, the Catti, the Quades, and other nations in great numbers assembling themselues, with a desire to rob and steale, and to inhabit some more fertile soile, began to make war and did great spoile in the territories of the Empire; against whom the Emperors and their two CÆSARS marched with their Armies: and dispersing themselues into sundrie parts they followed the wars, although not without losse and great difficultie, the one helping and assisting the other. In the end they all obtained victorie, and the barbarous nations were repulsed, and many thousands of them were taken prisoners: and afterwards being set at libertie, certain Prouinces, which by the wars were dispeopled were giuen them to inhabit. DIOCLESIAN hauing obtained this victorie and many other, and hauing settled peace in the Empire by the industrie of himselfe, of MAXIMINIANVS his companion in the Empire, and of GALERIVS & CONSTANTIVS who were CÆSARS; now willing to enioy the accustomed reward of victories, he came to Rome, where he entred in triumph together with the Emperor MAXIMINIANVS, and the two CÆSARS aforesaid, where was made vnto them one of the most stately triumphs that euer was seene in Rome, wherein was an infinite masse of treasure of the spoile of the East, of Egypt, and of other nations by them subdued: there were chariots full of arms, and of vessels of gold, and siluer; and there also wereled prisoners the wife and children of the King of Persia, with many other Kings and Captaines of sundrie armies of the Alanes, of the Catti and others, which was in the eighteenth yeer of the raign of DIOCLESIAN: for so long was the time that he had been busied in the wars, and in prouiding and giuing order for such things as were done therin. This DIOCLESIAN was so wise, so politick and so valiant in the gouernment of the Empire, as no Emperor either before or after him, held the Empire in the like subjection: for MAXIMINIANVS obeyed him as his father, and GALERIVS & CONSTANTIVS as their Lord, and so he was honored and reuerenced more like a King, then an Emperor; and he would haue his subjects adore him, and do him reuerence kneeling vpon the ground, after the maner of the Kings of Persia. And as the custome of the Emperors in former time was, when they were intreated by any eminent men to giue them their hands to kisse, they, raising them vp, gaue them peace with their lips on the cheeke, and meane men vsed to kisse their knees: but DIOCLESIAN commanded by a publike edict, that without any difference all men should kisse his foote prostrate vpon the earth; and for the greater reuerence, he made his shooes to be set with pearle and stone of great worth: And in the top of this his great prosperity, by the instigation of the Diuel, he resolued to persecute the Christians, and this was the 11th generall persecution of the primitiue Church after NERO, and cruellest of them all, and lasted longer then any other, for it continued 10 yeers. The Christians had liued in rest and libertie many yeers after the persecution of AVRELIANVS, and the number of them and of their Churches was now so great, that in all the cities of the Empire and out of it there was a great concourse of people, and their Churches were much frequented: with which rest and tranquillitie (as EVSEBIVS, who was a christian author of those times reporteth) the ceremonies and discipline of the Church began to bee corrupt, and feruent deuotion began to wax cold, enuie and contention growing between the Bishops. There was such discord among them, that (as he conceiueth) God did justly suffer the persecution which then happened, which in truth was so cruell, as no tongue is able to expresse the same: Wherefore well saith the same EVSEBIVS, who was present and saw the same, that hee cannot thoroughly expresse with wordes all that which hee saw with his eyes. And both hee and PAVLVS OROSIVS write such things, which were of that qualitie, as there can be no heart so hard, but will haue compassion, and bee grieued to heare what they haue written: So as it is wonderfull to consider of the patience and constancie of the persecuted, and of the rage and crueltie of those which persecuted them.

The eleuenth Persecution.

In generall, DIOCLESIAN endeuoured to destroy all the Churches and Temples of the Christians, to the end they should not assemble to pray and to vse diuine seruice, and hee burnt all the bookes he could get of the holy scriptures, and would not permit that any man of what condition soeuer, if he were a Christian, should hold any office or Magistracy: and if he were already aduanced to any, he should be depriued and held for infamous, if he escaped with his life. The souldiers and men of warre, being Christians, which would not renounce their faith, were cassiered, and depriued of all military honour, and some of their liues. The Bishops and Prelates were spoiled of that which they had, and many of them slaine and martyred, and a slaue which was a Christian could by no meanes obtaine his freedom. This was common in all the prouinces of the Empire: but particularly in some of them was committed very great crueltie, as in Phrygia, in Egypt, in Syria, and in other parts. Some were fleyed aliue, others were torne with iron combes: and so their skins being rent, they were returned to the prisons, prisons, where they were lodged vpon tile stones, and the sheards of broken pots, to the end that their rest should be more cruell and terrible then their martyrdome. Honest and delicate women, but strong and constant in Faith, were hanged vp by the feete as naked as they were borne, to the end that their life should continue for a space with shame and double torment. Others had their eares, noses, lips, hands, fingers, and feete cut off, hauing onely their eyes left, for a greater torment, and martyrdome vnto them: For others, they with great force bowed downe great armies and boughs of Trees, and fastned the one leg to one bough, and the other leg to another; and then letting loose the said boughes with the force thereof the bodies were rent in sunder. Betweene the nailes of the fingers and toes, which are very sensible and tender parts, they thrust thornes and splinters of Canes. Vpon other men, being naked, they cast melted lead and tinne, wherewith they indured most cruell torments. Finally, there were vsed against the Christians such torments and cruelties, as the like had neuer been seen nor imagined: and the number of the murthered (during the time of this persecution) was infinite.

As DIOCLESIAN was in the height of this felicitie obeyed and feared of all the World, he resolued to doe a notable act, the like whereof was neuer obserued in any other Emperor before his time: which was, to renounce the Empire and to liue a priuate life; considering (as som write) like a wise man, the mutabilitie of all things in this life, which neuer continue in one estate; but when they are growne to their height, naturally decline and fall; Taking example by the great POMPEY, MARCVS ANTONIVS, HANNIBAL, and other great Captains and princes, who hauing attained to the highest of all felicitie and prosperitie, were afterwards throwne downe and brought low. Accounting himself also insufficient for so great a charge, by reason of his decrepit old age, and fearing to fall into contempt, he would first contemn all dominion and rule, with so many cares and troubles; and so leade a quiet life in meane estate without care or disturbance. And he was not contented to leaue the Empire himselfe, but he perswaded, and (as we may say) in a manner compelled the Emperor MAXIMINIANVS to do the like. Which between them was concluded and agreed vpon by letters and Embassies, in such sort, that both of them vpon one day, hauing gouerned the Empire the space of twentie yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord three hundred and seuen, MAXIMINIANVS being in Milan, and DIOCLESIAN in Nicomedia, renounced the Empire; and putting off their imperiall robes and ensignes, they came downe from the thrones where they sate, and made themselues equall with other particular and priuate men; First nominating and chusing for Emperors and AVGVSTI, CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, and GALERIVS ARMENTARIVS; who before were CÆSARS. Which, DIOCLESIAN did so willingly and so vnfaynedly, as he afterwards vsed to say; that he then began to liue, and saw the beautie of the sunne. And it seemeth to be true: for after that these two had left the Empire, as we haue said, he would neuer intermeddle with any matter of gouernment whatsoeuer. But all his care was to plant and set a garden, and an orchard which he had in Solonia a citie in Dalmatia, where hee was borne, and whither he retired himselfe. And afterwards in processe of time being required by his companion MAXIMINIANVS and his son in law GALERIVS, who then was Emperor, vpon some vrgent occasions which happened, againe to receiue the Empire, alleaging that it was necessarie and expedient for the common good; he would not accept thereof; but answered, that if they had seene and enioyed such quietnes and rest as he had, and the hearbs and trees which he possessed in his countrie, they would not haue sent to haue made any such request vnto him: for he had already trauailed and done enough for the common-wealth; and that now God had giuen him time to trauaile and to liue to himselfe; and that he could not put to account that he had euer liued, but since that he liued in peace and rest in his own countrie. They replying, that he ought to haue respect vnto the great acts which he had done, and not to lose the reputation of the victories which hee might haue in his owne time: Hee answered, That hauing settled his felicitie in the gifts of the minde, it was no vile or base thing, neither ought it so to be adiudged to contemne temporall riches and rule; and to professe an honest poore life; agreeing with the discipline and examples of the sage and auncient Philosophers: and so finally he would not alter his determination. It cannot be said, but that this wise Prince did well vnderstand how little worldly dominion and command is to be esteemed; seeing that with it, it bringeth so much trouble, anguish and vexation. And I doo partly beleeue, that for some good deed which hee had done, it pleased God (who leaueth no merit vnrewarded) to giue him that rest and judgement in this world; seeing that in the other life, as a cruell Infidell, he was to pay for the cruelties which he had committed againſt the Primitiue Church; and in the end gaue him ſuch a death as he had deſerued. Some ſay, that he poiſoned himſelf for feare of LICINIVS and of CONSTANTINE, who afterwards were Emperors; who in their Letters had threatned him, for that he would not come to their nuptials. Others ſay, that hee died mad, after that he had liued (as ſaith AVRELIVS VICTOR) ſeuenty and eight yeers. What death his companion MAXIMINIANVS died, I will tell you in the liues of his Succeſſors. Of two wiues which DIOCLESIAN had, I finde not that there remained any other ſonne or daughter but VALERIA, whom he married to GALERIVS ARMENTARIVS when he made him CÆSAR. Of MAXIMINIANVS remained one ſon, whoſe name was MAXENTIVS, who afterwards took the name of Emperor; whom hee had by a woman of Soria, called EVTROPIA; and one daughter named FAVSTA, whom he maried to CONSTANTINE, ſon of CONSTANTIVS CÆSAR, who afterwards was Emperor.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND OF GALERIVS ARMENTARIVS, THE THREE AND FORTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

Conſtantius Clorus & Galerius Armentarius made Emperors.

PReſently after that DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMINIAN had reſigned the Empire, CONSTANTIVS and GALERIVS without any contradiction were obeyed and accepted for Emperors, accordingly as the others had ordained; they being, as we may ſay, ſons-in-law to the two laſt Emperors: for, GALERIVS was maried to DIOCLESIAN's daughter; and CONSTANTIVS, to THEODORA the daughter-in-law of MAXIMINIANVS.

This CONSTANTIVS was a very Noble, vertuous, courteous and valiant Gentleman, both of condition and bloud: And GALERIVS although he were but of a baſe ſtock and linage, yet was hee neuertheleſſe valiant, and a ſingular good Captain; but therewith cruell, terrible, churliſh, incontinent; but well proportioned, and (as AVRELIVS VICTOR ſaith) of a comely and goodly conſtitution of body. Notwithſtanding that in conditions there was great difference betwixt them, yet DIOCLESIAN through his great wiſdome made them to liue in peace and concord; ſo as they no way diſagreed. But, he being dead, they (as wiſe men) for feare to fall out, agreed by lot to diuide the Prouinces of the Empire between them. To CONSTANTIVS befell Italie, Sicilia, and Africa, with all the Prouinces thereof, together with France, Spain, Germanie and Britannie: and to GALERIVS was allotted Slauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Theſſalia; all the Prouinces of Gracia, of Aſia, of Egypt, of Soria, and all the Eaſt, and the Ilands therein.

This

This diuiſion being made, it ſeemed a great charge and a burden to the milde condition of CONSTANTIVS CLORVS, To haue the gouernment of ſo many Prouinces as fell to his ſhare: for, he rather deſired to gouern well, than to gouern much; and therefore renounced to GALERIVS the Prouinces of Africa, and of Italie, contenting himſelf with France, Spain, and the Iles of Britannie. Truely he had reaſon, ſeeing that one of theſe Kings at this day is held for one of the moſt mighty Potentates of the world: ſo as that part which CONSTANTIVS did hould for the ſmall time he liued, he gouerned very wiſely and vprightly, to the great good and content of the ſubiects; and was ſo highly eſteemed and beloued, that in his time there was not any warre or rebellion in any of thoſe Prouinces. He did much honour and fauour the Chriſtians, and would not conſent that any violence or diſpleaſure ſhould bee done vnto any of them. He died in England of ſickneſs, after that he had been (as witneſſeth EVSEBIVS) ſixteen yeers CÆSAR, and two yeers Emperor. And in his place his ſonne CONSTANTINE (whom he had by his firſt wife called HELENA, from whom he was diuorced to marrie with the Emperor MAXIMINIANVS daughter-in-law) was choſen Emperor. The ſaid CONSTANTINE was alſo married to FAVSTA, the daughter of MAXIMINIANVS. And this was the end of CONSTANTIVS. But his companion GALERIVS hauing accepted that which he deſired not (which was Italie and Africa) and conſidering alſo that one man alone could hardly rule and gouern ſo great an eſtate well; to the end therefore that he might bee aſſiſted in the wars, and in all other accidents that might befall him, he made two CÆSARS, which were almoſt equall in dignity to himſelf: the one was called SEVERVS, whom hee ſet in the gouernment of Italie and Africa; and to the other, whoſe name was MAXIMINVS, beeing (as ſaith AVRELIVS VICTOR) his ſiſters ſonne, hee gaue the gouernment of the Eaſt; houlding to himſelf the Prouinces of Slauonia, and of Gracia, with ſupreme powr, as ſoueraign Emperor aboue the CÆSARS: ſo as by four heads the world was gouernd: which were CONSTANTINVS and GALERIVS, Emperors; and SEVERVS and MAXIMINVS, CÆSARS.

Seuerus and Maximinus made Cæſars by Galerius.

After that DIOCLESIAN and MAXIMINIAN had renounced the Empire; the Pretorian ſouldiers, who (as hath been often ſaid) remained neer to Rome, diſcontented with the gouernment of SEVERVS which ruled it (he being farre abſent from thence, going into Slauonia to ſee the Emperor GALERIVS) aſſembling themſelues in a great tumult, choſe MAXENTIVS for Emperor, who (as is ſaid) was MAXIMINIANVS his ſonne, who renounced the Empire; whom hee had by a baſe woman of Soria, called EVTROPIA: the which bred a great confuſion in the Empire, being then in peace; and there enſued ſo great troubles, as can hardly be deſcribed. When the Emperor GALERIVS vnderſtood heerof, hee commanded SEVERVS CÆSAR with all ſpeed to take his way towards Rome, where the new Tyrant MAXENTIVS was. Being incamped neer to the City, the greateſt part of his Armie (for, nouelties are euer moſt pleaſing) went ouer to MAXENTIVS: which his father MAXIMINIANVS, being then in Lucania, after he had renounced the Empire, vnderſtanding, through deſire to rule, came in great haſte to Rome, vnder pretext to counſell and aſſiſt his ſon in the gouernment; and ſent to DIOCLESIAN, deſiring him to do the like; who (as wee haue ſaid) would not accept of his counſell, but liued in peace.

The Pretorian ſouldiers diſcontent with the gouernment of Seuerus, made Maxentius their Emperor.

MAXIMINIANVS hauing receiued his anſwer, and finding himſelf to be much eſteemed, reſolued to repoſſeſſe the Empire, and to diſpoſſeſſe his ſonne; ſurmiſing, that he being in poſſeſſion of Rome, and that his ſonne-in-law CONSTANTINE raigning in Britannie, Spain and France, all would yeeld obedience to him. But his imaginations had ſo ill ſucceſſe, that hee not onely miſt of his purpoſe, but was ſo hardly dealt withall by the Pretorian Cohorts (his ſonne permitting the ſame) that he was glad to flie out of Italie into France; where his ſonne in law the good CONSTANTINE had the gouernment; who very honourably receiued him, as his father in law, and as a man which had beene Emperor. But he which had ſet his thoughts only vpon the Empire, and ſought by all meanes how he might attaine thereto, like a wicked and diſloyall father in lawe purpoſed to haue ſlaine his ſonne in law CONSTANTINE: but it pleaſed God to diſcouer his treaſon, to the end that he ſhould receiue puniſhment for the cruelties which he had vſed againſt the Chriſtians: for flying from CONSTANTINES Court he was ouertaken at Marſeilles; where hee ſought to haue embarked himſelf, and there was ſlain: and ſo MAXIMINIANVS made an vnfortunate end, his ſonne MAXENTIVS remaining Emperor and Tyrant in Rome, as is aforeſaid.

Maximinianus who had renounced the Empire, came to Rome vnder colour to giue counſell to his ſon in the gouernment of the Empire.

Maximinianus praiſed the death of his ſon-in-law Conſtantine. The Emperor Maximinianus ſlain in Marſeilles.

When GALERIVS ARMENTARIVS, who was the right Emperor, vnderſtood of the ill succeſſe and death of SEVERVS CÆSAR, whom he had ſent againſt MAXENTIVS; he reſolued in perſon to go againſt him with the greateſt power hee was able to make: and, to the end he might leaue a good guard in the Prouinces of Slauonia, hee made an excellent Captain called LICINIVS, CÆSAR; who was a man of meane condition and baſe parentage, being but the ſonne of a poor Labourer of Dacia; but very wiſe, and an excellent Captain in the warres.

This being done, and hauing taken ſuch order as was requiſite, hee departed with his Armie towards Italie, directing his journey for Rome: but by the way he was aduertiſed, that his owne ſouldiers did treat among themſelues of abandoning him, and of going ouer to MAXENTIVS; and that certain companies of ſouldiers in Italie, which vntill then had held for him, had done the like. Whereupon, fearing to be ouerthrowne, he returned to the place where he left LICINIVS; repenting alſo that he had made him CÆSAR, for that he ſaw he was of greater power and authority than he deſired he ſhould haue bin. GALERIVS being ſo returned, there grew in his flank an impoſtume; ſo noiſome and peſtilent, that no medicines or remedies whatſoeuer were of force to cure it: and it becam ſo corrupt, that there fell a number of worms from it: which did put him to ſuch intolerable pain, that he was ready in deſpair to haue killed himſelf. Seeing himſelf to dy in this manner, he made ſome of his Phyſicians, which had him in cure, to bee ſlain, becauſe they could not cure him. And now at the laſt, without any true repentance, he beganne to think that this hapned vnto him for perſecuting the Chriſtians: and therefore in great haſte, conſulting with CONSTANTINE who raigned in Britannie, France, and Spain, he commanded all lawes and edicts whatſoeuer made againſt them, to ceaſe, and to bee aboliſhed; and to that effect ſent his Letters and Decrees into all the Prouinces of Gracia, and of the Eaſt, where MAXIMINVS (who was CÆSAR for him) gouerned; which, EVSEBIVS (an Author of great truth, and an ey-witnes) ſets down verbatim. And, beſides this, he made many Chriſtians to be brought into his preſence, whom hee deſired and intreated to pray to God for his bodily health; for, hee remembred not the health of his ſoule, but would haue continued an Infidell ſtill. Wherefore either they would not make ſo vnjuſt a ſupplication to God for him, or elſe it pleaſed not God to hear their praiers: for, within few daies after, he died of that his incurable diſeaſe; yet ſome Authors ſay, that he killed himſelf.

Galerius incurable diſeaſe, & infirmity.

The death of Galerius Armentarius.

This his death hapned in the yeer of our Lord 312, he hauing raigned ſix yeers; the firſt two in companie with CONSTANTIVS, and the reſt with the CÆSARS. Being dead, all things remained in this eſtate: MAXENTIVS, who tyrannouſly was called Emperor, held Rome and all Italie. CONSTANTINVS, who indeed was Emperor, held France, Spain, Britannie, and part of Germanie. LICINIVS, whom GALERIVS had made CÆSAR, remained in poſſeſſion of Slauonia, and of the Prouinces of Gracia, and preſently made himſelf to be called Emperor: and MAXIMINVS enjoyed all the Eaſt, with the dignity and name of CÆSAR. Among all which, onely CONSTANTINE ſeemed to haue juſt title, for that he was the ſonne of CONSTANTIVS, and had married the daughter of MAXIMINIANVS; both which had been Emperors.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND FORTY FOVRTH ROMAN Emperor; And of MAXENTIVS, and of MARCVS LICINIVS, which in his time were called EMPERORS.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Empire was diuided among diuers Princes, and each gouerned his part with equall authority: but Maxentius raigning in Rome as a Tyrant, behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that Conſtantine bare Armes againſt him notwithſtanding that he was allied vnto him, and ioined battaile with him, leſſe confident in the force of his Armie, then in the viſion which he had ſeene, that vnder the ſigne of the Croſſe he ſhould ouercome; which he euer after bore for his deuice. He likewiſe ouercame Marcus Licipius, who alſo gouerned a part of the Empire. Hee greatly fauoured the Chriſtians: and while he liued, the perſecution of the Chriſtians ceaſed, and the Prelates of the Church were had in great veneration, and made rich. He did put a ſonne of his owne to death, whoſe name was Criſpus, by the inſtigation of his wife Fauſta, whome he afterwards alſo ſlew, being grieuouſly reprehended by his mother Helena for the death of his ſonne. He would haue rooted out the hereſie of Arrius: but death intercepted him, which took him out of this life when he was very old: he died a Chriſtian, as he had Chriſtianlike liued, leauing the Church in great honour and rich, whereto he had of his bountie giuen many great and rich gifts.

AM of opinion, and do verely beleeue, that it cannot be otherwiſe, but that the Reader ſhall ſee himſelfe in a great confuſion, and will not without ſome trouble comprehend the ſubiect of this Hiſtorie; by reaſon of the multitude of Emperours and CÆSARS, which concurre at one inſtant: ſo as if it be a hard matter to remember their names only, how much more then will it be to vnderſtand the actions of euery of them particularly? It is true, that the Romane Empire was then ſo great, as no one man alone was able to gouerne the ſame; neither was it poſſible that many ſhould rule it: for in raigne and command (as I haue elſewhere ſayd) equality and company cannot be indured. And from hence aroſe ſo much diſcord, murther, and other ſtrange accidents, which then could not throughly be vnderſtood, neither can now be ſo clearely deſcribed, as they may be diſtinctly conceiued as they paſt. Wherefore, it ſhall be needfull that the curious Reader remember well what is paſt, to the end he may the better comprehend that which followeth.

The greatnes of the Roman Empire.

The Tyrant MAXENTIVS being as Emperour in Rome, CONSTANTINE in France, LICINIVS in Slauonia and Gracia, who alſo called himſelfe Emperour, and MAXIMINVS CÆSAR in the Eaſt; The life and behauiour of MAXENTIVS in Rome was ſuch, as hee was therefore extreamely hated of all men: for he was a cruell homicide and a murtherer of Noble-men, libidinous, an adulterer, diſhoneſt, couetous, and aboue all a perſecuter and deſtroyer of the Church of God. Finally, in all his actions he was a Tyrant, a great Sorcerer, and a friend to Southſayers, Enchanters, Charmers, and ſuch like. For which, the vertuous and moſt noble CONSTANTINE (being in France) was very ſorie: and being called by the Senators of of Rome and other Noblemen, he resolued to leuie an Armie against MAXENTIVS, notwithstanding that he was brother to his wife FAVSTA, as I haue sayd. But the better to preserue his owne Empire, he made MARCVS LICINIVS, who commanded Slauonia and the other prouinces aforesaid, his friend, giuing to him his sister CONSTANCE to wife, in the citie of Milan, where they two met for that purpose, and made great feasting. Whither was inuited (but would not come) the old Emperour DIOCLESIAN, who yet liued in his voluntarie pouertie. Wherewith CONSTANTINE and LICINIVS being discontent, wrote vnto him sharpe and threatning letters, alleaging that he fauoured MAXENTIVS; wherefore (as some write) he took poison wherewith he killed himselfe; and others say that he died mad.

The death of the Emperour Diocletian.

After the feasts were ended in Milan, the good CONSTANTINE comming with his Army into Italy against MAXENTIVS, who (although he were a wicked man) was both valiant and hardy: and raising also the greatest and best forces that he was able, went to meet him, trusting in the enchantments and charmes which he had made, and in the masters which he had with him, which for that purpose killed innocent children, making with their bloud a thousand charmes and other vanities: wherewith he held the vnlearned and vnbeleeuing people so amazed, that the greatest number of his friends gaue credit thereunto; and his enemies stood in feare to giue him battaile. Wherefore, and also for that in truth he had a great Armie and very expert, principally the Pretorian souldiers which first made choise of him; the warre grew to be very doubtfull, and there were some encounters and battailes betweene them, wherein for the most part CONSTANTINE had the victorie. But MAXENTIVS reinforcing his Armie, and vsing his diuelish arts, came finally to Rome, where he procured all possible fauour: and making greater preparation to offend his enemie; by the counsel of a Magician woman, or rather a witch, he resolued to sallie forth and to giue CONSTANTINE battaile, who with his forces was come neere to Rome. Who vnderstanding what MAXENTIVS meant to put in execution; considering the great losse that might ensue, and standing in feare and doubt of the issue of the battaile, aswell for the great number of the enemies, as for MAXENTIVS enchauntments wherewith he amazed the world; he was in great care and perplexitie: And as he gaue great credit to the Christians, and was their protector and defender (notwithstanding that yet he was not baptized) but had a firme and stedfast hope in IESVS CHRIST; EVSEBIVS, CASSIODORVS, and others write, that there appeared vnto him one of the greatest miracles that euer was seen in the world: which was, That he saw in the heauens a great crosse, of the colour of fire, like vnto that whereupon our Sauiour suffered his passion; and therewith he heard this voice, In hoc signo vinces. By vertue of this signe thou shalt ouercome. By meanes of which signe and miracle, God gaue him so great confidence, as he presently assured himselfe of victorie: and therefore caused the signe of the crosse to be made in his imperiall standard; and euer after vsed to beare it wrought in som iewel or otherwise in his right hand, and on his forehead: and finally, from thenceforth his deuice was continually the crosse, and he made it to be set in all his ensignes.

Warres betweene Constantine and Maxentius.

A miracle appeared to Constantine when he prepared to fight with Maxentius.

CONSTANTINVS then putting his hope and trust in the voice which he heard from heauen, and MAXENTIVS his beliefe and confidence in his diuels and enchauntments, ioyned battaile neere to a bridge ouer the riuer Tiber, called Pons Miluius, which was somewhat more then a mile from Rome; whither MAXETIVS very courageously came in the foreward of all his Armie. The fight being begun, and he ouercharged by CONSTANTINES vauntgard, before which was carried the crosse, he fled: and entring vpon the bridge which he had commanded to be made vpon Barkes and Boates neere to the other, both he and his horse fell into the riuer, where he was drowned: which bridge he himselfe had caused to be made, to the end therewith to haue deceiued his enemie. Wherefore to him may be well applied the saying of the Psalmist, Lacum aperuit, & effodit eum, & incidit in foueam quam ipse fecit.

A fight betweene Constantine and Maxentius.

Maxentius flying was drowned in the riuer Tiber.

CONSTANTINE hauing obtained this victorie in the seuenth yeere of his raigne (accounting from the death of his father) without any losse or slaughter of his people; the Senators and people of Rome, with their wiues and children came forth to receiue him, as the Prince who had freed them from seruitude; and they gaue him the title of Father of the countrie, and restorer of peace and libertie. In this manner was he attended into Rome, with incredible ioy and feasting, euerie one singing his praises; yeelding generally, sundrie congratulations, with mirth and gladnes. But he attributed nothing to his owne power or policie, but all to God onely. And in the right hand of all the Statues and Images, which in Rome by decree of the Senate were erected to his honour for his victorie against MAXENTIVS, he caused to be engrauen grauen the signe of the crosse, with the words which hee heard from heauen, In Hoc signo vinces. And then he commanded by publike edict that no man should be condemned to the death of the crosse: which vntill his time was vsed and held for an ignominious death. Setting all matters in good order and peace in Rome, making holy and iust lawes and statues, and to shew himselfe gratefull for the benefits which he had receiued; he did much good to the Christians, bestowing many fauours and gifts vpon them, building them Churches and houses of prayer, endowing them with rents and necessarie meanes for the maintenance of the Priests and Ministers thereof, with ornaments and necessaries for diuine seruice. And he and his brother in law LICINIVS, the other Emperor, by common consent sent their general edicts and decrees through all the prouinces and cities subiect to the Empire, commanding that the Christians should be eased from all grieuances, made free, and receiued into honours and offices of dignitie and authoritie; in which decrees were contained the great praises of our Lord, reciting the victories which CONSTANTINE had obtained vnder his banner with the signe of the crosse. Which decrees being sent into the East, where MAXIMINVS CÆSAR bare the sway, were obeied by him, as the Emperours commandement, but much against his will: for he was wicked and a most cruell enemie to the Catholike Church: and so although he conteined himselfe for a season, yet afterward he returned to his diuelliſh disposition.

Decrees made by Constantine in fauour of the Christians.

CONSTANTINE liuing in this felicitie, being Lord of all the prouinces of Africa (I meane of that part which was subiect to the Empire) of France, Spaine, Germanie, and also Italy, with the Ilands of Britannie and Sicilie; in all which countries he maintained peace and iustice (for the wisedome and police of this prince was exceeding great, and no lesse was his courage and valour) in such sort that as he was most valiant and venturous in Armes, so was hee very wise and politick in peace; and made new lawes, against the new slanders and inuentions of the wicked. He also took great care and paine to reduce all Arts and Sciences to their ancient perfection, greatly honouring such masters as were excellent, who then were greatly decaied and diminished, and he gaue them more honor: he also exercised himselfe in most honourable exercises, reading, writing, and inditing, and in hearing the Embasses and complaints which were brought to him from sundrie prouinces; and to all men was affable, milde, courteous and liberall; preseruing in all things the bountie and sinceritie of his minde.

Being in Rome, as some reckon in the yeere of Lord 314. and as other say 316. some say more, some lesse (for which computation I take no great care, seeing it little importeth the truth of the historie) he was there instructed by Pope SYLVESTER in all matters concerning the Christian faith: which he (as some writers affirme) receiued with great feruencie; and with his son CRISPVS, whom he in the beginning of his raigne had made CÆSAR, was baptized in Rome, hauing first made for that purpose a most sumptuous Font, which (as PLATINA affirmeth) is at this day there to be seene: yet some others affirme, that hee was baptized but a little before his death. But whensoeuer, it hath greatest apparance that it was solemnized in Rome. But wee will leaue this controuersie vntill another time. He liuing thus in quiet in Rome, MAXIMINVS CÆSAR, who ruled in the East, seeing himselfe rich and mightie, held it for a disgrace to be inferiour to LICINIVS or to CONSTANTINE; and therefore taking vpon him the name of AVGVSTVS and Emperour, and reuoking the priuiledges giuen to the Christians, he began to declare himselfe an enemie, especially to LICINIVS, who commanded neereſt vnto him: and knowing that LICINIVS prouided for him; trusting in the multitude of his men of warre, he marched towards LICINIVS: but before they fought any generall battaile, they made most cruell warre both by sea and land in many parts: and after many conflicts, at the last they came to fight, Armie against Armie, wherein MAXIMINVS was ouerthrowne: and the battaile was so cruell, as the greatest part of his men were slaine, and those which escaped yeelded themselues to LICINIVS. MAXIMINVS himselfe escaping by flight, changed his habit, to the end that he would not be discouered, vntill he might come to some place of safetie. And (as EVSEBIVS writeth) imagining himselfe to be deluded by his Magicians, and the false Priests of his diuelish gods, he put many of them to death, and began to intreate the Christians very well; and sent abroad his decrees, wherein he commanded that they should be suffered to liue at libertie, and to build Temples, and to doe what they thought good. Which this wicked man did, more for that he hoped that God would therefore giue him victorie, and so he might be reuenged of his enemies, then for any beleefe he had in him: for what he did was not willingly, but with a dissembling heart, and through desire of reuenge: for this wicked man thought that Christ should assist him with his mercie, who vpon the crosse

prayed to his father to forgiue them which had nailed him thereon. Hauing once againe leuied the greatest and best forces he could, with an intent to retutne to fight with LICINIVS, it pleased God to frustrate his purposes by his death, afflicting him first with the most cruel and grieuous disease that euer was heard of; wherein through the intolerable paine which he felt in his guts and intrailes, he did bite his owne hands, and did cast himselfe desperately from his bed to the ground: and this torment continuing many daies, so as hee could neither eate, drinke, nor sleepe: at length his eyes started out of his head, and so he died mad and in despaire. Through his death the Christians enioyed an absolute peace and quietnes through all the prouinces of the Empire: and CONSTANTINE and LICINIVS remained absolute Lordes and Emperors, and so continued in great peace and tranquillitie for a season: LICINIVS went presently into the East, where he slew VALENS, a Captaine whom the Armie there had made Emperor after the death of MAXIMINVS: and that tyrant being slaine, and he in possession of the countrie, he punished the Sorcerers, the Inchaunters, and the ministers of MAXIMINVS cruelties; and he also caused his sonnes to be slaine whom hee had made CÆSARS. EVSEBIVS, who was an eye witnes, reciteth, what great libertie the christians obtained through the death of MAXIMINVS; and how they built Churches and beautified the same, and in how great account and reuerence CONSTANTINE held the Bishops and Prelates; And likewise the gifts, rewards, and reuenewes which hee bestowed vpon them.

The death of Maximinus.

Valens slaine by Licinius.

The Empire being gouerned in this manner; in those times one ALEXANDER a Captaine in Africa rebelled and vsurped the name and title of Emperour; against whom CONSTANTINE sent from Rome an Armie: which comming to a battel, ALEXANDER was ouercome and slaine. So as all remained vnder the command of CONSTANTINE and LICINIVS onely. And although their dignitie and Empire was equall, yet was the authoritie and valour of CONSTANTINE farre greater, and he much more esteemed and better beloued of all men then LICINIVS, and for the most part remained in Rome, doing iustice to all men indifferentlie; particularlie honoring and enriching the Church of God, hearing and reading the holie scriptures, and in this manner remained in rest for a space. But the Deuill, who neuer ceaseth to induce men to do euill, and to sow discord and enmitie amongst them, made LICINIVS to alter his mind, who in his hart fauoured not the Christians, and drew him to persecute them. The first thing he did, was to cast out of his house and seruice, and so, out of all offices and places of charge, any one what soeuer that was a Christian; and afterwards he committed such cruelties against them as had seldome been seene: which he did (as some write) thereby to pick occasion of discord and war with CONSTANTINE, whom he enuied for his great authoritie and goodnes. He also sought many meanes to make him away either by poison or treason; wherein failing of his will, he resolued openlie to fall out with him: whereto CONSTANTINE suffered himselfe to be induced, more as a true Christian, for the defence of the Christian faith, then for his owne particular honor or intereſt: for LICINIVS, now ruined the temples and churches which he himselfe had before commanded to be built; and without either feare or shame, commanded all those Christians to be slaine which would not commit idolatrie, and adore his idols: whereupon many being weake and inconstant renounced their faith, and others ioyfullie receiued the crowne of Matyrdome.

Alexander rebelled, and taking the name of Emperour, was ouerthrowne and slaine by Constantines forces.

Licinius perſecuted the Christians.

Licinius made those to be slaine which would not commit idolatrie.

Each of these two Emperours mustring vp his souldiers and men of warre, they hauing raigned twelue yeeres in peace together, there began very cruell warres betweene them: and as CONSTANTINE euer bare the crosse in his ensigne and standard, it pleased God that most commonlie his people preuailed. And both these Emperours comming into Hungarie with his forces, there drew neere one to the other, the good CONSTANTINE hauing a fit opportunitie (for LICINIVS, was encamped neere to the side of a lake) in the night gaue him a camizado: and notwithstanding that LICINIVS fought very well and made great resistance, yet in the end his forces were ouerthrowne, and his camp was entred; and he escaping by flight, came to the citie of Bizantium, which ere long after was called Conſtantinople. Where to relieue himselfe and to recouer greater authoritie, he made one of his Captaines whose name was MARTIANVS, CÆSAR, who was maister of his offices, or high steward of his house; and raising the greatest power that he was able both of foote and horse, he prepared himselfe for a second battaile: But in the meane season CONSTANTINE seised on the prouinces of Dacia, Misia, Macedonia, and others which were vnder LICINIVS his gouernment.

Licinius ouerthrowne and put to flight by Constantine.

LICINIVS hauing gathered his Armie to a head, againe renewed the warre, which (as EVTROPIVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR write in his life) was very variable and cruell, vntill vntill that by the intercession of CONSTANTIA sister to CONSTANTINE, and wife to LICINIVS, there was some truce and peace taken betweene them: but through the enuie and malice of LICINIVS it held not long: and they both againe returned to Armes, warring with greater malice and power both by sea and land then before. And both these Emperours comming againe to a bataile, in the prouince of Bithynia, in Asia the lesse, whither LICINIVS had withdrawne himselfe (hauing lost all that he held in Europe) it was extremely bloudie and cruell; but in the end CONSTANTINE had the victorie, and LICINIVS escaped by flight: And yet afterwards through the intreatie of his sister CONSTANTIA, wife to LICINIVS, CONSTANTINE graunted him his life, he yeelding himselfe into his power; but he confined him to the citie of Nicomedia in the same prouince: where afterwards fearing he should rebell againe as MAXIMIANVS had done, or as some thinke, for that LICINIVS began to practice with some to take Armes, he was put to death by CONSTANTINES command, and with him MARTIANVS whom he had made CÆSAR, in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne, and the threescore of his age, and in the yeere of our Sauiour Christ three hundred and seuen and twentith.

Licinius the second time ouerthrowne.

Licinius put to death by Constantines commandement.

This Emperour LICINIVS was of a most wicked and cruell disposition, beeing dishonest, incontinent, couetous, and also most ignorant, as hee who had no Learning; and (which is worse) did abhorre and detest it, affirming that Learning was a publike plague: whereas to the contrarie (to whom is it not euident) that without Learning, or learned Councell, there neuer was yet any King that either did or could rightly gouerne and minister Iustice? Neuertheless, hee was very valiant, and followed the warres all his whole life time.

The whole Empire remaining vnder the command of the good and Christian Emperour CONSTANTINE alone, the world enioyed a most happy time: for so great was his goodnesse and wisedome, that generally euery where he ministred iustice mixed with clemency; so as there was vniuersall peace and quietnesse. And by all his subjects hee was beloued, and much honored, and by barbarous and strange Nations greatly feared: and aboue all, the Christian faith was held in great reuerence, and embraced euery where. It is wonderfull what EVSEBIVS doth write in the end of his Ecclesiasticall historie, and SOCRATES in his Tripartite Historie, of the fauors, graces, priuiledges, benefits, and gifts, which CONSTANTINE bestowed vpon Bishops and the Churches, and generally vpon all christian people, abolishing all the laws which his predecessors had made against their libertie: and he commanded by publike edict, that there should no more temples be built to the honour of the false gods and idols which the Romanes adored. But he commanded through all the Prouinces of the Empire: that the Bishops commandements should be obeyed; and that to those which had not whereof to liue, there should be assigned goods and rents to maintaine them during their liues. And he not only tooke care for the Christians which liued in Countries subject to the Empire: but vnderstanding that to those Christians which liued in other Prouinces subject to the King of Perſia was vsed force and oppression, he sent his Ambassadors to that King, requiring him to command that fault to be amended; perswading him to honour and beleeue in IESVS CHRIST: So as by his meanes CHRIST was adored, and the Gospell freely preached through the whole world; and vnder this good Emperour the Christians indured not any oppression, or suffered persecution: and so there were many holy and learned Doctors.

Benefits bestowed by Constantine vpon the Church and christen-men.

CONSTANTINE liuing in this great power and prosperity, was worthily surnamed the Great, and in all Historics hee is called CONSTANTINE the Great. Besides this, other honourable names and titles were giuen him by the Senate of Rome: as, the restorer of mankind, the enlarger of the Romane Empire, the founder and preserver of perpetuall peace and safety, and so he was generally honoured and beloued of all men, as much as possibly a man could be.

Titles of honour giuen to Constantine.

Some Authours write, among which EVTROPIVS is one, that CONSTANTINE through his great power and prosperity blemished his vertues, waxing proud and cruell; and they tax him also for being too desirous of glory and honor: wherof AVRELIVS VICTOR also maketh mention, and proueth the same by the death of his sonne CRISPVS, whom he had made CÆSAR, and of his wife FAVSTA, who as we haue sayd, was MAXENTIVS sister; and of many other noble and eminent men. But it cannot certainly be said how it fell out, thereby to condemne or excuse this Emperour: for as a man, hee might fall into such sinnes; and yet afterwards acknowledging his errour, might aske mercie at Gods hands for his offences.

Constantine did put his wife, his sonne, and his Nephew to death.

True it is, some say, that he put his son CRISPVS to death, because that his wife FAVSTA, and mother in law to his said sonne, had complained to him that he would haue rauished her; whereas to the contrarie she had dishonestly sought it of him, procuring his loue and dishonest companie; whereto, he as a loyall and dutifull childe would not consent. The truth whereof being afterwards knowne, CONSTANTINE caused her to be slaine: which he did with great reason; although hee were deceiued in the death of his sonne. Others say that she as a mother in law, practized the death of CRISPVS, because he should not be preferred before the other sonnes which she had by CONSTANTINE. But I am of opinion that these executions were not but for some offences and iust causes which moued him thereto, although they were not published and made knowne to the world.

Warres against the Sarmates.

PAVLVS OROSIVS reciting the deaths of his wife, of his sonne, and of his Nephew, saith that the causes were secret and vnknowne, which mooued him. And truly a man can presume no otherwise, considering how wise and how good a Christian this Prince was. And so SOZOMENVS doth excuse him, as relateth CASSIODORVS in his Tripartite Historie. EVSEBIVS and RVFFINVS in their writings, and the same CASSIODORVS, onely declare his vertues, and blame him in nothing. Saint GREGORIE calleth him Emperour, of holy memorie. Saint AMBROSE speaking of the death of THEODORVS saith, that CONSTANTINE was worthie of great praise, who with the Empire left the Christian faith for an inheritance to his successors: So as what such men commend, I dare not reprehend or condemne. Holding it then for certaine, that he was a good man, returning to his Historie, I say, that after that he raigned alone, their failed not warres: for the Sarmates inuaded the Empire, and he in person with a mightie Armie marched against them; and ouerthrowing them a in battaile, he forced them to obey, and to be quiet. The like he afterwards did by the Gothes, and other barbarous nations. Which when he had performed, and hauing made his three sonnes CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIVS, and CONSTANS, CÆSARS, and also his Nephew DALMATIVS: for some resonable considerations, holding it more conuenient for matters of the East and to be neere at hand, which was his greatest care; he determined to transport his imperiall throne and seat from Rome into Bithynia in Asia, or into some other part of that countrie: and hauing considered thereof, and thought vpon sundrie fit places; he resolued in the end to reedifie the citie of Byzantii, which is in Thracia: and meaning to call it new Rome, he beautified it with edifices, priuiledges, and other riches, more then any other citie of the world. And as Saint IEROM saith in his additions to EVSEBIVS, he enriched and adorned that citie with the spoiles of all the rest. For all the worthie and notable monuments which were in Rome, as statues, pillars, colosses, and all other things which were singular and excellent, of gold stone or metall, he made to be taken from Rome and to be carried to that citie: Whereto notwithstanding that he gaue the name of new Rome; yet was it then, and now to this day is called Constantinople, after his name: and so it became one of the greatest and most noble cities of the world: and he went thither, and there settled his imperiall throne and state, leauing his sonnes in France, Spaine, and Italy, which prouinces he had giuen them to gouerne.

Constantine reedified the citie of Byzantium, now called after his name Constantinople

The Empire being in this prosperitie, the heresie of the Arrians, through the suggestion of the diuell arose in the City of Alexandria in Egypt, which denied the eternitie of the Son of God with the Father, alleaging that he was not of the same substance with him. This heresie did then, and a long time after, trouble the quiet estate of the Church. The head and inuentor of this heresie, was one ARRIVS a Priest in the said citie of Alexandria, who was a man which outwardly made great shew of holinesse, and liued morally, well. At the same time was Bishop of Alexandria one ALEXANDER, a man of great holinesse & learning: But as he was gentle and of a mild condition, so he endeuoured in the beginning to haue cured ARRIVS of that heretical infirmitie, with soft and gentle medicaments; praying and admonishing him to leaue his errour and misbeliefe, with holy speeches and exhortations; but being proud and insolent, persisting in his heresie, he induced many others to follow his errors: and this pestilence increased and extended it selfe so far, that many were infected therwith: and all the possible diligence that ALEXANDER could vse, did nothing quaile to suppresse the same; notwithstanding that ARRIVS was by him excommunicate out of the Church. Whereupon ALEXANDER aduertised the Emperor thereof: and the mischief grew to be so great, as it required a great remedy; and so by order of the same Emperor, a generall Councell was called in the City of Nicea, which is in in the prouince of Bithinia in Asia, where ther assembled three hundred and eighteene Bishops. And CONSTANTINE himselfe in person was present in the same councell: finally, ARRIVS, and his wicked sect, was therein condemned by all the Bishops, excepting seuenteene which held with him. Whereof eleuen afterwards (as saith RVFFINVS) made shew of recantation: and ARRIVS together with the other sixe were excommunicated and banished; to all which the Emperor consented and approued the same, submitting himselfe to the iudgement of the holy councell. And so the opinion of ARRIVS was held for a wicked heresie: but he persisted in his error, and had disciples and followers. And notwithstanding that the Emperor took great paines to redresse it, yet he could not by any meanes effect the same. This euil did a long time trouble the Chuch, and extended it selfe euen into Spain and other prouinces; in somuch as it seemed impossible to finde any redresse for so great a mischiefe: but afterwards in processe of time, it pleased our Lord of his infinite goodnesse and mercie, to cure the same.

The Nicen councell.

Among many other things which CONSTANTINE did in this councell, one was very notable. As among so many Bishops, although many of them were holy and good men; so their wanted not enuie and contention among those which were not such: for some held erronious opinions; and others which were in sute and at debate, accused one another to the Emperor, exhibiting their complaints and informations vnto him in writing, entreating him to punish the offenders; The Emperor received the accusations, & concealed the same, so as no man saw them: afterwards calling those Bishops which thus complained before him, he made a briefe speech, saying; Fathers, Bishops and Prelates, it hath pleased God to ordaine you for Prelates and Priests, and hath giuen you power to iudge of me, and I may iustly and orderly be iudged by you, but you cannot be iudged by me: wherefore I referre your sutes and debates to the diuine iudgement, and to the iudgement of the Church and councell. And seeing that you are set before vs in the place of God, it is not fit that I iudge of you, but should leaue you to the iudgement of God, of whom it is written, Deus stetit in synagoga deorum, in medio autem deos discernit; God stood in the synagogue of the Gods, and God alone among them is iudge. Wherefore setting apart all this malice, discord and contention, apply your selues diligently to that which appertaineth to the Christian faith, and to the Church, and for Gods sake forget these rancors and priuate iniuries. These speeches are written by RVFFINVS and CASSIODORVS, and are also seene in the Decrees, wherewith the good Emperour exhorted those Bishops to concord and friendship, without interposing himselfe betweene them as their iudge, and so was that most holy & Christian councell dissolued. About the same time or little after it, the holy woman HELENA, mother to the same Emperour CONSTANTINE, went to Ierusalem (I meane to that which is new builded: for of the old Ierusalem there remaineth not one stone vpon another) to seeke the crosse whereon our Sauiour CHRIST suffered his passion. And commanding a Temple to be throwne downe, which by the Gentiles was builded in that same place to their Goddesse VENVS, there were found three crosses, but not in such manner as that it might bee well perceiued which was the crosse of CHRIST: for the superscription was taken away, or else the letters could not be read, and the one was like the other. And HELENA being in this confusion, and with her MACARIVS, which at that time was Bishop of Ierusalem, they caried the three crosses to the house of a great Ladie, which in that citie was then at the point of death, sicke of a great and incurable disease; where (as it is written) the right crosse was miraculously discouered. SOZOMENVS in his Tripartite historie writeth wonders, concerning the same. The feast of the finding of the crosse is celebrated by the Church of Rome with great solemnitie, vpon the third day of May. And HELENA, hauing found what she so earnestly fought, caused in the same place where it was found, a most rich and sumptuous Temple to be built: and taking the crosse asunder, the one halfe shee left there inclosed in a siluer chest, and the other halfe shee caried with her to Constantinople, where it was kept by CONSTANTINE with great reuerence. She caried vnto him also the nailes wherewith CHRIST was nailed to the crosse, the one of which hee alwaies wore in his helmet or caske; and of another he made a bit for his horse, agaiast such time as hee should enter into any fight or battaile; and the other naile, it is said, that bearing it about him, and being in a great storme at sea, he threw it into the sea to asswage the tempest. How true or false I will not argue. This historie and the finding of the crosse, besides RVFFINVS and CASSIODORVS alreadie alleaged, Saint AMBROSE writeth at large in the oration by him made to the honour of the Emperour THEODOSIVS.

The finding of the Crosse.

Helena caused a Temple to be baile in the same place where the crosse was found.

CONSTANTINE hauing now happily raigned about thirtie yeeres, in the later time whereof hee wholly applied himselfe to roote Idolatrie out of the world; and to builde Churches, which he dedicated to CHRIST IESVS and his Saints; and to extirpate ARRIVS his heresie, which yet had some roote: but in the end he was was forced to leuie an Armie to go against the Persians and their king, which inuaded the Empire. And marching thitherwards, in the 66. yeere of his age, and the thirtith of his raigne (although that herein is some small difference among authors) he was taken with a grieuous sicknes; and to the end hee might recouer health, he caused himselfe to be caried from Constantinople, with intent to goe to Nicomedia, which is a citie in Bithynia, to certaine Bathes of hot water: but before he could come thither, his disease so increased as he died, humbly recommending his soule to IESVS CHRIST, in whom he constantly beleeued. And so holily died this holy and great Emperor; leauing behind him three sons, CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIVS, and CONSTANS; whome he constituted and ordained for his heires and successors in the Empire, together with his nephew DALMATIVS; and two daughters, the one named HELENA, which was afterwards maried to IVLIANVS who was Emperor: and the other CONSTANTIA who maried with GALLVS. Some suspected that CONSTANTINE was poisoned. He died in the yeere of our Lord 342.

The death of Constantine the Great.

Although that we shall somewhat exceed ordinarie in this discourse, yet I account it time well spent to treate of some doubts, which grow in the life of CONSTANTINE. The first is, for that some say this holy Emperour was not baptized, vntill a little before his death, and that he was then baptized by EVSEBIVS, Bishop of Nicomedia; and that all the rest of his time he liued without baptisme: alleaging a reason why he did so, for that he hoped to haue been baptized in the riuer Iordan, wherein our Sauiour CHRIST was baptized by S. IOHN. But I account the opinion of those to be most certaine, which write that he was baptized in Rome by the hand of Pope SYLVESTER, after the death of MAXENTIVS. For it is hardly to be beleeued, that there could be such deuotion found (as CONSTANTINE shewed in his works) in a man which was not baptized; and therefore it carieth no colour of truth. Writers doe also proooue, that he was baptized with his sonne CRISPVS, and that he caused his sonne to bee slaine long before he died, as by vs hath been alreadie declared: so as it appeareth that he could not be baptized with his sonne, being alreadie dead. And whereas it is written in a little booke, that CONSTANTINE was infected with a leprosie, and that he was cured with the bloud of certaine little children which he caused to be slaine for that purpose; PLATINA holdeth this for a fable and a forgerie: and none of the ancient writers neither moderne that are of any credit, write any such matter. Some also write, that CONTANTINE was baptized in his later daies, and that he seemed to be inclined to the Arrian heresie. But he was deceiued which wrote so: for that was his sonnes error, who was also called CONSTANTINE: and that which was written of his sonne (being deceiued through the name) was imputed to the father, of whose true faith, life and death there ought no doubt to bee made; neither in their histories treating of his life, do they make any doubt, as OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, S. GREGORIE, RVFFINVS, and CASSIODORVS testifie: Of which S. GREGORIE calleth him, of holy memorie. S. AMBROSE in an oration which he made at the death of THEODORVS, giueth him the title of holie, and highly extolleth him because he left the Christian faith, for an inheritance, with the Empire. And the Greek Church doth celebrate his feast as a Saint, vpon the twentith day of Aprill. And so doe also defend his faith and holinesse both in life and in death, ANTONIVS SABELLICVS in his Æneades; PLATINA in the life of Pope MARCVS; POMPONIVS LETVS in his abbridgement of the Roman historie; and BAPTISTA IGNATIVS in his epitome of the Emperours; and S. ANTONINVS in his Historials: and generally all the moderne authors, besides the auncient alreadie named. And wheras it is written that he recalled ARRIVS from exile; if he did so as some write, yet according to the same authors, he was induced thereto by a certaine Priest, and at the entreatie of his sister, but principally through a writing sent to him by ARRIVS, wherein he declared what opinion he held concerning the faith; seeming by his words to be conformable to the decreee of the Councell; and the Emperour not comprehending his deceit in those words, released him from banishment. Neuertheless he referred the examination of the cause to a new councell of Bishops, which was then assembled about the building of the Temple at Ierusalem; without approouing his opinion in any respect. And it happened that ARRIVS died in this demand, accordingly as his sinnes and heresie had deserued: for it pleased God that he died suddenlie, and and his bowels came forth at his lower parts. Many of these Authors affirme, that this hapned in the time of the Emperor CONSTANTINE the sonne, and not of the father. They being both of one name causeth this confusion and doubt in the Historie. So as it may be set downe & auouched for certain, that the Emperor CONSTANTINE at what time soeuer he was baptized, sure it was in Rome many yeers before his death: And he died holding and beleeuing the holy Catholike faith. And as an holy and true Christian he neuer consented vnto, nor beleeued any point of ARRIVS his heresie, as some charge him, being deceiued by the name of his sonne, who was infected with the venome of that wicked heresie.

Now concerning the donation, which some say that CONSTANTINE made to Pope SYLVESTER and to his successors, of the Citie of Rome and of all Italy, when hee went to Constantinople; notwithstanding that all authors agree that he gaue great gifts, and builded many Temples; yet of this so notable a donation, I find not that any author of that age doth testifie or auerre any such matter. PAVLVS OROSIVS, EVTROPIVS, S. IEROME, or THEODORETVS which liued neere to that time, and wrote the rest, make no mention thereof. Wherefore it is to be doubted, whether there were any such donation.

It is true that there is a text in the decree, which reciteth this said donation of Rome and of Italy and other orientall Prouinces: But that text is held for Apocrypha; neither is it found in GRATIANS ancient originals. But finally, this is a question which I cannot determine, and therefore I will not thrust my sickle into another mans haruest, neither will I be iudge herein, seeing that I am but onely an Historiographer. Yet to one thing I will not forbeare to make answere, in some sort to satisfie the malice of our times. I say, that they haue no reason to taxe the Emperor CONSTANTINE, as some haue done, pretending that hee hath been the cause of much euill, in that he inriched the Bishoppes, Prelates and Priests, for that before his time they followed the true rule and forme of a Christian life; all liuing in the perfection of the Gospell, imitating the pouerty of CHRIST and of his disciples. To the first, let it be that this were true; the good and holy meaning of CONSTANTINE was much to be commended, and therein he did well and acceptably before God. To the other, it is not certaine that before the time of CONSTANTINE the Clergie had no temporall goods: for it seemeth to the contrarie in the Chapter Videntes 12. quæstione 1. wherein it is expressed that the ancient Fathers, considering that it was not so profitable to sell the goods and to distribute the mony in commune, as the Christians did in the beginning; as it was to keepe those heritages and possessions, to the end that by meanes of the fruites thereof, the Ministers then being might be maintained, and their successors might do the like after them: And comming to the ground of the matter, although that our Lord IESVS CHRIST and his holy Apostles and Disciples, commended pouertie, preferring it before riches, as chastitie before wedlock, for the full perfection of the holy life which he had chosen; it doth not therefore follow that he would that Bishops, Priests and Ministers should haue no temporall goods of their owne: for if he had meant so, it is to be presumed that he would haue ordained it, and so it should haue been obserued euen to this day. And if they shal say to me, that before the time of CONSTANTINE, they liued without rents or reuenewes, and yet there were many holy Bishops, as CLEMENT, LINVS, CLETVS, IGNATIVS, POLICARPVS, MARCELLVS, and such others which liued in pouerty, contenting themselues with a little in holy exercises: I answere, that all these holy men were not altogether without goods, but that they and their Churches had some possessions. And I also affirme that it is certaine, in the beginning, about the first propagation of the Gospell, as the name of Christian was odious and hatefull to the Emperors and Princes of those times, principally the Bishops and Priests: so it behooued them of necessity to be contented with that which they had, and to maintaine themselues as they were able. And wheras it appeareth that commonly they then liued more deuout, more holy, and in greater humility, then after that the Emperor CONSTANTINE became Christian, and the Church obtayned libertie, and that the authoritie thereof was confirmed with riches; Yet it is certaine, that after that time there were also very many holy men. And although that afterwards there was not generally so great sincerity and holinesse of life, as before: yet neither the Emperor, nor the riches he gaue were to be blamed, but the euill disposition and conditions of those which had the vse thereof, and did abuse the same. For it is not to be beleeued, that those ancient holie men in the beginning of the Primitiue Church, would, by reason of riches, forbeare to haue been holy and deuout; neither am I assured that those which afterwards were proud and insolent, would haue been holy and deuout, notwithstanding that they had been poore. It is true, and I acknowledge the same, that voluntarie pouertie is a state of great perfection, and that great riches oftentimes minister occasion of pride and wickednesse: but hereof men themselues are the cause; for we are naturally inclined to euill: but to put the same in execution, the rich haue greater power then the poore. Therefore neither riches nor pouerty are the occasion: for neither are all rich men wicked; neither are all poore men good: which would be so, if riches only be the occasion thereof. For neither riches nor pouertie in their owne nature are good or euill: but rather, as saith S. PAVL; All things are cleane to the cleane. Neither ought riches to be contemned, because that some wicked man doth abuse his wealth: For, if that Argument were of force, so were likewise to bee condemned and despised the strength of the bodie, beautie of countenance, sharpenesse of wit, and quicknesse of vnderstanding; and a man should desire to be vgly, feeble, dull, ignorant and of little discretion: for those which be strong, faire, beautifull, quick-witted, and of great capacitie and vnderstanding, may doe more harme and vse greater deceite, then the deformed, decrepit and ignorant. And if a man shall judge according to the occasion only; pouerty bringeth with it little care, and great distrust, and therewith men become enuious, greedily couetous, malefactors, coueting and stealing other mens goods: yet I will not denie, but that in riches is the greater danger. But in both, the fault is in vs, and not in the goods, which of themselues are neither good nor euill, but are as is he who hath the vse of them. And so not to swarue any further from our History, I conclude and say; Let vs forbeare to blame CONSTANTINE, and blame those which haue abused and misspent the goods which were giuen by CONSTANTINE. And let those which are so zealous of the generall reformation of the Church, reforme their owne Consciences, and amend their owne liues and abuses; and let them with teares pray vnto God to amend the rest. For if euery man in particular would doe thus and amend one, all would presently be amended. But truly most men take care for the gouernement of Empires and States, euen at home in their houses: but of their owne houses and Consciences they take little care. And to the end that they thinke not, that all the mischiefe consisteth in the Church goods, let them know that after that the Churches were rich, and that the Prelates were of great power and authority, there were therein a S. LEO, a Pope, a S. GREGORIE, S. AMBROSE, S. IEROME, S. AVGVSTINE, S. BERNARD, and an infinite number of other Bishops which possessed riches, and despising them were poore in spirit, which is acceptable before God.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIVS, AND CONSTANS, Brethren; Sonnes of the Emperor CONSTANTINE the Great, and fiue and fortith Emperour of ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Emperour Constantine being dead, the gouernment of the Empire remained in the hands of his sonnes Constantius, Constans, and Constantinus: But as commonly it hapneth in matters of State; so after that the Prouinces were diuided, they imagining them to be vnequally shared, fell together by the eares among themselues: and two of them being dead, the gouernment of the Empire rested wholly in Constantius, who had no lesse to doe to defend himselfe against domesticall tyrants, which sought to vsurpe his estate, then to offend forraine Princes, thereby to preserue the Romane Empire. After many accidents of warre, he ouercame Magnentius, and the last battaile betweene them was so bloudie, and the execution so great, that in a manner it weakned the forces of the whole Empire: but finally, Magnentius was driuen to such extremity that he slue himselfe. He made his Cosen-Germane Gallus, Cæsar, giuing him his sister Constantina to wife; who behaued himselfe so wickedly in his gouernment, that Constantius was forced to cause him to be slaine: in whose place he made his brother Iulianus, Cæsar, who going into Germany against the high Dutch, had so good successe in all his enterprises in the warres, that the souldiers of France constrained him perforce to take the Ensigne and name of Emperor. Which when Constantius vnderstood (who then was in war against the Persians) he ordered that war in the best manner he could, and came with a mightie Army against Iulianus: but falling grieuously sick by the way, he died, and made Iulianus his successor, leaning the Empire to him, whom he was going to depriue.

NOW necessarie and good the raigne of the Emperour CONSTANTINE was, and how great his bountie and valour was, plainly appeareth, seeing that immediatly with his death the vniuersall quiet and peace was disturbed, the fauor and respect of the Church was diminished, and the administration of justice was likewise peruerted and troubled. The good Emperor CONSTANTINE left behinde him when he died three sonnes, and two daughters. His sonnes names were CONSTANTINVS, CONSTANTIVS, and CONSTANS; his daughters were called HELENA, and CONSTANTIA. The sons presently after the death of their father were Emperors: for in his life time he had made them CÆSARS, together with his nephew DALMATIVS; and he also left them by his testament heires to the Empire. The daughters were afterwards married to Emperors; as in the processe of this Historie we will declare: which in truth is very abrupt, as well for the varietie and difference among authors, as for the great discord and warres which grew betweene these three brethren, and through the tyrants and vsurping Emperours which arose in their time. Let the Reader endeauour to reade attentiuely: For I will doe my best to write it as plainely and cleerely as I shall be able.

Constantine his children.

These three Brethren diuided the Roman Empire among them in this manner: To CONSTANTINE, who was the eldest Brother, was allotted Spain, Britanny, France, and that part of Germany which was subject to the Romans. To CONSTANS, the second Brother, there fell Italy, and all Africa, with the Iland Sicilia, and the rest between them, together with Slauonia, Dalmatia, Macedonia, Achaia, Morea, and all Græcia. The third Brother, which was CONSTANTIVS, possessed the Prouince of Thracia where the City of Constantinople stands, with all the East Prouinces of Asia the lesse, Soria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. And in the dominion of this CONSTANTIVS, by his consent and accord, his cosen DALMATIVS gouerned as CÆSAR. SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR saith, that he raigned also in Armenia, and in the borders thereof, and that ANNIBALLINVS was therein established CÆSAR.

Constantine his three sonnes diuided the Empire betweene them.

And so in this manner began the Empire to be gouerned by three Emperors, and one CÆSAR which was DALMATIVS: whereof ensued great discord and warre, for that either of them would take place before other, and be Lord of the whole. And, on the other side, the Roman Empire was so great, that no one man could well gouern it alone; and so very few held the whole in quiet possession: and therefore it declined, as all kingdoms and dominions which are farre extended and enlarged, will doo: for, neither mans life, force, nor humane policy, are able to manage and gouern that which is of too great an extent.

In the beginning of their Raign these Brethren liued in peace, for joy to see themselues so great Lords: and DALMATIVS, who in the East assisted CONSTANTIVS, began to make shew of himself to be a most excellent Prince, in his actions & vertues imitating CONSTANTINE the Great: wherefore by the good he was much beloued; but feared of the wicked, and enuied by CONSTANTIVS himself, who was the cause of his death. CONSTANTIVS permitting it, or being accessary thereto, hee was vpon a day in a mutinie slain by the souldiers which he had leuied against the King of Persia: and so the Empire remain'd absolutely betwixt the three Brethren.

Dalmatius loued by the good and feared by the wicked.

Dalmatius slaine by the souldiers through the practice of Constantius.

Soon after this, CONSTANTINE (who was the elder Brother) beganne to finde himself grieued, alleaging that he had the least part in the diuision of the Prouinces: for, hee possessed but France, Spain, part of Germany, England, and Scotland; his other Brethren houlding so many Prouinces. And therefore hee sent Ambassadors vnto them, requiring a new diuision: and as their parts seemed to them to be but little, they would not yeeld to his requeſt. Whereupon he muſtered vp his men and leuied an Armie, reſoluing to take that perforce, which they would not allow him by their free will, and with a great power inuaded the Frontiers of his brother CONTANS his Empire, to whom befell Italy and Africa. At that time CONSTANS was in Dacia (which is Tranſiluania and Walachia) making warre vpon the Gothes and Sarmates, who had made incurſions into the limits of the Romane Empire: and he vnderſtanding what his brother did, ſent a Captaine with men of war into Italy, who with ſuch power as he was able to raiſe, made Head againſt CONSTANTINVS, neere to the City of Aquileia. But CONSTANTINVS, little regarding his brothers forces, vnaduiſedly reſolued to fight: and being entrapped in an ambuſh laid by his enemies, fighting vnknowne, his horſe being killed vnder him, and he falling to the earth was ſlaine, hauing enioyed his Empire but three yeeres, being of the age of 25. yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord, 343. Which as ſome imagine hapned vnto him for his ſinnes: for they write of him, that he fauoured the hereſie of ARRIVS. And CASSIODORVS, RVFFINVS, and THEODORETVS in their Eccleſiaſticall hiſtories write, that vpon the death of CONSTANTINE the Great, father of theſe young men, thoſe which were infected with the hereſie of ARRIVS, tooke courage audaciouſly to maintaine the ſame, contrary to the decree of the holy Councell: and by their illuſions they perſwaded CONSTANTIVS thereto, who ruled in the Eaſt parts, and many Arrian Biſhops ſought to ſuppreſs and diſpoſeſſe the Catholikes; againſt whom CONSTANS the other Emperour and brother made great reſiſtance, who was of the Catholikes opinion. And particularly the holy Biſhop ATHANASIVS was perſecuted, who was the chiefe man in the Nicene Councell, and in that perſecution were ſent into exile, both he and others, which ſuffered great iniurie and infamie. There were alſo many councels and aſſemblies held by the Heretikes, and others by the Catholikes, wherein were many contentions. Finally, the Catholikes were greatly troubled and moleſted, by reaſon that many reuolted from the faith, and ioined with the heretikes: which I forbeare to write, becauſe it requireth much time to relate the ſame; and alſo, for that I rather write the liues of Emperors, then any Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie, wherof I muſt of neceſſity make often mention hereafter.

Constantine warred againſt his brother Conſtans.

Conſtantine ſlain in Italy.

CONSTANTINE the elder brother being ſlain by his brother CONSTANS his ſouldiers, CONSTANS took poſſeſſion of all the Countries his deceaſed brother was ſeaſed of: and ſo he became Lord of all the Weſt, and of Africa, whereof already he was in poſſeſſion. After this, preſently enſued another dangerous war againſt a kinde of people cald Franques, a people of Germany, inhabiting neer the riuer of Rhine (as AGATHIAS writes): which Franques rebelled, and ſeiſed on a great part of Gallia; from which the Frenchmen vaunt themſelues to be deſcended; and of Galli were called Franci; and Gallia, Francia. And, to make their originall ſeem to be of greater antiquity, they alleage that thoſe Franques deſcended from thoſe which eſcap't from Troy, and that they came to inhabit Germany with one of HECTOR's ſons, whoſe name was FRANCVS: but heerof we will ſpeak more heerafter. Theſe Franques came to blowes with CONSTANS; and, after cruell wars and much ſlaughter between them, they were vanquiſhed, and made ſubject to the Empire. And although CONSTANS were much troubled with theſe wars, yet afterwards he liued ſome yeers in peace and proſperity,; but very weak and impotent of body, both in his feet and hands, by reaſon of the gout wherewith he was oftentimes much afflicted. His gouernment in the beginning was good and pleaſing to all his ſubjects: but afterwards he became vitious and negligent in the execution of iuſtice, and by means of his infirmity grew vnwieldy and ill diſpoſed; and therfore ill-beloued by the Prouinciales and Subjects of the Empire: ſo as certain wicked men, making benefit of this occaſion, practiſed his death. The chief authors of this treaſon were CRESPIVS & MARCELLINVS, his own captains, who agreed to make MAGNENTIVS Emperour, a man of baſe condition and mean parentage, although through his courage and valour in the wars he won great reputation: and they found the ſouldiers very willing and ready thereto; for, they hated CONSTANS: and, giuing the imperiall robe to MAGNENTIVS, they ſent to kill CONSTANS, who miſtruſted no ſuch matter. In the manner of his death Authors varie: but in concluſion hee was ſlain in a certain place called Helena, neer to the Pirenean mountains which diuide France from Spain, in the 13th yeer of his Raign, and the thirtith of his age, in the yeer of our Lord 353, according to S. IEROM's computation.

The death of the Emperour Conſtans.

Whil'ſt

Whilſt matters paſſed in the Weſt after this manner, in the Eaſt with the third brother and Emperour CONSTANTIVS, who ruled all that part of the Empire, things proſpered not ſo well, eſpecially in the warres: for he had great and dangerous warres with the King of Perſia: and hauing fought with him nine ſeuerall times, he was at euery time ouerthrowne, with the loſſe of many of his people. In the end, they fought one moſt cruell battaile: and the victorie being apparant of the Emperors ſide, his ſouldiers vſed the matter ſo ill, as thoſe which were held for conquered, became conquerors: and ſo CONSTANTIVS loſt this battaile alſo, as he had done many others, in ſuch ſort that the King of Perſia recouered certain great Cities in Meſopotamia. Moreouer in the ſame parts of the Eaſt, there happened many earth-quakes wherwith certain Cities were deſtroyd, and ſwallowed into the earth: which by true Chriſtian authors was attributed to the iuſt iudgement of God, for that this Emperor did maintaine the hereſie of ARRIVS, and perſecuted the true Chriſtians. But returning to our new Emperour MAGNENTIVS, it happened in this manner: that hauing murthered CONSTANS, as we haue declared, the Armie which was in France obeyed and receiued him gladly, and all Spaine preſently did the like, together with Italy and Africa in like manner: whither he determining to come, made his ſonne whoſe name was DECENCIVS, CÆSAR; to leaue him in the gouernment of France and Spaine with their confines. But in Hungarie, Auſtria, Slauonia, Dalmatia, and part of Græcia, the ordinary legions which were in thoſe places, choſe an old and valiant Captain for Emperor, whoſe name was BRITANNIO or VETRANIO; who was a man highly beloued of the ſouldiers, for his great wiſedome and valour in the warres; and for the victories which he had obtained in the defence of thoſe Prouinces againſt the barbarous Nations. Of BRITANNIO you ſhall heare more hereafter.

Conſtantius ouerthrowne in 9 ſeuerall battels by the Perſians.

Conſtantius ouerthrowne in the tenth battell by the Perſians, for that he knew not how to vſe the victory.

Great earth-quakes in the Eaſt in the time of Conſtantius

Decencius made Cæſar by Magnencius.

About the ſame time, when it was knowne in Rome that CONSTANS was dead, NEPOTIANVS preſuming on his neerneſſe of bloud to the deceaſed Emperor (for, he was the Emperour CONSTANTINE's ſiſters ſon) aſſembling together a company of Fenſers, Sword-plaiers, and ſuch others, proclaimed himſelf Emperor. But as his beginning had no ſound foundation; ſo had he an vnluckie end: for, within twenty nine daies after that hee had with great difficulty enjoyed the title of Emperor, he was ſlain by MAGNENTIVS his Captains. And ſo MAGNENTIVS remained Emperour (although a Tyrant) of Italie, Africa, France, and Spain, in concurrence and diſgrace of CONSTANTIVS in the Eaſt, who in truth by juſt title was ſole Emperor.

CONSTANTIVS, beeing aduertiſed of the death of his Brother CONSTANS, and of the ſucceſſe of MAGNENTIVS, was greatly perplexed, ſeeing himſelf oppreſſed with warre againſt the Perſians; and, on the other ſide, bound to reuenge the death of his Brother, and to root out ſo mighty an enemy as MAGNENTIVS, who grew great in a very ſhort time; and BRITANNIO alſo, who was not ſlightly to be regarded. But, after many conſultations, it was concluded to ſettle all matters of the Eaſt in the beſt order hee might, and to paſſe into Europe againſt MAGNENTIVS. Whereupon he determined to make his coſen germane GALLVS, CÆSAR; who was brother to IVLIANVS, of whom we ſhall ſpeak heerafter: Both which were ſons to a brother of CONSTANTINE the Great, named CONSTANTIVS; whom his father CONSTANTIVS had by a ſecond wife; and, the better to bee aſſured of this new CÆSAR, he married him to one of his owne ſiſters, whoſe name was CONSTANTIA. And leauing this GALLVS in the Eaſt, hauing firſt concluded a kinde of truce or peace with the King of Perſia, he came into Europe againſt MAGNENTIVS, with the greateſt power he was able to leuie; and by the way purpoſed to haue fought with the ould Captain BRITANNIO, whom we ſaid to bee called Emperor in Auſtria, Hungary, and Slauonia. But BRITANNIO would not make any reſiſtance: for, laying aſide his imperiall robes, hee came into Thracia to meet him; and, humbling himſelf before CONSTANTIVS, ſaid vnto him, that he renouncing the Empire, yeelded himſelf into his hands; to the end he ſhould diſpoſe of him at his pleaſure. CONSTANTIVS very joyfully accepted his humility; and, lifting him vp from ground, imbraced and honoured him much in ſpeeches; and, calling him Father, ſet him at his owne table: and they two ſupt that night together. And, beeing informed of all matters by BRITANNIO concerning MAGNENTIVS, he kept on his journey; and ſent BRITANNIO to a City in Bithynia in Aſia, and gaue him rents & reuenues ſufficient for the maintenance of his eſtate: whither he retired himſelf with many his friends and Familiars, and liued there ſix yeers after in great reſt and tranquillity.

Gallus made Cæſar by Conſtantius.

Britannio yeelded himſelf to Conſtantius.

Conſtantius accepted Britannio for his friend and called him father.

CONSTANTIVS, paſſing forwards, drew neer to Italie, where MAGNENTIVS lay in wait waite for him: and the warre began betweene them, not onely with great power and numbers of men; but also with great hatred and malice: for besides that they both fought for the Empire, they had sent letters and messages the one to the other, which had much incensed them both. And so the warres began to be very cruell, and there ensued some battailes wherein fortune shewed herself variable; MAGNENTIVS hauing somtimes the victorie, and sometimes CONSTANTIVS, as CASSIODORVS reporteth in his Tripartite History. But, after many conflicts, each of them setting vp his rest, they fought a great battell neer the City of Mursia in Spain, which was one of the most cruell and bloudy that hath been seen; and the Roman Empire lost therein the best men of all the ordinary Legions: for, it continued the greatest part of all the day, and part of the night. There were slain of both sides foure and fifty thousand men, all valiant old souldiers; wherein CONSTANTIVS obtained the victory, and MAGNENTIVS escaped by flight.

A cruell battell betwixt Magnentius and Constantius.

It is very strange what some Authors write concerning this battell; that MAGNENTIVS Armie did consist but of thirty and odde thousand men, and CONSTANTIVS had in his Army threescore and ten thousand: and of those which were ouercom, there died four and twenty thousand; and of them which ouercame, thirty thousand. Whereby it appeareth, with what resolution, force or obstinacy, MAGNENTIVS and his men did fight, who slue as many of their enemies as they themselues were in number: and there remained but six thousand of them liuing.

MAGNENTIVS being ouerthrowne fled into Italie (as EVTROPIVS and AVRELIVS VICTOR doo write): where reinforcing himself the best he could, he resolued to haue returned again to try his fortune, and once again to fight with CONSTANTIVS; hauing first in vain sought to come to some composition of peace, seeming to bee contented if CONSTANTIVS would suffer him to possesse but Thracia onely. Finally, coming to another encounter, he was again ouerthrowne; and, fleeing from the battell, shut himself vp in the City of Lions in France: where, being aduertised that his souldiers practised to deliuer him aliue into the hands of CONSTANTIVS, he slue himself with his owne poiniard, leaning against a wall (as saith AVRELIVS VICTOR) and so ended his Empire which he had tyrannically vsurped, together with his life; being of the age of fifty yeers.

Magnentius, being ouerthrowne the second time slue himself.

When his sonne DECENCIVS (whom he had made CÆSAR, and Gouerner of France) vnderstood of his death, being out of hope to make head against CONSTANTIVS, and to defend his gouernment, hee hung himself. CONSTANTIVS hauing happily ended so dangerous a warre, all the Prouinces which had held for MAGNENTIVS (without any resistance) submitted themselues to his will: and hee being very joyfull came triumphing to the City of Milan; where for a certain space he made his abode.

Decencius, hearing of the death of his father, hung himself.

Whil'st these matters befell CONSTANTIVS in the West, his cosen GALLVS (whom he left for CÆSAR, and Gouerner generall of the Prouinces in the East) administred no point of justice, neither defended that estate with such valour as hee ought to haue done. For, it is written, that SAPOR King of Persia ouerthrew him in battell, and in the rest hee vsed extreme cruelty: And Writers particularly affirm, that in the City of Antioch hee did put to death the greatest part of all the Nobility there. And of the Iewes of Iudea, and of Palestina, for that they had attempted to rebell, he most cruelly made many thousands of either sex, and of all ages, to be slain. He commanded the Cities of Tiberias, Diospolis, Cæsarea, and others, to bee set on fire; which, Saint IEROM doth report in his additions to EVSEBIVS. When CONSTANTIVS vnderstood of these and other matters (which, AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS recites at large, being an ey-witnes: which Author wrote the life of CONSTANTIVS, IVLIANVS and IOVIANVS, Emperors of those times, very truely and distinctly; but with the most ragged stile that euer I read in any Latin Author: yet it was great pity that so many of his Works were lost) hee, being desirous to preuent the disorders whereof I haue made mention, and standing already in some fear of GALLVS, sent some secretly to kill him; which was easily effected, hauing first sought some other remedies. And so for that time CONSTANTIVS remained sole Emperor without any CÆSAR or companion in all the Roman Empire: and from Milan he prouided and sent Captains and Gouerners to all parts. And, because he was of light beleef, and took pleasure in factions (an ill thing in any man, but in Princes most dangerous) and to commit cruelties, and to inflict punishments, there were daily offered new occasions: by reason whereof, he vsed great cruelty, and put many to death; which, MARCELLINVS describes at large.

Constantius made his cosen Gallus to bee slain.

A-

Among other accidents, a valiant ould Captain, whose name was SILVANVS, who at that time was Generall against the Germans, was accused to haue practised some matters against his Imperiall Majesty. Which accusation (all Writers affirm) was through the enuy which they bare him for his victories and good successe: and this credulous Emperor, as it seems, did also enuy him, and intended to cause him to be slain. Whereof SILVANVS beeing aduertised (as he was very much honoured for his age and bounty, and for the great honour which he had wonne in sundry warres and battels; but principally in the warres of CONSTANTINE the Great, against LICINIVS) and finding no means to assure his life; forced more through fear than his own voluntary choice, he resolued to rebell, and to take vpon him the title of Emperor. Which he did, shewing first to his souldiers his disgrace, and how he was odious to CONSTANTIVS; and how that for the seruice which he and they had done, he had commanded him to be slaine. Which being vnderstood, they all with one voice hailed him Emperor, swearing and promising to protect and defend him. These newes did greatly trouble CONSTANTIVS, who was yet in Milane: and at the very instant that he was aduertised hereof; without discouering it to any man, making shew as though he knew nothing, he compounded with a certain subtile and valiant Captaine, named VRSICINVS: who besides his familiars and necessarie seruants tooke with him tenne Companions extraordinary men and very valiant; with which hee vndertooke to kill SILVANVS, vnder this pretext and policie:

Siluanus chosē Emperor by his souldiers.

CONSTANTIVS wrote certaine Letters vnto SILVANVS, wherein making no shewe to haue vnderstood ought of his rebellion, hee fained hee would depart from Milane and haue him with him, with many honourable words willing him to repaire to him and to deliuer vp the charge which he held, to the Captain whom he had sent. VRSICINVS made great haste on his way; to the end, that through the shortnesse of the time, it might be the better belecued, that all his proceedings had been vnknowne to CONSTANTIVS. As he with his companions came neer to the Army, among which one was MARCELLINVS the writer of this History; SILVANVS thinking no other but that this man was sent to be his successor, and then being no time to debate the matter, made no account thereof. VRSICINVS seeming careless and simple, so cunningly handled the matter, conferring with certain captains his friends, and others which were discontented with SILVANVS, that by means of some gifts which he gaue, and great promises which he made, they resolued to kill poor SILVANVS. Whereupon, assembling together a good number of souldiers, they went one morning to his Palace; where killing his guard, they entred perforce; and SILVANVS, fleeing into a Church of the Christians, was therein found and slain. And in this manner ended his Empire with his life, hauing vsurped the same onely 30 daies.

A stratagem vsed by Vrsicinus, thereby to kill Siluanus.

Siluanus slain in a Church of the Christians.

This plot being ended to the good liking of CONSTANTIVS, there followed other troubles and combustions: For the barbarous Nations of high Germanie came down to make warre in the Empire: and as all things were yet very much out of order, by reason of the death of SILVANVS, they did much harme by taking certain Cities, and by robbing and spoiling the Countrie. Which when CONSTANTIVS vnderstood, considering with himself that if he went thither in person, the whole Empire was without any defence; and imagining also that a Generall was not to be trusted with that warre, he resolued to choose his cosin germane IVLIANVS, and to make him CÆSAR, who was brother to GALLVS, of whom wee haue spoken heretofore, and had been CÆSAR in the East, and slain by his commandement; both which were the sons of CONSTANTIVS, brother to CONSTANTINE the Great, before spoken of.

This IVLIANVS was a yong man of whom there was great hope: for hee was of a good constitution of body, of an excellent wit, inclined and giuen to studie, and therewith very well learned. IVLIANVS was made CÆSAR and adopted by CONSTANTIVS, with great solemnity in the Citie of Milane, where CONSTANTIVS then made his abode: yet some say, that it was at Athens, in Gracia: and the better to confirme the friendship and alliance, he married him to his sister HELENA. Other matters also passing, which for breuity I omit, IVLIANVS went towards the Army which was in Germanie; where all things succeeded so well with him, that he not onely recouered the losses receiued, but also made great spoil and slaughter of his enemies.

Iulianus made Cæsar by Constantius.

CONSTANTIVS, leauing the West in charge with IVLIANVS, resolued to passe into the East, where there was no lesse danger and need of his presence: for, the Persians, being antient tient and daily enemies to the Romans, as the of-spring and successors of the Parthians, neuer ceased from inuading and making warre vpon the frontiers of the Romans; robbing and spoyling the Territories of the Empire. And in his way he purposed to go to Rome, where hee was receiued with great ioy and magnificence. But he could not stay there aboue thirty daies: for, besides other newes from the East, he vnderstood that the Sarmates, a fierce and barbarous nation (which were the Russians, Muscouites, Polonians, and some others) had entred and runne through Misia (now called Bulgaria and Seruia) and with other nations were comm into Hungary. Wherefore hee presently departed, and committed the charge of the Sarmatian warres to Marcellus Peberius sent by Constantius against the Sarmates.

MARCELLVS PEBERVS, an excellent Captain of great experience, and himselfe passed through Slauonia towards the East. And notwithstanding that he had a great Armie, yet he was not free from fear: for, as this Emperor euer preuailed in all his ciuill warres, and against Tyrants; so against the Persians he was euer vnfortunate: wherefore he practised to come to some composition of peace with SAPOR (the second of that name) King of Persia; who then raigned, and refused not to giue eare to an Ambassador which motioned the same. Whereof SAPOR, growing beyond all measure proud, wrote a most hautie Letter to CONSTANTIVS; which, with the answer thereto, MARCELLINVS setts down. Wherein he required, if the Emperor would haue any peace with him, that he should first resign into his hands the Prouinces of Mesopotamia and Armenia, which had been subiect to his Ancestors (so great was the power and presumption of the Kings of Persia, that they would not grant peace and truce to a Roman Emperor, except he would giue them two of the best Prouinces of the world).

Lib. 7 the tenor of a Letter written by Sapor King of Persia to the Emperor Constantius: and an answer thereto.

To this Letter, CONSTANTIVS sent him another for answer; which was a notable Letter and very discreet, which for breuity I do not insert. Wherein he held the grauity and maiesty of a Roman Emperor; and, reprehending SAPOR for his pride and ambition, he not only denied what the other required, but did also put him clean out of all hope to haue any peace with him: and so afterwards there began a very cruell war.

The effect of Constantius letter to Sapor.

At such time as these matters passed in the East, IVLIANVS, who remained in France, CÆSAR, and Generall against the Germans, after some other victories subdued his enemies in a very great and bloudy battell: and, hauing obtained this notable victory, by a generall consent of the whole Armie he was called Emperor and AVGVSTVS; and they made him equall with CONSTANTIVS.

Iulianus was by the Armie made Emperor and Augustus.

These newes within fewe daies were brought to CONSTANTIVS in the East; wherewith he was so much disquieted, that he was once resolued to haue abandoned the warres there, and to haue marched with all his Legions against IVLIANVS. But, afterwards altering his determination, he resolued to send Ambassadors vnto him; and, thinking with good words to win him, he sent to perswade him to content himself with the title and dignity of CÆSAR, and to renounce the name of Emperor and AVGVSTVS. With this ambassage he sent a chief man, whose name was LEONAS; who, for that he came from CONSTANTIVS, was honourably receiued in the Army, and audience was giuen him. He hauing deliuered his Ambassage, and the Emperors Letters being read, the Armie not onely refused to yeeld thereto, but they all with one voice confirmed what they had done, calling IVLIANVS Emperour and AVGVSTVS: onely they obeyed CONSTANTIVS in putting FLORENTINVS out of the office of Pretorian Prefect, which was giuen to NEBRIDIVS. Touching the rest, IVLIANVS answered CONSTANTIVS in humble manner, with the best words hee could, promising to be to him a loyall and an obedient companion; desiring him that hee would not depose him from his dignity, seeing that he had accepted thereof against his will, being thereto compelled by the Armie. And heerwith he returned to make war against the Germans with greater force and circumspection than before. And foreseeing it was very requisite to tame and subdue those nations, imagining that he should haue war (which he could not auoid) with CONSTANTIVS, he aduised his Captains and Troops to make haste, and to assail their enemies before they were by them assailed: whereupon there ensued between him and the Germanes some notable battails and encounters; which I cannot relate without altering my ordinarie course of breuitie.

Constantius sent an Ambassador to Iulianus.

Iullianus answer to Constantius.

After that CONSTANTIVS vnderstood that his Ambassadors could not obtain what hee required, he resolued to make war against IVLIANVS, presuming on his great power, and the good fortune which he had euer had against other Tyrants. Wherefore hee sought meanes to confirm the peace and friendship, which then was in question between him and ARSACES King of Armenia, and other Kings of the East; to the end they should not ioin in league and confederacy with the King of Persia, his chiefest enemy: against whom hee left such forces as he thought sufficient to defend the countrey, and to continue the war. After this he came into Europe; and, trauelling from Antioch in Syria to the City of Tharsus, by the way hee felt himself somewhat ill of a light Feuer: but yet notwithstanding he held on his journey, thinking that his exercise would haue holpen him by diuerting the humour; and therefore he caused himself to be carried in a Litter, making small journies. But, coming to the foot of Mount Taurus, he felt himself much oppressed with his disease; the Feuer increasing vpon him in such sort, that hee seemed to be all on fire. And so, knowing his infirmity to be mortall, and that his death approched, he made his Will; wherein he nominated IVLIANVS (his enemie, and a tyrant) for his heir and successor: so the man, whom in his life time he would not admit for a companion, at his death hee chose for his heir; hauing in this action (as a good Emperor) great regard to the common good and quiet of the Empire.

Constantius last Will and testament.

This Emperor raigned foure and twenty yeers; seuen with his brethren, and seuenteen alone, although in contention with the tyrants aforenamed; and in his fathers time he was CÆSAR thirteen yeers: wherefore some say, that he raigned in all eight and thirty yeers. He was when hee died (as saith EVTROPIVS) fiue and forty yeers old: yet all Authors agree not heerupon. This Emperor was reckoned among the indifferent Emperors: for, notwithstanding that he was endowed with some singular gifts, yet was he not altogether free from vices. For, as he was courteous, milde, and of a pleasing conuersation, liberall and affable to his seruants, and very temperate in eating and drinking, and would take great pains, and delighted and desired much to speak well (yet naturally he was neither very sharp-witted, nor eloquent) and was an excellent Archer, and delighted greatly therein: so was hee otherwise very credulous, and delighted to hear men speak euill of others. Which moued him to commit many cruelties: for, he was by nature mistrustfull, and euer feared treason, and therefore trusted fewe men: so was he likewise much giuen to women.

The death of Constantius.

With these vices and vertues he well preserued and defended the Roman Empire; and died, according to S. IEROM's computation, in the yeer of our Lord 364.

THE LIFE OF IVLIANVS, ONLY OF THIS NAME, CALLED APOSTATA, AND SIX AND FORTITH EMPEROVR OF ROME.

AFter the death of CONSTANTIVS, which hapned as is before declared, his coson germane IVLIANVS remained sole Emperor of the whole Roman Empire, who in the others life time enjoyed the title of AVGVSTVS. This IVLIANVS was by birth such as we haue specified in the life of CONSTANTIVS, and in valour and sufficiency was one of the best Emperors that euer was; as presently we will make manifest. All which good graces he corrupted and defaced, by renouncing the Christian faith whereof he had before made profession, and by turning to the idolatry of the Gentils: wherefore he was commonly called IVLIANVS APOSTATA: whereof, some Authors say, one LIBANIVS an Idolater & a fa-famous Rhetorician was the occasion. Which, besides the reasons which may bee heerto annexed, is a notable example for all Princes, and men of all estates and conditions whatsoeuer, that they not onely with all diligence seeke out masters for their sonnes, which may be expert in those sciences wherein they purpose to instruct them; but that principally they be vertuous, honest, and sound men in religion: for learning without vertue is little worth. And it is most certaine, that what children learne in their youth, is so imprinted in their vnderstandings, as they neuer forget the same. And those exercises & qualities wherein they are bred vp in their tender age, become proper and naturall, and are neuer left by them in their whole life time; whereof the masters which haue charge of the children are the principal cause. And although we might produce many good and fair examples, yet this present shall now suffice, returning to IVLIANVS, in whom his masters infidelitie took so deep impression, that it well appeareth, what prejudice hee thereby receiued: for, in the rest hee was so compleat and so rare, that in goodnes, bounty and courtesie, they compare him with TITVS; in clemency, with ANTONINVS; in his fortunate stratagems at wars against the Germanes, they make him equall to TRAIAN; in temperance and modestie, to MARCVS AVRELIVS: and in knowledge and learning, to the ancient Philosophers. He was endued with a singular memory, and was very studious, and therefore learned in many Arts and Sciences; and was eloquent and well spoken, no lesse by the gift of nature then by Art. He was most temperate in his dyet and sleep: and most chaste and free from all fleshly passion and dishonestie. Hee was so valiant and hardie in Armes (although but of a small constitution of body, and delicately limmed) that hee was therefore noted and reproued to be more hardy and aduenturous, than for a Generall or Emperor was fit or conuenient. Of glory and renowne hee was greedily couetous; which is a vice wherein great spirits do oftentimes offend. With his friends he was very pleasant and bountifull, and loued to do justice indifferently to all men; which he strictly obserued in the time that he was CÆSAR, and in the small time that he enjoied the Empire. He was likewise adorned with many other vertues; which, EVTROPIVS as an eye-witnes, AVRELIVS VICTOR, and AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS, doo record. But, with all this, hee was an Infidell, which was great pity; and his vnderstanding was blinded by the perswasion of his master LIBANIVS, who was a Gentile and an Idolater.

To whom Iulianus was compared.

Iulianus an Idolater by the perswasion of his schoolmaster.

Those things which passed in the time that he was CÆSAR and Emperor, are very largely and particularly described by AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS, as by him which saw and vnderstood the same: for, they hapned in his time; and he also followed and serued him in the wars of Persia. But I will relate onely that which happened when hee was Emperor, and that briefly; for, he raigned onely two yeers: wherefore, I hold it not fit in a Raign of so small continuance to spend much time.

Being aduertised of the death of CONSTANTIVS (which newes were brought to him in France, whence he was about to go to meet him; and the other, as we haue said, was comming towards him with the same resolution) in great haste hee marched to the City of Constantinople, which euer since the death of the Emperor CONSTANTINE was the Head of the Empire; where, by all means possible he sought to win the loue & good will of the people of all nations; which the better to bring to passe, hee vsed this policie: First, hee caused the Temples of the Gentiles to be set open, and suffred them therein to commit their superstitious idolatry, and to adore their idols. And although he abhorred, and was an enemy to the Christians, yet at that time he persecuted them not with deaths and tortures; and in contentions between the Christians and the Arrians he was neuter, shewing himself inclined to neither partie: wherefore he was not very hatefull to any; and the barbarous nations standing in fear of his great fame (for, by reason of the German wars he was growne very famous) abstained from making warre, or from troubling the Empire; and so sent their Ambassadors to him to treat of peace and friendship, which he granted.

Iulianus made the temples of the Idolaters to be opened.

In this manner hee began to gouern the Empire with as great prosperity and contentment of all men, as euer any man had done. But, as his heart hee was an Idolater; so hee resolued to finde some means to supplant the true Christian religion, induced thereto by the diuell and his owne wickednes: And, the better to effect the same, he practised a means neuer before vsed by any other; which was, To shew himself pitifull and not cruell, perceiuing that by means of torments inflicted vpon the Martyrs, the holy Christian faith was greatly increased: and therefore he determined to take a contrarie course (as RVFFINVS, S. IEROM, and CASSIODORVS, report) which was, to induce them by gifts, fauours, flatteries, and by bestowing on them offices offices and dignities, to the end they should renounce the Christian faith, and do sacrifice to his false gods. And as the same authors affirme, there were some, and they not a few, which being couetous and ambitious, through desire to grow rich and to be honoured, denied the christian faith.

A new deuice found out by Iulianus to persecute the Church.

And this was one of the greatest persecutions that euer the Church endured, aswell in respect of those which abandoned the same, as for that IVLIANVS perceiued that by this meane he could not throughlie accomplish his desire; although as is said, he put none to death, neither vsed any violence to any. He therefore made lawes and generall decrees, that no Christian should be master of any arts or sciences, neither should ther studie in any Schooles but such as would adore his Idols, to the end that through the desire of learning, they should become Idolaters, or else at the least should remaine idiots, and without learning, and so be insufficient and vnable to preach the christian faith. He likewise ordeined that no Christian should haue any charge, or hold any office of iustice, neither should be a Captaine in the warres, neither enioy any other dignitie. Finally, he vsed all the inuentions and meanes he could deuise to make warre against IESVS CHRIST, without shedding any christian bloud: which I hold to be the inuention and subtiltie of the Diuell, to take the crowne from the holie Martyrs, which they obteined through the persecution of the sword.

Decrees made by Iulianus against the Christians.

Vsing this pitifull crueltie against the Christians (as a man of courage and valiant in Armes) he resolued to make warre against the Persians, who onely had not shewed any humilitie, or acknowledged his superioritie. Wherefore he went into Asia with a great Army: with which and the ordinarie legions hauing passed through Asia the lesse and other prouinces, he entred Mesopotamia, which (as is said) was the Lady, for whom the Romanes and Persians did ordinarily contend: and after some light encounters and skirmishes, he seized vpon the citie of Cercasio which fauoured the Romanes and was enobled by the Emperour DIOCLESIAN with wals and bulwarkes; and from thence he passed to Zaita, where he was aduertised that the King of Persia was neere at hand with his whole power: whereupon he marshalled his troupes, with a great desire to come with him to a battaile. But his enemie at that time durst not fight with him, but sent him many Ambassages, intreating pardon, and promising him a great part of his countries. To whom this valiant Emperour would giue no audience: but seeing that he refused the battaile, the more to prouoke him, he entred his countrey by sundrie waies, taking many cities in Soria, some by force, and others yeelded themselues without any resistance; committing great spoiles in all that countrey, vntill at last the Persians for very shame were forced to fight, which battaile was very cruell. Before which, this blind IVLIANVS (as OROSIVS and S. IEROME recite) of very malice and hatred which he bare to the Christians, whom he called Galileans (as saith THEODORETVS in his history) made a vow to his gods, that if he obtained the victory, he would do sacrifice to them in the bloud of those Christians which would not worship idols. And it pleased God in his secret iudgement to giue him victorie at that time, thereby to reward him in this life for the morall vertues wherewith he was endued, to the end that perpetuallie he should be punished in the other world, for his damnable infidelitie.

Iulian his enterprise against the Persians.

Iulianus his vow to the gods.

He seeing himselfe victorious, and finding no resistance, marched to the famous citie of Thesiphonte; and finding no forces that durst stop his passage, he determined to returne to winter in Mesopotamia: but vpon the way his people indured great penurie and want with thirst and hunger, aswell for that his Armie was exceeding great, as also for that his enemies did often assault and molest them. And notwithstanding that the Persians would neuer come to any equal fight, but gaue camizadoes, with light skirmishes, sodainely charging, and then running away, after the manner of the Arabians in these daies; yet therewith his Armie was exceedinglie much toiled and tired. And in this manner it pleased God (who with his death would stop the execution of so many innocents which he purposed to haue sacrificed) that a Persian fugitiue, who was the guide to his Army, trecherouslie led him and his Armie into a place where many of his enemies lay in ambush; where being charged, he was constrained to fight, and in the fight pell mell being vnknowne was striken with a launce through the arme into the bodie: with which wound losing his senses, he fell vpon his horses necke, and so his people took him, and caried him into a tent, wherein with some medicines which they applyed vnto him, he came againe to himself; and recouering strength, he called for his horse and Armes: for he would againe returne to the battaile. But afterwards feeling his force to faile him, they write, that with extreme pride he vsed these words against our Sauiour CHRIST, It sufficeth that thou CHRIST of Galilea hast ouercome, for so he was accustomed to call call him. After this, ſeeing that all thoſe which were about him began to weep, hee reprehended them, ſaying; You do ill to weep for that Prince which dies in the fauour of the gods: and ſo he diſcourſed of the immortality of the ſoule as long as hee was able to ſpeak, vntill that his bloud being wholly ſpent, he died; which in truth was great pity, that there ſhould be ſuch accurſed blindnes in a man in whom there was ſo great valour, and ſo many good and vertuous parts. Hee died in the ſeuenth yeer after he was made CÆSAR, and in the third yeer of his Empire, being 31 yeers old, in the yeer of our Lord (according to Saint IEROM) 366.

THE LIFE OF IOVIANVS, ONELY OF THIS NAME, AND SEVEN AND FORTITH EMPEROR OF ROME.

MVch was the death of IVLIANVS lamented by the whole Armie: for, hee was much beloued by all his men of war. But the Church and all Chriſtians rendred thanks to our Lord God, who in his mercy had deliuered them from the yoke of ſo great a ſeruitude. There was ſo great a confuſion in the Camp by reaſon of the death of this Emperour, that they were in danger to haue bin ouerthrowne by the Perſians: beſides that, they were much diſtreſſed through want of victuals. And the enemy, vnderſtanding of the death of the Emperor, neuer left to moleſt them on euerie ſide with ſuch continuall ſudden aſſaults and alarmes, that they were not able to endure them. Wherefore, the chiefe Commanders of the Army aſſembled themſelues together to chuſe an Emperor which might gouern them. After much contention and diuerſity of opinions, they agreed to chuſe one (as ſaith EVTROPIVS) whoſe name was MARCELLINVS. But finally they concluded to name a very famous man called IOVIANVS, who was the ſonne of a Noble-man called VARRONIANVS, an Hungarian, or an Inhabitant of Hungarie: who, leauing the warres which hee had long followed, and to auoid the tumults and troubles which he ſaw in the Empire, retired, and gaue himſelf to his reſt and quiet in certain poſſeſſions which he held in Hungary. But his ſonne IOVIANVS came to the Emperor CONSTANTIVS Court, and followed the warres: who, for that he was valiant, and a goodly Perſonage, was greatly eſteemed by IVLIANVS; and, whil'ſt he was CÆSAR and afterwards Emperour, this man was the chief Commander of the ordinarie Troops which went with the Emperor.

Praiſe of Iouianus.

This IOVIANVS was of an excellent witte and ſound judgement, giuen to ſtudie, and therewith well learned. He was tall of ſtature, and well proportioned, and a faithfull Chriſtian; in ſo much that when IVLIANVS commanded, that no Chriſtian ſhould bee a Captain, neither ſhould haue any charge or office in the warres; IOVIANVS pleaſantly ſaid, that hee made greater account of the faith whereof he made profeſſion, than of any dignity or honour that he enjoyed; and ſo gaue vp his charge. Being afterwards choſen Emperor, RVFFINVS and and THEODORETVS write, that ſeeing IVLIANVS had drawne the men of warre of his Armie to commit idolatrie, and to doo ſacrifice to his gods; he in a publike Oration which he made to them, ſaid, that he (although he might) would not (being a Chriſtian) be an Emperor of Infidels. And ſo hee reſiſted, and abſolutely refuſed the Empire. But all men were ſo well pleaſed with his election, that, after they had approued the ſame, they cried out aloud, ſaying; We are all Chriſtians. And for his ſake thoſe which were not ſo, reſolued to become Chriſtians, vpon condition that he would accept the Empire.

Iouianus choſe Emperor.

In this manner, with incredible joy and gladnes, they ſware obedience vnto him, and gaue him the Imperiall Enſignes. Whereupon hee preſently ordered and re-inforced the Armie; which could not be done without great difficulty: for, SAPOR vnderſtanding of the death of IVLIANVS (who, for his noble acts and great courage, was generally feared of all men) made ſmall account of this new Emperor; but, gathering together the greateſt forces hee was able, gaue ſo fierce a charge in the Emperors Armie, that the Romans were likely to haue bin wholly defeated: and the Perſians apparantly had the better. IOVIANVS marching with great trouble and danger, for that the waies were craggie and mountainous; The firſt day he followed his journey: and, making an Alt in a vallie, his Armie was preſently compaſſed about on euery ſide by the Perſians; who aſſailed and skirmiſhed with them after their manner.

The next day he came to the City of Carras, where IOVIANVS and his ſouldiers remembring that in antient time MARCVS CRASSVS was in that coaſt ouerthrowne and ſlain by the Parthians; holding it for an ominous preſage, they accounted themſelues loſt, if the enemie euer gaue them battell. The principall cauſe of which feare was by reaſon of their weaknes through the hunger which they had endured, and at that inſtant did endure, through want of victuals: for, as two ſo great Armies marched ſo neer together, no prouiſion could bee made that could ſuffice to ſuſtain them. But in all theſe extremities IOVIANVS neuer fainted or was diſcouraged, neither omitted to vſe all diligence in guiding, defending and animating his ſouldiers, till they came to the riuer Tigris, their dangers ſtill increaſing: where King SAPOR ſent him Ambaſſadors, giuing him to vnderſtand, that, conſidering the weaknes of his Army and his owne force, he was moſt aſſured of victory; yet, if hee would render him the Prouinces hee required (which were many) he would be content to hould perpetuall peace with the Empire. IOVIANVS, ſeeing the preſent neceſſity wherein hee was, took counſell heerupon with the chiefeſt men in his Army: and, after 3 or 4 daies conſultation, a peace was concluded for thirty yeers; IOVIANVS leauing to King SAPOR all the Prouinces beyond the riuer Tigris, and ſome Cities in Meſopotamia; with further condition, that the Emperour ſhould not aid or aſſiſt ARSACES King of Armenia: which peace or truce (as EVTROPIVS writes, whoſe hiſtorie ends with the life of this Emperor; and many other Writers) was held for very ſhamefull and diſhonorable to the greatnes of the Roman Empire, for voluntarily giuing to the enemy part of the Prouinces thereto belonging, and for decreaſing the bounds and limits thereof. But, for that Princes actions are euer diuerſly judged of, PAVLVS OROSIVS and other Writers excuſe him; alleaging, he made ſuch a peace as was requiſite, conſidering the time; and albeit it were not honorable, yet at leaſt it was profitable and needfull: for, he was in manifeſt danger to haue loſt his whole Armie, and the greateſt part of the Prouinces that he rendred. Heerof euery man may judge after his phantaſie; but thus it was: IOVIANVS, hauing concluded this peace, went into Soria; where he commanded by publike proclamation, that all thoſe Biſhops which were exiled for reſiſting and contradicting the hereſie of ARRIVS, or any other vnlawfull occaſion, ſhould be recald and reſtored; and principally the great ATHANASIVS. He likewiſe reuoked and made void all the prohibitions and decrees made by IVLIANVS againſt the Chriſtians; and ordained that they ſhould be admitted to any dignity, office, charge, magiſtracy or ſtudy, as they were wont to be in the time of the Emperor CONSTANTINE the Great. He likewiſe cauſed to be paid to the Churches thoſe rents of corn and other things that CONSTANTINE had giuen them, and which by the commandement of IVLIANVS were ſequeſtred; which is written by THEODORETVS and RVFFINVS. IOVIANVS, hauing laid ſo godly a foundation to his Empire concerning the Chriſtian faith, giuing in all things good ſignes of a good and juſt Prince, and prouiding for all matters in the Eaſt as to him ſeemed moſt needfull, began his journey towards Conſtantinople, ſhewing himſelf euery where as he paſſed in all his actions a juſt and a gracious Prince; ſo as all men conceiu'd great good hope of him. But this, and all his noble reſolutions, and other Chriſtianlike purpoſes, were interrupted by death; for, the iniquity of the people deſerued not ſo good a Prince; which hapned thus: He coming to a place which was called Dudaſiana, in the confines of Bithynia, and Galatia, in Aſia the leſs, the weather being very cold (for it was in the winter) they did ſet in the chamber where the Emperour ſhould lie that night, a great panne with kindled coales, which coales were wet: and as the officers of his chamber were gon to take their reſt, the chamber dore being lockt, and he aſleepe; the vapour of the fire waxing groſſe and thicke, and filling euery thing with ſmoake, and finding no place to euaporate, ſtopped the Emperours breath, in ſuch ſort as he was ſmothered ſleeping, and in the morning was found dead; all men imagining this to be the cauſe of his death. Yet ſome were of opinion that he died by eating of Muſhrumpes, which are held venemous. And others coniectured that he ate ſo much meate at ſupper, as his naturall heate could not digeſt the ſame, and ſo through the cruditie thereof he was ſuffocated. But howſoeuer it was, all men were very ſorrowfull for his death, he having held the ſcepter of the Empire only eight moneths; being, according to ſome writers, of the age of fortie yeeres: and after ſome other, thirtie and odde.

Whoſo deſireth to know more of this Emperour, as well in warre as in peace, let him reade the authors aboue named, and particularly AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS, who was with him in all his aduentures; and the Tripartite Hiſtorie of CASSIODORVS in his ſeuenth booke, and RVFFINVS in the tenth book of his eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie: and EVTROPIVS, although he be briefe was an eie-witneſſe. And here endeth his Hiſtorie. Many things may be gathred of the life of this Emperor, by reading the firſt booke of the epiſtles of Saint AMBROSE, and the fourth book of THEODORVS.

THE LIFE OF VALENTINIANVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND OF HIS BROTHER VALENS, THE Eight and Fortith Romane Emperor.

THE ARGVMENT.

VAlentinianus being the ſonne of a rope maker, for his vertues deſerued to be made an Emperour; euen as his father mounted from making of ropes to the higheſt martiall dignitie. He hauing taken vpon him the imperiall dignitie, choſe his brother Valens for his companion, and ſhortly after made his ſonne Gratianus, Cæſar. In their time the world was troubled, with ſo many prodigious earth-quakes, remouing of the ſea, ſtrange rainet, and ſo much warre as ther hath ſeldome been read of the like. Nevertheleſſe, theſe wiſe Emperours prouided excellently for all theſe troubles and dangers; and not onely ouercame barbarous Kings and ſtrangers which were their enemies, but alſo ſubdued domeſticall tyrants, among which was one whoſe name was Procopius, a kinſman to Iulianus the Apoſtata; who taking the enſignes of Emperours, was ſo reſolute as to come to fight with Valens. Valentinianus was a great friend to the Chriſtians, yet Valens was to the contrarie, and being earneſt to giue anſwere to certaine Ambaſſadors, he was taken with an Appleexie which bereaued him of the vſe of his tongue euen by leaning al his other ſenſes ſound, whereof within ſhort ſpace he died. Whereupon Valens remaining in the Empire, with his Nephew Gratian, as the manner of Vncles is, he began to make ſmall account of his Nephew: and fauouring the ſect of the Arrians, gaue himſelfe to inchauntments, nigromancies, to perſecute the Chriſtians, and to martyrize many of them. For which his wickednes God puniſhed him; for he comming againſt the Gothes (to whom he had done good) in a piece of ſeruice, was by them ouerthrowne: and flying wounded into a farmers houſe in the countrie, the houſe was fired by them; and he burning therein, made ſuch an end as his euil life deſerued, receiuing ſuch puniſhment at Gods hands, as ſuch obſtinate heretikes are worthy of.

The deſcent of Valentinianus.

IT pleaſed God of his goodnes, to giue to the Chriſtian and vertuous Emperour IOVIANVS, a ſucceſſor (although he left neither ſonne nor kinſman) which was like vnto him in faith, goodnes, and vertuous conditions: and this was VALENTINIANVS: who although that hee were but of a meane Parentage, and came of a poore father; yet he was a faithfull Chriſtian, and endued with excellent vertues. His fathers name was GRATIANVS: borne and bred in Hungarie, in a Citie of the Cimbales, a man of meane Parentage, as ſayth ſaith AVRELIVS VICTOR; and as he and PAVLVS DIACONVS affirme, was very poore, and by his trade a rope-maker: But he was of ſo great ſtrength, as vpon a day fiue ſouldiers ſtriuing with all their might to take one of thoſe ropes which he ſold, out of his hands, they were not able to doe it. Wherfore ſeeming to be ſtrong and a very able man for the warres, he was counſelled to follow the ſame; which he did: and hauing no leſſe courage of minde then force of body, he profited ſo much in Armes, through the notable exploits which he performed therein, as offices were beſtowed vpon him; and ſo aſcending by dgrees, he became Pretorian Prefect.

By theſe means his ſon VALENTINIANVS, of whom we purpoſe to treate, came to be bred vp in the wars, and therein wan great honour. Being Captaine of the companies called Scutarij, which were targettiers, ſo called, for that no others did beare targets, but they; IVLIANVS the Apoſtata commanded him to doe ſacrifice to his gods, or otherwiſe to giue vp the office which he held (as he did by others, and as we ſaid by IOVIANVS): but hee as a good Catholike and not as a fained Chriſtian, voluntarily ſurrendred his office and Captainſhippe, to continue in the Faith of CHRIST. And the good and Chriſtian IOVIANVS coming to the Empire, drew vnto him all ſuch, as he was; by meanes whereof VALENTINIANVS was in his ſeruice when he died, in the ſame place and office which he forſooke in the time of IVLIANVS. As ſoone as IOVIANVS was dead, the firſt and chiefeſt care that VALENTINIANVS took, was, to prepare his body to be ſent to Conſtantinople to be buried; and the ſecond and next was, to conſult who ſhould be the next Emperor. The chiefe commaunders marched with the Armie to the Citie of Nicea, which is the head and Metropolitane of the Prouince of Bithynia: where determining to nominate an Emperor, there were ſome which made account to haue been ſo; and among many, one was named, which was a Tribune called EQVITIVS; who (as MARCELLINVS reporteth) was afterwards for his curriſh and harſh conditions depoſed. But finally after long conſultations, VALENTINIANVS was choſen, by reaſon of his goodneſſe and valour, being at that time abſent, hauing remained certain daies iourney behinde the whole Armie; and being ſent for, and come, they all ſware obedience vnto him, with great ioy and contentment. For truly he was (as all men write) a goodly perſonage, very valiant, and magnanimous; very wiſe and temperate, a louer of iuſtice, eloquent, and of a good grace, honorable and vertuous, and a man who knew how to make himſelfe beloued and reſpected of all men. Hauing accepted the Empire, and beginning to prouide for ſuch things as might be needefull for the good gouernment thereof; it ſeemed good to the captaines and ſouldiers of the Armie to giue him a companion and an equall in the Empire, to be an aſſiſtant to him in the gouernment; which the Emperors of their own accord did often vſe to doe. VALENTINIANVS being aduertiſed hereof, commanded the Armie to be called together; and with a bold and ſtiddaine reſolution, among other matters ſpake vnto them in this manner:

Valentinianus gaue vp his office of Captain rather then he would doe ſacrifice to Idols.

Valentinianus choſen Emperor.

Gentlemen and Souldiers, it was in your hands and at your pleaſure, when I was not Emperour, to giue me the gouernment and command of the Empire; but now that I haue the gouernment and am in poſſeſſion thereof, it is no part of your charge, neither ought you to entermeddle therein: for that is my charge only, and the care thereof appertaineth to me to command and gouerne the common-wealth. And as for a companion, when neede ſhall require, I will take care for one. Theſe ſpeeches are written by THEODORETVS and other Authors make mention thereof: which made ſuch an impreſſion in the ſouldiers hearts, as from thenceforth they all tooke care to obey his commandements, not daring to ſpeake a word concerning any ſuch matter. But when he came to the Citie of Conſtantinople, which euer ſince the time of the Emperor CONSTANTINE, was the head of the Empire, imagining it to be a matter very requiſite, he made his brother VALENS his companion and equall with himſelfe in the Empire: which truely he ought not to haue done, for that he was infected with the Arrian hereſie, as hereafter we will declare. And hauing made this election, they diuided the Empire betweene them, ſo as VALENTINIANVS tooke charge of the Prouinces in the Weſt, and VALENS of thoſe in the Eaſt. And matters ſtanding vpon theſe tearmes, they both fell ſick of a burning feuer, ſo grieuouſly, as all men thought they would haue died; but afterwards recouering, there happened vnto theſe brethren ſo many warres and ſuch troubles, as they both had enough to doe. For the Saxons and Scots which are northerlie Nations, came in great troupes to make a conqueſt of the Iſle of Britannie, and the Germanes came againe downe into France: and the countries of Hungarie and Auſtria were inuaded by the Sarmates and the Cat-ti: Into Thracia came certaine companies of Gothes to robbe and steale. The King of Persia brake the truce, inuaded Armenia, and afterwards Mesopotamia. Whereupon by reason of these combustions and others which were feared, and some already begun, VALENS took his way towards the East, and VALENTINIANVS towards Milan: And into Hungarie they sent SEVERIANVS, a valiant Captain; and so they prouided and placed in diuers parts excellent Captains and Gouernors. To recite all that past in particular, would be a long worke: but in summe it was thus; that in the first three yeers of the raign of VALENTINIANVS, he had very cruel warres with the Saxons and Germanes: which in the end, after many battailes, he ouercame and subdued. In the third yeere of his raigne, he made his sonne GRATIANVS his companion, Emperour, and AVGVSTVS. And in Rome by reason of the death or depriuation of TVRCIVS APRONIANVS (for the Historie declareth it not, or I am forgetfull) he placed a Noble man, named ORPHITVS. As a good Christian, he honoured and fauoured the Christians, their Temples and Churches: which his brother VALENS did not in the East; but lying for the most part in the citie of Amioch, suffred the idolatries and superstitions of the Gentiles, and likewise the rites and ceremonies of the Iewes. But the Arrians and Hereticks he extremely fauoured, only he molested and was enemie to the true Christians: and aboue all, gaue himselfe to diuinations, sorceries, and prohibited Astrologie; which CASSIODORVS, IOANNES MONACVS, otherwise called ZONARAS, and RVFFINVS treate of at large.

Valens permitting Idolatrie, and the ceremonies of the Iewes, was an enemie to the Christians.

These two brethren gouerning the Empire, although after diuers manners, making head against the incursions of strange and barbarous nations, which infested the same; a Noble man called PROCOPIVS, borne in Sicilia, and neere kinsman to IVLIANVS Apostata (who beginning by meane degrees, came to be Captaine generall of the Imperiall Armies in the East) rebelled in Constantinople: and with the fauour and assistance of certaine Captaines, and some other men of warre (taking the Imperiall ensignes) he proclaimed himselfe Emperour; which greatly troubled the two Emperours: for they knew that he daily grew greater, and that his forces continually increased, and that he had sent for succours to the Gothes, and other strange nations.

Procopius was called Emperour.

The Empire being thus troubled, there also followed in those daies so generall and terrible an earth-quake, that an infinite number of houses, and sundrie cities fell downe. For in Sicilia and in many other Ilands, whole countries perished, and the sea ouerwhelmed and drowned many townes and cities, ouerflowing the naturall bounds and limits; and aboue all, it was most terrible in the prouince of Bithynia, in Asia; so as the citie of Nicea was therewith wholie ruined. And in many other prouinces bordering vpon the sea, the sea altering his course, in some places discouered and left dry land, where before was nothing but sea; and in some other places made sea, where before were greene fields and pastures; as PAVLVS OROSIVS and other authors write, principallie MARCELLINVS, who was an eie witnes, and S. IEROME also. Whereof the Cosmographers of our times should take notice, and not so much blame and maruell at the auntient, if they find not described and set downe in their bookes the sea-coasts, the capes, points, hauens, and entries into the sea, to be such as they described them then to be: for these and many other naturall changes haue been the cause thereof; besides the error which may be in the letter and painting of the bookes, or in the phrase, through their fault which wrote and translated them. A little while after this earth-quake (S. IEROME writeth) that there rained from heauen, like as at other times it vseth to snow, an infinite quantitie of wooll, as perfect and as fine wooll as the sheepe beareth. But returning to our historie; This attempt of PROCOPIVS so much troubled VALENTINIANVS and VALENS, that VALENTINIANVS was in doubt whether he should go against him in person, or leaue it to VALENS; whom it seemed more to concerne, aswell for the neernes to him, as for that those parts were vnder his iurisdiction. And being resolued to go in person, he was constrained to alter his resolution, for that certaine strange nations made new inuasions in the Empire, aswell in Germany as in Britannie, and the cities and prouinces in these parts by their Ambassadors required succour. Wherupon he determined rather to relieue those which were friends to the whole Empire, and to the common estate, then his owne in particular: and publishing his intent, he returned to make warre against the strangers, sending an excellent Captaine with a very good Armie against PROCOPIVS, to make head against him, and not to suffer his power to increase: and he himselfe went to the warres of Germany, wherein he did many worthie deeds of Armes against the Saxons, the Burgonians, and other nations: whose force was so great, that although although they were ouercome by him, and reduced to his obedience; yet vntill this day the remembrance of them continueth, and they inhabit those parts. On the other side, VALENS, as a man which had the lesser charge, marched towards PROCOPIVS, and he came to meete him in Asia the lesse, or in Phrygia, neere to a Citie called Natolia, where they fought, and PROCOPIVS was ouerthrown and fled. But before this battaile, VALENS had sent a Captaine whose name was IVLIVS, with a very good Armie, against those Gothes which came to the aide of PROCOPIVS, he hauing spread a rumor that VALENTINIANVS was dead in France, and those Gothes were ouerthrowne by IVLIVS. PROCOPIVS, as is aforesaid, escaping from the battaile, vsed all possible meanes to reinforce his Armie, that hee might returne againe to fight: but he not only failed of his purpose, but was by his owne Captaines which fled with him, thereby to obtaine pardon and grace with VALENS, apprehended and deliuered into his hands.

Some write, that VALENS as soone as he had [illegible] made his head to be striken off: and others say, that bowing downe two trees by force, one leg was bound to the one Tree, and another to the other, and the Trees being let loose, he was torne in peeces: and so ended he his life, parted and diuided in two parts, who had caused so great parts-taki[illegible] diuision in the Empire. PROCOPIVS when he died, was of the age of 41 yeeres, he was of a great courage and goodly constitution, but that he went somewhat stooping. It is reported of him that he was euer very sad, and was neuer seene to laugh, and that he alwaies did meditate on melancholy matters; and so had an vnfortunate end, as one which was disloyall, and a Traytor to his soueraigne Lord.

The death of Procopius.

After that VALENS had obtained this victorie, he seuerely punished those that had fauored and assisted PROCOPIVS: and because that Chalcedonia, which is a Citie in Asia the lesse, ouer against Constantinople, had taken part with him, he caused all the towne walles to be thrown downe, and made euen with the ground, which before were very faire. When PROCOPIVS was dead, a Captaine and neere kinseman of his, named MARCELLVS, being in the Citie of Nicea with certaine companies with him, and with 3000 Gothes which he had caused to come thither, tooke vpon him the name of Emperor: but he was soone set vpon, taken and slaine by another Captaine, whose name was EQVITIVS, Gouernor of Slauonia. This so important an enterprise being by VALENS brought to a happy end, he then endeuored himselfe to persecute the remainder of those souldiers, and to prouide for other accidents in the East: which, for that they were many and of lesse importance, I will omit. But in matters concerning our religion, as an Heretick and a wicked man, he committed so many outrages, exiled so many, and did so great harme, as it would require a long time to describe. His brother VALENTINIANVS following the wars aforesaid, obtained sundrie victories, some in his owne person, and some vnder the leading of his Captaines. In great Britanny, by a Captaine of his whose name was VALENTINE, he ouercame and subdued the Picts and the Scots, from whom the Scots at this day are descended, and the Kingdome of Scotland in that Iland tooke name.

Valens raged the walls of Chalcedonia.

The Picts and Scots.

THEODOSIVS, of whom wee will speake hereafter, obteined some other notable victories in Germany, whom VALENTINIANVS sent also into Africa: for therein rebelled a mightie Captain whose name was TIRMVS, whom THEODOSIVS ouerthrew in battaile, and tooke prisoner, leauing the countrey in quiet. But notwithstanding that hee had so good and happie successe, yet the Roman Empire was so odious and hatefull to all strange Nations, as they neuer desisted as long as they had any oportunitie to inuade and molest the same. Whereupon the Sarmates, a barbarous people, of whom we haue often made mention heretofore, rebelled and entred Hungary: against whom VALENTINIANVS (being greatly offended) went himselfe in person; and hauing ouerthrowne them in battaile they sent their Ambassadors vnto him: and the Emperour being in an earnest discourse with them, it is reported that he was so mooued, and cried out so loud, as with the force thereof the blood gushed out at his mouth in such aboundance, that he died within fewe daies after. Others write, that he was taken with an Apoplexy, wherewith he lost his speech only, all his other senses remaining perfect. Finally, of the one, or other, hee died within a short space, nothing auailing any Physick that could bee administred vnto him, hee being of the age of fiftie yeeres, in the twelfth yeere of his Raigne, and according to S. IEROME his computation in the yeeere of our Lord 379.

The victories of Valentinian.

This Emperour is accounted among the good and vertuous Emperours, and with great reason ſon: for beſides his valour and ſufficiencie, he was a very iuſt Prince, and a great enemie and a puniſher of vice, eſpeciallie of briberie and couetouſnes. When he died he left two ſonnes, and three daughters, which he had by two women. His eldeſt ſonnes name was GRATIAN, whom he had by his lawfull wife, named SEVERA; him before his death he made Emperour AVGVSTVS. His other ſonnes name was VALENTINIANVS, who afterwards was Emperour alſo. And his three daughters, IVSTA, GRATA, and GALLA, he had by a Gentlewoman called IVSTINA: of which, one, which was GALLA, was afterwards married to THEODOSIVS, who in proceſſe of time came to be Emperour. It is written, that this IVSTINA, mother to theſe three ſiſters, was the faireſt woman of complexion, of the moſt excellent conſtitution of bodie, the comelieſt perſonage, and was endowed with more commendable parts, then any woman then to be found in the world; ſo as ſhe was brought to the Emperors Palace to his wife the Empereſſe for a miracle in beautie, where he had by her theſe three children, as PAVLVS DIACONVS reporteth, by the conſent and permiſſion of his wife the Empereſſe.

Gratianus remained Emperour in the place of his father.

Valens fauoured the Arrians.

Valens made the Monks and Heremits to leaue their cels, and become ſouldiers.

VVe haue related the chiefe of all that paſſed in the time of VALENTINIANVS, Emperor in the Weſt, and of his brother VALENS in the Eaſt. VALENTINIANVS dying in ſuch manner, as we ſayd, he left his ſonne GRATIANVS for Emperour of all that which he poſſeſſed, and made him Emperor in his life time. And VALENS ſeeing himſelfe freed, and at liberty, from the reſpect and dutie which he ought to his brother VALENTINIAN, making ſmall account of his ſonne GRATIAN, began to fauour and ſupport the Arrians, and to perſecute and oppreſſe the true Chriſtians. Amongſt other things, S. IEROME writeth, that he commanded all the Monks and Hermites in Egypt, and other parts, that (leauing their Monaſticall life) they ſhould become Souldiers, and follow the warres: but before that hee could bring them to it, hee put many thouſands of them to death, and did many other cruell deeds, for which God gaue him ſuch an end as he deſerued. To the contrary, his Nephew GRATIAN was a good Chriſtian, and was likewiſe a good Poet, and an Oratour, a very vertuous, temperate, honeſt and courteous Prince, and indued with many noble qualities; but he was condemned to be very remiſſe in matters of gouernment. But concerning the Chriſtian Religion, hee fauoured and ſupported the Chriſtian Churches in Phœnicia, and other Prouinces in the Eaſt, as his father had done before him. By meanes of whoſe death the high Dutch took heart and courage to come downe, and make warre within the bounds of the Empire, with great multitudes of men: and he with a farre leſſer number went to fight with them, neere to a Citie called Argentine or Colleine; where recommending himſelfe to IESVS CHRIST, he fought a moſt cruell battell, and obtained the victory: and as PAVLVS OROSIVS reporteth ſlew of them aboue 40000. men. S. IEROME ſayth 30000. When the young Emperour GRATIAN had obtained this victorie, he reſolued to make his brother VALENTINIAN his companion in the Empire, who was his brother by the father, and ſonne to the faire IVSTINA; which he performed with great ſolemnity.

A great victorie obtained by Gratian againſt the Germanes.

The Empire being in this eſtate, VALENS liuing in Antioch in Soria, and GRATIAN and this his young brother VALENTINIAN in France, VALENS as he was giuen to diuinations, inchantments, nigromancies and ſuch other like vanities, made certaine figures to bee caſt; and the diuell willing to ſhew him that after him there ſhould raigne one, whoſe name began with this Gregke letter, θ, which in Latine is th, he therefore cauſed to be ſlaine that moſt excellent Captaine THEODOSIVS, and others whoſe names began in that manner.

Valens gaue great credit to inchauntments and ſorceries.

Theſe things being paſt, as God in his ſecret iudgement had ordeined that the Romane Empire ſhould generally decline (as not long after it did) it pleaſed him in his diuine wiſedome to permit that there ſhould firſt happen ſome great and particular calamities, which ſhould be as ſignes and forewarnings preſaging the great and general miſeries which afterwardes enſued, and continue euen vntill this day. For a beginning, and foretelling of the commune and generall calamitie, which in proceſſe of time afterwardes followed, it pleaſed God to permit (for VALENS his infidelitie) that in thoſe daies in the Northerly parts of Scythia, betweene a people called Hunnes, bordering vpon the Riſean mountaines, and the Gothes which with them diuided their frontiers, and were their neere neighbours (both moſt valiant and fierce nations, as in this hiſtorie hereafter ſhall appeare) great warres aroſe: and after many battailes and ſlaughters betweene them (which make nothing to our purpoſe) all beginning about the parting of fields and diuiding their bounds and limits, and other ancient quarrels, as vſually happen betweene nations which are ſo neere neighbours; in theſe controuerſies, the the Gothes were finally ouerthrowne in a great battaile by the Hunnes, and driuen out of their owne countrie by force: and being a huge multitude of people (compelled through neceſſitie, as ouercome, and deſiring to liue in peace) they ſent to intreate the Emperour VALENS by their Ambaſſadors, that it might pleaſe him to receiue them for his ſeruants and vaſſalls, and to giue them ſome lands, which they might till and inhabit. The Emperor ſimply granted their requeſt, aſſigning vnto them a great countrie beyond the riuer Danubius, and certaine fields in the Prouince of Miſia, which at this time is called Bulgaria and Seruia (as PAVLVS OROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS and others doe report) and there for a certaine time they remained in peace and reſt: and it was thought they would ſo haue continued, had not two of the Emperors Captaines (which diuided the fields amongſt them, and remained there as their guard and ouerſeers) begun to vſe them cruelly, like tyrants, doing them daily great wrongs and injuries, as though they had been rather ſlaues then ſubjects. Whereupon they conuerted their obedience and humility into rebellion and deſperation; reſoluing to beare Armes, and to take perforce that which thoſe men denied them. And ſo raunging themſelues in good order (leauing that which was appointed for them) they marched forwards, deſtroying, robbing and ſpoiling all whereſoeuer they came.

Countries aſſigned by Valens for the Gothes to inhabite.

Entring into Thracia, they tooke ſome ſtrong holds and Cities, vntill they came neere to Conſtantinople, where VALENS then was: for as ſoone as theſe troubles began, he was aduertiſed thereof: and departing from the Citie of Antioch, he came by great iourneyes to Conſtantinople, out of which he afterwards ſallied with a great and very well ordered Armie, to make head againſt the Gothes, which from ancient time had been euer much feared, and were ſtill famous. And although they vnderſtood of the Emperors comming, yet they were therewith nothing diſmaid, nor doubted to meete him, but rather ſought to fight with him. Which VALENS refuſed not; ſo as there was a cruell battaile betweene the two Armies; wherein, at the firſt encounter, the Romane horſemen behaued themſelues ſo ill, that disbanding, they left the ſquadrons of footemen naked without any defence; which the Gothes horſemen perceiuing, charged the Romane Infantry; and compaſſing them about on euery ſide with an infinite multitude of Archers, brake through them, and conſtrained them to flie: and ſo the Gothes had an entire victorie, and did great execution in the Imperiall Armie. VALENS, flying thence wounded with an Arrow, would haue hidden himſelfe in a Farmers houſe neere to that place: but being found, the Gothes ſet the houſe on fire, wherein he was burnt. Some write that he died fighting, and that ſeeing the horſemen flie, he alighted; and putting off his Imperiall robes, placed himſelfe in a ſquadron of footemen, and there being vnknowne, was ſlaine. But I hold the firſt opinion for moſt certaine, for ſo doe the moſt and beſt Authors affirme. One of which is Saint IEROME, in whoſe time theſe things happened: ſo as he died a death conformable to the courſe of his life.

A battaile betweene Valens and the Gothes.

The death of the emperor Valens.

The Gothes hauing obtained this victorie, marched forwards, and beſieged the Imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, where enſued that which we will hereafter declare. The Emperor VALENS died in the fiftith yeer of his age, and the fifteenth of his raigne; of which, hee had raigned aboue eleuen in the companie of his brother, and the reſt with his nephew GRATIANVS, which was in the yeere of our Lord IESVS CHRIST, three hundred, foureſcore and two, after S. IEROMES computation, who in that yeer ended his Hiſtorie, which PROSPERVS afterwards proſecuted. I haue not read that this Emperour left any children behinde him.

THE

THE LIFE OF GRATIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND OF HIS BROTHER VALENTINIAN THE SECOND, AND NINE AND FORTITH ROMANE Emperour.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE whole burthen of the Empire resting vpon Gratianus, he was aduertised that the Gothes daily increased their power, and were growne so audacious as to assault the Citie of Constantinople: wherefore he made prouision to goe against them, and made one Theodosius a Spaniard Generall of his Army, who ouerthrew and subdued them, and reduced the Empire to the antient dignitie. Wherefore Gratianus made him his companion in the Empire, assigning vnto him the East part: and he remaining in France, purchased the euill will of his men of war, by shewing himselfe too much affected to the Alanes, and to other strange Nations, whose fashions in attire he often vsed to weare. In which time one Maximus, rebelling in Britanny, made himselfe a tyrant; and Gratianus, seeing himselfe forsaken by his Legions, returned into Italy: in which iourney Maximus by a stratagem, caused him to be slain. He had beene a very vertuous and good Emperor, if he had applied himselfe to the gouernment of the Empire: for otherwise he was endued with many good parts, and liued little more then 28. yeeres.

AFter the death of VALENS which was so ill and vnfortunate, as we haue declared, the gouernment of the whole Empire, East and West, remained in his nephewe GRATIANVS, his brother VALENTINIANS sonne, who before ruled the Western Empire, and in his brother, yong VALENTINIAN, whom he had made Emperour; although by reason of his yong yeeres no great account was made of him. The Gothes following the victorie which they had obtained against the Emperour VALENS; without any stay, became masters of all the countrie round about, and (as I said) besieged the imperiall Citie of Constantinople, wherein was the Empresse DOMINICA, wife of the vnfortunate VALENS; and they assaulted it with great furie and very resolutely, burning all the suburbs which were very great. And so they inuested the Citie, vntill that the widow Empresse (as writeth CASSIODORVS) vsed such diligence in encouraging and animating the souldiers which were within it, with good words, gifts, and readie money, which shee distributed amongst them, as they fought so valiantly, that the Gothes receiued great losse & could not enter the Citie; and so it was defended by the diligence of this woman, and the valour of the besieged. The Gothes, diuiding themselues into seuerall troupes, became Lords of the Prouinces of Thracia, Dacia, and their confines. Here historiographers make large descriptions of the originall and countrie of these Gothes; and by what meanes, and when they came forth of their their countrie; wherein they are so tedious and so contrarie in opinions, the one to the other, that I purpose to eschew that labour, for that it little importeth; neither can the truth be fully set downe. But it is true, they were a people which came out of Scythia in Europe, according to most writers; but whether they were borne there or came from some other countrie (as some say they did) it importeth not much: neither the difference in their names in calling them Ostrogothes or Visogothes; for herein is no greater difference, but that the Ostrogothes were more easterly, and the Visogothes more westerly: but generally both the one, and other were called Gothes, and so I purpose to call them, as often as I shall haue occasion to mention them, which will be very often: for in truth the greatest wound, and chiefest losse the Roman Empire receiued, and the beginning of the fall thereof, was through their occasion. Wherefore these people may iustly be held and esteemed for the most valiant in Armes of all other Nations in the world; seeing that they (although with much toyle and by fighting many battailes) were able to tame and subdue that people and Empire, which was the tamer and subduer of all other Nations.

The Gothes, and whence they came.

The occasion of the fall of the Empire was through the Gothes.

GRATIAN vnderstanding of the death of his Vncle VALENS, and of all the accidents which ensued; and being also aduertised of the power of the Gothes, and how they daily became Lords of more lands of the Empire; and how that following their example, other northerly Nations called Hunnes and Alanes, no lesse valiant in Armes then the Gothes (as it was reported) made preparation to enter the Roman Empire, and to doe the like: he resolued with the greatest Army he was able to raise, to goe into Hungary to stop their passage. And forasmuch as in so great an extremitie, in his owne person he was not able to prouide for all occasions; he determined to make choise of the most sufficient man that he might finde to be Generall of his Armie, to whom he might commit the charge and care of the war against the Gothes; which was both of great importance and very dangerous. There liued at that time in his countrie in Spaine, one THEODOSIVS, the son of a noble Captaine whose name was also THEODOSIVS; whom, as we haue told you, VALENS caused to be slaine. This THEODOSIVS after the death of his father, holding himselfe to be in danger, retired himselfe into his country; being as well for the nobleness of his ancestors, and his fathers name and worthines, as for his owne valour, and his exploits in Armes, the most renowned and of greatest account of any man in his time. Whereupon the Emperor GRATIAN, in great haste sent for him, and wrote his letters vnto him, wherein he made him Captain generall of all the Empire; and within a little while after, Emperour AVGVSTVS, and his equall in the Empire, he being of the age of three and thirtie yeers.

Theodosius made generall of the Imperiall Army.

PAVLVS OROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS say, that this Emperour did wisely in choosing a Spanish Captaine, to free the Empire from seruitude; as in former times they had beene preserued from the like danger, hauing followed the same counsell: as the Emperour NERVA elected the good TRAIANE who after him was Emperour, seeing himselfe old, and the Maiesty of the Empire in contempt. And the said Authors write, that he did it with great reason; for that the said TRAIAN did extend the bounds of the Empire more then any other. This THEODOSIVS did wholly vanquish the Gothes, and recouered from them, all the Countrie which had beene lost. And during his life time hee made them serue as vassalls, and the Romane Empire stood free and recouered her reputation by him, though with much toyle and danger; so as the Romane Empire was neuer more honoured, nor better defended then when Spaniards were Emperors. And if men will giue no credit to bookes, let them looke into the present estate of the Empire, and they shall see that for these 200 yeers it was not in that authoritie and greatnesse as it is now that CHARLES 5. King of Spaine is Emperour. But you must vnderstand that MEXIA was a Spaniard borne.

When THEODOSIVS had receiued the Emperors letters, and accepted of the charge offered vnto him; with the greatest speede he could, hee went into those countries where the Gothes were; who knowing of his comming gathered themselues together to fight with him. And THEODOSIVS being very desirous thereof, hauing first leuied a sufficient Army, and taken such order, and made such prouision as was most requisite; with great care and circumspection drew neere vnto them: And after that he had tried his souldiers in some skirmishes and encounters, he came to giue them battaile; which was one of the most cruell and bloudy that euer was. But THEODOSIVS carried himselfe so discreetely and valiantly, as wel in fighting, as in encouraging and directing his men, that he obtained the victory, and made an incredible slaughter of the enemy; and afterwards of the remainder which escaped, vntill that he had driuen them all out of that Prouince; so as there remained not any enemy there. Leauing his Armie in good order, he went to doe his dutie to the Emperor GRATIAN in Hungary, where he then lay, in the Cittie of Sirmio. Who for so noble a victorie (after that hee had well considered of his vertues and worthinesse) made him Emperor and AVGVSTVS, and his equall and companion. Yet some say, that he did this in the beginning, before the battaile. But howsoeuer, he shared the Empire with him; giuing to THEODOSIVS, Constantinople and Thracia, with all the Prouinces of the East, in like manner as VALENS held the same; reseruing to himselfe Italie, and all westwards, wherein also raigned his young brother VALENTINIANVS.

This being ended, GRATIAN presently returned into Italie, and from thence into France; and THEODOSIVS went to make an end of his wars against the most feared and redoubted nations of all the world, which were the aforesaid Gothes, the Alanes, and the Hunnes; all people of Scythia. We reade that ALEXANDER the Great, would not goe to make any conquest of these people: for they were feared of all the world.

The Alanes tooke their name of a riuer in Scythia called Alane. AMMIANVS MARCELLINVS saith, that these were called in auncient time Massagetes. The Hunnes are also Scythians of Scythia in Europe, inhabiting beyond the bogges of Meotis, all which were most fierce Nations: and although that all the northerly nations were such, yet were these more then any of the rest; as in this Historie hereafter will appeare: And these (they say) are those which at this day are called Tartarians. This people being againe entred into Hungarie, THEODOSIVS went to fight with them, sometimes with one Nation and sometimes with another. All authors write, that he fought many cruell battailes with them, and in them all had the vpper hand: so as he slew an infinite number of them: and those which escaped the sword, hee made to flie out of the confines of the Empire. And to the end hee would not ouer-tire his men of warre, being humbly required of peace by ATHANARICVS King of the Gothes, offering himselfe and his people to doe him seruice; he graunted it. And comming victorious to the Cittie of Constantinople, which was his imperiall seate, hee brought ATHANARICVS with him; and was receiued with great solemnity, ioy and triumph. Where (they write) that ATHANARICVS did so much wonder to see the power of the Emperour, the solemnity and greatnes of his court, the sumptuousnes and magnificence of the buildings of the Cittie, and the riches of the furniture of his house and seruice, as he said, that truely the Roman Emperor was god of the earth, and represented the God of heauen; against whom no man ought to be so hardy, as to lift vp his hand, or heart, except he would presently be condemned to death.

Athanaricus King of the Gothes sued to Theodosius for peace.

Athanaricus his comming to Constantinople, and his speech concerning the Romen Empire.

Within few daies after that this valiant King ATHANARICVS came to Constantinople, hee was taken with a grieuous sicknes, wherof he died, after that he had been tormented therwith, the space of 3 moneths, whom THEODOSIVS sumptuously buried and bestowed great cost vpon his obsequies. Some Authors, as IORNANDES and others, say, that this peace with the Gothes, was made by GRATIANVS; for THEODOSIVS fell so grieuously sick, that al men thought he would haue died, and that in this season the peace was granted to ATHANARICVS more for feare then for any good will: and that THEODOSIVS, recouering health, would not breake what GRATIANVS had concluded. AVRELIVS VICTOR, PAVLVS OROSIVS, and others report it after the first manner, but this difference is of small importance. The Gothes which serued ATHANARICVS in his house and army, hauing had triall of the goodnes and bounty of THEODOSIVS, desired to continue in his seruice; and afterwards serued him faithfully and valiantly, in such warres as hapned. In this time, through the grace and mercy of God, GRATIANVS and THEODOSIVS being true Christians, the Catholike Church was fauored and protected by them. Yet some write, that THEODOSIVS was baptized after that he was Emperor: But before that time he did reuerence and beleeue the Christian faith. SOZOMENVS, after CASSIODORVS, affirmeth it so, which to me seemeth hardly to be beleeued. But howsoeuer it was, THEODORETVS writeth, that as soone as he came to Constantinople, hauing ouercome and subdued all the barbarous nations; he applied himselfe to the reformation of the Church, and to the subuersion and rooting out of the Arrian heresie, which was dispersed ouer all the East parts. And vpon this occasion he vsed meanes to assemble a great number of Bishops at Constantinople; and although that that the euill was not throughly cured thereby, yet that which he did, was very profitable. downe THEODOSIVS decree, wherein he professed and protested that hee beleeued the same faith, which was preached by the holy Apostles; and which was published in the Nicene Councel. He setteth down also, how that THEODOSIVS banished certaine Bishops from Constantinople, for that they were of the diuellish and abhominable sect of the Arrians. In the West, there was no neede of any such care or diligence; for this Arrian pestilence had not so much infected those parts: as we haue already declared in the liues of the three sonnes of CONSTANTINE the Great. CONSTANS which raigned in that part, tooke great care to preserue and defend the auncient Catholike faith; and after him IOVIANVS and VALENTINIANVS. So as, aswell in matters concerning Religion, as also the warres and ciuill gouernment, THEODOSIVS shewed himselfe a worthie Prince, and was so much feared and honoured by all Nations, as the King of Persia (notwithstanding that he had slaine the Emperour IVLIANVS, and obtained so many victories) in great humilitie, sent his Ambassadors to Constantinople, entreating a perpetuall league and peace with THEODOSIVS: And he seeing with how great submission that King sued for peace, graunted it.

The King of Persia sued to Theodosius for peace.

THEODOSIVS, liuing in this prosperitie, the better to assure the succession of the Empire to his posterity, made one of his sonnes whose name was ARCADIVS, his equall and companion: notwithstanding that he was but a childe, and very yong. In this meane while liued GRATIAN in France, from thence making prouision and sending direction to all parts; as into Africa, Spaine, Britanny and Germany: and as he was a man very remisse and soft spirited (as the most part doe write of him) he waxed much more, after that he had taken THEODOSIVS for his companion; depending much vpon his diligence and valour: so as he became ill beloued of his souldiers. And this dislike increased; for that he (seeing that THEODOSIVS had entertained the Gothes which serued ATHANARICVS into his pay and wages) drew to his seruice certaine companies of Alanes, and respected and honored them so much, as he sometimes apparelled himself after their fashion, and made them his guard; wherwith the Roman and Italian souldiers were much discontented.

Gratianus ill beloued by his men of warre.

In Rome and all Italie the Empire was of no absolute authoritie: for therein was the young VALENTINIAN, brother to GRATIANVS; who for that he was very young and of little discretion, a Noble man called PROBVS had the charge of the gouernement, who had been Consul, and was then Prefect of the Cittie. These matters gaue occasion to the Legions which were in Britanny to presume to rebell, and to chuse an excellent Captaine, whose name was MAXIMVS for Emperour; and as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, against the will of MAXIMVS. But afterwards hauing accepted the name, he resolued to proceede: and so with all expedition possible, he went into France; and for as much as GRATIAN was ill beloued of his Armie, the greatest part of his men of warre forsooke him, and calling MAXIMVS Emperor, went to his campe. Whereupon GRATIANVS finding himselfe vnable to fight with him, purposed to retire into Italie, where his brother was. MAXIMVS being aduertised thereof, vsed such meanes as GRATIANVS fell into his hands. Which was after this manner: He caused a rumor to be spred abroade, that GRATIANVS wife was comming to see her husband with a good troupe of souldiers, and to goe with him into Italy, and he sent some messengers before with counterfeit letters, which aduertised him thereof. After this, he sent a valiant and subtle Captaine called ANDRAGATHIVS, to the end he should put himselfe in a horselitter, with some chosen souldiers, and goe to meete GRATIAN, faining to be the Empresse, and so take him and kill him.

Maximus chosen Emperor by the legions in Britanny.

This cunning Champion performed what his Lord had committed to his charge, and at Lions in France, in passing the riuer Rhodanus, he came to ioyne with him; some going before and telling him that the Empresse was neere at hand. The goodnesse and sincerity of GRATIANVS were the occasion that he suspected nothing, neither discouered the deceipt, vntill he came so neere, that he saw it with his eyes, where being compassed about with ANDROGATHIVS his souldiers, he was there by his commandement slaine. In this manner ended the life and raigne of the Emperor GRATIANVS, being of the age of nine and twenty yeers; fifteene yeeres after that his father made him Emperour and his companion; whereof eight yeeres were in his fathers time, more in name then effect; and of the other seuen yeeres, three were with his Vncle VALENS who was slaine by the Gothes, and the rest with THEODOSIVS whom he chose for his companion, and with his brother VALENTINIAN; who for that he was a childe was not regarded. He died (after PROSPERVS his computation) in the yeere of our Lord three hundred, fourescore and seuen. This Prince was endued with many excellent excellent vertues: for he was valiant, noble and discreet; and aboue all, a Catholike and a very deuout Christian: but he had a fault, which was, that he was too soft spirited, remisse, and negligent, taking little care for the gouernment: which (as is said) was the principall cause of his ruine. And truely this is a great and dangerous fault in Kings and Princes: for as their principall charge and office is to gouerne and rule, and they therefore are called Reges, failing to performe their office and dutie, they make themselues hatefull, odious, and vnworthy the power and dignity which they enioy.

THE LIFE OF THEODOSIVS, THE FIRST OF THIS NAME, AND FIFTITH EMPEROVR OF ROME.

THE ARGVMENT.

After that Gratianus was dead, the whole burthen and care both of peace and warre, appertaining to the Empire, rested vpon Theodosius. The first enterprise he vndertooke, was in Italy, against the tyrant Maximus, who caused the Emperor Gratianus to be slaine. And besieging him in Aquileia, he made him die like a Traytor, together with a sonne of his. And hauing triumphed in Rome, he restored the Empire to Valentinian. Returning to Constantinople within short space after, he vnderstood that Valentinian was slaine; and that only two (to wit) Arbogastes and Eugenius, vsurped the Empire. Whereupon returning againe into Italy, he fought with these two tyrants, and ouercame them both, more by miracle and by the especiall grace of God, then through his power or any humane wisedome. After this victory, the whole charge of the Empire, both East and West, rested vpon him alone; but he calling his sonne Honorius, inuested him in the Empire of the West, and to Arcadius he left the Empire of the East: But because they were both children, and very little, he gaue them two tutors, men no lesse valiant in Armes then politique in peace. After this, happening to be excommunicate and absolued by S. Ambrose Bishop of Milan, for certain cruelties committed in Thessalonica, falling grieuously sick, he dyed at the age of fiftie yeeres.

SIX yeeres raigned THEODOSIVS in companie with GRATIANVS, when he was slaine by the commandement of MAXIMVS, who as a tyrant and vsurper proclaymed himselfe Emperour: And by reason of GRATIANS death, all the care and trouble both for warre and peace rested vpon THEODOSIVS; who was very sufficient, and well able to support the same. For although that young VALENTINIAN was in Italy, yet hee had neither power nor courage to reuenge the death of his brother, GRATIANVS; but knowing that MAXIMVS came with a great Armie, and was already entred Italy, he abandoned it, and went to Constantinople to intreate ayde of THEODOSIVS: Who taking compassion of the two brethren, the one slaine by treason, and the other wrongfully dispossessed of his Empire; of his naturall and accustomed valour, resolued to goe into Italy to reuenge the death of the one, and to restore the other to his estate, by pursuing and destroying this new & mighty tyrant. Wherupon leauing his son ARCADIVS in Constantinople, taking VALENTINIAN with him, he prepared for his departure, raising the greatest and best forces he was able, and began to to march through Gallia Cisalpina, which is now called Lombardie, where MAXIMVS alreadie was in the citie of Aquileia, hauing made ANDROGATHIVS Generall of his Armie to make head against THEODOSIVS.

This ANDROGATHIVS was a politick and a valiant man in the warres, and he which slue the Emperor GRATIANVS; who with great care and diligence had taken all the streights, riuers, bridges and passages, whereby THEODOSIVS might passe: and afterwards changing his minde, thinking that THEODOSIVS peraduenture would haue passed his Armie by sea, he drew his forces from the mountains, and from those places which hee had left them in guard, and embarked them aboord a great number of ships and barks, purposing to ouerthrow him, and to take him prisoner vpon the water. The valiant THEODOSIVS, being aduertised heerof, marched by great iournies; and, finding him in the passages open, entred with his troops into the Plains of Lombardie, and besieged the City of Aquileia, where the vsurping Emperor was, before ANDROGATHIVS could ouertake him: and compassing the City round about, those which were within it, of meer fear hauing guilty consciences, deliuered him into the hands of THEODOSIVS, without staying for any assault or fight; and he iustly caused him (as a Traitor and Rebell to his Prince) to bee put to death. The like was afterwards done by a sonne of his whose name was VICTOR, whom his father had created Emperor, to auoid the perils and troubles that might ensue. When ANDROGATHIVS who was his Generall, beeing vpon the sea with a very mighty nauie, vnderstood of the taking and death of MAXIMVS, hee was so ouercomn with sorrow and despair, that hee cast himself ouer-boord out of his Galley, and there was drowned; and his people, wanting a Leader, yeelded themselues to THEODOSIVS. And so, without either death or bloud-shed, God gaue him a very great victory; and from France, Britannie, Germanie, and Spain, came Ambassadors vnto him, yeelding him their obedience, with great humility and deuotion.

Maximus and his son Victor put to death by Theodosius.

Androgathius drowned himself in the sea.

Hauing performed this enterprise, he went with yong VALENTINIAN to Rome, the principall Head of the Empire; where they were receiued with a solemn triumph (as RVFFINVS and CASSIODORVS report) whither he sent for his yong son ARCADIVS from Constantinople, where he left him to the end he might be knowne and honoured in Rome: where he continued certain daies, reforming the abuses and disorders there; and hee inflicted great punishments, and did great iustice vpon certain euill and wicked persons. And, as he was a deuout and good Christian, so he took great care to reform the abuses of the Church. And, finally, setting all things in good order, he returned to Constantinople to gouern the Empire of the East; and to VALENTINIAN he left all the West, leauing him an Armie and power sufficient to defend the same: which is no small argument of his goodnes and loyalty, that being of power able (if he had desired to haue made himself onely Monarch and Lord of the whole) yet he held it for greater honour To reconquer the Empire, and to restore it to him to whom in right it appertained, than to hold the same himself. THEODOSIVS being returned to Constantinople, VALENTINIAN went for France, that he might be neer at hand if any occasion should be offred: where liuing in prosperity and void of care, a Captain of his, called ARBOGASTES, practised his death; who was a man of a hautie courage, politick, venturous, and of great power by reason of the place and authority which he held neer about the Emperor; whom PAVLVS OROSIVS and PAVLVS DIACONVS call Comes or Earle: for in those times wee finde that name and dignity, and before that also; and these were those which were Gouerners and Captains of Prouinces, and sometimes were the Emperors companions, to whom were committed matters of greatest importance: In like manner as the antient Consuls, when they went to make a conquest of any Country, had with them Legats, which is as much as Lieutenants. This ARBOGASTES resolued with himself to kill VALENTINIAN, thereby to aduance an Emperor of his making, although it prospered ill; not daring to vsurp it himself, for that hee was of base parentage, a stranger born, and an Infidell, and for other causes which in the Historie are not mentioned. Finally, he practised with one EVGENIVS, who of a Grammarian and a Rhetorician (being for that cause wel beloued and esteemed) came to bear Armes, and to follow the Court, and was now highly regarded and of great account; promising him to kill VALENTINIAN, and to make him Emperor; giuing him to vnderstand, that it was a matter possible, and easie to be done. EVGENIVS accepted what this wicked man offred; and ARBOGASTES vsed such means, that he corrupted the Eunuchs that waited in VALENTINIAN'S chamber, and agreed with them to strangle him in the night, and giue it out in speech that they found him dead in the morning; and they did so. VALENTINIAN, being in the city of Vienna in France, flee-sleeping in his bed, was by these Eunuchs strangled; and they published abroad, that hee had hanged himself, eighteen yeers after that his brother had nominated him Emperor. The manner of his death was kept so secret, that it was bruited abroad that he had hanged himself; so as PROSPERVS, in the addition which he made to EVSEBIVS book of Times, writing his death, saith, that he died in that manner.

Eugenius made Emperor by Arbogastes.

Presently, when as his death was knowne, before the treason was discouered, ARBOGASTES nominated and made EVGENIVS Emperor. What these two men did, being of greatest authority, was generally approued by all men; and by means of their reputation, and thorough their cunning, large promises, and great gifts, they leuied a great number of men of war, as well Barbarians as Romans, and so became Lords of all the Prouinces: And although EVGENIVS bare the name of Emperor, yet all was ordred and disposed accordingly as it pleased ARBOGASTES.

Within short space THEODOSIVS was aduertised of this fact; for which hee was very sorrie, and therewith much troubled, seeing how dangerous a warre lay before him: but, accounting it a great dishonour and a shame to suffer such an action to passe vnpunished, with the greatest expedition and diligence that could bee hee mustred vp his men of warre, and with all possible speed departed from Constantinople, leauing his sonne ARCADIVS there; and HONORIVS also, whom he then made Emperor, appointing him to bee equall and companion with his brother. But, as a good and deuout Christian, the first prouision hee made, was, To fast and pray, that it might please God to giue him victorie against those Infidels and Tyrants; recommending himself to the praiers of a Monk which was accounted a very holy man, whose name was IOHN, dwelling in the City of Thebes in Egypt: who sent him word that hee should haue the victory, but should dy in Italie, and neuer return to Constantinople.

THEODOSIVS being comm to the confines of Italie; the Tyrants had so great forces, and had taken so good order for all matters concerning the warres, that all passages were stopt in the Alps, and at the foot thereof EVGENIVS and ARBOGASTES attended with their whole Armie; so as THEODOSIVS was much troubled and distressed, aswell after hee had passed those passages and mountains, as when he was entred into Lumbardie, where hee found himself inclosed about with enemies, which on euery side stopt the coming of any victuals to his camp; they hauing, besides this, a greater number of men than hee had, and no lesse experienced and valiant in the warres than his were. But the valiant Emperor, vsing the best means hee could in all things, as a faithfull Christian expected and hoped for his best relief from God, to whom with teares he made his continuall supplications. Truely, the danger and extremity wherein he was, and the multitude of his enemies was so great, that all Writers affirm he had been vtterly lost, if God in a battell that ensued had not shewed a manifest and apparant miracle. The night before the battell he spent altogether in praier, without either eating or sleeping: and the next day, seeing himself charged on euery side, he set his men in very good order to fight; and with great courage and resolution attended the coming of his enemies; where presently in the beginning a Captain of theirs called ARBICIVS came ouer to his side with his whole charge, which was a good signe of his good successe: and the battell beginning, where Romans fought against Romans, they fought at euen hand, most cruelly killing and wounding one another. The other battalions and squadrons, which were auxiliaries of sundry nations, being of THEODOSIVS his side, had the worse; so as at the first charge tenne thousand Goths which were in his pay were slain: which when he saw, he lifted vp his eies to heauen; and, with a true faith and stedfast hope shedding many teares, prayed to the Lord that he might not be ouerthrowne in so just a cause.

At that Instant a Captain of his, called BARBARIVS, with a great troop of souldiers came to the rescue of certain squadrons which in shew were ouerthrowne; and hee came with such courage, that they which were in a manner vanquished recouered strength and heart; in such manner, that without retiring they fought most valiantly for the victory: but the enemies were so many, that it seemed impossible for them to defend themselues. At that Instant it pleased God to send them succor from heauen; which was, that suddenly there arose so violent a wind and tempest, as the like thereof had neuer been seen by any man then liuing; which, without annoyance to the Emperors people, did beat in their enemies faces with such force, that it bereaued them of their sight; so as they were not able to march forwards: and the winde was so strong and forcible, that all the arrowes, stones, darts and lances, which they shot and hurled, were thereby born back again; and they which threw them were therewith wounded, in such manner, that it most plainely appeared to be miraculous, and the especiall gift of God. Which the most Christian Emperour perceiuing, rendring thanks to God for the same, incouraged and animated his people, so as within short space he obtained a compleate victorie. For his enemies souldiers took no other care, but how they might saue themselues by flight: but EVGENIVS persisting obstinate in his treason, was taken fighting, and brought to THEODOSIVS, who commanded him to be slaine: yet some write that he killed him, himselfe.

Eugenius slaine in the presence of Theodosius.

All writers affirme, that ARBOGASTES, seeing himselfe ouerthrowne, fled from the battaile, and finding no certaine place of refuge, with his owne sword cut his owne throate. So as THEODOSIVS obtained a most glorious victorie, followed the execution, and had the spoile of his enemies Campe. Of this battell and the strange accident that happened therein, we haue for testimonie, not onely Christian and godly authors, more then a few, as well such as liued at that time and neere vnto it, but also one CLAVDIANVS a Heathen Poet of that age, who receiteth the same in heroicall verse most excellently, in the third and fourth Consulship of HONORIVS the sonne of THEODOSIVS.

Arbogastes did cut his owne throte with his owne sword.

After THEODOSIVS had obtained this victorie, ther was no man either in the East or West that durst oppose himselfe against his power; so as all the Princes of the Empire sent him their Ambassadors to congratulate his victorie: and many barbarous nations did the like, and so hee became absolute and onely Lord of the whole Empire. And seeing himselfe free from warres, he came to Milan, whereof S. AMBROSE was Archbishop: where he remained all the rest of his life time, applying himselfe to ciuill gouernment; whereof in the warres he neuer left to haue all possible care. Being thus in Milan, acknowledging himselfe to be but mortall, and knowing how vnsound and diseased he was in bodie, he purposed to prouide for matters to come: wherefore he sent to Constantinople for his sonne HONORIVS; to whom (by the assent and good will of all men) he assigned after his daies the Empire of Italy and of all the West; and to his other sonne ARCADIVS, the Empire of the East; and into Africa and the prouinces thereof, he sent a man of great wisedome and experience called GILDVS to gouerne the same, and he himself took care and had the ouersight of the whole. With such prosperitie was the world gouerned (as PROSPERVS writeth) the space of three yeeres: for so long time liued THEODOSIVS in Milan, in companie with the great Doctor S. AMBROSE, with whom there happened a notable matter; which because it is an example of humilitie, I meane to declare in a more large manner then ordinarie, which is also written by THEODORETVS, PAVLVS DIACONVS, RVFFINVS, and CASSIODORVS.

THEODOSIVS being in Thessalonica, a very rich, populous and a Noble Citie in the prouince of Macedonia, there hapned a great tumult among the people, against the Magistrates and gouernours thereof; and their furie and presumption grew to be so great, as they slew the Iudges and all those which took part with the Emperour in the gouernment. Which when THEODOSIVS vnderstood, notwithstanding that he was very vertuous, yet did he much desire to execute his wrath against him, and not without iust cause: but he did therein so farre exceede the bounds of reason, as he made his souldiers put to death seuen thousand persons of the common sort, making no difference between the guiltie and innocent. Which punishment was held for rigorous and very cruell; although the offence were very great, chiefly against a Prince so iust and so much admired in all his actions. Amongst those which reprooued him for this fact, the holy Doctor S. AMBROSE then Bishop of Milan was one; and the Emperour afterwards comming to that citie, and being receiued as to his estate appertained, the next day he meant to haue gone to the Church to haue done his deuotion, and to pray, as of custom he vsed, nothing thinking of what he had done at Thessalonica, whereof it was thought he had long before repented. But S. AMBROSE, to the end that his punishment should be as publike as his offence, with great authoritie and boldnes set himselfe in the Church doore, and told the Emperour that hee should not enter there; making a learned oration vnto him, wherein with the authoritie of a Bishop, he opened vnto him his fault and offence; excommunicating him, and forbidding him to come into the Church. All which speeches the Emperour heard with great patience, and returned to his palace, obeying the excommunication and prohibition, and so remained eight moneths without comming any more to the Church: at the end whereof, a priuate seruant and Captaine of his (whose name was RVFFINVS) finding the Emperour melancholike, and discontented for that he was so long excommunicated, offered to goe to S. AMBROSE to get him absolution, perswading him to come to the Church, and he would go before to obtaine his leaue. The Emperour, although he much doubted thereof, did so. But RVFFINVS was not onely denied of his requeſt, but was highly reprehended by the Biſhop, as a miniſter and counſellor of the Emperours crueltie: which when he perceiued, he ſent to aduertiſe the Emperour thereof, and to aduiſe him not to come, for at that time he ſhould by no meanes bee receiued. The Emperour met with the meſſenger vpon the way, and hearing what meſſage hee brought, anſwered; Yet truly I will goe to ſee what penance my Paſtor will lay vpon me for my offence. And ſo went forwards vntill he came to the Church doore, and went not in, but came where S. AMBROSE was: whom he requeſted to abſolue him, and to permitt him to come into the Church there to heare diuine ſeruice. When S. AMBROSE ſaw the Emperor, and heard what he ſaid, imagining that he came of purpoſe to go into the Church, which he was reſolued to withſtand vntill he were abſolued, or had done ſome open penance for the great crueltie which he had commanded to be done, he asked him wherefore he came ſo as a tyrant, contemning and violating the lawes? Whereto the Emperor mildely anſwered: I come not to breake the lawes, neither thy commandement, neither will I paſſe ouer the threſhold of this doore: but I come to requeſt thee to looſe the bands wherewith thou haſt bound me, and that thou wilt pray to God to forgiue me my ſinnes, and not ſhut the doores of his Church againſt me, which God openeth to all ſinners which heartily repent. What repentance haſt thou ſhewed (quoth the Biſhop) for ſo hainous an offence? and with what ſalue haſt thou healed ſo mortall a wound? Thou (quoth the Emperour) art to inſtruct me, and to ſhew me what I ought to doe, and thou ſhalt ſee that I will accompliſh what thou ſhalt preſcribe. The Biſhop ſeeing the Emperours mildnes, thinking it a ſufficient penance for him to be excommunicated from the Church the ſpace of eight moneths, with faire and charitable ſpeeches ſaid; Thy penance THEODOSIVS ſhall be this, that (ſeeing that to follow thy owne will, and to execute thy wrath, thou diddeſt commit ſo cruell a murder) thou ſhalt preſently proclaime and eſtabliſh a Lawe, that no man, whom thou ſhalt adiudge or condemne to dye, or any thy ſucceſſors, ſhall be executed within thirtie dayes after that thou haſt pronounced the ſentence of death againſt him. At the end of which thirty dayes, thou ſhalt be againe demanded, whether thou doſt hold thy commandement for iuſt: for by that time being free from paſſion, thou wilt iudge of thy ſelfe whether thou haſt iuſtly iudged or no. When THEODOSIVS heard this, he preſently commanded that law to be written, and made it to be proclaimed: and he himſelfe obſerued it during his life, wherof much good enſued.

A penance laid vpon the Emperor Theodoſius by Saint Ambroſe.

This law being made, the Emperour came into the Church; where making his prayers, and doing his deuotion, he receiued the Sacrament, and from thenceforth loued the Biſhop very deerely, and vſed his counſell in many matters: For as he was haſtie and cholerick, this law was a bridle to reſtraine him from being too extreame in puniſhing offenders. THEODORETVS reciteth one example therof: which was, that the Citizens of Antioch hauing committed a great offence, and made a great vprore in the Citie, THEODOSIVS commanded great puniſhment to be inflicted vpon the malefactors; which was not preſently executed, by reaſon of this law: and and afterwards he altered his opinion; which he attributed to the counſell of S. AMBROSE: whom hee loued ſo much, that to enioy his companie and counſell, hee ſtaied in Milan, and there made his abode the remainder of his life. From thence he ſent to Conſtantinople for his ſonne HONORIVS; who came to Milan. Soone after THEODOSIVS fell ſo extreamely ſicke, that after care taken for his ſoules health, he diſpoſed of the Empire, ordaining his ſonne HONORIVS to haue the gouernment of Rome, and of all the prouinces of the Weſt: and ARCADIVS to rule in Conſtantinople and the Eaſt. And for that theſe his two ſonnes were very young, and not of fit yeeres to gouerne, he left with them as their tutors and gouernours, two very ſufficient men both for warre and peace, the one called RVFFINVS, and the other STILICO; RVFFINVS to be with ARCADIVS in the Eaſt, and STILICO with HONORIVS in the Weſt: and into Africa and the prouinces thereof he ſent GILDVS, to gouerne the ſame as Lieutenant to the two Emperours, to whom he gaue that charge. After that he had ſet all things in order, his diſeaſe ſo much encreaſed, as he could not endure it any longer: wherefore recommending his ſoule to God, he departed out of this preſent life, as SEXTVS AVRELIVS VICTOR ſaith; who here maketh an end of his hiſtorie, and the moſt part of other authors, in the fiftith yeere of his age, and the eleuenth of his raigne; accounting from the death of GRATIANVS, raigning alone, and with GRATIANVS other ſixe yeeres: ſo as in all he raigned ſeuenteene yeeres; and in the yeere of our Lord, three hundred, ninetie and ſeuen.

Theodoſius made Stilico and Ruffinus tutors and ouerſeers to his two ſonnes Honorius and Arcadius, and Gildus to be their Lieutenant in Africa.

This Emperour, according to all authors that write of him, was of conſtitution of bodie, counte-counteuance, and geſture, very like to the Emperor TRAIAN, as by TRAIAN's ſtatues and pictures, which in that time were remaining, might eaſily be conceiued, and might be imagined by that which was written both of the one and the other: And they write, that he was not onely like vnto him, and did reſemble him in bodie and geſture; but that he did imitate and excell him in vertue and good conditions, and had the ſame qualities; and was naturally ſo inclined; ſauing that if TRAIAN were ſpotted with any vice, THEODOSIVS was free from it. It is written that TRAIAN was a little too much giuen to the drinking of wine: but we reade that THODOSIVS was moſt temperate, in eating and drinking. TRAIAN was very deſirous of triumphs, glorie and honour; THEODOSIVS deſpiſed them and held them for things of no moment: but he euer ſought to obtaine the victorie, and in all battailes and skirmiſhes was both valiant and politicke, euer giuing thankes and honour vnto God as a good Chriſtian. In concluſion, THEODOSIVS was of admirable valour, force and courage, very politicke and expert in the warres, of an excellent witte and iudgement in ciuill gouernment, a louer of iuſtice and equitie, mercifull, pitiful, and of a moſt noble inclination, although ſomewhat haſtie and cholericke againſt malefactors; but he was preſently pacified and eaſily entreated. And to moderate this paſſion, beſides S. AMBROSE his law concerning matters of death, he vſed of cuſtome (knowing his owne haſtie diſpoſition) not to determine of any thing, vntil that he had repeated ouer the foure and twentie letters of the Greeke Alphabet: for in that ſpace his wrath would be tempered. He was much honoured and beloued by all men, eſpecially by ſuch as were honeſt. He was exceeding liberall, continent, and ſhamefac't, very circumſpect and carefull, indifferently well learned and ſeene in hiſtorie. He much deſired to know the acts of the antient, and greatly honoured learned and wiſe men. He was well ſpoken, and of a pleaſant and merrie conuerſation, framing himſelfe with great diſcretion to the qualitie of thoſe perſons with whom he diſcourſed, maintaining the maieſtie of his eſtate and the authoritie of his perſon; and had alſo other excellent vertues too long to recite. THEODOSIVS when he died left two ſonnes (of which we haue alreadie ſpoken) and one daughter. His ſonnes ARCADIVS and HONORIVS were Emperours; both which he had by his firſt wife whoſe name was FLACILLA, an excellent and a moſt religious woman; his daughters name was PLACIDIA GALLA, which hee had by his ſecond wife, who was the daughter of the Emperour VALENTINIANVS the firſt.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Empire being vnder the gouernment of Theodoſius his two ſonnes, and ſo vnder the Tutors ordained by him, that is, Ruffinus and Stilico, which ought to haue taken care for the young men, and to haue gouerned them as fathers: they not only neglected the care of the youthes committed to their charge (nothing caring they ſhould be acknowledged for Emperors) ſeeking to make themſelues abſolute Princes: but they both came to an euil end. For Ruffinus, who was Arcadius his Tutor in the Eaſt, his treaſon being diſcouered, had his head ſtricken off, and ſet ouer one of the gates of Conſtantinople. And Stilico, who was Honorius his Tutor in the Weſt, notwithſtanding that hee went againſt the Gothes, yet he temporized, that hee might bring his treaſon to ſome effect; which being in the end diſcouered, he was ſlaine by Honorius his commande-

ment: which was the beginning of the vtter ruine of the Romane Empire, which was in a manner wholly destroyed by the Gothes. In which time, Arcadius, who had very peaceably enioyed his Empire the space of certaine yeeres, died in Constantinople. But sundry barbarous Nations ouer-ranne all Honorius his Empire, he lying in Rauenna, making small shew to be an Emperor; being very negligent, when there was neede of great care and diligence. Neuertheleſſe, giuing charge of the warres to sundry of his Captaines, he freed his eſtate (except Spaine which was conquered by the Gothes, Vandals and other strange Nations). In which time he fell sick and dyed in Rome, without leauing any heirs of his body (for he had no children by any wife) when he had held the Empire in a manner eight and twentie yeeres.

TRuly I feare that such as shall reade this Hiſtory, will reproue me for spending more time about the life of THEODOSIVS, then I vſe to do in writing the liues of other Emperors; but he that shall duly conſider his vertues and excellencies, will iudge that I haue been rather too brief, then otherwiſe. Wherefore holding the time and labour herein spent for wel employed, let vs come to speake of his sonnes: in whoſe Hiſtorie I can vſe no greater breuitie, then in that of their father, conſidering the great and sundrie accidents which hapned in thirtie yeeres; for ARCADIVS raigned little leſſe: and so likewiſe from henceforth we shall be conſtrained to write more at large, according to the alterations of eſtates and other matters, whereof we shall haue occaſion to speake.

THEODOSIVS left the Empire in such subiection, so peaceable, and in such quiet to his sonnes ARCADIVS and HONORIVS, that if the wickednes of their tutors had not altred and troubled it, they might easily haue gouerned and supported the same. But they which were put in truſt to see all well ordered, were the cauſe that the Empire was moleſted, in such manner, as it plainely appeareth they were the occaſion of the totall ruine of the Empire, or at the leaſt, the beginning thereof. For as soone as THEODOSIVS was dead, GILDVS who was Gouernour of Africa, and of the Prouinces there, and RVFFINVS and STILICO in their gouernments, each of them practiſed to get the Empire for himſelfe, and to diſpoſſeſſe the sonnes of their soueraigne Lord; and each of them shewed his reſolution, as soone as he had oportunity. ARCADIVS with his Gouernour RVFFINVS went to Conſtantinople, whither he commanded his fathers dead body to be brought to be buried with great solemnity. HONORIVS remained in Italie, with STILICO: and so they began to raigne without any contradiction or oppoſition, in the same order as their father had left them. As soone as GILDVS, gouernour of Africa, vnderſtood that THEODOSIVS was dead, he tooke no longer care to conceale his intent, but preſently shewed it openly in his actions; and beginning to make himſelfe Lord of all that country, not with the title of Comes or Earle, as vntill then he held it (which as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, was then giuen to Gouernours of Prouinces) but as abſolute Lord thereof, without acknowledging any subiection or dutie to HONORIVS, or to ARCADIVS.

This GILDVS had a brother whoſe name was MASTELZERIVS, a very good and loyall Chriſtian, who to the vttermoſt of his power reſiſted his brothers proceedings. But GILDVS was already so mightie and of such power, that MASTELZERIVS, whom some call MASTELZER was driuen to flie into Italy, and so he remained ſole and abſolute Lord of all Africa. And GILDVS vnderſtanding that his brother was gone to the Emperour (like a cruell tyrant) made two of his sonnes which were his Nephewes and left in Africa, to be ſlaine, nothing regarding how neere they were to him in bloud. MASTELZERIVS came into Italie, and making relation to HONORIVS, or to say better, to STILICO, of what had hapned (whoſe wiſedome and courage was very great, although grounded vpon diſloyaltie) had an Army giuen him, and all things thereto needfull; and so was sent againſt his brother, as againſt a common enemie. And MASTELZERIVS aſwell to performe his duty, as to be reuenged of the death of his sonnes, with the greateſt expedition he could make, departed towards Africa, although with ſmall forces, truſting in the equitie of his cauſe, in the friendſhip he had in that Countrey, and aboue all, in the helpe and power of God, which he daily implored with teares, and moſt deuout prayers. And as PAVLVS OROSIVS reporteth, comming to an Iland

Gildus put two of his brothers sonnes to death.

Maſtelzerius went with an Army againſt his brother Gildus.

Iland called Capraria, neer to Naples, he carried with him from thence certain deuout religious men which liued there; in whoſe prayers hee repoſed greater truſt than in the ſtrength of his whole Armie: with which hee made so many faſtings and praiers, that it seemed God heard him; for, he preuailed without any battell or bloudſhed, which hapned in this manner:

Coming vpon the Coaſt of Africa with the ſmall Forces which he brought, with great courage hee went to Land, and entrenched his Armie, and fortified the same, and sent abroad to giue notice of his arriuall, and of his power in all places; from whence hee thought his friends and ſouldiers would haue comn to join with him: but his brother cam againſt him with threeſcore and tenne thouſand men, very well appointed. MASTELZERIVS, seeing himſelf in this diſtreſſe, was no way diſcouraged, neither made any doubt of the victory; aſſuring himſelf that to obtain the ſame it lay in the hand of God, and not in the multitude of men and horſes. Hauing a reſolution to paſſe by a certain Port, thereby to auoid his enemie and brother, but conſidering with himſelf how hardly it was to be performed (as PAVLVS OROSIVS writeth) hee made his praiers; and, praying, fell aſleep and dreamed, that within three daies hee ſhould obtain the victory. Heerupon, MASTELZERIVS remained there vntill the third day; and then with inuincible courage ſallied out of his trenches againſt his enemies, who thought of no ſuch matter, but rather daily expected to haue had him in their hands; and, they coming forth againſt him, he went towards them before his troops, aduiſing and perſwading them to yeeld obedience, and not to bear Arms againſt him: for, he was sent thither by the Emperor, their ſoueraign Lord. And as an Enſign-bearer would haue charged him, and thoſe that were with him, hee ſtept to him; and, wounding him, ſmote his colours to the ground: with which onely blowe it pleaſed God that he ſubdued and pacified all the reſt: for, there was not any one that made any reſiſtance; but all the Enſign-bearers and ordinary ſouldiers came ouer to him, and yeelded their obedience; and the ſouldiers of that Countrey fled, and ſo did his brother: whereby he had the victory, as we may say, miraculouſly; for, ſo all men accounted the ſame.

Maſtelzerius victory againſt his brother Gildus.

This GILDVS, seeing himſelf abandoned by his ſouldiers, fled to the ſea ſide; and, imbarking himſelf aboord a ſhip, ſet ſail, thinking to haue eſcaped: and, hauing ſailed ſome ſpace, it pleaſed God that the winde came contrary, and he for ought he could doo was driuen to take Land; where he was taken, and by his brothers commandement had his head ſtricken off, in requitall of the cruelty which he had ſhewed to his sonnes, and for his treaſon againſt his Lords; MASTELZERIVS remaining without controulment victorious, and Maſter of his brothers Camp. But afterwards seeing himſelf mighty (as, of cuſtome, in proſperity men growe inſolent) hauing no ſuch fear of God before his eies as he ought to haue had, hee purpoſed and attempted to haue the Empire of Africa to himſelf, without any regard of the Emperour HONORIVS, who had sent him thither; which his diſloyalty his Captains could not endure, and therefore they ſlue him. Theſe two brethren being dead, Africa remained for a ſpace in quiet ſubiection to the Emperors. Theſe warres aforeſaid are excellently well written in verſe by CLAVDIANVS.

Gildus taken and beheaded by his brothers commandement.

Maſtelzerius ſlain by his ſouldiers, and the cauſe.

While theſe matters paſſed in Africa, ARCADIVS was not idle in Conſtantinople: for, his Gouerner RVFFINVS, vnwilling any longer to conceal his wicked purpoſes, ſought by all means to bring ARCADIVS into ſome diſtreſſe, that he might vſurp the Empire; and to that end ſolicited the Goths and other Nations to war againſt the Empire. Which being diſcouerd, ARCADIVS procuring it, though but a boy, he was ſlain by ſom companies of Italian ſouldiers; who, ſtriking off his head, ſet it ouer one of the gates of Conſtantinople. This RVFFINVS, as ſome say, was born in Britannie. Others say, that he was a Frenchman, a man of great judgement, and an excellent Captain; but diſloyall and ill-diſpoſed. His goods ARCADIVS gaue to an Eunuch of his called EVTROPIVS, who was very priuate with him. Againſt this RVFFINVS (declaring his doings) the aforeſaid CLAVDIANVS wrote two books in heroicall verſe; and by his death ARCADIVS remained at liberty, and Lord of his Empire in the Eaſt with greater quietnes than his brother HONORIVS: for, STILICO, who gouerned in the Weſt, was farre more cunning and ſubtile than RVFFINVS, and was very valiant, and a moſt expert man of warre; and as he had as wicked or a worſe intent, ſo hee knew better how to couer the ſame, as well by his wit, as the great power which he enioyed. For, beſides that he was HONORIVS his Gouerner or Tutor, he was twice his father-in-law: for, HONORIVS had his daughter to wife, hauing firſt been contracted to another daughter of his which died vnmarried.

Stilico, father-in-law to Honorius.

This

Stilico's practises and treason against Honorius.

This STILICO was by birth a Vandall; and, hauing purposed to make a sonne of his called EVCHERIVS Emperor, by his great (although malitious) wit hee concealed the same, vntill time of better opportunity: whereto he thought, that the best and most assured way was, To bring the Emperors into necessity, distresse and danger, to the end that he onely might bee the mean to repair and recouer all losses. For, he had so proud a heart, and so great power, that he was perswaded, that as often as it pleased him he was able to redresse all matters; and that the need which the Emperor should haue of him, would open the way to his purposes. And to that end, by deuices and secret practices, hee solicited many nations to make warres vpon the Empire; as, the Alanes, whose Originall I think we haue described: which, according to PTOLOMY, was of Gotland; and, after MARCELLINVS and PLINY, was of Sarmatia in Europe, who at that time inhabited part of Germany: and the Swevians, a most fierce people of the same Germany, and the Vandals borne also therein; called Vandals, after the name of a Riuer so called in Scythia, from whence they first descended, as is aboue mentioned; which by PLINY and PTOLOMY are called Vandalines: and those Burgundians, which wee now call Burgonians; of which, CORNELIVS TACITVS saith, that they were of the same Vandals, and all one nation. They were called Burgundians; for that, in times past being driuen out of Germany by DRVSVS and TIBERIVS NERO in the time of AVGVSTVS CÆSAR, they were constrained to dwell in the fields, and suburbs of cities called Burgi or Burghs, and therefore took their name of Burgunds or Burgundians; but they were very famous by many authors. He, hauing moued these nations, and procured them to make warre, sometimes by letters from certain persons which promised to aid and assist them, and sometimes by causing wrongs and violences to bee offred them, the more to incense them, vsed yet another policie; which was, that the Gothes, called Visogothes, which (as we haue said) for the space of 21 yeers had serued in the Emperors pay, and had serued faithfully euer since that the Emperour THEODOSIVS had receiued them into his seruice, after the death of ATHANARICVS their King; he found a meaus to cassiere them, and that they should be ill-intreated, and had in contempt. Which they took for such a disgrace, and in such scorn, that they presently determined to mutine; and, doing so, chose a Noble man of their owne nation for their King, whose name was ALARICVS, and began to inuade the countries of Hungarie and Austria.

The Alanes, and their Originall.

The Originall of the Vandals.

Alaricus King of the Gothes.

Matters standing in these tearms, STILICO his drift was, that the Gothes, as men which knew and had good experience in Italie, should go make a conquest thereof; and, as the other nations (as, Vandals, Alanes and Suevians) should inuade France, he should haue the charge to defend Italie: and HONORIVS, being thus distressed, should defend France in person; where he should be either slain or ouerthrowne, or at the least be so oppressed, that he ouercoming the Gothes, which hee held to bee easily done, would make himself Lord of Rome which was the head of the Empire, and afterwards would do the like by all the rest; which hapned not as hee expected: but of his treason arose the destruction and totall decay of the whole Empire, and of himself also. Eight yeers were expired since the death of THEODOSIVS, and that HONORIVS and ARCADIVS raigned, when STILICO and another Noble-man called AVRELIANVS, were chosen Consuls; and the Visogothes, which were put out of pay, began to make open wars in Hungary and Austria; and, this war in the beginning seeming to bee of small importance, their force and power in short space increased in such manner, that all the world stood in fear of them. For (as PAVLVS OROSIVS an Author of that time, PAVLVS DIACONVS, and others write) as soon as the Gothes were in a mutinie, a certain King, called RADAGASIVS joyned with them, with two hundred thousand other Gothes; all, fierce men of war. But it is true, that they write not how or from whence came so great a number of men; neither what this King RADAGASIVS was. It seemeth that then it was a thing so publikely knowne, that no man was ignorant or stood in doubt thereof, and therefore needless to be repeated; by reason whereof we are now ignorant thereof: but they most constantly affirm, the number of the men of war to be such as is already specified.

The wars of the Gothes.

Radagasius, King of the Gothes.

The cruell wars which the Goths made in the bids of the Empire.

ALARICVS and RADAGASIVS coming together, without finding any resistance or force able to offend them, ouerran and spoiled all Thracia, Hungarie, Austria, Slauonia, Dalmatia, and the Frontiers thereof; in such sort, as it seemed that diuels, and not men, had passed that way: for, they left nothing standing but the earth and the air; which, S. IERROME, who liued in that time, writing to PAVLVS and EVSTACHIVS, plainly expresseth in these words: The brute beasts haue also endured the wrath of the Lord in this warre: for, the cities being laid waste, and the people thereof put to the sword, the like is done by the very fields; so as they lie bare, desolate, and desert; whereof the Prouinces of Thracia and Slauonia; and the countrie wherein I was borne beare true record: whereby it seemeth that nothing remaineth but the earth, the aire, the bushes and the woods; for all the rest is spoiled and destroied. After these inhumane spoils, ALARICVS & RADAGASIVS resolued to come into Italie; diuiding their Armies into sundry troupes: for it was impossible that so huge an Armie should be able to march together. When these newes were knowne in Rome, there fell so great a terror among the Citizens; and generally ouer all Italie, as they all held themseues for lost and dead men.

RADAGASIVS being arriued in Italie, and hauing passed the Apennine mountaines, came to the mountaines Biesole in Tuscane. There came in the behalfe of the Empire, against RADAGASIVS, two Captaines which serued the Emperor HONORIVS: the one of which was called VLDINVS, and the other SARRA, with a great number of Gothes and Hunnes in the Emperors pay, which made head against RADAGASIVS, and stopped the passages in the mountaines against him, and cut off his victuals, whereof he stood in great want, considering the greatnes of his Army. These Hunnes and Gothes which came to the aid of the Romans, PAVLVS OROIVS, who, as we may say, was an eye witnesse, and also PAVLVS DIACONVS and others write of their comming: but they write not how, or from whence they came, although it be already declared from whence they were: but neuertheless they were a great defence of Italie; so that the Lord abated the pride of RADAGASIVS, through hunger, thirst, and the want of necessaries. But herein Authors disagree: for PROSPERVS saith, that RADAGASIVS was ouerthrowne and taken prisoner, STILICO leading a great Armie against him. But PAVLVS OROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS, after they haue spoken of the two Captains VLDINVS & SARRA, say that RADAGASIVS and his Army were ouerthrown through pure hunger and thirst, without any battaile, and that they were taken prisoners like sheep. But howsoeuer it hapned, for it might be that there was a battaile also; the truth is, that he and his Army were ouerthrowne in this Iourney, and all taken prisoners by HONORIVS his Souldiers: in such sort, that S. AVGVSTINE who liued in that time, whose reports are to be beleeued, in his booke de Ciuitate Dei, affirmeth, that in one only day RADAGASIVS lost aboue one hundred thousand men; and all Authors affirm, that a great number of them dyed of hunger: and that there was not a Souldier among the Romans but had a droue of Captiues, as if they had been sheepe; and that they were so cheap, that for a peece of gold, which is now worth but a ducat, a man might haue bought a whole company of them. There fell so great a mortality and sicknes amongst them, that within short space they in a manner all died. And their King & Captain RADAGASIVS was likewise taken prisoner and put to death by HONORIVS: whose vertue and valour is much commended in this action, by PAVLVS OROSIVS; but (as by the Histories it appeareth) he seemed to be of very little worth, a very negligent and careless Prince, chiefly in matters concerning the wars, and at that time lay in Rauenna where he held his Court, which in those daies was a great and principall Citie. His brother ARCADIVS lay in Constantinople, from whence he sent ayd and succours to his brother. This feare being past, within a little while after ALARICVS entred Italie, who was a man of greater iudgement and courage then RADAGASIVS, and his souldiers better trained, and of greater experience; against whom STILICO courageously oppoled himselfe, and the warre began between them in the marches of Rauenna; where ALARICVS was ouerthrown in battel by STILICO: for in those daies; STILICO for valour and policy in the wars, had not his equal in the world. But his purposes being such as we haue said, he would neuer wholy vanquish ALARICVS; but sometimes would make shew to be careless, and leaue open the waies for him to passe: so as ALARICVS perceiued that STILICO had no meaning to ouerthrow him; and this war continued between them (as some Authors write) the space of three yeeres.

Alaricus came into Italy.

Stilico the most excellent Captaine of his time.

About the same time, the Alanes, Hunnes, Vandales and Burgonians entred the territories of the Empire, making war vpon the bankes sides of the Riuer of Rhine, wherof a new feare seised the hearts of the people. When ALARICVS vnderstood these newes, he sent to HONORIVS to haue peace, and some country in France, wherin he and his people might inhabit, promising to defend that prouince against those Nations, and therewith aduertising him that STILICO did cunningly prolong the wars against him. The Emperor beginning to be iealous of STILICO, and notwithstanding that he was also certified by others of his treason: yet for the present he dissembled the matter, and agreed with ALARICVS, granting him his request; and taking security of him, sent him into France. Wherof it was imagined, that two great benefits would haue insued; the one was, the peace and quiet of Italy through his absence; the other, the defence of France, wherein the Vandales, Hunnes, Alanes and Burgonians were already entred; which all men affirmed to be aboue two hundred thousand men. But STILICO his treason spoiled all: for notwithstanding that he did that which HONORIVS commanded, in suffering ALARICVS and the Gothes to begin their iourney in peace, and gaue them such things as were needefull, accordingly as the Emperor had appointed; yet as a man which altogether repined against peace, and chiefly that to ALARICVS should be committed the defence of France, he resolued to breake and scatter all those troupes; and had such meanes to effect it, as I will tell you, whereof ensued his owne totall destruction, and the ruine of the whole Empire: which hapned in this manner.

The comming of the Alanes, Hunnes, Vandales and Burgonians.

Alaricus going for France.

The Treason of Stilico.

ALARICVS, free from any suspicion (according to the agreement) went for France: but STILICO secretly practised with a Captaine in his Armie which was a Iew, whose name was SAVL, that he with his companie, fayning some displeasure, or particular quarrell, vpon an Easter day (when the Gothes mistrusting nothing being Christians celebrated diuine seruice) should then set vpon them, and kill as many of them as he could: for by these meanes hee was assured that the wars would begin againe, and therewith would his power and authoritie also begin, which with the peace was at an end. The Iew put this secret practice in execution, and the Gothes being suddainly set vpon, receiued great losse: but he presently paid for it; for the Gothes, in great haste putting themselues in Armes, fought with him; and there was SAVL slaine with the greatest part of his souldiers. ALARICVS being herewith highly offended, returned against STILICO his Army: and STILICO fayning to stand in great feare, made shew not to dare to fight, but sent to the Emperor for new succors; who being aduertised of what STILICO thought to bee most secret, and what had hapned concerning the Iew SAVL, and standing in great feare of STILICO, sent certaine persons to the Armie, who finding opportunitie should kill both him and his sonne: which was performed accordingly, and his treason was discouerd, and the cause wherefore they were put to death. But herein, although the Emperor HONORIVS vsed a good policy, yet he was careless in prouiding for the rest: for he sent not any such Generall to command his Armie as the case required. So as King ALARICVS either beleeued that the injurie which SAVL had done him, was by the Emperours consent, or else he knew and saw his time and oportunitie: and thereupon finding no resistance, marched directly with his whole Armie towards Rome, the head and Empresse of the world,

The death of Stilico.

Alaricus returned against Rome, besieged & tooke it.

And making most cruell warre by fire and sword, he drew neere vnto it, in the yeer one thousand, one hundred and threescore, after the foundation thereof: but the Romanes standing vpon their guard, he could not take it at the first assault; wherefore he besieged it, which siege continued two yeers. Of the besieging of Rome, and how ALARICVS took it in the end, many authors write: but in what manner it was taken, and what exploits were done during the time of the siege, they write so briefly as in a manner they say nothing thereof. But that it was taken; PAVLVS OROSIVS in his seuenth booke, PAVLVS DIACONVS in the life of HONORIVS, IORNANDES in his Historie of the Gothes, S. AVGVSTINE in his book De Ciuitate Dei, S. HIEROME in his epistle ad Principium, as a matter which hapned in his time, auerre the same: and so doth S. ISIODORE in his History of the Gothes. PROCOPIVS, a Greeke Authour, and others of later time, as I could gather out of their writings, say, that ALARICVS marching with his Army towards Rome, with a resolution to doe that which afterwards he did; as to a Christian, although fierce and cruell, there came a Monk which very boldly (ALARICVS giuing him audience) admonished and counselled him to desist from his enterprise, and to consider that he was a Christian, and that for the loue of God he should moderate his furie, and not seeme to rejoyce in the slaughter of men, and the shedding of humane blood; and sith that Rome had not done him any offence, he should not goe thither. To whom they say, that ALARICVS made this answer: I let thee vnderstand, man of God, that I goe not of my own will and desire against the great Citie of Rome: but I assure thee, that there daily appeareth vnto me a man, who doth vrge and importune me thereto; saying, Get thee to Rome and destroy it euen to the ground. Whereat the religious man being greatly amazed, durst say no more. This I finde written in the Annales of Constantinople annexed to the history of EVTROPIVS: whereby it plainely appeareth, that the affliction of Rome was the especial punishment of God. PAVLVS OROSIVS affirmeth the same, saying, That as God drew iust Lot out of Sodome, when he inflicted so great punishment on that Citty; so drew he Pope INNOCENT out of Rome when ALARICVS came to besiege it; who went to Rauenna to see the Emperor HONORIVS. Yet PLATINA writes, this misfortune hapned in the time of Pope ZOZIMVS: but but it may be that it began in the time of the one, and ended in the time of the other; S. HIEROME liued also in those daies out of Rome, being then gone to doe penance in Bethlehem.

But returning againe to the matter, ALARICVS held the citie of Rome, strictly besieged; where betweene the besieged, were many skirmishes, and many men were slaine in those two yeeres space; and the famine was so great in Rome, as they endured it with so great patience and constancie, that Saint HIEROM saith, that when the citie was taken; there were few men therein that could be slaine or taken prisoners, for that extreame hunger had consumed them; and had constrained them (in horrible manner) to eate the flesh the one of the other; so as the mother did not spare the child which she held at her brest, but through hunger, lodged the same againe in her wombe, from whence not long before it issued. These are the words of Saint HIEROM. But in what manner Rome was taken, authors agree not: for PROCOPIVS saith, that ALARICVS seeing he could not take it by force, resolued to vse some stratagem; and fayning that he would raise the siege, made a kinde of truce, and secretly sent into Rome three hundred prisoners in which he reposed much trust, hauing first instructed them what they had to do; setting them at libertie and promising them great rewards. The which one day at a certain hower; making shew as though they went to see the citie, metall together at a port according to their appointment, which port they took and held in despite of those which had the guard; and the Gothes running thither vpon a sodaine, entred there and surprised the citie. Others affirme, that by the commandement and policie of a woman, which was a great Ladie of that citie, a port was giuen to the Gothes, at which they entred. And that she did this of pitie, to see the great famine which raged within the citie, imagining that the enemies could not doe so great hurt in Rome, as the Romans did to themselues, as we haue said. Some authors there are, which say, that the citie of Rome was taken by force, for that those which were within it, were not able to man the walles, or to make any longer resistance. But howsoeuer it was, all authors affirm that ALARICVS before he entred the same, commanded on pain of death, that no man should be so hardie, as to touch any of those which had withdrawne themselues into the Churches and temples, chiefly of Saint PETER and Saint PAVL Apostles; which was afterwards duly obserued. But all the rest of the citie was robbed and spoiled, and many thousands of people slaine, and many taken prisoners; among which was a sister of the Emperours, whose name was PLACIDIA, whom ATHAVLPHVS one of the principall men among the Gothes, and neere kinsman to King ALARICVS took, and had in his keeping; and after wards married her. The next day after they had taken the citie; in disgrace and disdaine of the Empire, and to make themselues merrie, they chose one ATALVS for Emperour of Rome, and the same day they carried him vp and downe the streetes in the habit of an Emperour; and the next day they made him serue like a slaue. Three or fower daies the Gothes remained in Rome: which being past, setting fire in sundrie parts of the citie, their King ALARICVS and they departed.

Famine in Rome in the time of the siege.

The taking of Rome.

Placidia sister to the Emperor Honorius taken prisoner.

Rome set on fire by the Gothes.

All this while the Emperour HONORIVS was in Rauenna, so careless, that when the newes was sodainely brought to him that Rome was lost (nothing remembring the citie where of he was Emperour) he thought that they had told him of a French-man, whom they called ROMA, which was one of those which were maintained by the Emperors to fight man to man, after the manner of Gladiators in Rome: whereat the Emperour greatly marueiled that hee should be so soone dead or taken; for it was but a little while since that he saw him fight with others: whereby it plainely appeareth how careless hee was. This was the first time that Rome, after that it grew to bee mightie, was taken by Barbarous Nations: for vvhen the Gaules tooke it, it was of no such account; beeing in the beginning but of small strength and power.

After this time that ALARICVS tooke it, the Romane Empire daily declined, and the Citie of Rome was oftentimes taken and destroied: whereof we will declare the most notable accidents, to the end that the Reader may know and iudge how weake, and of what small power the Empires and mighty Kingdomes of the World are; and how that Rome which was the Queene and Empresse of the vniuersall World, in time became a slaue to all the Nations thereof. ALARICVS departing from Rome would haue sailed into Sicilia; but a tempest returned him into Italie, and hee dyed in the City of Cosenza; and the Gothes after that he was dead, chose ATHAVLPHVS for their King, who (as we sayd) married with PLACIDIA, the Emperor THEODOSIVS his daughter. Which ATHAVLPHVS as soon as he was

When the Romane Empire began to decline.

The death of Alaricus King of the Gothes.

Athaulphus made King of the Gothes in place of Alaricus.

Athaulphus would haue destroyed Rome, but forbare through the entreatie of his wife Placidia.

King returned towards Rome, with a determination to haue wholly destroyed the same, to haue rooted out the name thereof, and to haue left it desolate; which his cruell resolution he altred at his wiues intercession, who with teares entreated the same. When ATHAVLPHVS departed with his Armie from Rome, it is not written whether he placed therein any gouernour, or left it at libertie to the Emperour. For his wife PLACIDIA was a meane to bring HONORIVS and ATHAVLPHVS to some agreement, and concluded a truce betweene them. And ATHAVLPHVS consummating his nuptial rites with her, which vntil then were not solemnized, he went out of Italie: and marching with his Armie through France, to the citie of Barcelona in Spaine, and taking the same and the territorie thereof, he staied there a certaine space. What end he made, you shall heare hereafter.

During the time of these troubles in Italie, ARCADIVS liued in peace in Constantinople, and in the easterne parts free from troubles: for authors write not of any wars of importance which troubled him, or of any aduersitie that befell him; for it pleased God to lay his scourge vpon the prouinces of the West onely: and so hauing raigned thirteene yeeres, in the one and thirtith of his age, he died in Constantinople. Others say, that he held the Empire a great while longer; alledging that he died after the taking of Rome: but PROSPERVS and others affirme, that he died before. Some say, that it was in in the yeere of our Lord foure hundred and tenne: others say, foure hundred and thirteene. He seeing death neere at hand, and that he could not liue, and that his sonne THEODOSIVS whom he left behinde him for his heire, was but eight yeeres old, he tooke a dangerous course; but it prooued very profitable, which was: That leauing his son CÆSAR, and his successor, he ordained by his last will HISDIGERDVS King of Persia and of Parthia for his tutor; who at that time was a friend and in league with the Empire; notwithstanding that the house of Persia was euer a capitall enemie thereof. When the King of Persia vnderstood what ARCADIVS had ordained, he accepted of the gouernement and of the protection of the child, and speedily sent one ANTIOCHVS an excellent man, and a great soldier, to Constantinople: who with the good will and consent of HONORIVS, who was not a little glad of the friendship of Persia, gouerned the Easterne Empire, with great fidelitie, and discretion; and so maintained the same in peace and iustice, vntill that young THEODOSIVS, sonne to the Emperour ARCADIVS, came to age. ARCADIVS being dead, whether before or after the sacke of Rome, the name of Emperour rested in HONORIVS, and in his Nephew young THEODOSIVS.

The Emperour Arcadius died in Constantinople.

A relation of what happened after the death of the Emperour ARCADIVS.

Grafianus rebelled and took the title of Emperour in England.

ALl things being in such confusion, as the Gothes, Vandals, and other nations inuaded and made a conquest of the territories of the Empire; and the Emperour HONORIVS lying in Rauenna, taking no good order for the same: In the Ile of Britannie also a great Lord borne in the same Iland, whose name was GRATIANVS rebelled, and took vpon him the title and ensignes of Emperour, with the consent of some of the men of warre in the same Iland. But his presumption had an euill end: for within few daies after, the same men of warre slew him. But they setting all dutie apart, determined to make an other souldier among themselues Emperour, whose name was CONSTANTINE, who was a man of greater courage and of more witte, then GRATIANVS; who drawing all the Armie out of England, went into France, with a conceit to haue made himselfe Lord thereof; and to that end, made peace with the Vandales, Sueuians and Alanes, which alreadie were in France marching towards Spaine: for the Burgonians made their abode in that part which is now called Burgundie.

The souldiers slew Gratianus and in his place made Constantine Emperour.

The Vandales, Sueuians, and Alanes took their way towards Spaine.

This peace betweene CONSTANTINE and these three nations could not well be concluded: for CONSTANTINE drew to him many souldiers of France; and growing mightie made a full account to become Lord of Spaine also, before that those Barbarians should be able to come thither. Whereupon he sent certaine gouernours, with a competent number of souldiers thither, and many townes in Spaine were resolued to obey his commandement; holding it better to serue him, then those nations which were marching thitherwards. But two Noble-men, rich, and of great authoritie, whose names were (as saith PAVLVS DIACONVS) DIDIMVS and VERODIANVS borne in Valentia, withstood them, and and found meanes to driue them out of Spaine. And thereupon with the aide of their kindred, friends, and acquaintance they went to the Pyrenæan Mountaines, with a resolution not onely to defend the passages against CONSTANTINES Armie, but also against all the other nations before mentioned, vsing all meanes to retaine Spaine in the obedience and seruice of the Emperour HONORIVS; which they continued a long time, although with great trouble, effusion of bloud, and daunger.

CONSTANTINE, holding himselfe herewith greatly affronted, assembled together a certaine number of the most actiue and best tried souldiers that hee had, and made his sonne CONSTANS their Commander, who by some authors is called CONSTANTIVS; whom for this purpose, he took out of a Monasterie wherein he was a Monke, and making him CÆSAR, sent him against the two brethren. His people were of such power and so expert in the warres, as they ouerthrew, and slue the two Spanish brethren, and entred Spaine, which was the ruine thereof: for the men of warre which came with CONSTANS, after they had spoiled the countrie, and had vsed all kinde of hostilitie, returned to the Pyrenæan Mountaines; and driuing the Spaniards from thence which garded the passages, took vpon them the defence thereof, and were well able to haue performed the same. But CONSTANS going to Arles a citie in France to speake with his father, who then lay there, those which had the guarde in the Mountaines came to an agreement with the Vandales and the other strange nations, and sold to them the passages; suffering those Alanes, Sueuians, and Vandales to passe into Spaine: who made such hauocke and committed such spoiles, as can hardly be expressed: especially neere vnto the Pyrenæan hilles where they found greatest resistance. From thence they marched into the maine land to the citie of Valentia (against which they bare an old grudge) which citie they ruined, and the countrie round about it; and then went to the citie of Astorga, which they entred by force; and passing further made great spoile in all Galicia. Afterwards crossing through Castile, they came to the citie of Toledo, which by reason of the situation and naturall strength thereof, and the valour of the inhabitants, they could not take; notwithstanding that they besieged it for a certain space, but were constrained to raise their siege, with shame and dishonor, from that citie which for wars and feates of Armes hath euer been famous in that countrie. By whose example many townes in Spaine continued their allegeance to HONORIVS; notwithstanding that hee sent neither souldiers, captaines, nor reliefe. This people did much harme in the territorie of Toledo: and passing forwards they marched along the riuer Tagus, still spoyling the countrie vntill they came to the citie of Lisbon, in Portugall, which in those daies also was very famous: and giuing an assault thereto, it was so well defended by the inhabitants, that they could not take it, but came to a composition: where they receiuing a great quantitie of treasure they raised their siege, and returned the same way they came, making warre on euerie side. And by reason of a great famine and scarcitie in the countrie (as OROSIVS writeth) they laid downe their Armes for a space, and fell to tilling of the land, as inhabitants of the countrie; diuiding what they had gotten amongst those nations, and their captaines or Kings, being Vandales, Sueuians, and Alanes.

Constantine made his sonne Constans Cæsar, and sent him into Spaine.

Lisbon.

The Empire being in this estate, ATHAVLPHVS and the Gothes possessing Narbona, Barcelona, and the marches thereof, which in name were confederates with HONORIVS, the tyrant CONSTANTINE and his sonnes enioyed the rest of France. The young Emperour THEODOSIVS being a child, was bred vp in Constantinople, vnder the protection of the King of Persia, and of Antiochus, whom he had sent. But of his house and person a very vertuous and honorable Noble man took charge, whose name was ANTHEMIVS, who was his Pretorian Prefect. This child was bred vp in all learning, and became a vertuous prince and a good Christian. His Vncle HONORIVS, who then lay in Rauenna, bethought himselfe how he might make the Westerne Empire, as free from the slauerie of these tyrants and barbarous nations, as the East; and to that end he made a worthie man, whose name was CONSTANTIVS, Generall of his Armie against those tyrants and Barbarians. Which CONSTANTIVS vntill then was an Earle, borne in Rome, descended of the Noble and auntient Romanes; who like a perfect Romane, with a pickt and selected Armie, entred France; and fighting with the Emperour CONSTANTINE the tyrant, ouerthrew him, and besieged him in the citie of Arles, and at length getting him into his hands, smote off his head. And it fell out so happily that within few daies after that the death of CONSTANTINE was published, young CONSTANS the sonne of the said CONSTANTINE, whom his father had made CÆSAR, was slaine in the citie of Vienna in France, by the hands of a captaine of his his whose name was GERONCIVS. And the same GERONCIVS, who also sought to haue made himselfe a tyrant, and to haue created one MAXIMVS a friend of his Emperour, was also slaine by those souldiers which in England rebelled with CONSTANTINE; with a resolution to returne to the seruice of HONORIVS. GERONCIVS being dead, they dispoiled MAXIMVS of his Imperiall robes, and sent him in exile into Spaine. In this manner was France freed from these tyrants, by this worthie man CONSTANTIVS; and the Armie reduced to the seruice of the right Emperour HONORIVS. After this, HONORIVS speedily sent Captaines and souldiers into Britanny, which held for CONSTANTINE, from the first beginning of his tyranny; who reduced the same to obedience and subiection. In France, a man of great parentage and authority in that Countrie (as PAVLVS OROSIVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS affirme) sought to make himselfe Emperour; but he was presently slaine: and in the like manner another brother of his, called SEBASTIAN; both which rebelled (as it seemed) without any occasion or reason, but only that they desired to die with the name and title of Emperors.

The designes of Athaulphus.

CONSTANTIVS Generall for the Emperour HONORIVS, being thus powerfull in France, ATHAVLPHVS King of the Gothes, who lay in Barcelona, and was Lord of all the countrie round about, and had there liued in peace and quiet the space of three yeeres, at the intreary of PLACIDIA to whom he was married, which was HONORIVS sister; began to stand in some feare of the power of the Emperour and of his Generall CONSTANTIVS, knowing that they had fortified the Alpes, to the end hee should no more returne into Italy: Whereupon he resolued to attempt to make himselfe Lord of all Spaine; and perswaded a Romane Captaine, whose name was ATTALVS, to take vpon him the name and title of Emperour, and to goe with a fleete which he would giue him, to seise vpon the Countrie of Andaluzia, which was then called Betica; and to do the like, if he should be able, in Africa; and hee would also make warre in his owne person. Attalus called Emperor. ATTALVS, very vnwisely, accepted his offer, and presently sent into Africa an Armie with Iudges and Gouernours, as though he had been the peaceable Emperour thereof; and began to make warre in Spaine. Against whom, HONORIVS sent a wise and a valiant Captaine called HERACLIANVS: who, driuing all ATTALVS his Iudges and Gouernours out of Africa, leauing the Countrie in peace, with a Nauie came to seeke him himselfe; and, finding him, fought with him in a battaile by Sea, and ouercame him. And he, fleeing to the coast of Spaine, was taken by the Spaniards, and sent to CONSTANTIVS, who was Generall for HONORIVS, who was then in France; who presently sent him prisoner to HONORIVS; and HONORIVS made his hand to be striken off, and sent him in exile into the Isle of Lippari, neere vnto Sicilia. To HERACLIANVS for the victorie which he obtained against him, was giuen the Consulshippe and the Gouernement of Africa. But as in prosperity, pride and ambition increaseth, and men are then farre more insolent, then in time of aduersitie: So this HERACLIANVS, seeing himselfe fauoured and in great authority, thought that he might also be an Emperour. And as he was in possession of Africa, PAVLVS OROSIVS writeth, that taking another Captaine for his sonne in law and companion in his rebellion, whose name was SABINVS, a most subtle fellow and very valiant, he assembled (to goe into Italy against HONORIVS and to make a conquest thereof) the greatest Nauie of all manner of shippes that I euer read of. For OROSIVS affirmeth, that he gathered together (if there be no error in the figures) foure thousand and seuentie sailes of all sorts little and great; which without comparison was the greatest in number that euer was seen vpon the Sea: For we doe not reade that XERXES or ALEXANDER euer armed so great a Nauie.

Heraclianus ouerthrew and tooke Attalus prisoner.

An incredible great Nauie by Sea.

With this great fleete, fraught with souldiers, armes and victuals, he came to the coast of Italie, and set his men on land, to march directly to Rome, being many in number, but not so well experienced and trained as were the Romans; who by HONORIVS his commandement attended their comming, led by a good Generall called MARINVS, with the title and dignity of an Earle: who had raunged his Romanes in very good order, with a resolution to die or to ouercome, and not to suffer themselues to be besieged, as they were by ALARICVS. HERACLIANVS, who thought to haue amazed the world with the name and number of his fleete, and that he should haue found no resistance, was so discouraged when he saw MARINVS his Armie, that he presently fled to the Sea; and embarking himselfe aboord one of his shippes, returned by flight into Africa with that only shippe; from whence he came with so many as is before said.

Heraclianus came into Italy.

After

After that HERACLIAN was arriued, and his base cowardise discouered, the ordinary Garrisons vpon a day mutined and slew him. And his sonne in law and companion SABINVS, altering his resolution, fled to Constantinople to entreate the yong Emperour THEODOSIVS, nephew to HONORIVS, to take compassion of him: from whence within a little while after he was brought to HONORIVS; and hauing his life graunted, was condemned to perpetuall exile. So through the wisedome and good fortune of HONORIVS, all these tyrants were defeated which rebelled against him, the which we haue already related in as plain manner, as I could possibly; which truely was not without great toyle and difficultie: for matters which past both in the time of ARCADIVS & of HONORIVS were so many & so diuers, and off so many accidents happened together, and Historiographers treate of them so confusedly, that in writing them, I am much troubled, as well in collecting and abbreuiating them, as in relating them, in such sort as the readers may vnderstand and comprehend the same; and to recite them in order as they passed, one before another, which hath been my principall care from the beginning; and, by the grace of God, shall be, vntill I haue ended.

The death of Heraclianus.

All the victories and aboue recited good fortunes of HONORIVS, after so many calamities and warres, which he had in his time, Authors attribute to the care which he had of the Christian faith and religion. For in those times through the diligence and endeuour of a Captaine of his called MARCELLINVS, with the assistance of his great Captaine CONSTANTIVS, he procured concord and vnitie in all the Churches of Africa, and of other Prouinces wherein were many Schisms, and erronious opinions concerning the Christian Faith. And truly S. AVGVSTINE was a good meane to bring this to passe, who at that time was Bishoppe of Hippo in Africa; which the Emperour CHARLES the fift in his iourney and conquest of Tunis took from the powerfull and cruell tyrant BARBAROSSA; but his sonne PHILIP the second within few yeers after againe lost the same.

HONORIVS then seeing himselfe free from those tyrants, and the most part of the Prouinces of his Empire in peace, and obedient, resolued to driue the strange and barbarous Nations out of those Countries which they held in Spaine and France about Narbona; thinking it best to begin with the Gothes, which were the most powerfull and warlike people of all the other Nations, and possessed such part of Spaine, as is aforesaid: for these being defeated, he held it an easie matter to make an end of the rest. King ATHAVLPHVS, as he deerely loued his wife PLACIDIA, much desired peace with HONORIVS, and so by all meanes sought the same: Which when his souldiers perceiued, who were of a farre contrary opinion, they so hated him that they slew him; but Authors set not downe in what manner. And they presently chose a great man among themselues for their King, whose name was SEGERICVS; and for that they suspected him as they did ATHAVLPHVS, they handled him in the same manner, as they did their last King. Hauing slaine these two Kings, they chose one WALIA for their King, conceiuing that he would be a great enemy to the Romanes, with whom they desired to haue cruell warres; they hauing the Emperours sister PLACIDIA in their power who at that time was a Widow, whome they entreated very honourably and honestly.

The Gothes slew their King Athaulphus

Segericus king of the Gothes slaine by h. soul diers.

Walia King of the Gothes.

This WALIA beginning to gouerne his kingdom he held it for necessary and sound counsell to haue peace and friendshippe with HONORIVS: but taking warning by his predecessors (to satisfie his people) he rigged vp a great fleete, which he sent to make a conquest of Africa, which held for HONORIVS: and as it pleased God so to worke for HONORIVS, without his assistance, such a tempest tooke them vpon the Sea, that the whole fleete was in a manner lost and cast away. Which misfortune, together with the newes of the comming of CONSTANTIVS, Generall of the Emperours Armie with great power, did much temper the fiercenesse and furie of the Gothes; And WALIA tooke so good order with them, as of their owne accord and consent, a treaty of peace was made with HONORIVS, which was concluded vpon condition, that PLACIDIA should be rendred to the Emperour, and that WALIA and his forces should faithfully aide CONSTANTIVS, to driue the Vandales, Alanes, and Sueuians out of Spaine, who had already made themselues Lords of the greatest part thereof. This being concluded, hostages were giuen in the behalf of WALIA, and PLACIDIA was deliuered, whom HONORIVS afterwards gaue to wife to CONSTANTIVS, in reward of his services and victories obtained by him; and making him CÆSAR, he proclaimed him for his successor. And then began CONSTANTIVS his warres in Spaine against the Barbarians, King WALIA assisting & seruing there in with his Visogothes, as we wil presently declare.

Honorius made peace with Walia King of the Gothes.

Constantius made Cæsar and sent Generall into Spaine against the Vandales.

Andaluzia so called after the Vandals.

While these things (whereof we haue spoken) were acting, the Barbarians were in possession of the greatest part of Spain; especially the Vandals, who had conquered a great part of Betica; from whom that Countrey took the name of Vandaluzia: and afterwards, in processe of time, leauing out the letter V, it came to be called Andaluzia. And the Suevians and Alanes held Merida, and a great part of Lusitania (which is now Estremadura) and part of Portugall: and in Galicia and Leon they had enioyed a great part from the beginning, and had diuided these Countries among them by lot. CONSTANTIVS the Imperiall Generall being com into Spain, and with him the Gothes, according to the agreement, the first warre they made was against the Alanes, neer to the City of Merida; where was fought between them a very cruell battell: wherein the Alanes were ouerthrowne, and CONSTANTIVS had the victory; and the King of the Alanes, called ACHAGE, was slain in battell. This victory obtained by CONSTANTIVS, strook so great a terror into the hearts of the rest of the barbarous Nations, that they presently in great humility sued for peace, and sent to intreat HONORIVS to grant them truce, and some place in Spain wherein they might liue.

Constantius his victory against the Alans

Honorius went to Constantinople.

While these accidents hapned in Spain, HONORIVS went to Constantinople to visit the Eastern parts, where his Nephew the yong THEODOSIVS commanded, who was now com to riper yeers: and, being at liberty free from his Tutors, there fell out some controuersie between him and the King of Persia. And it hapned, that as CONSTANTIVS was busied in the wars of Spain, and HONORIVS out of Italie; an eminent man, born and inhabiting in Rome, Tartallus rebelled in Rome.

being of the antient Nobility, named TARTALLVS, assisted by a great part of the Romane people, and by many Towns in Italy, rebelled, and took the name and title of Emperour, and began to leuie souldiers: but the loyall Subjects which held with HONORIVS, fighting with him, he was by them ouerthrowne and slain. But, disloyalty and treachery was then so much in vse, that another whose name was ATTALVS did the like; who, putting on the Imperiall Robes, and taking the Ensignes, was called Emperour, and beganne to leuie great Forces in Italie.

When the Imperiall Generall CONSTANTIVS, being in Spain, heard these newes, after the victory aforesaid, putting the Vandals, Suevians, and Alanes in good hope to obtain what they desired, and giuing it out that he went into Italie to conferre thereof with the Emperor, the better to keep them in peace in his absence; he left Spain, and came into Italie: the like did the

Emperor HONORIVS, who had been aduertised thereof in Constantinople. When the coming of HONORIVS and CONSTANTEVS was knowne in Rome, the people grew into a great fury; and, apprehending the Tyrant ATTALVS, sent him to Rauenna to the Emperour HONORIVS, whither CONSTANTIVS was already comn with his wife PLACIDIA; where ATTALVS, by HONORIVS his commandement had his hand stricken off, and was

HONORIVS being in Rauenna, whither his brother-in-law CONSTANTIVS CÆSAR was already comn, and hauing consideration of his worthy seruices, and how profitable he had been to the Empire, made him with very great solemnity to be called AVGVSTVS, Emperor, and his equall and companion in the Empire of the West, and made a long set Oration in praise of his vertues: and there the two Emperors by mutuall consent, to the end that WALIA king of the Gothes should continue in their seruice, consigned vnto him the City of Tholosa in the Kingdome of France, with all the Countrey neer adjacent, called Aquitania, which they then named Basconia, and is now called Gasconia.

After the Feasts, and Coronation of CONSTANTIVS, HONORIVS went to Rome to pacifie some tumults which were there: and the new Emperor CONSTANTIVS, resoluing to go into Spain to make an end of the warre which hee had begun, commanded souldiers to bee mustered. Surely, the valour and wisdome of this excellent Captain and Emperour was such, that, if God had permitted him life, hee had freed Spain from those barbarous Nations: but death staid his journey, so as hee neuer came thither. Whereof when HONORIVS was aduertised, he was extremely sorry, and in his place sent into Spain a famous and valiant Captain called ECIVS, who took charge of the Armie which CONSTANTIVS had leuied; and, marching thitherwards, by the way he ouerthrew the Burgonians which attempted to haue entred France. The like he did by the Franks, who afterwards entred and inhabited there. And being comn into Spain, his principall care was to finde out the Alanes: which after their ouerthrowe by CONSTANTIVS, did not chuse them any King, but joyned with the Sweuians, who who were Lords of all the Countrie about Lisbon. But, as soon as they knew that CONSTANTIVS was dead, they returned to Merida; and the Vandals and Sueuians were now grown so proud, that they would neither require nor accept of peace; but came to aid the Alanes, and began to make warre against such Cities as held for the Emperor. ECIVS being comne into Spain, seeing that all made head against him, and hauing no sufficient Armie to encounter them, protracted the time for certain daies, and leuied more forces; which by HONORIVS (without reason) was imputed to him for cowardize, and he sent the Earl CASTINVS to bee Generall and his Successor, displacing ECIVS from his charge. But CASTINVS, perceiuing how the world went, approued the judgement of ECIVS; and in the same manner prolonged the warres, vntill that BONIFACIVS, who was Gouerner of Africa (whom we reade, Saint AVGVSTINE for his vertue to haue much loued) came into Spain to his aid, bringing verie good troops with him: and they two together began the warre, and obtained many notable victories against the Barbarians; and so handled the matter, that it was held for certain that they would haue freed the Countrey. But this command is such a thing as can neuer be well shared: for, these two excellent Captains fell at such variance, that BONIFACIVS would not stay any longer, but returned to the gouernment of Africa (as PROSPERVS, and PAVLVS DIACONVS haue written; yet EVTROPIVS differs from them) and CASTINVS remaining alone, the Emperors partie began to growe vveak in Spain.

Castinus succeeded Ecius in his charge.

Boniface came into Spaine in aide of Castinus.

While these matters passed in the West, HONORIVS his nephew, THEODOSIVS, Emperor in the East, being now of sufficient age, was freed from his Tutors; and, as he was a good Christian, his chiefest care was for the seruice of God, and for the defence of his holy Church. Whereupon he fell at variance with BARRABANVS King of Persia, who succeeded ISDEGERDVS who had been his tutor (as is before said) for that he was giuen to vnderstand that BARRABANVS persecuted the Christians which liued in his dominions, whereof THEODOSIVS had admonished him, requiring reformation: but seeing he could not obtaine it, he sent ARDABVRVS an excellent Captaine against him, who fought a battaile with NASIVS Generall of the Persians, and therein ouerthrew him, and made great slaughter of his men, and afterwards entred the Countrey, and did great harme and spoyle therein. And by another way THEODOSIVS sent another Captaine called GRATIANVS against ALAMANDER King of the Sarazins, who came in aide of the King of Persia: this King was likewise ouerthrowne in battaile by GRATIANVS, and a very great multitude of his people slaine, and he himselfe escaped by flight. And in another place another Captaine called ARSOBVIDA ouerthrew the Persians also: so as this warre was made to the great aduantage of the Romanes, and with losse and preiudice of the Persians, vntill that BARRABANVS ceassing to persecute the Christians, a peace was treated and concluded betweene him and THEODOSIVS. This happened in the time that I told you that the Emperours partie began to waxe feeble and weake in Spaine: which weakenesse increased by reason of the death of HONORIVS; who, as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, died of an infirmitie in Rome, hauing taigned sole Emperor of the West about fifteene yeeres after the death of his brother ARCADIVS, with whom he raigned other 13 yeere; so as in all he raigned 28 yeers, besids 2 with his father. HONORIVS left no heires of his bodie: for by two wiues which he had, which were the daughters of STILICO, he had neuer any childe. And a little before he died, he fell so farre at diffension with his sister PLACIDIA, as she went to Constantinople to her Nephew the Emperour THEODOSIVS, with her two sonnes which she had by the Emperour CONSTANTIVS, of whom we haue already treated: her sonnes were named HONORIVS, and VALENTINIANVS: this VALENTINIANVS was afterwards Emperor: He called in the yeere of the Incarnation of our Sauiour Christ 427.

The death of the Emperor Honorius.

HONORIVS (as before is mentioned) was a vertuous man and a very good Christian, very noblie minded, and very pittifull. He did one notable thing, which was the part of a charitable and good Christian, which was, to abolish the Gladiators or Sword-players, which (as it is written) did vse in Rome vpon pleasure most cruelly to kill one another. He much loued his ease: and so we see, that in his owne person he neuer followed the warres; and in his gouernement was very negligent. But in the end by his Captaines he so much preuailed, that excepting Spaine, he brought all the rest of his Empire to quiet subjection in his life time, although after great rebellions, wars and troubles. A few yeers before his death died the great Doctor S. HIEROME, being of the age of fourescore and twelue yeers, in Bethelem in Iewry, where Christ was born: who departing out of this life, went to enioy the life euerlasting.

Honorius put downe the Sword players called Gladiators.

THE ARGVMENT.

After the death of Honorius, Theodosius lawfully succeeded in the Empire; who, perceiuing that many went about to make themselues Tyrants of the Western Empire, resolued to make his cosen, Valentinian, Cæsar in those parts: who, within a small time after, making himself Lord of all Italie, was by the consent of Theodosius, and of the people, called Emperor. All the while these two Emperors liued, there were such cruell and bloudy wars made by the Barbarians (as, Hunnes, Gothes, Vandals, and such like nations) that the whole world seemed to haue been turned vpside down. But, aboue all other, the wars of the Hunnes was most dangerous, and of longest continuance: for they, hauing conquerd Hungary, would haue gone into France. Against whom, Valentinianus continually sent fresh supplies, vnder the leading of his Generall Ecius. But Theodolius his Empire in the East was in farre better rest and quiet. For, the Western Empire was continually infested with cruell warres: whither Theodosius neuer left to send new supplies of Captains and soldiers. By reason whereof, Attila King of the Gothes, thinking to finde the Empire of Constantinople vnfurnished of men of warre to defend it, inuaded the same: whereupon Theodosius recalled those Captains which hee had sent into Sicilia to the aid of Valentinianus, and encountred the Gothes, during the time of that warre; which on the Gothes side was managed very coldly, by reason of some suspicions and iealousies among themselues; Theodosius falling sick, died of the plague, when he had raigned 42. yeers; whose death was lamented by the whole Empire: for, hee was a verie good man, and much beloued in his life time.

GReat in truth were the accidents and warres, as well prosperous as vnfortunate, which haue befaln in the Roman Empire in the space of foure hundred yeers (little more or lesse) whereof wee haue written, as the Reader may easily judge. But notwithstanding that we haue sometimes seen it in distresse, troubled, and in danger to haue been lost in the whole, or in part; yet in the end, although those calamities continued for a space, wee haue seen how it hath bin deliuered from those dangers, repairing them by some meanes: so as we may say, that it hath bin cured of those infirmities wherwith it was oppressed, and recouered the losses which it sustained, vntill the time whereto wee are now come. But, through the secret iudgement of God, from henceforth matters succeeded not so well; but the losses multiplied, and their forces diminished. And although that sometimes, through the valour of some excellent Emperours and their Captains, the Empire did striue to recouer her antient Majesty, and was both honoured and feared, yet it could neuer attain to the former; and this also was very seldom. So as from henceforth, at sundry times, and by diuerse accidents, the Emperors lost whole Prouinces and Legions; and in them began Kingdoms and par-particular States; and of those Countries which the Empire lost, arose great and mightie Monarchies: and as Principalities and Kingdoms multiplied, so great and more strange were the accidents which hapned, which I cannot relate, neither am I bound thereto: for, my purpose and intent was, Not to write a generall History, but onely of the Emperors, and that briefly. Wherefore, as briefly as I shall be able, I will lay open the ground-work, and hold on my way; writing such things as shall be of greatest importance in the History of the Emperours, leauing that of other Kings and Kingdoms, which in proces of time shall present themselues to others, which either already haue, or hereafter shall take that charge vpon them. For, this which I haue already taken in hand, will be enough for my small ability; which I pray God I may bee able to bring to any reasonable good end, to the honest satisfaction of those which shall reade the same.

The Originall of the Kingdoms.

By the death of HONORIVS, the whole Roman Empire did belong to his nephew THEODOSIVS, then sole Emperor; who at that Instant was in Constantinople, and held the Eastern Empire, as by that which is already said may easily be vnderstood; although that in the time of HONORIVS there bee no notable mention made of his doings, aswell for his fewe yeers, as for that the Empire of the East was in better rest and quiet than the Western, which then was infested and turmoiled.

When it was publikely knowne that HONORIVS was dead, som which meant to continue their allegeance, held for THEODOSIVS, as reason and duty required: but the greatest Potentates beganne to make themselues Lords of the Empire, or of part thereof. In Africa was BONIFACIVS (as we said) Gouerner of that Prouince; who in the beginning held himself Neuter. In Spain the Vandals, Sweuians and Alanes, thinking that CASTINVS (who was Generall for the Empire) should not be able to withstand them, began vpon a sudden to be discontent with that which they held; and so took Arms, and would haue more. The Gothes, who were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, Tolosa, and all the Countries round about, by the leaue and permission of HONORIVS, as his allies and friends, took the same resolution as the rest did. And the Burgonians in like manner which dwelt vpon the Rhines side, and the Franques which had been driuen out of France, resolued to return thither again. The Hunnes also, a most fierce Nation, whose Originall was in Scythia, as that of the Gothes, desirous to leaue their barren Countrie, departed thence in great numbers, and came to the confines of Pannonia inferior, which now is called Hungary: so as into all those Nations, and into sundry others, the death of HONORIVS did put new thoughts and conceits, although they did not presently put them in execution: of all which, as it shall be most fit for my purpose, I will hereafter make particular mention.

The alterations & changes that hapned through the death of Honorius.

The Huns entred Hungary.

The state standing in these tearms; as THEODOSIVS prouided not suddenly for his coming into Italie, or to send some Noble Personage with his power and authority, there was an eminent man in Rome whose name was IOHN, who by meanes of his dignity and riches, was of great power: He, by the counsell and direction of CASTINVS (although in secret) who (as we haue said) was an Earle and Generall in Spain, rebelled, and took the name of Emperor: and ECIVS, whom HONORIVS deposed from the gouernment of Spain, was also of his councell, and fauoured and assisted him in his proceedings.

This Tyrant IOHN hauing made himselfe Lord of Rome, and of the greatest part of Italy, a great part of France holding for him alreadie, and all that part of Spaine which was vnder the command and gouernement of CASTINVS; the same ECIVS and CASTINVS, as they were both enemies to BONIFACE gouernour of Africa, seeing that hee tooke not part with IOHN, perswaded him to declare him for an enemie: yet they discouered not themselues as then, the better to bring the other to confusion. Wherefore CASTINVS fled from Spaine into Africk, with a great fleet and a great number of souldiers, spreading a rumour that hee fled thither for feare of the Vandales, from whom in no part of Spaine hee could liue in safetie. Vnder colour whereof, and writing very louing letters to BONIFACIVS, setting his men on land, he seised on many cities on the coast of Africa, and so liued for certaine daies in counterfeit peace and friendship with BONIFACIVS; yet BONIFACE was not free from iealousie. Heereof ther are at this day epistles extant, written to him by S. AVGVSTINE, who then was Bishop of Hippo, and the answers thereto; discouering the suspicion. And CASTINVS afterwards manifesting his ill meaning, S. AVGVSTINE sought meanes to reconcile them: but his godly endeuour taking no effect, they fought a battaile, which although it were very cruell and bloudie, CASTINVS was ouerthrowne and fled to his ships, and with such of his his ſouldiers as hee could gather together; he returned with ſhame and diſhonour into Sapine. Which when Ioh the vſurping Emperour vnderſtood, hee ſent for him with an intent to leaue him for his Lieutenant in Italy; and aſſembling together the old Captaines and ſouldiers which remained ſince the time of HONORIVS, with the greateſt power that he was able to leuie, and a very great fleete, he made preparation to paſſe into Africa. Some authors write, that hee went thither in perſon, and that after many battailes he was ſlaine by BONIFACIVS. So writeth BLONDVS in his booke of the declining of the Romane Empire, and GVIDO of Rauenna, and ANTONIVS SABELLICVS in his Æneades, and other modern authors: who in my opinion are deceiued, or at the leaſt, I know not what ancient authors they follow therein. Whereof that which I finde written, is, that THEODOSIVS being aduertiſed of the great combuſtions in the Weſterne Empire, and not daring to leaue the Eaſt, thought it his ſafeſt courſe to nominate his coſin germane VALENTINIAN, CÆSAR, who was the ſonne of PLACIDIA, ſiſter to the two Emperours ARCADIVS and HONORIVS, and wife to that worthie Captaine and Emperour CONSTANTIVS. After ſome accidents which happened, with ſuch troupes as hee thought good, hee ſent him into Italy with his mother PLACIDIA, whoſe vertue and wiſedome was ſufficient to gouerne the whole, vntill the young CÆSAR came to age fit for the gouernment. Before this, the vſurper IOHN ſent his Ambaſſadors to THEODOSIVS, requeſting him to allow of his election, and to be pleaſed to accept him for his companion in the Empire. Whereto THEODOSIVS anſwere was; To command his Ambaſſadors to be apprehended as Traitors and rebels. And he ſent commandement to ARDABVRIVS or ANDABVRIVS, an excellent Captaine of his, that with the greateſt power that he could, he ſhould take his paſſage by Sea into Italy, before PLACIDIA and her ſonne, and ſhould ſeeke to defeate the tyrant IOHN. ARDABVRIVS preſently put this charge in practice: but there befell him ſuch a ſtorme at the Sea, as his ſhippe was driuen from the reſt of the fleete, and arriued where he was taken and carried priſoner to Rauenna. His ſonne ASPAR within few daies after being aduertiſed hereof (who alſo came in the ſame fleete) after that the tempeſt ceaſed, and that the Seas were calme, ſet his men on land; and vſed ſuch meanes, that paſſing through certaine lakes or boggs, which are, or were, neere to Rauenna (where the vſurping Emperor IOHN then was), and held his father priſoner: Which was held for a matter impoſſible, and ſo it is written for a wonder) he by force entred the Citie, which nothing ſuſpected any ſuch miſhap; where he did not only ſet his father at libertie, but took the Emperour IOHN the vſurper priſoner, and ſmote off his head.

In this manner writeth Biſhop PHRECVLPHVS in his Hiſtory of the death of the Tyrant IOHN, who wrote the ſame aboue ſeuen hundred yeeres ſince; with whom PROCOPIVS agreeth, an Author of aboue a thouſand yeers continuance; CASSIODORVS in his tripartite hiſtorie declareth it at large; and PROSPERVS and IORNANDES of little leſſe antiquity; and alſo PAVLVS DIACONVS. And although they all briefly paſſe it ouer, yet they auerre that he died in Italy, and not in Africa. And PLATINA, CVSPINIANVS, and other diligent modern Authors, follow them therein: whereby it is to be preſumed, that they were deceiued which wrote that he was ſlain by BONIFACIVS in Africa; although it bee not to be doubted, but that he went into Africa, and was there ouerthrowne. And, holding this for the moſt certain, let vs proceed to the reſt, wherein in a manner all agree in the taking of Rauenna; and that after they were entred, ASPAR and his ſoldiers inflicted cruell puniſhments. Fiue yeers did IOHN enioy the name of Emperor before his death; and was commended for his vertue and good parts by ſome Authors; ſo as they condemn him not for any thing, but only for making himſelf a Tyrant in vſurping the Empire: whereof the greateſt fault is laid vpon CASTINVS and ECIVS, who perſwaded him thereto.

This victory being obtained, within ſhort ſpace after came PEACIDIA with her ſonne VALENTINIANVS the new made CÆSAR, into Italie; through whoſe coming, and the death of the aforeſaid IOHN, in a ſhort ſpace there followed a great alteration: for, being com to Rauenna, and vnderſtanding that CASTINVS came from Spain with ſuch forces as hee was able, to put himſelf into Rome with ECIVS who held the ſame againſt VALENTINIAN, PLACIDIA ſent ARDABVRIVS againſt him, or (after ſom others) BVRGVNDIVS, and it may be both; who fighting a battell, CASTINVS was ouerthrowne; and eſcaping from the fury, his owne ſouldiers mutined, and deliuerd him to the Emperors Generall, who ſent him to Rauenna. The like hapned to ECIVS in Rome: for, the ſouldiers and citizens mutined, and apprehended him; and he was brought priſoner alſo to Rauenna. This is that ECIVS whom ſom call call ACIVS, ſo much commended by the Writers of thoſe Times for one of the beſt Captains in the world: and in truth ſo had he already ſhewed himſelf in all his actions; but hee performed much more afterwards. And of no leſſe eſteem was BONIFACIVS, who gouerned Africa. ARDABVRIVS was very famous for his victories; as wee haue ſaid, againſt the Perſians: and ſo was CASTINVS in like manner. Theſe Captains being brought priſoners, and the need of ſuch men in the Empire conſidered, as well in Spain againſt the Vandals and the reſt, as in France againſt the Gothes and Burgundians, who already inuaded that Kingdome, and againſt the Hunnes which were in Pannonia; After many allegations pro & contra, PLACIDIA vndertook to procure her ſon VALENTINIAN to pardon them their liues: and ſo CASTINVS, after ſom few daies impriſonment, was baniſht. And ECIVS, hauing put-in ſecurity for his fidelity, was made General of the Army in France againſt the Gothes, who took ſuch order, that the Huns came no further forwards: for, he had great friendſhip among thoſe nations, and was born in thoſe parts; and, during his diſgrace with HONORIVS, liued among them.

Ecius made Generall a gainſt the Hunnes and Gothes.

VALENTINIANVS, being in full poſſeſſion of all Italie, was with the good will of all men, and by the conſent of his coſen THEODOSIVS, called Emperor and AVGVSTVS, and for ſuch obeyed and receiued by the Senate and people of Rome: and the Earl and Generall ECIVS, without delaying any time, vndertook his charge of Generall of the wars in France. And at that time when he came into France (as PROSPERVS and DIACONVS write) THEODORICVS, by the death of WALIA, was King of the Gothes, and had beſieged a principall City then called Archilla, after the taking of many other towns. But as ſoon as ECIVS came with his Army, he began the wars in ſuch manner, that to the loſſe of the Gothes the City was relieued; and they, raiſing their ſiege, retired themſelues into their Countries: and hee euery where made ſuch head againſt them, that they could not take any other places either in France or Spain. In the ſame time in the Ile of Britannie, which then was vnfurniſht of ſuch garriſons as it was wont to haue, were great wars and combuſtions: for, the Scots, a fierce nation (of whom we haue already made mention, and after whoſe name part of Britannie is called the Kingdome of Scotland to this day) with other people called Picts or Pictauians, whoſe Originall was of Sarmatia in Europe, robbed and ouer-ran all the Land, and made themſelues Lords of a great part thereof. Wherefore ſuch of the Inhabitants of that Iland as continued ſubject to the Empire, ſent to ECIVS for ſuccour; certifying him, that if relief came not within a ſhort ſpace, the whole Iland would fall into the hands of the enemy.

The wars that Ecius made in France againſt the Gothes.

The comming of the Scots into Britanny.

When ECIVS vnderſtood thoſe newes, hee preſently ſent one Legion of his Armie vnder the leading of a Captain whoſe name was GALLIO, into Britanny: and he, joyning with the Inhabitants which ſent for aid, fought often times with the Scots and Picts; and obtaining the victory, compelled them to leaue that country in peace and quiet: and ſo they continued, till that ECIVS (ſtanding in need of ſuccours to make head againſt the Burgonians who alreadie had paſſed the Rhine, and began with great fury to inuade France, being feared to haue an intent to paſſe into Italy) drew that Legion out of Britanny, and left it in the borders of Paris in France, to guard that Country; and left another Legion neer to Tarragona in Spain, vnder the command of a Captain called SEBASTIAN, to defend the ſame againſt the Gothes: and hee with the reſt of his Army went to the wars againſt the Burgonians; with which hee oftentimes came to blowes, and ouercame them in ſome battels. But the Britans, being abandoned by that Legion which ECIVS ſent for out of that Iland, were ſo diſtreſſed, that if VALENTINIAN had not ſent commandement to ECIVS to ſend back that legion which he had drawn out of Britanny, they had been in great diſtreſſe: but, that legion coming to their aid, they were ſufficiently able for that time to defend and ſupport themſelues in the Emperors ſeruice.

Boniface rebelled in Africa.

While theſe things paſſed in Britanny, France and Italie, BONIFACE grew daily more mighty in Africa; who although that he yet ſhewed not himſelf to be againſt VALENTINIAN, but rather ſeemed to be of his party euer after that he was troubled by the Vſurper IOHN: yet he ſeemed to be a friend, in ſuch ſort, that hee would not leaue any part of that which hee held. Which, VALENTINIAN and PLACIDIA perceiuing, reſoluing to ſound his intent, they ſent to command him to leaue his gouernment to a Succeſſor whom they would appoint, and to come to them: which, BONIFACE openly refuſed, and leuied ſouldiers to defend himſelf againſt the Emperor. It is true that ſome Authors write, that he was deluded by ECIVS who ſent him word, that if hee came into Italie VALENTINIAN would put him to death; whereof he aduertiſed him as a friend: and he likewiſe told PLACIDIA, that BONIFACE would not come, but would rebell; ſo as they affirm, that more for fear than for any ill intent, he made himself a Tyrant; of which opinion is PROCOPIVS. But howsoeuer the matter went, VALENTINIAN sent presently two Captains against him, the one called MAHORCIVS or MABORCIVS, the other called GALLIO or GALBIO; hee, who (as I said) went to aid the Britannes with a Legion: who being arriued in Africa with great power, BONIFACE, who was an excellent man of war, with a very good Army attended their coming; and, knowing where they landed, went to meet them: and seeing his power equall, they came to a battell; wherein BONIFACE through his great valour and policie got the victorie, and the Emperors Captains were ouerthrowne and slain, together with a great number of their soldiers: and so BONIFACE becam mightier, and a greater Lord than before.

Maborcius and Galbio, captaines against Boniface.

A battel where in the tyrant Boniface prevailed.

The losse of this battell, and of men of warre, greatly encreased the strength of the enemies to the Empire: for, first the Gothes followd the warres in Spain with greater force than before, as well against the Emperors subjects, as against the Vandals and other Nations inhabiting other parts of that Country. And the Burgonians began to make a more resolute resistance against ECIVS, than before they had done. And, aboue all, the Franks or Francons (a people of Germany) coming from Franconia (after some Authors) so called after their name, as truely writes AGATHIVS (although of their Originall there be many fabulous opinions) seeing that ECIVS had enough to do against the Burgonians and the Gothes, and that the Emperor VALENTINIAN had lost his Armie in Africa, and that his cosen THEODOSIVS was busied about matters of the East, they resoluced to inuade France: out of which a little before they had been expelled by the Vandals, Alanes and Sueuians, in the time of the Emperors HONORIVS and ARCADIVS; and also by ECIVS, as wee haue said, when HONORIVS sent him into Spain. But now, taking the benefit of the time, they came with a very great power, and entred the Prouince called Senonensis, and the countries about Orleance and Paris, and presently took those countries: MARCOMVNDVS hauing been before this time their Leader; and afterwards his son FARRAMOND was the first King of the Franks: whom CLODIVS succeeded, who at that time was their King. And in processe of time their power increased so much, that Gallia from them took the name of France; and the King therof is called King of the Franks or Frenchmen.

The coming of the Francons or Frenchmen into France.

The successe of the French.

Gallia called Frantce.

Of these Frenchmen (who in truth were a warlike and valiant Nation) some French Historiographers recite certain fables; saying, that they descended from the Troianes, from one of HECTOR's sons called FRANCVS, and that from him they took their name. Others say, they had this name for certain franchises, priuiledges and immunities they enioied in the time of VALENTINIAN the First. All which is fabulous and vntrue: for, neither had HECTOR any such son, neither descended they from the Troians, neither is there any memorie of those Franks but from the time of the Emperor AVRELIANVS, who ouerthrew them about the yeer of our Lord 260, little more or lesse. Neither obtained they this name in the time of the Emperor VALENTINIAN: for, hee raigned long afterwards, and they (as I said) were so cald 200 yeers before. But they were then a new people; of which, CÆSAR, STRABO, PLINY, CORNELIVS TACITVS, POMPONIVS MELA, nor PTOLOMY, made any mention; neither were they then of any name, or knowne: which if it had bin otherwise, it had bin impossible but some of those Authors, if not all, would haue left some memoriall of them. The Franks might begin to be knowne a little before AVRELIANVS time: the rest is winde.

The antiquity of the French.

And it is to be vnderstood, that the Kings which in our time raigned in France, are not descended from this people: for, in the House of France there haue been two or three alterations and changes. The first was about the yeer of our Lord 750: at which time King CHILDERICVS or CHILPERICVS was deposed by Pope ZACHARY, that Kingdome hauing continued 330 yeers in the line of the Franks. And PEPIN, father to CHARLES the Great, beeing a Germane born, was chosen King: and so the Franks then lost the royall Scepter. And in King PEPINS posterity it afterwards continued 238 yeers, vntil the yeer of our Lord 990: at what time LEVVES the son of LOTHARIVS then raigning was poisoned; and, for that hee had no sons, they sought to haue made his brother CHARLES Duke of Lorrain, their King. But a great and mighty man, whose name was HVGO CAPVTIVS, and born in that Countrey, hindred the same; and was of such power, that he took CHARLES prisoner, and enjoyed the Kingdome: and in his posterity the Kingdome continueth till this day, the next in bloud inheriting for want of heirs males. So as we are not to hould the Kings of France to be of the linage of the Franks, seeing they come not, neither are they descended from them. Heerin doo all good and true Authors agree.

The Kings of France descended not from the Francons.

But

But to returne to our historie; I say that the Frenchmen entred with such force and furie, as they tooke all that that they inuaded: which ECIVS considering, and the warres which the Gothes made in Spaine, notwithstanding that he had oftentimes ouerthrowne the Burgonians, and was in hope shortlie whollie to haue subdued them, yet he resolued to graunt them peace: which they humblie sued for, to be the better able to giue succours to other places where needs required; but especially to come against the French, for they were a mightie and valiant people.

Ecius granteth peace to the Burgonians.

In this time whilest that ECIVS was thus troubled to defend the Romane Empire against so many nations, the new Emperour VALENTINIAN, being still in hope to recouer Africa, with a greater resolution then at any time before, commanded souldiers to be leuied in Italie and Sicilie; and with the aide of men and ships which his cosin the Emperor THEODOSIVS sent him from Constantinople, he sent an excellent Captaine called SISVLPHVS, against BONIFACE in Africa; who by PAVLVS DIACONVS is called SIGISVLDVS. And he brought such an Armie and vsed such meanes, that taking land in Africa neere vnto Carthage, hee grew so strong in that countrie, as BONIFACE durst not abide his comming in Carthage, but went into Mauritania Cæsariensis, and the marches thereof, which now containeth the kingdomes of Bugia, Argier and Oran, and the countries bordering vpon Spaine. And yet not holding himselfe there in safetie, he sent to treate with GENSERICVS King of the Vandales, who then was in the prouince of Betica, called after their name Vandaluzia, to the end he should come from Spaine to relieue him, and he would giue him townes and cities to possesse, if he would helpe him to recouer what he had lost.

Valentinian sent an armie against Boniface the tyrant in Africa.

This embassie came to GENSERICVS when he stood more in neede of helpe, then able to send any: for the Gothes who had many times inuaded Spaine, taking the benefit of the time when as all things were turned vpside downe, THEODORICVS being their King and leader, and not contenting themselues with what they held, and was giuen them in Spaine, entred, making a conquest of the countrie, with an intent to make warre particularly against the Vandales; wherewith GENSERICVS was so oppressed, as he was out of all hope to be able to defend himselfe. Whereupon, more of necessitie, then for any good will, he accepted the offer made by BONIFACE: and abandoning the prouince of Vandalozia, he passed the streights of Gibraltar, as well with his men of warre, as of peace, women, children, goods, and cattell, and seised on the best part he could, of all Mauritania; and hauing entred vnder the name and title of succour, he made himselfe absolute Lord, robbing and spoiling the cities and townes with great cruelti. And this people thus abandoning Andaluzia, was the occasion that THEODORICVS and his Gothes tooke a great part thereof, and so the Gothes continued Kings of Spaine, vntill the time of the Emperour CHARLES. And although that at sundrie times they had wars and battailes with the Alanes, and Sueuians, yet in the end the power of the Gothes prevailed: From this THEODORICVS the first, is descended the roote and stocke of the Kings of Spaine vntill this day. The Vandales being barbarous and misbeleeuers (for they were of the sect of the Arrians) held not promise nor league with BONIFACE in Africa, who had drawne them thither; but taking the cities vpon the coast which he had giuen them, they entred and tooke the rest in despite of him: wherefore he was constrained through necessity, to become enemie to those which he had drawne thither for his succour and relieife, seeing they tooke all. But as hee was hated by the Emperor VALENTINIAN, and could hope for no succours from anie where else, as wise and as valiant as he was, he was not able to make sufficient resistance against all; but, being too weak, was driuen to flee from place to place. But the Prouince of Carthage and all the countries thereabour, were valiantly defended by the Generall SISVLPHVS, whom the Emperor VALENTINIAN sent thither against BONIFACE. GENSERICVS King of the Vandals being so mighty in Africa, and finding SISVLPHVS of power able to make head against him, and fearing (as a wise man) the mutability of Fortune, sent to entreat a peace with VALENTINIAN, vpon condition that hee should suffer him to enjoy that which he had taken from BONIFACE, seeing that he was not possessed thereof himself.

The Vandales abandon Spaine, and saile into Africa.

The Vandales made themselues Lords of great part of Africa.

The Emperor VALENTINIAN considering that ECIVS was much troubled in France against the French, new inhabitants there, and that there was little assurance of the truce with the Burgonians; with a desire to recouer that which was lost in Spain (for, hee was aduertised that his Generall SEBASTIAN, who was there in his seruice against the Alans and Sueuians, had obtained certain victories against them, and that they were ioyned with the Gothes, so as he was vnable alone to defend himself against all) he resolued to grant the Vandals in Africa that peace they required: and, taking security and great promises of their King GENSERICVS, Valentinian graunteth peace to the Vandales in Africa.

the peace was concluded between them: and VALENTINIAN, relying more on that peace than he ought to haue done, sent for SISVLPHVS, commanding him to come into Italy with his Army, not leauing any garrison to keep Carthage or Africa. For, his meaning was, with his whole power to haue re-inforced ECIVS his Armie, and to haue driuen out those Nations which were entred France, and to haue recouered, or at least to haue preserued, that which hee possessed in Spain. SISVLPHVS being arriued in Italie, GENSERICVS King of the Vandals, as an ambitious impudent Infidell, went presently to Carthage, and entred the same by force of Arms; fiue hundred, fourescore and fiue yeers (as PROSPERVS reports) after that SCIPIO subdued it to the Roman Empire. The like he afterwards did by all the rest; and in the end came to the City of Hippo, wherein S. AVGVSTINE was Bishop, and therein also (as saith POSIDIVS, a Disciple and Familiar of S. AVGVSTINES) was BONIFACE, who had retired himself thither; and, houlding it besieged the space of 14 moneths (God hauing first taken away S. AVGVSTINE, being when he died of the age of 76 yeers) hee took it, and put BONIFACE to death. Heerin PROCOPIVS differs from other Authors; who writes, that he raised his siege without taking the City: and, concerning BONIFACE, PROSPERVS and PAVLVS DIACONVS relate it after another manner; saying, that hee had his pardon, and went into Italy, where he died of a naturall death.

Valentinian was ill aduised.

Gensericus sue Boniface. The death of S. Augustine.

After the taking of Hippo, the power of GENSERICVS daily increased, in such manner, that he made a full conquest of all Africa: and so the Vandals remained for a long time absolute Lords thereof. Wherein this cruell King committed so many cruelties against the Bishops and Priests which held the true faith, and would not become Arrians as he was, as the like had seldome been seen; most cruelly putting many of them to death, and banishing others. The like he vsed towards all kinde of people, committing incredible insolencies and robberies, as many credible Authors affirm; whereof VICTOR wrote a particular Book, which he intituled the Vandalicall Persecution; whereto I referre the curious Reader: which Book is newly imprinted and annexed to EVSEBIVS his Chronicle, and to the tripartite History. After this accident hapned in Africa, VALENTINIAN had daily aduertisements, that the Huns, who already were become Lords of Austria and Hungarie with the marches thereof, made preparation to come down into France; and to that end had raised a great number of men of war (TOTILA a most fierce proud man being their King): against which their designes he daily sent new forces to ECIVS, who followed the ordinary wars of France: by meanes whereof, ECIVS could not send any succours to those of the Ile of Britanny, who newly had sent to him for aid against the Scots and Picts: for which cause the Romans and Britannes which inhabited Britanny, despairing of any other help, called to their aid, and solicited with fair promises, the Angles then called Saxons, a people of Germany, inhabiting neer to the sea-side: who being allured thereto, partly for pay, and partly through the fertility and fruitfulnes of that Country, came into Britanny vnder the leading of their Captain HENGISTVS (as saith BEDA); who, assisting the Inhabitants, in such manner subdued their enemies, that they rebelled no more. But they, afterwards growing strong and ambitious, did the like in Britanny as the Vandals did in Africa; and making war vpon the Country, and subduing the Britannes, made themselues Lords of all the Land, excepting that which is now the Kingdome of Scotland.

The' cruelties vsed by Genserius King of the Vandals against the true Christians.

Totila, King of the Hunnes.

The Britaines called the Saxons to their aid.

The Angles or Saxons took the Ile of Britannie.

In this manner the Empire lost this Iland, and the Angles remained Kings thereof; and afterwards it lost the name of Britannie, and by them was called Anglia, and now England, which is as much to say, as the land of the English; and so from henceforth we will call it. And their power so much increased, that in the time of AVGVSTVLVS, as we will hereafter declare, they banished and draue the Britannes wholy out of that countrie, so as some came ouer into France, and inhabited that countrie which is now called Britannie, where before that time dwelt the Turones and Veneti, which through their comming thither is called Britannie; But a great number of the Britannies fled to the mountaines towards the North-west now called Walet, where they maintained themselues against all Inuaders. Thus the dominion of that Iland rested in the Kings of the Angles or English, and hath continued in them with great alterations, warres and troubles, which import not me to recite. Of all which, besides BEDA, and other antient and moderne authors not a few, POLIDORE VIRGIL, an author of our time, hath written a historie, of the beginning and successe of all matters in Britannie or England.

Britannie called England.

Britannie in France why so called.

But to returne to our story of GENSERICVS King of the Vandales; I say, that being vnsatisfied with Africa, he rigged vp a Fleete and sayled into Sicilie, and took great part thereof, robbing and spoiling the Country: And truly he had taken all the rest of the Iland, if that VALEN-

VALENTINIAN (notwithstanding that he was very tender and delicate, and in person did nothing, neither would follow the wars) had not (as it cannot be denied) taken great care and vsed all possible diligence to prouide what was needfull, so farre as he was able: who presently sent commandement to SEBASTIAN, his Generall in Spaine, to transport himself with the greatest power that he was able, into Africa and to make seisure thereof, while as GENSERICVS was busied in Sicilia. GENSERICVS was aduertized of this preparation; and vnderstanding that without delay it should be put in execution, resolued to leaue Sicilia, and to returne to defend Africa which was of greater importance, and concerned him more: and so Sicilia escaped out of his hands. And SEBASTIAN forbare to goe into Africa. But hee seeing himselfe of greater power then before, and that his Lord was oppressed with wars and crosses (wherein those men are seldome faithfull, which in prosperitie shew themselues most seruiceable) and purposing to make himselfe Lord of all that which the Emperour possessed in Spaine, was the cause that the Empire lost the same, and he without obtaining his desire, lost both his life and honour. For moued by this ambition, as I said, he treated with THEODORICVS, and the Gothes, and with the Alanes also, that they should come to a peace with him, and that they should diuide the country amongst them, without yeelding any acknowledgement to VALENTINIAN. Wherewith in outward shew they seemed to be very well pleased, and yeelded to his propositions, which they obserued for certaine daies: but afterwards vpon a safe conduct they slew him; and he being dead who was wont to defend the countrie, they took all Spaine, excepting some small part of Galicia and Biscai; which by reason of the inaccessible steepnes of the mountaines and the valour of the inhabitants, defended themselues for a season.

Genserius went to make warre in Sicilia.

The treason and death of Sebastian, Generall for the Emperor Valentinian in Spaine.

During these euents in Spaine and Africa, ECIVS neuer desisted from warring against the French, Burgonians and other nations in France: and VALENTINIAN, leauing all things in his cosin the Emperor THEODOSIVS; whose Empire as it pleased God was then better in peace and in more quietnesse then the West. At this meeting VALENTINIAN married with EVDOXA, THEODOSIVS his daughter; and then presently returned into Italy, to prouide for the defence of that which remained, and to recouer what was lost. Whereat the Emperor THEODOSIVS much greeuing, sent him two Captaines called ARIOBINDVS and ANSILA, with good troups of souldiers, to the end that they should reconquer Africa; being much discontented with GENSERICVS King of the Vandales, for the breach of the peace, and for the great cruelties which he had committed in that Countrie.

Valentinian went to Constantinople, and maried with Eudoxa the Emperor Theodosius his daughter.

Ariobindus and Antila captaines sent by Theodosius.

These Captaines and soldiers sailed into Sicilia, from thence to passe into Africa: but they so detracted the time and prolonged their departure in such manner, as they spoiled the whole Iland of Sicilia, and it pleased not God that they should proceed on their iourney. For ATTILA a mighty King of the Hunnes, which of long time had purposed to make himselfe Lord of the Empire, hauing besides Hungary, had made a conquest of many Cities in Germanie, drawing to him for pay and by faire promises and subtill meanes, an infinite number of people, part of which were called Turlingi, Tungri, Ostrogothes, and Marcomanni, and other barbarous northerly Nations, which like swarms of Bees came to him in that time: which (as PAVLVS DIACONVS recounteth) determined to inuade the Empire of Constantinople, knowing that the best and greatest part of the men of warre thereof, were gone with the two Captaines aforesayd into Sicilia. At this his entrie he tooke many Cities in Thracia, and in Slauonia; and made so great spoyle in that Countrey, as the Emperour in great haste sent for ARIOBINDVS and ANSILA, who with a great Armie (as I sayd) were in Sicilia, to the end that they should come and defend the Country; together with other great forces which he had commanded to be leuied. And so he began the warre, and to oppose himselfe against the force and fury of ATTILA; wherto this was a great helpe, that at that instant there began to grow some suspicion and iealousie between ATTILA and his brother BEDA, and enuy and emulation between the Kings which came with him; by reason wherof, the war was not so terrible as before, although they still did much harme. THEODOSIVS Emperour of the East being in this care, and at warres with the mightie ATTILA, and his Cosin VALENTINIAN in such trouble, as is before sayd, that the Vandales and their King held Africa, the Gothes and Alanes Spaine, his Generall ECIVS in France, held warre with so many nations, and therein passed so many aduentures, as they would be too long to recite.

Attila inuaded the Greek Empire.

THEODOSIVS, applying himselfe in Constantinople, with great care and diligence to send greater reliefe and forces against ATTILA, was stricken with the plague, whereof quickly he he died. Whose death was generally lamented: for he was a good, pitifull, very vertuous and Christian Prince; as it plainly appeareth by many letters, which at this day are extant, written to him by LEO Bishop of Rome, who liued in his time. It is written of him, that he was very deuout and religious, and spent much time in prayer; and that he fasted two daies in the weeke, and much honoured the Church and the Clergie.

The religion and vertue of Theodosius.

Finally, he left nothing vndone which a Christian was bound to doe, neither what was conuenient for an Emperour. He was very studious and addicted to letters, and to Philosophie, and made great Libraries, principally of the holie Scriptures. He was so pitifull, that being one day reprehended for giuing so many malefactors their liues, he answered: I would to God that I could raise againe those which I haue put to death. In conclusion, he was accomplished with all vertues, and free from all vices, so as he was not subiect vnto any: onely he was noted to be somewhat mutable and hastie. He was married to EVDOXIA, a very godly and discreete woman, the daughter of LEONCIVS, whom he married for her vertue onely: she was called, before that she was married to him, ATANAIS, and with her mariage her name was chaunged. For this his goodnes and vertue, it pleased God that his raigne continued two and fortie yeeres: foureteene or fifteene being a childe, vnder the Protection of the King of Persia, in the time of his Vncle HONORIVS, as is alreadie written; and seuen and twentie with his cosin VALENTINIAN, and for the most part he enioyed the Empire of the East in peace and quiet; and died being about fiftie yeeres old: for in a manner as soone as he was borne, he inherited the Empire. He departed this world, according to MATHEVV PALMERVS computation in his additions to EVSEBIVS his Chronicle, and after PROSPERVS, in the yeere of our Lord, foure hundred, fiftie and three; and after some others, foure hundred and fiftie; and after the most common opinion, in the seuen and twentith yeere of the raigne of the Emperour VALENTINIAN, who then raigned in Italy, and liued in the citie of Rome.

THE ARGVMENT.

VAlentinian remaining alone in the Empire of the West, tired with many warres, and seeing that Attila molested the eastern parts; to please his sister Pulcheria, and to the end that those parts should not remaine without an Emperour, he gaue the charge thereof to an old man called Martianus, who was a man of great iudgement, and very wise. In which time Attila resolued to giue ouer his enterprise against Constantinople, the siege being long and very difficult, but came towards the westerne parts, with a determination to passe into France and into Italie: Against whom Valentinian made Ecius his Generall, who was stil his Generall in France; hauing first concluded a peace with Genfericus King of the Vandales, wherein to the new Emperour old Martianus entred. This Ecius daunted Attila much, and made him know (to the great losse of his men) how valiant a man he was; so as he compelled him to flie. For which victorie Valentinian began to haue Ecius in iealousie, that he had an intent to haue made himselfe Emperour, and to that end had some intelligence with Attila, seeing that he did not wholly ruine him when he might: wherfore he caused him to be slain, which was the cause of the ruine of Italie, and of the Westerne Empire. For Attila (vnderstanding that Ecius was dead) returned into Italie, which Valentinian inuaded in peace: and being being inuaded, none of the Emperours set his hand to releeue it, being vnable to leuie any sufficient Armie to withstand the enemy. Whereupon hauing taken Aquileia, and comming towards Rome, at the intreaty of Pope Leo, he spared that Citie, and so leauing Italie, he returned into Hungary: where marrying with the sister of the Emperor Valentinian, vpon his wedding day he gorged himselfe so full with wine and meate, as in the night (nature being vnable to support so great a charge, casting vp aboundance of blood) he died in his bed. Whose death yeelded some libertie to the Empire, notwithstanding that the West remained in a manner ruined, whereof grew the greatnesse of the Empire of the East, and of Constantinople. And one yeere after the death of Attila, Valentinian was also slaine by a souldier, whose name was Tantillus, both to take reuenge for the death of his Captaine Ecius, as vrged by the hatred of one Maximus, whose wife Valentinian had forced, when he had raigned Emperor thirtie yeeres.

RVly I know not whether the reading of that which I haue already related and am presently to write, shall make the reader so much to wonder, as it doth me which write the same. For mine owne part, I dare iustifie, that no warres, alterations or changes of Kingdomes, of all that euer I haue read in auntient or moderne Histories, seeme worthie of so great admiration as those of these times, whereof we are now to treate. Neither doe I remember that I euer admired more at any thing then at these; considering the great and many calamities of so many prouinces and cities, the battailes and effusion of blood, the alterations and falles of estates, the diuersitie of people and nations which flocked together in them. And aboue all, I doe most wonder at the infinite numbers of people which came out of the northren parts, so as it seemed the earth did flowe with armed men. And likewise to consider, what rage, furie, pride or ambition (for I can giue it no other name) might moue so many sundrie nations, to abandon their owne countries, to ruine and conquer the world, not being vrged, or moued thereto by any offence or iniurie receiued. But it was the iust iudgement and permission of our Lord God, whose counsels are vnsearchable, and whose prouidence cannot be perceiued by the light of any humane eye. Let vs giue humble thanks vnto his diuine maiestie, that although, for our sinnes, he suffereth warres and combustions in these our times; yet they are not so generall, neither so miserable and cruell, as those which they endured in that age, as the reader may plainly perceiue by that which is already, and hereafter shall be related, which passed in this manner.

A consideration of the calamities of these times.

The state of Italie and of the West, where VALENTINIAN raigned, standing in such manner, as is said, THEODOSIVS dying in Constantinople, leauing neuer a sonne to succeede him, and but one sister, whose name was PVLCHERIA, a wise and worthie woman, who as she bare a great sway in the gouernment, and considering the warres she had with the Gothes, and in what state the whole Empire of both East and West stood, she endeuoured to procure that some excellent man, both in peace and warre, might be chosen Emperour, whether he descended of imperiall bloud or no. And it seemed that there was not any man, in whom more noble and excellent parts did concurre, then in an old Captaine called MARTIANVS: who although he were but of meane parentage, yet with his age he was of great experience, and a very valiant and excellent Captaine.

Pulcheria sister to Theodosius.

PVLCHERIA, and those which were of her counsell hauing taken this resolution, concealed the death of THEODOSIVS for certain daies, vntill they had taken such order as was requisite concerning the election of MARTIANVS. And notwithstanding that he was old, PVLCHERIA took him for her husband, to giue the greater assurance and authoritie to his Empire, and so he was ioyfully receiued by all men for their soueraigne Lord and Emperor. And VALENTINIAN likewise, who then resided in Rome, was well pleased therewith; as well for his deserts, as also for that it was done by PVLCHERIA, of whose vertue and worthinesse there was a generall good opinion. ZONARAS an antient Author, whom some call IOHANNES MONACVS, writeth (as IOHN CVSPINIAN relateth) that PVLCHERIA married with MARTIANVS to giue the greater authority and reputation to his Empire: but first she took securitie of him, that they should both liue chaste; for she was a maide, and had resolued to keepe her virginitie inuiolable: and that MARTIANVS accepted thereof, and Martianus chosen Emperor of Constantinople.

A notable example of chastity

they both obserued the same, which is a notable example. As soone as MARTIANVS was made Emperor of the East, the first thing he did, was to make prouision to reinforce the Armie which THEODOSIVS had left, and to send against ATTILA fresh souldiers and a new Generall. And writers affirme, that if ATTILA had continued the warre which he began against Constantinople, he had without doubt come to confusion, by reason of the mutinies and contentions which began among his men of warre: which that politike and mighty King comprehending, and also for that (as they say) a great Captaine of his counselled him to leaue that conquest, and to goe from thence to make warres in the rest of Germany, and afterwards in France, Spaine, and Italie, where VALENTINIAN ruled: knowing that the Empire was diuided and vsurped by diuers nations, and therefore was very easie to be conquered; He resolued therefore to goe into Hungarie, where by treason he slue his brother BEDA, who together with him was equall King, for that he suspected that BEDA was the cause of the dissension and discord; to the end to make himself absolute Lord: so great was his pride, cruelty and ambition. After this, giuing good pay to his old souldiers, and raising new, he grew to be so mighty, that the Kings and Captains of the Ostrogothes, the Heruli, and other Nations which in the beginning came to aid and assist him as a friend, did now serue and obey him as their Lord. And Authors affirm, that he raised an Armie of fiue hundred thousand men which were souldiers leuied by him, and aduenturers (so great was his fame and reputation at that time): with which Armie comming out of Hungarie, Austria and the confines thereof, which were in his subiection, together with many other countries which he had taken in the last troubles, wherein the Empire was brought so low, he presently began to make a conquest of Germany, and tooke the most part thereof, and the best cities, as Colein, Strausburg, Spire, Constance, Basil, and many other, making all possible haste to come into France and Italie, imagining that VALENTINIAN should not be able to protect and defend the same. Wherewith (such was his pride) he pretended not to rest contented, but to make himself sole Monarch of the whole world; through all which his name was greatly feared: and so he intituled himself King of the Huns, of the Medes, of the Gothes, and of the Danes, the terrour to the world, and the scourge of God.

Attila's bodily constitution.

PRISCVS an Historiographer writeth (who, being Secretarie to the Emperor VALENTINIAN, was sent Ambassador to him into Scythia, before his coming into Hungarie) that hee was but a little man of stature, and had a large broad brest, a great head, little eies, but very quick, a very little thin beard, and some gray hairs, a flat nose, and was of a very swarth complexion; and that in his going and looks he shewed the pride and greatnes of his minde. He greatly delighted in the warres, and was both politick and valiant, although he did not often vse to fight in person; but reserued himself for greater occasions. Hee was milde and easie to bee pleased by those which humbly required pardon, and submitted themselues vnto him; and held and maintained his faith and word, and defended those which yeelded themselues into his protection: but, with all this, he was most proud, and desirous to make himself Lord ouer all others. VALENTINIAN the Emperor of Rome, vnderstanding ATTILA his successe, with his resolution and desire, of whom he had long stood in fear, did the vttermost of his power to make head against so great force and fury. The first prouision hee made, was, To conclude a peace with GENSERICVS King of the Vandals, who was now King of all Africa, to haue his back in safety from so mighty an enemie. This peace was very acceptable to GENSERICVS; and, as to a thing which hee greatly desired, hee gladly yeelded: for, at that time there was great dissension and rebellion among his Captains and men of warre. This peace was concluded betwixt them, vpon condition that the King should resigne certain prouinces and cities to VALENTINIAN; and MARTIANVS the new Emperor of the East was included in the same.

Valentinian made peace with Genfericus, King of the Vandals, and of Africa.

This being ended, ECIVS, who followed the ordinary warres in France, was made Generall against ATTILA, for that hee was the best and most expert Captain in his time; whom ATTILA had not forborn to haue corrupted with many fair promises, putting him in minde of former friendship: but, for all he could do, he gaue no ear to him.

Ecius made Generall against Attila.

Ecius fought the first endship of Theodoricus King of the Gothes, and of Spain.

ECIVS, vnderstanding that ATTILA with his Army had already passed the riuer of Rhine, and knowing himself to haue no sufficient Armie to make head against him, notwithstanding that many new supplies were comn to his aid, he therefore by all means and deuices sought the friendship of THEODORICVS, whom some call THEODORBDVS King of the Gothes (who possessed the greatest part of Spain, and a great part of France, who was a mighty Prince & very valiant, and at that time lay in Tholouse) to induce him to aid and assist the Romans: who frankly promised, and faithfully performed the same; which the Emperor VALENTINIAN had had also before attempted. And although that ATTILA by his Letters had sued to the contrary, promising him assurance of his estate; yet he (conceiuing that, ATTILA preuailing, he would as well seek to defeat him afterwards, as he did now the Romans) raised his whole power, and drew neere to ioin with ECIVS; and made the Alanes and Sueuians, who liued in Spain, to do the like. And, with the like perswasion, ECIVS concluded a peace with MEROBEVS King of the French, and with GVANDARICVS King of the Burgonians, who of custome were his ordinary enemies; and with the Saxons and other Nations: all which, more for fear, and through the hatred which they bare to ATTILA, than for any good will to the Romans, resolued to take part with ECIVS; whose wisdome and discretion was so great, that they all willingly ioined with him: yet for all this, ATTILA entred France with such power and fury that without finding any resistance he took the greatest part thereof before that ECIVS was in order to fight with him. But while that he made this spoil and conquest in France, the Kings and people aforesaid ioyned with ECIVS in the fields called Catalanes, on the borders of Tholouse: so as he had one of the greatest and best Armies that euer was seene, as well for number, as goodnesse of men, and his partie was held to be of no lesse power than that of ATTILA. Wherefore the one armie drew neere to the other, and between them beganne a most cruell warre: wherein (as IORNANDES affirmeth) dyed foure score and ten thousand men, before they came to a generall battaile, whereof we will speake presently; eyther partie desiring it, but chiefly ATTILA, who held his power inuincible, and so all nations attended the issue thereof: for it seemed that on the victorie depended the command and Empire of the whole world. And to say the truth, at this encounter were gathered together the best, and the greatest part of martiall men of all Europe, being almost a million of people: wherefore it shall not be amisse that we describe this battaile more distinctly then we doe others; seeing that it cannot be said, that there was euer seene any that was greater or more bloudie. First then, there fought there in proper person aboue ten mightie and warlike kings of the one side, and of the other. Of ATTILA his partie was ARDARICVS, king of a people called Gepidi, and ANDARICVS, VALAMIR, and THEODOMIR, brethren, and kings of the Gothes, or Ostrogothes, and the King of the Marcomanni, and others whose names I finde not written, and the people already named which were without number.

The warres betweene Ecius & Attila.

Of ECIVS his partie, was THEODORICVS (who was of greater power then any of the rest) king of the Gothes, Visogothes, and of Spaine, and his sonne THORISMVND, MEROBEVS, King of the Francques, GVANDARICVS King of the Burgonians, SANGVIBANVS King of the Alanes, and the Captaines and kings of diuers other nations, which tooke his part, besides the Romane Legions and Captaines of the Empire. But ATTILA made small account of all these: For he had formerly ouerthrowne the greatest part of them; so as nothing made him to feare or doubt of the victorie, but only the discretion and valour of ECIVS, who was their Generall. Wherefore, as he was an Infidell and superstitious, he commanded his sooth-sayers and wizards to be called together, to the end that vsing their enchantments and forceries, they should tell him what successe he should haue, and how hee should speede in the battaile: and they sacrificing their beasts, told him, that he should lose the victory, but that the greatest Captaine among his enemies should die therein. Whereto giuing credit (although that it grieued him to thinke that he should be ouerthrowne, imagining that ECIVS should die) he sought and procured it: For, he made account that if ECIVS were dead, although he lost the day, yet he would raise new supplies, and preuaile against the rest, and so he disposed himself to fight. And as ECIVS and his partakers desired the same, the two Armies came so neere together, that there rested nothing but to come to blowes, and so they fought: which as PROCOPIVS, IORDANVS, ALABIVS, PAVLVS DIACONVS, and others write, was in this manner.

Both parties being desirous to fight, the one Armie being in the morning by breake of day in sight of the other, both Generals commanded to marshall and raunge their troupes, and to order their battailions, for to charge their enemies; but as their numbers were infinite (notwithstanding all the diligence and expedition that could be vsed by eyther partie) it was past noone before they could set their men in order. ATTILA with all his carts and wagons which hee brought for his cariage, made a kinde of fort or sconce vpon the side of a hill, wherein he put the women and disarmed people of his Armie, and of his whole Armie made three battailions, reseruing to himself e with his Scythians and Hunnes, the maine or middle battaile. And ARDARICVS King of the Gepidi with his countrie-men, and many others in whom he reposed greatest greateſt truſt, led the battaile on the right hand: and to ANDARICVS, VALAMIR, and THEODOMIR, brethren, kings of the Oſtrogothes, with their owne people and their friends, he gaue the charge and leading of the battailion on the left hand.

How Ecius marſhalled his troupes.

And in this order he marched againſt ECIVS: who had ſomewhat prolonged the time, by reaſon of a great miſtruſt which he had conceiued of SANGVIBANVS King of the Alanes, doubting that he would haue gone ouer to ATTILA: for he was aduertiſed that there had been ſome treaty between them; wherein ATTILA granted to reſigne to him a Citie, wherein he had lien, and which was taken from him. Wherefore ranging his Armie into three ſquadrons alſo, in the middle ſquadron, he ſet the ſaid SANGVIBANVS, placing in the auaunt, and arierward of the troupe, the moſt valiant men of the Romane Legions, to the end that he ſhould not chuſe but fight. And to THEODORICVS with his ſonne THORISMVND with his Gothes and Spaniards, he gaue the leading of the ſquadron on the right hand; to the end that they ſhould encounter the Gepidi, which were a mighty people. And he tooke to himſelfe the leading of the left wing, taking with him MEROBEVS, King of the French, with his people, and the Burgonians, whoſe King with the greateſt part of his forces were ſlaine in an encounter which hapned the night before this battaile. With theſe troupes he placed himſelfe againſt the Oſtrogothes (the right wing of the enemie) changing it in this manner, for that he imagined, that if the Viſogothes which were of his ſide, ſhould haue been placed againſt the Gothes which were of the other ſide (for that they were countrie-men, and neighbours) they would not haue charged with ſuch furie as he deſired. In this order theſe two migktie Armies marched the one againſt the other, with incredible courage and aſſured confidence, the one to ouerthrow the other. And ſo there began between them, the moſt cruell and bloudy battaile that euer was. For, although it may be ſayd, that in other battailes there hath been ſo great a concourſe of men, as they could not well be numbred; yet they were not ſuch men, as theſe which now fought; or that it was ſo obſtinate and cruelly fought, with the ſlaughter of ſo many men and effuſion of ſo much bloud as this was, I doe not remember that I euer read. For therein fought the Flower (for valour and courage) of almoſt all the Nations of the World: As, the Romanes, the Scythians, the Hunnes, the Gothes, the French, the Germanes, the Spaniards, the Gaules, the Burgonians, and of each of theſe a very great number: So as in my iudgement, this may be recorded for the greateſt and moſt fierce battaile that euer was. The firſt attempt was to get a little Hill betweene the two Armies, which either of the two Generals thought requiſit to be taken, thereby to haue the aduantage of the other. ATTILA ſent certaine troups to take that Hill: but to that effect, thither already THORISMVND, ſonne to THEODORICVS, was come with his people, which were Gothes and Spaniards; ſo as theſe by this Hill, and all the reſt preſently gaue the charge: and the ſlaughter, the cries, and the ſound of the blowes with ſwords and launces, was ſuch, as it ſeemed the firmament had rent in ſunder; ſo as no man could doe any other but fight. And they all fought with ſuch furie, as there was not any aduantage ſeene from none till night, for ſo long it endured. What particular exploits were therein performed, cannot certainely be knowne: for the Hiſtoriographers (which treate thereof) affirm, that among ſo great a multitude of people, it could not be ſeene nor iudged how things paſſed; for euery one applyed himſelfe to ſtrike, and to kill, and there was not any ſquadron or troupe that ſtood ſtill, to looke on. But it is certaine, and they all affirme the ſame, that a little Brook, which ranne where this cruell battaile was fought, grew ſo high with the bloud of thoſe which were ſlaine, as it vſed to doe after ſome great raine had fallen. And the ſtreames of bloud were ſo great, as they carried the dead bodies down the valley. This ought not to be held for incredible, ſeeing the number of the dead was ſo great, as all authors agree it exceeded the number of one hundred & fourteſcore thouſand men; and they all lay dead in a ſmall circuit of ground. For in this fight there was no retrait, nor running away, but all dyed fighting. In this manner, in the heat and fury of the fight, the night came vpon them, and parted them, but with great and apparant aduantage on ECIVS his ſide; for ATTILA his troupes began to giue ground, notwithſtanding that hee vſed all poſſible meanes to haue maintained the fight. And THEODORICVS, King of the Gothes and of Spaine, charging too farre in amongſt his enemies, was ſlaine. Some ſay, that his horſe fell with him, and ſo he was troden to death by his owne men; and that his ſonne THORISMOND falling into the like danger, was reſcued by his people. ATTILA, perceiuing the defect and weakneſſe which was in his people, in the beſt order that he could retired to his fort or ſconce, which he had made of his carts and wagons, and therein fortified himſelfe that night, with thoſe which repaired repaired to him from the battaile (for ſome were fled other wayes) there expecting the next dayes fortune. ECIVS went vp and downe the fields, as the Lord thereof, gathering his people together and ſetting them in order; to the end, that their diſorder ſhould not incourage the enemie: for by reaſon of the multitude of people, and the darkneſſe of the night, it could not certainly be ſayd who had the victory; and ſo they paſſed that night without any certain knowledge whether THEODORICVS were aliue or dead. The next morning by the breake of day the victorie was apparant: for ATTILA durſt not come forth of his campe; and ſo ECIVS and his ſouldiers had the ſpoile of the field, and were Lords thereof. The Armies were ſo neere together, as notwithſtanding that ATTILA held himſelfe for ouerthrowne, yet hee neither durſt neither could retire: wherefore, he reſolued to fortifie his campe and to defend himſelfe therein. And as THORISMVND found his father dead in the field, he with his Gothes and Spaniards was ſo extreamly enraged, as he purpoſed to haue aſſaulted ATTILA in his campe, to reuenge the death of his father, by his ruine. For all Writers affirme that hee might haue done it, if ECIVS would haue conſented thereto, and haue giuen him ſuch ayd as he might haue done. And they alſo write, that ATTILA was in ſuch deſpaire, when he vnderſtood that they meant to aſſault him, ſeeing the ſmall forces hee had to defend him, that he reſolued rather to kil himſelf then to com into his enemies hands. But the wiſe & valiant captain ECIVS, knowing both the ambition and power of THORISMVND, THEODORICVS his ſonne, and how mighty the Gothes were, was in great doubt, that they hauing wholly defeated ATTILA and his Armie, would haue conuerted their Arms againſt the Romans, who would haue been vnable to defend themſelues againſt them: and therefore it was moſt profitable (the time conſidered) to giue ATTILA meanes to eſcape; to the end that the Gothes and French ſhould not be freed from the feare of him. And to that end, without diſcouering his conceit, he counſelled THORISMVND, that ſetting all other matters aſide, he ſhould go to take poſſeſſion of his kingdome of Spaine, before that the Alanes, the Sueuians, or any other Nations ſhould cauſe any alteration, or rebell againſt him: And that before this, hee ſhould not attempt any other enterpriſe; for it was vncertaine whether he ſhould be able to bring his purpoſe to effect. THORISMVND deeming this to be the counſell of a father, and a friend (as indeede it was profitable for him) accepted his aduice, and without any delay preſently departed towards his countries; aſwell thoſe which he held in France, as thoſe in Spaine. And ECIVS, for the confideration aforeſaid, forbare to aſſault ATTILA's Camp: and ſo he and the kings which were with him had meanes to eſcape, and abandoned what he held in France. But the counſell of this great Captain (although that to this effect it ſeemed profitable) afterwards fell out cleane contrary: for it was the cauſe of his owne death, and of great miſeries (as hereafter ſhall be declared) to the Romane Empire.

A great victory obtained by Ecius againſt Attila.

ATTILA being in this manner gone out of France, by long iournies, as a man vanquiſhed, went with his Army into Hungary, and the countries there adiacent, of which he was in peaceable poſſeſſion; where relieuing his people, he reſted certaine daies. From whence (they ſay) the Hungarians are deſcended, deriuing their name from the Hunnes and another nation called Catti or Gatti, and ſo they were called Hungary, and Pannonia is now called Hungaria; although that neither in Hungary, neither in other Prouinces are obſerued the limits and bounds which in antient times they held. For as there haue beene great changes and alterations in the names; ſo haue there beene likewiſe as great in their limits and confines. But ſeeing this concerneth me not, without producing any example, this ſhall ſuffice for an aduertiſement to the Reader.

ECIVS (hauing obtained ſo great a victorie, leauing all that which in France the Romans enioyed, and ATTILA had poſſeſſed, and the French and Burgonians in amitie, and friends) he came to Rome, where the Emperor VALENTINIAN expected the iſſue of the battaile. This victory freed all Italie from feare, and purchaſed to ECIVS the greateſt honour poſſible; he entring Rome with great ſolemnity and incredible ioy of all ſorts of people: within few daies after (as the moſt of the Authors which I follow doe write) VALENTINIAN began to ſuſpect, that he had an intent to haue made himſelfe Emperor, and that he had intelligence with ATTILA; The ſuſpicion growing (as he ſaid) for that ECIVS after the battaile did not wholly ruine ATTILA. And as EVTROPIVS particularly relateth, VALENTINIAN was ſo highly incenſed againſt ECIVS by MAXIMVS a Gentleman of Rome, as he cauſed him to be ſlaine. Which (they ſay) MAXIMVS did to the end to be reuenged of VALENTINIAN (as afterwards he was) for rauiſhing his wife; which iniurie he diſſembled, and and made no shew to vnderstand, vntill that he had oportunitie to effect that which afterwards he put in execution, which was to kill the Emperour; which he neuer durst attempt so long as ECIVS liued. ECIVS being slaine at this time (although that PAVLVS DIACONVS seemes to be of opinion that it was afterwards) with him ended the whole force and power of the Western Empire; wherof PROXIMVS a discreete and Noble Romane gentleman gaue VALENTINIAN to vnderstand. Who being demanded by the Emperor (as PROCOPIVS writeth) whether he had not followed the best and most profitable counsell, by putting ECIVS to death, answered: whether the Emperor hath put ECIVS to death with or without reason, I dare not determin; but this I dare affirm, that by killing him, thou hast with thy own left hand cut off thy right. Sure, he was a true Prophet, as the Historie hereafter will make manifest.

The saying of Proximus to the Emperor Valentinian.

While these things passed in the Westerne parts, the Emperour MARTIANVS raigned in great prosperity in Grecia and the East: for he was a very wise man, and a louer of peace; and so he maintained and preserued the same with the Persians and other Nations, without losing any iot of his confines: but rather in all treaties, had euer the aduantage, and got ground. He sent aide and men of warre to serue VALENTINIAN in the warres with ATTILA: so as MARTIAN liued in prosperity and well beloued. But returning to our Westerne Historie (thus it went) As soone as ATTILA vnderstood that ECIVS was dead (the feare of whom made him to contain himselfe within Hungary and Germany) he resolued without any delay, setting all other matters apart, to come against Italie, which only being in peace, held for VALENTINIAN. And coming downe with a very mightie Armie, with some of those Kings before named, which after that he was driuen out of France, he had ioyned with him, he descended with great furie, taking by the way all the Cities and countries as he passed, putting all to fire and sword. And in this manner he entred poore Italy, through the Prouince of the Venetians now called Friuli, robbing and spoiling all places: where there came against him a Captaine sent by VALENTINIAN with a great and mighty Armie, with which ATTILA fought a very cruell battaile: but the Imperiall Generall and Armie were ouerthrowne, with great losse and slaughter of men; and so ATTILA marching forwards, tooke many Cities: which put all Italie in such feare, that the inhabitants in no part thereof, held themselues in safety from the power and rage of ATTILA. And this his comming and the feare of him, was the cause of the first beginning of the mighty and famous Citie of Venice, which in those daies begunne to be built (according to the most part of the best Historiographers) by people which flying from the rage of ATTILA, reduced themselues to dwell in certaine little Ilands, with their wiues, children, and goods, where that Citie now standeth, imagining that there they might liue in safety: and there fortifying themselues in the best manner they could (for ATTILA his Armie did consist of land-men only) afterwards they resolued to continue there, notwithstanding that the feare was past, and began to set orders concerning their gouernement and iustice. And hauing good successe, they grew in processe of time to such greatnesse, that in a manner they became absolute Lords of the Sea, and gat many Ilands, kingdomes and Noble Cities, and are vntill these our daies the honour and credit of all Italie, and preserue their liberty inuiolate, calling their Citie Venetia, after the name of the Prouince from whence they came, which was the maine Land vpon the shore side neere to Venice: which, for that it appertaineth not to my Historie, I will passe ouer with silence, referring the Reader to BLONDVS, SABELLICVS, and other Authors which treate thereof at large.

Attila his commme into Italy. Forum Iulij.

The beginning of the city of Venice.

Some are of opinion that it is called Venetia of these words Venite qua, vsed by those which were first there, to induce the rest which were on land to come thither.

ATTILA, hauing taken all the countrie behinde him, besieged the Citie of Aquileia, which at that time was of great power; whereinto, besides the inhabitants, and such as were borne therein, entred many Romanes, and other of the Emperours souldiers which escaped from the battaile wherein their Generall was ouerthrowne: and they so valiantly defended the same, that ATTILA besieged it three yeeres, and could not take it, holding it for a great dishonor to raise his siege before he had it: in which time he did much harm in all the countrey round about, with his men of warre, and there were many conflicts between the besiegers and the besieged.

The siege of Aquileia.

During the time of this long siege, GENSERICVS king of the Vandales made himselfe peaceable Lord of all Africa. And the French with MAROBEVS their king grew mighty in France, and enlarged their Dominion, and the Burgonians in the countrie now called Burgundy did the like. And the Gothes, Alanes, and Sueuians in like manner in Spaine, and in such part of France as is afore said. And the Emperour VALENTINIAN neuer came to relieue Aquileia, and as little did MARTIANVS the Emperour of Constantinople, eyther through cowardize cowardize, wretchlenesse, ill gouernment, or want of power sufficient for such an enterprise, standing in feare of ATTILA and his power, who at the end of three yeers that he had held the same besieged resolutely assaulting it vpon a day with his whole Armie without any intermission, withdrawing such as were weary and tyred, and setting others in their places) he tooke it by force; and hauing sacked it, and put all to the Sword which he found therein, he made it to be cast to the ground, not leauing any one house or building that might be inhabited, it hauing been one of the richest and most Noble Cities of that time: for Aquileia, and Rauenna, after Rome, were the greatest and most populous in that age.

Aquileia taken and razed by Attila.

ATTILA, hauing thus like a sauage barbarian ruined Aquileia, he marched forwards with great expedition, and within very few daies, tooke many excellent Cities and Townes; among which, were Mantua, Brescia, Cremona, Bergamo, and all their confines. The like he did by Milan and Pauia, and other neighbour townes: and went to the Citie of Rauenna, which for that the Emperours held their courts there, was the most famous Citie in all Italy, which yeelded to him without any assault. From thence he marched into Tuscane, with a determination to haue made no stay vntill he came to Rome, and wholly to haue ruined the same, and so in speeches he gaue out. At that time LEO the first of that name was Pope, who at the request of the Emperour VALENTINIAN, accompanied with many Senators, went to ATTILA, intreating him for pities sake to spare Rome, and not to destroy that City, which intreatie he made with such discretion and wisedome, and it pleased God to giue such efficacie to his words, as notwithstanding that ATTILA was the most cruell and inexorable Prince in the World; yet the Popes supplication did so much preuaile with him, that he not only gaue ouer his iourney to Rome, but resolued to depart out of Italie, and to returne to his antient seate in Hungarie, requiring first a great summe of money to be leuied vpon the Citie for a signe and acknowledgement of Soueraignty. And the state of Rome was now come to this point, as they durst not make denyall of any thing that ATTILA required at their hands; and (withall) they held it for a very great good hap, that ATTILA would forbeare to put his cruell determination in execution.

Cities taken in Italy by Attila.

Some Authors haue written (whether truely or fasly, I dare not maintaine) that all men wondring at this sodaine alteration of ATTILA his purposes, and some of his fauorites asking him the cause thereof; he answerd, that he durst not denie the Popes demand: For, whilst he stood talking with him, he thought that he perceiued two old men standing behinde him, with vnsheathed swords in their hands, threatning to kill him, if hee failed to perform what he required; and that he therfore durst doe no other, which was held for a miracle.

A great miracle, if true.

After this agreement ATTILA returned into Hungarie, where he was held for the greatest and most powerfull Prince of the World, and was so much feared, that MARTIANVS the Emperour of Constantinople sent to sue for peace, and therewith sent him presents and money to obtaine the same. And he to the contrarie sent to the Emperor VALENTINIAN, requiring him to send him his sister HONORIA for his wife; threatning, that if he sent her not he would againe returne into Italie, and destroy Rome. Whereto VALENTINIAN agreed by the consent of his sister; For shee, by meanes of an Eunuch, had written to him, and receiued letters from him, procuring him to require her to wife whatsoeuer hapned; which she did, for that her brother constrained her to liue a maide, lockt vp to her disgrace, and to the dishonor of the Emperor her brother: and he fearing ATTILAS displeasure, sent him his sister, according to his request, and he tooke her to wife, together with others which as a Barbarian he held. This his mariage was the cause of his death: For he, holding a royall feast, and banquet at his wedding, dranke and ate that day so much: that waxing drowzie, and being ouercome with sleepe, he laid him downe, mussling or grouling vpon his face, and nature being oppressed with what he had eaten and drunke, such aboundance of blood gushed out at his nose, and with such vehemency, that in the space of an houre he was choaked therewith, and so hee ended, shedding his owne blood, who had caused streames and riuers of humane blood to flow; and had slaine a greater number of men, and vsed greater cruelty then any King or Captaine that euer was before him.

Attila had Valentinians sister to wife.

The death of Attila.

The death of ATTILA gaue liberty to some Kings and Nations which were vnder him, and had serued him in all his warres, and there ensued great warres betweene them and his sons. But the Empire could neuer recouer the Prouinces and Countries which it had lost in Germany, in France, in Spayne, in England, and in Africa; although that in France and Spaine it held some part: yet it so much declined and fell to so meane estate, as from henceforth wee shall write of the Emperors and such accidents as hapned in Italie, as additions annexed to the Empire of the East, principally naming the Emperors of Constantinople, wherein consisted the strength and power of the ancient Empire. For, after fiue or six Emperors, and some of them tyrants (as we will shortly declare) AVGVSTVLVS being the last of them; for the space of three hundred and thirtie yeeres the western Empire was whollie lost, and that which in Italie remained was subiect to the Emperors of Constantinople, who ruled the same by their Gouernors (called Exarchi) vntill the time of Pope LEO the third, in which time through the negligence and basenesse of the Greeke Emperors, the Imperiall seate was transported to the West, as when time commeth we will specifie.

The death of the Emperor Valentinian.

The next yeere after the death of ATTILA, the Emperour VALENTINIAN was slaine in Rome, by the secret practice and treason (as it was afterwards knowne) of MAXIMVS: and he which executed this murther was a valiant souldier, who had serued that braue Captaine EVCIVS, whose name was TRANSILA, who did it in reuenge of the death of his Captaine. And so ended VALENTINIAN after that he had raigned thirtie yeeres; fiue and twentie in the company of his father in lawe THEODOSIVS the lesser, and fiue with MARTIANVS the Emperor of Constantinople, who by reason of his death remained sole Emperor, which hapned in the yeere of our Lord (after most writers) foure hundred six and fiftie. He left not any some that might succeede him, but two daughters by his wife EVDOXIA.

THE LIFE OF MARTIANVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRE AND FIFTITH EMPEROVR of ROME.

Maximus vsurpe the name of Emperor.

PResently vpon the death of the Emperour VALENTINIAN in Rome, as PROCOPIVS, PAVLVS DIACONVS and some others doe write, MAXIMVS for that he was a Romane Citizen, of high parentage, nobly descended, and of great authoritie in the Citie, presently vsurped the name of Emperor; and was possessed of Rome and of all Italie. And the better to assure his tyranny, he vsed such meanes, as (more by force, then any free consent) he married with EVDOXIA, which had been VALENTINIANS wife, and daughter to the Emperor THEODOSIVS the lesser. To whom after that he had her in his power, thinking thereby the better to winne her loue, he discouered and confessed that he had caused her husband to be slaine: with this addition, that he did it languishing for the loue of her; which did nothing asswage her discontentment, but rather so much incensed her, that she resolued to be reueng'd on him by any means howsoeuer

uer. And imagining that from Constantinople, or from the Emperour MARTIANVS, she should not haue any redresse, she secretly wrote to GENSERICVS King of the Vandales, who then raigned in Africa, very effectually recommending her vnto him, and earnestly intreating him to set her at libertie, and to deliuer her from the power of MAXIMVS, who was a tyrant and a traitor. GENSERICVS to take the benefit of the time, and in hope to make himselfe Lord of Italy, or at least to haue the spoile thereof, employing his whole power, raised the greatest Armie he was able; and vsing all possible expedition sailed into Italy, being so strong as Authors affirm, that he brought with him three hundred thousand men in his Armie: against whose power MAXIMVS was neither able, neither durst make any resistance, notwithstanding that he attempted as farre as he could: wherefore being altogether hopelesse and in despaire, he resolued to flie, and to abandon Rome; but by the way he was slaine by a Roman captaine called VRSVS.

Gensericus came into Italy with 300000 men.

The death of Maximus.

When GENSERICVS arriued on the coast of Italy, there was so great feare in Rome, as all the principal citizens abandoned the Citie: wherefore Pope LEO seeing the calamity likely to fall vpon it, resolued to hazard his life for the same. And knowing how great cruelty GENSERICVS had vsed against the Bishops in Africa, as an Heretike (for he was an Arrian) before that he came to Rome, he went forth to meete him, and in great humilitie intreated him for the Honor of Christ to mitigate his furie, and to content himselfe with the wealth of Rome, without spoiling and sacking the Churches and Temples. But this cruell king forbare not to march to Rome, and to enter it with his whole Armie, and robbed and spoiled without any difference as well the sacred, as the prophane. Being in Rome thus busied, in the space of foureteene daies, he departed from thence, carying with him infinite wealth, and rich prisoners; and so Rome being the head of the world, and Queene of all Nations, was spoiled, dishonoured, and sacked by the Vandales, hauing already at another time been spoiled by the Gothes, as aboue is mentioned: a wonderfull example, to moue a man to make little account of the power & riches of this world. Leauing the Citie thus wasted (notwithstanding that at the intreaty of Pope LEO he commanded that no edifice or buildings should be set on fire, neither any man to be slaine or tortured) he led with him from Rome the Empresse EVDOXIA, and her two daughters which she had by VALENTINIAN, which he afterwards caried with him into Africa. After that GENSERICVS departed from Rome, he did the like in many other Cities in the marches thereof, as he had done there: and destroying the Citie of Capua, for that it made some resistance, he went to Naples, and besieged it, thinking to haue wonne it by assault. But the inhabitants so manfully defended it, that he was driuen to raise his siege, and so returned into Africa loden with the spoiles and wealth of Italie; where he married one of the Emperour VALENTINIANS daughters, which he brought with him from Rome to his sonne TRASIMVNDVS, who succeeded him in his estate.

Rome sacked by Gensericus.

The Empresse Eudoxia, and her two daughters caried into Africa.

This befell in the sixt yeere of the raigne of MARTIANVS, being the next yeere after the death of VALENTINIANVS. GENSERICVS with his Armie hauing left Rome, and being departed out of Italie, the principall Senators and Romane Gentlemen, which through want of forces and of an Emperor, had abandoned the Citie, presently returned, and by common consent, chose for Emperor of Rome, Italie and Sicilie (for now in a manner all the rest of the state was vsurped) an antient Noble Romane Gentleman, both for age and blood, of the order and dignity of Senator, whose name was AVITVS: which when the Emperour MARTIANVS vnderstood, as a gentle and religious Prince, he was very glad thereof, and allowed and ratified his election, in hope of better order to be taken in the Gouernment; and so it seemed that there was good hope to haue preserued the Empire in that state wherein it then was. But all was disturbed through the death of MARTIANVS, who was poisoned in Constantinople, by the practice and deuice of ARDABVRIVS, and his father ASPAR, who were his Captaines: which hapned in the yeer of our Lord 459, he hauing raigned seuen yeers. This MARTIANVS was a vertuous and a iust Prince, and preserued and enlarged the Easterne Empire.

THE LIFE OF LEO THE FIRST, BEING THE FIVE AND FIFTIETH ROMANE EMPEROR; AND OF THOSE WHICH IN HIS TIME TOOK VPON THEM THE NAME OF Emperors.

The Argvment.

When Martianus was dead, some which had beene the causers thereof sought to haue vsurped the Empire: wherein failing to effect their desires, they made Leo Emperour, being a Greeke borne, who in the beginning of his Empire bare himselfe so valiantly, that there was not any enemy so hardie, as to make warre against him. But in the Westerne Empire many tyrants arose, and many Emperours; which for that they liued not long, were the cause of great alterations and combustions: and the Vandales aduentured to come into Italy, against whom Leo sent a good and a worthy fleete, vnder the conduct of a Captaine called Basiliscus, who encountring them, ouerthrew them. In the meane time Leo in Constantinople was driuen to fight against some who sought to haue vsurped: who being ouercome and slaine, he had great difficultie to rescue Rome, which was sacked and spoiled by many vnder the name of Emperors; which for that they liued not long, or were deposed from that dignity by others which were more mighty then they, were the causers of very great troubles in the Westerne Empire, in the middest of which tumults ensued the death of the Emperour Leo in Constantinople, when hee had raigned seuenteene yeeres.

PResently when Martianvs the Emperor of Constantinople was dead (whose death was greatly lamented) the principall men began to consult about the choosing of a new Emperour: and Aspar, who wrought the last Emperors death, sought to haue been his successor; but he preuailed not, for as much as he was of the Arrian sect: for as the Catholike Christians were the stronger side, so they would not consent to his election. But seeing that he could not obtaine the Empire for himselfe, hee bare a great sway in the election of another, which was an excellent man both in peace and warre, a Tribune, whose name was Leo, a Greeke borne, and the first that euer was Emperour of the Greeke Nation, and as most Authors write, was born in the City of Besica. But Aspar first made this bargain with him, that when he should be be in full possession of the Empire, hee should then make his sonne, Ardaburivs, Cæsar; although it succeeded not. This being concluded, Leo was chosen and obeyed for Emperor: and gouerning the Empire in good order and with good successe, in the beginning thereof he wan great credit and reputation; so as neither Africa, Asia, nor Persia, durst to stirre against him: but in the West, in Italie, and in Sicilia, there were great alterations, and many were Emperors more in name, than in power or authority comparable to the Antient. And that old and mighty King Genserics neuer desisted from infesting Italie, coming himself in person, and sending his fleets to rob and spoil the Countrey; so that (as Eutropivs relateth) he ruined and laid waste many Cities, and in the end became sole and abolute Lord of all Sicilia. In the first yeer of the Raign of Leo, Avitvs died in Rome, who (as we said) raigned there; and the Roman Army, being then neer to Rauenna, chose and nominated for Emperor a good man of warre, whose name was Maioranvs: whereto the Emperor Leo gaue his consent. The death of Auitus.

This Maioranvs was a good Prince, and an excellent Captain, for the time he raigned: for, he took great care, and vsed great diligence in defense of Italie against the Vandals & Genserics their King: and to that end he raised a great Army, and remained for the most part of his time vpon the sea-side, to be the better able to send relief and succour where most need required. This prospering well with him, and seeing himself mighty and strong in men and munition, he resolued to haue sailed into Africa, in hope and with intent to haue reconquered the same; but he could not accomplish that good work: for, death surprised him when he had raigned three yeers and odde moneths. Some say, that hee died of a disease: and others say, that the same Army that chose him slue him. In place of Maioranvs rose vp another Emperor, which was an eminent man called Severianvs; who, besides the ordinary warres against the Vandals, was troubled with another against the Alanes: who, with George their King departing from Spain, where they had of long time inhabited together with the Gothes, resoluted to come into Italie, thinking to haue conquered the same, and to haue made themselues Lords of certain places in Lumbardy: against whom, Severianvs commanded an Armie to bee leuied, and made a valiant man called Rithimer Generall thereof, who was by linage a Goth, but now made a Citizen of Rome, and receiued into the degree and dignity of a Roman Gentleman. The King of the Alanes coming with the Roman Generall neer to the City of Bergamo, to a battell which of either party was very cruell, in the end the Alanes were ouerthrowne, and their King slain. The death of Maioranus, chosen Emperor. Seuerianus chosen Emperour.

After this victory and other accidents which hapned of lesse moment, Severianvs died in Rome, when he had gouerned the Empire in Italy almost foure yeers: and in his place was chosen a very excellent man of war, sent thither by the Emperor Leo to succour and protect Italy against the Vandals, who was called Anthemivs, and was sonne-in-law to the late Emperor Martianvs, Leo's Predecessor. There presently arose against Anthemivs (intituling himself Emperor) a Captain whose name was Gervandvs, who was Prefect and Gouernor of the Prouince of Narbone; which was all that remained subject to the Empire in France. But Anthemivs speedily sent his Captains against him: and, beeing by them taken, hee was condemned to perpetuall exile; and Anthemivs established in his place a friend of his which was a good Captain, called Belimer, to gouern the Countrey of Gallia Narbonensis. This rebellion was scarcely ended, when in Rome another prime man arose, and would also haue rebelled, called Patricivs: but Anthemivs pacified that matter with as great facility as the rest. The death of Seuerianus. Anthemius chosen Emperor. Gerundus was called Emperor.

During all these alterations, and the death of Emperors in Italie, the Emperor Leo gouerned Græcia and the East very valiantly, and in peace. But the ould and politick Genserivs, King of the Vandales in Africa, seeing the alterations and troubles which daily happened in Italie, resolued with himself to inuade it, and to make himself absolute Lord thereof; which was a thing that hee long desired, as a man who had tasted the sweetnes of the wealth and riches of Rome. Whereupon hee mustred vp his valiant Vandales, and the countrey Inhabitants of Africa and other Nations; and armed and rigged the mightiest Armie and Nauy that hee euer before had leuied. Whereof when Leo was aduertised, and knowing that Anthemivs had not power sufficient to defend himself against Genserivs, and that if Anthemivs sped il, his estate was not assured (at the least Slauonia, and those Countries which bordered vpon Italy) he resolued to imploy his whole power against Genserivs, in defense of Anthemivs; who of his side made all the prouision of men and Arms that Genserius, King of the Vandals, came again into Italie.

possibly he was able; for the defence of Italy, and had rigged vp an excellent fleet for the Sea. When LEO had prepared his Armie and fleete, he made one BASILISCVS, a great man in his countrie, Generall thereof, who was his brother in law, being brother to his wife the Empresse, and was also brother in law to ANTHEMIVS: for ANTHEMIVS had maried his sister. BASILISCVS, with his great fleet departing from Græcia, safely arriued in Italy; and ioyning with the fleete which ANTHEMIVS had prepared, they went in quest of GENSERICVS, who with no lesse a fleete was come vpon the same coast.

These two Nauies being come within sight one of the other, and GENSERICVS knowing his enemies souldiers to be farre more readie and expert in Sea seruices then his were, would gladly haue auoided the fight; but he was so charged by BASILISCVS, that he could not chuse but fight: and as the battaile was fearefully begun, so was it cowardly maintained. And he seeing his disaduantage, would haue gon out of the fleete, whilest the ships were fighting one with an other, and did attempt to haue done so: which the rest of his fleete perceiuing, they all presently turned their backes, and he was apparantly ouerthrowne: where he lost many of his ships and much people; and so very shamefully fled into Africa. Whom BASILISCVS pursued, and took land but two hundred and fourescore furlongs from Carthage: and (as PROCOPIVS reporteth) if he had presently gone thither he had easily taken the same. And GENSERICVS being without forces (as he then was) he might haue taken all that prouince: for alreadie on the other side towards the East, another Captain whom LEO had sent, whose name was HERACLIVS, had taken the citie of Tripoli, and other townes: but through ignorance, or as some say, BASILISCVS being corupted with a great summe of money by GENSERICVS, he forslowed the warres, and was content to retire his Armie into Sicilia, and there to recouer what GENSERICVS possessed. Whilest as the Emperor LEO's Captaines and souldiers performed these seruices, he himselfe was not idle in Constantinople: for ASPAR and his sonne ARDABVRIVS had caused great combustions. And as they were chiefe in making him Emperour; so were they of great power and authoritie in his Court, and in the gouernment of the Empire: besides that both the father and the sonne had euer been eminent men, and very powerfull. This ASPAR, perceiuing that BASILISCVS the Emperors Generall prospered well in all his actions, began to feare to fall from that dignitie which he then enioyed; imagining that the Emperor being out of feare of GENSERICVS, would make small account of him: and to auoide this, he resolued whilest as BASILISCVS was in the warres, to importune and vrge him to nominate and make his sonne ARDABVRIVS, CÆSAR, according to his former promise when he was chosen Emperour; which he had hitherto deferred, by entertaining them with some apparant reasons. But now ASPAR (as a mightie man) so audaciously importuned him to hold his word, as taking hold of the Imperiall robe which the Emperor then ware, he said, LEO thou oughtest to performe what thou hast promised me; for he that weareth this robe ought not to lie. Whereto the Emperor answered: And much lesse ought he to endure that any man vse violence or force him.

ASPAR, perceiuing the Emperors determination, resolued to make his sonne CÆSAR by force; and accounting himself of sufficient power to effect it, gaue him the name of CÆSAR: and leuying such forces as he was able, the warre began betweene him and the Emperor. Some say that LEO nominated him CÆSAR, and that the Catholike Christians would not yeeld thereto, for that ASPAR and his sonne ARDABVRIVS were both Arrian heretikes: whereof ensued great tumults. But howsoeuer the matter went, it is certaine that they tooke Armes against their Soueraigne, and that their men of warre fought one partie against other. Wherefore in great haste LEO sent to recall his Generall BASILISCVS from Sicilia, to the end that with his Armie and fleete he should come to his aide: but before that he could come, the Emperour was in great danger, and likely to haue been vtterly lost and ouerthowne.

But being come with his Armie, notwithstanding that there were many skirmishes within the citie of Constantinople, and that in apparance it seemed the matter went in a manner at euen hand (for ASPAR and his sonne were excellent men of warre, very rich and of great power) yet in the end LEO his partie preuailed, and the two tyrants were taken and put to death by the Emperours commandement: and so was he freed from this daunger and seruitude.

But there presently ensued other troubles with the Ostrogothes, which had accompanied ATTILA in his warres. For BALEMIR and THEODOMIR Kings of those Gothes, with all their whole power, after many battailes fought between them and the sonnes of ATTILA (which I write not, for that it appertaineth not to our historie) resolued to make warre in the East

East Empire: and beginning in Slauonia, they put the Emperor LEO to great care and trouble. But he, as a wise Prince and a louer of peace (seeing that there was no other remedie) gaue them Hungarie and Austria, and taking hostages and great assurances of them, concluded a peace; which at that time was very necessary and profitable for the Empire, although nothing honourable. He also granted vnto them Seruia, Mœsia, and Walachia.

In the meane season, after the ouerthrow of GENSERICVS, the Emperor ANTHEMICVS liued in peace in Italy. But as there is no constancy in humane estates, and that in the time of most prosperity, there many times happen the greatest disasters and calamities; RITHINER, who (as we said) ouerthrew the Alanes and slew their King neere to the Citie of Bergamo, being growne proude and vaineglorious, by reason of so famous a victory, forgetting the fauours which ANTHEMIVS had bestowed vpon him (first in marying him to his owne daughter; and then making him Gouernour generall of Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lombardy) resolued to rise and rebell against his father in law, and soueraigne Lord; by either of which he was bound to haue been a faithfull and loyall seruant; and to that end resolued to come with the greatest force that he was able, against the Emperor ANTHEMIVS: whereupon, all Italie was in Armes, either for the one party or for the other. But Pope EPIPHANIVS vsed the meanes to bring them to a peace: which he caused to be confirmed vpon certaine conditions, and with exceeding great oathes. But the wicked RITHINER (within a little while after) brake all, and with his Army came to the walls of Rome, making warre against all such as tooke part with the Emperour.

ANTHEMIVS was then vnfurnished of any sufficient Army to take the field; and therfore contenting himself to defend the City, suffered it to be besieged, expecting the succours which came to him out of France. For BALEMIR (whom as we haue sayd, he had made Gouernour of Gallia Narbonensis) vnderstanding in what distresse he was (as a loyall and gratefull seruant) resolued to come with the greatest power he was able to leuie, to relieue his soueraigne Lord and to raise the siege. And the Emperor LEO vnderstanding what past in Italie, and knowing how small meanes and power ANTHEMIVS had to defend himselfe, being informed also of the treason of RITHINER, with all speed he sent into Italie a Captaine whose name was OLIBRIVS, with a good Army against him; with authoritie, when he should see time fit for it, to take the name of Emperour. Which when ANTHEMIVS vnderstood, thinking by this meane to be freed from the siege, wherewith the Citie was distressed, he agreed that the other should be called Emperor, and willingly allowed his name and title.

But before that OLIBRIVS could come, BALEMIR arriued with such succours, as he brought with him out of France: and seeking to enter Rome, and to ioine with ANTHEMIVS, RITHINER got betweene him and the Citie, in such manner, that whether BALEMIR would or would not, they came to blowes, and there was between them a cruell battell, wherein the loyall Captaine (through the secret iudgement of God) was slaine by the traytor: whereupon, the people of Rome being out of hope of this succour (and as OLIBRIVS which came from Constantinople was in Rauenna, so farre from Rome) they so cowardly fainted, as RITHINER entred the Citie by force; and being in possession thereof, put his Lord and father in law the Emperour to death, and sacked the whole Citie, excepting two streets wherein hee was lodged. And so this was the third time that Rome endured wants and much trouble in defending it selfe, and violence and spoile after it was taken. So that (as it hath been seene, and hereafter will often appeare) this Woorld knoweth not how to giue any good thing, but takes it away againe; neither how to aduance, but to the end to pull downe againe. Rome had commanded and subdued the whole World, and had raigned ouer all the habitable knowne Nations of the earth: it had tamed and deprined great Kings and Common-wealths of their Kingdomes and Dominions, and had enriched it selfe with the spoiles and wealth (in a manner) of all the Nations and Cities of the World. Neuertheless, through the diuine prouidence of God, in processe of time it was taken and spoiled by the same people and Nations which it had subdued, and brought vnder their yoke. And those Nations came to Rome, tooke it, and made spoile thereof, as if they had come to set home, and to haue that restored to them, which in former time was taken from their Auncestors; which the Reader may plainly perceiue by that which is already written, and shall be written hereafter: which will shew how often Rome hath beene entred and taken by force, and how often it hath been sacked and spoiled, and indured such like disastres and calamities.

of the reſt of Italie, with the power and name of Emperor (excepting Rauenna, and the marches thereof, which was defended by OLIBRIVS) three moneths onely hee enjoyed this ſouereignty: after which, he fell into an extreme ſickneſs, whereof he died in terrible pain. And as ſoon as he was dead, OLIBRIVS was proclaimed Emperor in Rome, who then was in Rauenna: and coming thither, and giuing but the ſignes and ſhew of an excellent good Gouernour, within foure months he died of his naturall death. And as Rome had loſt her power and authority: ſo had the Emperors thereof little health, and ſhort life. For, who-ſo ſhall make a computation thereof, ſhall finde, that whil'ſt LEO raigned in the Eaſt, there were in Italie (by good and bad titles) one and other, ſix or ſeuen Emperors.

Preſently after the deceaſe of OLIBRIVS, the Senate of Rome, conſidering the loſſes and tyrannies paſt, would haue vſed their authority in chuſing an Emperor by voices, and by generall conſent, with good aduice and conſideration; but they could not bring their purpoſe to effect: for, being ouerſwaied by GVANDIBARVS (a Captain who then was in Rauenna) they made choice of one GLIZERIVS a Senator of Rome, who was in Rauenna with him. Yet his Empire laſted but a while: for, the Emperour LEO, vnderſtanding that his election was by force, ſent againſt him a Captain called NEPOS, with the title and name of Emperor; who, being aſſiſted by the Romans which againſt their wils had ſworn obedience to GLIZERIVS, depoſed him, and made him againſt his will to take Monaſticall Orders, and gaue him a Biſhoprick: but he tooke the Empire to himſelf; which was the occaſion of many commotions and troubles in Italie. For, GVANDIBARVS, who had aduanced GLIZERIVS, took his ſuppreſſion for a great diſgrace and an indignity done to himſelf: wherefore he leuied an Army, to the end to haue reſtored him. But Pope EPIPHANIVS vſed ſuch diligence, and took ſuch pains in the matter (who, as we ſaid, made the peace between BALEMIR and ANTHEMIVS, although it continued not long) that hee made a ſtay thereof, procuring peace betweene them: ſo as they laid down their Armes; and for that time NEPOS remained in peace in Rome. But, as he liued in that eſtate, he was aduertiſed that HENRY King of the Gothes (who then raigned in Tholouſe in France, and in the greateſt part of Spaine) made warres vpon thoſe Countries which were ſubiect to the Romans; and had taken certain Towns; ſo as it was feared that he would haue proceeded further. NEPOS, to ſhew his power, leuied a very good Armie; and, making one ORESTES, a priuate friend of his, Generall therof, commanded him to take his way towards France. But ORESTES, departing with very great forces, took no care for going that journey according to his commiſſion, which had been more for his honour; but rather, as ſoon as he came to Rauenna (hauing firſt founded the good will of his Army, ſo far forth as he thought expedient) made his ſon to be called Emperor, whoſe name was AVGVSTVS; whom the Romans called AVGVSTVLVS (for, that name they gaue him when hee was a childe) and ſo he is called by all Hiſtorians. And hauing brought this to effect, he reſolued to return to Rome againſt NEPOS; who, as hee had imployed all his men of warre and whole power in that Army, was not of force able to ſtay his coming, neither to make any defenſe or reſiſtance againſt him. Wherefore he abandoned Rome, and the hope to bee any longer Emperor, hauing been ſo but a little while; and fled into Dalmatia, which was vnder the iuriſdiction of the Emperor LEO: and ſo AVGVSTVLVS continued in Rome in poſſeſſion, and with the name and title of Emperor.

Oreſtes, being ſent by the Emperor Nepos with an Armie into France, made his ſon to be called Emperor.

The Emperor Nepos, abandoning Rome, fled into Dalmatia.

Auguſtulus made Emperor. The death of the Emperor Leo in Conſtantinople.

While the affairs of Italie ſtood in this eſtate, the Emperor LEO died in the City of Conſtantinople, hauing raigned (as writeth PAVLVS DIACONVS) ſeuenteen yeers with great valor and honour, as an excellent Prince, in the yeer of our Lord foure hundred, threeſcore and ſixteen; who left not behinde him any ſonne to inherit, but two daughters, the one called ARIADNE, and the other, LEONCIA: the one was married to ZENO, who afterwards was Emperor; and the other to MARTIANVS, ſonne of ANTHEMIVS, (as we haue ſaid) had been Emperor of Italie: yet ſome ſay, that ARIADNE, who was wife to ZENO, was not his daughter, but his ſiſter, and that hee inſtituted a ſonne of hers before his death for Emperour, and his Succeſſor. His death was condoled by all, and many lamented the ſame with teares.

The Emperor LEO being dead in Conſtantinople, and AVGVSTVLVS raigning in Rome, the generall eſtate of all the Prouinces that were wont to be in ſubiection to the Empire, ſtood in this maner: The Gothes, with their King called by ſome EVRICVS, and by other HENRICVS, held Tholouſe, and that part of France which borders vpon Spain, and the greateſt part of Spain it ſelf. The Sueuians in Gallicia, and in part of the Kingdome of Leon, held warres with the the Gothes, and to the Empire remained ſome hauen townes on the coaſt of Arragon, Carthagena, and Tarragona, and ſome others alſo. The Alanes which remained in Spaine, dwelt together with the Gothes in a part of Spaine towards Italy: and after the names of theſe two nations, that prouince was cald Gotalonia, which now through corruption of ſpeech is called Catalunia. In France raigned the French, in Paris and in al the countries round about it, and in other countries with all that which we now call Flanders and Picardie, whoſe king was called HEDERICQVE. The Burgonians held the two Burgundies, and the Empire held no more but Narbone, and ſome land thereto neere adioining, which continued but a while in the Emperours iuriſdiction. In England raigned the Engliſh Saxons, and in Scotland the Picts and Scots. In Hungarie, Auſtria, and Miſſia, Seruia, and Walachia, the Oſtrogothes, with their King TODOMIR, and his ſonne THEODORICVS, by permiſſion of the Emperour LEO, bare the ſway. In Africa were the Vandales, and their very old King GENSERICVS, many times ſpoken of: who died within a little while after, and his ſonne HONORICVS ſucceeded him. The moſt of the prouinces of Germany were vſurped by the ſucceſſors of the Hunnes, called Heruli, Turingi, and others which came thither with ATTILA: and betweene all theſe nations and countries and their Kings were great warres, each of them couueting to inlarge his territorie and dominion. All the Eaſterne prouinces were in peace ſubiect to the Empire, and to the Eaſterne Emperour, who then was LEO, nephew of that LEO of whom we but now diſcourſed.

THE LIFE OF LEO, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND SIXE AND FIFTITH ROMANE EMPEROR; And of his Father ZENO.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Emperor Leo being dead, his Nephew, whoſe name was alſo Leo, tooke poſſeſſion of the Empire; to whom it ſeemed a matter vnreaſonable, that his father, whoſe name was Zeno, ſhould liue as a priuate man, and he an Emperour: wherefore he renounced the Empire vnto him, and crowned him with his owne hand, and within ſhort ſpace after dyed. Zeno beeing then made Emperour, the wiſdom Empreſſe being much diſpleaſed that he ſhould enioy ſo great a dignity, procured Baſiliſcus a Captaine of his owne, to rebell againſt him; who making himſelfe Emperor, compelled Zeno to flie into Iſauria in Aſia: but he continued not long in that miſerie; for Baſiliſcus being hated for his pride, behaued himſelfe ſo, as Zeno was reſtored to the Empire. Whileſt as he liued in the Eaſt in peace, the Weſterne Empire and Rome were ſo turmoiled, that Oreſtes father to the Emperor Auguſtulus was taken priſoner in Pauia, and there ſlaine. And Auguſtulus (for feare) left the Imperiall enſignes, the Empire and Rome to the diſcretion of Odoacer, who was afterwards diſpoſſeſt by Theodoricus King of the Oſtrogothes. And Zeno hauing been ſomewhat troubled with warres in the Eaſt, and hauing obtained victorie againſt two tyrants, which were Aſpar and his ſonne Ardaburius, which roſe againſt him, dyed of an ordinary death in Conſtantinople, when he had raigned ſixteene yeeres.

I Am of opinion that the Reader hath ſufficiently vnderſtood, in what eſtate the Empire remained, when the Emperour LEO died in Conſtantinople: wherefore I hold it needleſſe to make any repetition thereof. I ſay then, that as ſoone as LEO departed out of this life, his Nephew without any contradiction was acknowledged and obeyed for Emperor, whoſe name alſo was LEO. For as I ſayd, his Grandfather had choſen and ſo appointed him to be, before his death, and hee held the Empire the ſpace of certaine moneths: at the end of which he did a thing which ſeemeth ſtrange, and breedeth admiration. Which was, that of his owne accord cord and voluntarie free will (holding it a hard caſe, that the father ſhould be ſubiect and inferior to the ſonne) he renounced the Empire, and gaue it to his father ZENO, and crowned him with his owne hand, and preſently did him homage. For fathers in their life time to giue to their children their kingdomes and dignities, is a thing we haue ſeene, and often read of; and it ſeemeth that there is reaſon to induce them thereto: but ſeldome hath any man euer heard, that the ſonne would diſpoſſeſſe himſelf of a kingdome or Empire, to giue it to his father. For it hath rather happened to the contrarie, that the ſonne hath bereaued the father thereof by force in his life time; yea and ſometimes hath wiſhed and practiſed his fathers death, to be his heire, and to ſucceede him. Therefore I ſay, that this accident is very ſtrange, and the reuerence and obedience of this ſonne much to be noted.

Leo refuſed the Empire, and gaue it to his father Zeno.

But it ſucceeded in this manner, that ZENO was crowned and obeyed for Emperour in Conſtantinople, and his ſonne LEO remained in his former eſtate. To the contrarie hereof, in Italy ORESTES made his ſonne AVGVSTVLVS Emperor, not deſiring or procuring it for himſelfe. LEO hauing renounced the Empire and giuen the ſame to his father (as IORNANDES and other authors ſay) died within few daies after. But PAVLVS DIACONVS reporteth it after another manner: for he ſaith that the father ſought his ſonnes death, from which he was deliuered by making himſelfe a Prieſt, and ſo liued certaine yeeres. But howſoeuer it was, there is no more mention made of LEO, and his father ZENO began to rule the Empire. Going in progreſſe to viſit the ſame, being in Chalcedonia, the widow Empereſſe, his wiues mother, who remained in Conſtantinople, repining to ſee ZENO Emperour, whom her husband LEO neuer accounted worthie of the Empire (as IORDANVS writeth) induced her brother BASILISCVS, who (as we ſaid) ouerthrew GENSERICVS in a battaile at ſea, to take vpon him the name of Emperor. And as by reaſon of that victorie and the affinitie which he had with the late Emperor LEO, he was very mightie and highly eſteemed: ſo was he both able and willing to make himſelfe Emperour, and for ſuch was receiued; and they ſware obedience vnto him in Conſtantinople. Which as ſoone as ZENO vnderſtood (whether it were through baſeneſſe of minde, or to auoide the warres and the effuſion of blood which would haue enſued) he took no care to make any head againſt him, but retired himſelfe into Iſauria, which is a very ſtrong and guardable prouince in Aſia the leſſe, where he aſſured himſelfe to liue in ſecuritie.

Baſiliſcus made himſelfe Emperour againſt Zeno in Conſtantinople.

Whereof BASILISCVS waxing proud, and very ioyfull, and holding himſelfe now ſafe and paſt all danger, he made his ſonne MARCVS, CÆSAR. But his pride and ioy continued but a while: for as he was infected with the Neſtorian hereſie, ſo he began to perſecute and afflict the Church and Catholike Chriſtians; by meanes whereof (as IORDANVS and PROCOPIVS report) he grew ſo hatefull, and was ſo abhorred by all ſortes of people, that thoſe Captaines which he ſent againſt ZENO, returned againſt himſelfe, and by the generall conſent of all men ZENO was reſtored, and reeſtabliſhed in the Empire; and he with his ſonne MARCVS and VERINA his ſiſter, were taken priſoners, and being baniſhed died in exile. In this manner remained ZENO mightie and in peace, hauing bin diſpoſſeſſed of the Empire the ſpace of eighteene moneths: where we will leaue him, and returne to ſpeake of AVGVSTVLVS the Emperor of the Weſt, or to ſay better, of Italy.

Marcus made Cæſar by his father Baſiliſcus.

Baſiliſcus the tyrant diſpoſſeſſed, taken priſoner and baniſhed, died in exile, together with his ſonne and ſiſter.

Whileſt theſe things paſſed in the Eaſt, we told you how that ORESTES had exalted his ſonne, and made him Emperor againſt NEPOS, who held his Empire in Rome, and that NEPOS had abandoned Italy, and AVGVSTVLVS remained there: and ſeeing that in Italy no man durſt oppoſe himſelfe againſt him; by the aduice and counſell of his father he made peace, and entred in league with GENSERICVS King of the Vandales in Africa, who was now growne old and worne with bearing armes, and euen at deaths dore. By reaſon of which league, hee held himſelfe to be in great ſecuritie: for of ZENO he made no account, ſeeing the diſcord between him and BASILISCVS. But his trouble and ruine ſprang from whence he leaſt miſtruſted it; for the Heruli and the Turingi, a people of which we haue made mention, and which had ſerued in the warres vnder ATTILA the mightie King of the Hunnes, and which at that time inhabited along the riuer of Danubius, in the furtheſt confines of Hungary, tooke for their Captaine a man of their own nation called ODOACER, with a reſolution to come into Italy, and to make a conqueſt thereof; ſeeing that no man had any right thereto, but he who was of greateſt power, and could beſt fight for it. And it was the will and pleaſure of God, that as Italy had ſent Captains to the conqueſt of all parts and nations of the world, ſo ſhould Captains and men of war come from all parts and nations of the earth to make a conqueſt therof. Leauing apart other accidents which by the way befell ODOACER; hee beeing approached to the Borders

Borders of Italy, ORESTES, the father of AVGVSTVLVS, ſallied forth to encounter him, with an excellent Armie which the father and ſonne (hauing intelligence of his coming) had leuied.

The two Armies being comm within ſight one of the other, both the Generals would haue fought: but certain companies of ORESTES his ſouldiers went ouer vnto ODOACER, Which when he perceiued (repoſing no firm confidence in the reſt which remained) hee retired in the beſt order he could towards Ticinum, which is now called Pauia, a City in Lumbardy; and ODOACER purſued him. But ORESTES, hauing no ſufficient Armie to take the field to fight with him, ſuffred himſelf to be beſieged in that City. And notwithſtanding that he did as much as was poſſible for his defenſe, yet the aſſaults giuen were ſo terrible, that the City was entred by force, after that hee had defended it many daies, and ORESTES taken: on whom, and the ſouldiers which were with him, ODOACERS ſouldiers executed extreme cruelty. And from thence ORESTES was carried priſoner to Placencia; where, by ODOACERS commandement, he was put to death.

Oreſtes, father to Auguſtulus, marches againſt Odoacer.

Oreſtes taken and ſlain by Odoacer.

After that ODOACER had obtained this victory (as AVGVSTVLVS his Empire had but a weak foundation, and leſſe equity of his ſide) all things went againſt him, and proſpered with his enemy: and ſo with ſmall difficulty, and as little reſiſtance, ODOACER took all the cities of Italy, and preſently proclaimed himſelf Lord and King thereof.

When AVGVSTVLVS vnderſtood that all the townes and people took part with ODOACER, he departed from Rauenna, where he then kept his Court, to go to Rome: but by the way, before he came thither, being out of hope, hee voluntarily put away his Robes and Imperiall Enſignes, abandoning Rome, and fled; contenting himſelf with the hope of ſauing his life, when he had raigned two yeers a peaceable Emperor: and ſo he afterwards ended his life in pouertie and miſery (as it is to be preſumed); for, the Hiſtoriographers make no more mention of him. Rome being abandoned by AVGVSTVLVS, ODOACER without any reſiſtance poſſeſſed himſelf of all Italie, which he enjoyed foureteen yeers in great proſperity: after which we will tell you who were Lords thereof. And ſo in this AVGVSTVLVS ended the Empire and dominion of Rome; which afterwards had no Emperor for the ſpace of three hundred and thirtie yeers. This happened in the yeer one thouſand, two hundred, nine and twenty after the building of Rome; and in the fiue hundred, nine and twentith after that IVLIVS CÆSAR made himſelf Tyrant and Lord thereof; and in the yeer foure hundred, ſeuenty and ſeuen, after the birth of our Sauiour CHRIST.

Auguſtulus abandoned Rome to Odoacer.

Odoacer made himſelf Lord of all Italy.

Anno 1229 after the building of Rome.

Anno 529 after that Iulius Cæſar made himſelf monarch of the Romain Empire.

In theſe times (as PAVLVS DIACONVS and BLONDVS write) there aroſe a Nobleman in England, by linage a Roman, deſcended from thoſe which in antient time had dwelt in that Iland, whoſe name was AMBROSE; who ioyning with the Britans, the antient Inhabitants of that Country, againſt the Angles, fought many battels with them: but in the end hee was ouerthrowne and ſlain. Whereupon, many of thoſe Britans reſolued to abandon that Iland; and in Barks and Ships (ſuch as they could get) embarked themſelues, and ſailed ouer into that Coaſt of France which for that cauſe is now cald Britanny; where in thoſe daies dwelt a people called Veneti, Cenomanni, and others: where, ſomtimes by leaue, and with the good will of the Inhabitants, and ſometimes without it, they inhabited and poſſeſſed themſelues of that Country; and haue continued there euer ſince with ſo good ſucceſſe, that the name thereof and their language continueth there vntill this day, and is one of the beſt Prouinces of all France: wherein haue been mighty Princes; but, by means of ſundry alterations, the French King is now Lord thereof.

The Britans abandoned England, and went ouer into Britanny in France.

After this, the Emperor ZENO raigned in Conſtantinople, and ODOACER in Italie, ſome yeers peaceably; ſo as there hapned not any thing in the Empire worth the writing: but in the end fortune turned her wheel in ſuch manner, that ODOACER juſtly loſt all that which hee had wrongfully gotten; and one Tyrant was bereaued of what he had taken from another Tyrant; which hapned in ſuch manner as we will ſet down. THEODORICVS, ſon of THEODOMIR King of the Oſtrogothes, who in the time of the Emperor LEO the Firſt had lien in hoſtage in Conſtantinople, when his father and vncle made peace with LEO, who granted vnto them Auſtria, Hungarie, and Miſsia, to inhabite; at this time his father THEODOMIR beeing dead, THEODORICVS ſucceeded him in the Kingdome: whereof when the Emperor ZENO was aduertiſed, he ſent Ambaſſadors to him; giuing him to vnderſtand, that he was very glad of his ſucceſſion; and therewith requeſted him to come to his Court, for the great deſire he had to ſee him, and to doo him honour: which THEODORICVS gladly performed, remem-remembring the honour and good entertainment which in former time he had receiued in Constantinople. Whither when he came (besides that he was very solemnly receiued at his first coming) he was afterwards very honourably entertained by the Emperor ZENO; who gaue him Ensignes of Arms, and other honours and dignities, assigning to his people pay and perpetuall pensions: and so was THEODORICVS beloued and esteemed by the Emperor & his whole Court. And, liuing in this manner with great contentment for a certain space; his people that came with him, and those which remained behinde also in his Countrey, being accustomed to the warres, and to rob and spoil, and now grieued with liuing idle in peace, continually perswaded him, that (imitating those from whom he was descended) he should seek to make some conquest, and not to spend his life in banquetting and feasting: but principally they counselled him to sue to the Emperor to giue him leaue to make a Conquest of Italy, which ODOACER had taken and vsurped; and they told him so many things thereof, that in the end he resolued to follow their counsell: and, finding a time and place conuenient, he made a fair speech to the Emperor, intreating him to grant him what is before-said; which, Bishop IORNANDES writes at large in his Book of the Originall and Acts of the Gothes.

Theodoricus, King of the Gothes, came to the Emperor Zeno's Court.

Theodoricus made suite to the Emperor to giue him leaue to conquer Italie from Odoacer.

When ZENO had heard his discourse, and vnderstood his meaning, hee was very sorry for it: for, he desired euer to haue had him neer to himself, and not to haue suffred him to haue departed; aswell for the loue hee bare him, as for the fear and doubt which hee euer had of the Gothes. But seeing his resolution, after counsell taken with the Senate, he was of opinion that hee might well grant him (as he requested) the conquest of Italie; considering that the Empire had lost it, and that it was now in the power of ODOACER; wherefore it were better that a King which was a friend and a confederate should possesse the same, than another: and if hee did not accomplish his conquest, yet it was a means to weaken both their forces; of which the Empire stood in fear, hauing been oftentimes molested by them.

When the Emperor had made this Grant, and confirmed the same by publique instruments, THEODORICVS took his leaue, and went into Hungary and into Mysia, where his people inhabited: there he gathered together the best and choicest men of war he was able for this enterprise, and began to march forwards with his Armie; but by the way he was hindred and encountred by certain Kings and barbarous people which were the remnant of ATTILA his troops: so as by that time he came into Italie, he was well trained in the warres, and his souldiers were accustomed to vanquish. ODOACER, who some daies before was aduertised of his coming, had leuied a very great Armie, and had assembled together the people of that countrey, whom he perswaded to aid him, and to defend themselues.

Theodoricus entred Italie, & Odoacer went to meet him

When THEODORICVS was arriued in Italie, he encamped himself by a riuers side called Sontius, neer to the ruines of old Aquileia, to refresh his Armie in those fertill fields. As soon as ODOACER heard of his coming (as he lay in wait for him in those Marches) hee drew so neer with his Armie, that in short space they came to a battell (which THEODORICVS with great courage offred, and ODOACER refused not: for, it seemd that both the Commanders desired the same); which was one of the most cruell and bloudie that hath been seen: for, the Commanders and souldiers of either side were very valiant; and the one fought to winne a Kingdome, fame and honour, and the other fought to preserue all these. The Fight lasted a great part of the day; and, after great slaughter, and effusion of much bloud on either side, THEODORICVS obtained the victory, and ODOACER was fain to flee when he had done all that was possible for him to maintain the Fight. And although ODOACER lost this battel, yet he lost neither courage nor hope to defend himself: but, gathering together the remainder of those which escaped from the battell, he raised new forces; and, again taking the Field neer to the City of Verona, returned to fight with THEODORICVS, who followed him thither: and the two Kings came the second time to battell, which was no lesse cruell than the first; for, this was the last of ODOACER's hope: but hee was again ouerthrowne; for, those supplies which came to his aid forsook him, and he lost great part of his Army fighting; and afterwards in his flight passing the riuer Po, many of his people were drowned.

A battell betwixt Odoacer and Theodoricus.

Odoacer was ouerthrowne by Theodoricus.

Odoacer ouercomm the second time by Theodoricus.

In this flight ODOACER neuer staied till he came to Rome: where he thought to haue gathered a new head, and there to haue resisted his enemies; but they would not receiue him: for, seeing that hee had been twice ouerthrowne, they had no hope or confidence in him; but sought to gratifie THEODORICVS, so as the City was in Arms: wherefore ODOACER returned, and with the best forces hee was able to gather together, put himself into Rauenna. THEODORICVS for that time forbare to pursue him; but went to Milan and took it, with other cities in that quarter: whereupon, many cities in Italy sent to him to yeeld their obedience, and many companies of souldiers came to serue him in his warres. In the meane season ODOACER fortified himself with armes, men, and victuals, thinking at the least to haue been able to defend himself in Rauenna, which at that time (after Rome) was the principall citie of all Italy. THEODORICVS being in a redines to besiege it, there followed so sodaine an alteration, as he neither could, neither durst to stay before it: for by the procurement of one of ODOACER's Captaines, who was either a president or admirall of some part of Italie, many Captaines, townes, and people againe took part with ODOACER; and they grew to so great a head, that THEODORICVS was in such feare, as he put himself into Pauia, and many daies passed before that he drew his Armie againe to field, so as neither ODOACER came to seeke him, nor he ODOACER. Within few moneths after, they made frontier warres: and THEODORICVS, recouering forces, committed his Mother and Sisters to the keeping of EPIPHANIVS Bishop of Pauia, and went to Rauenna (wherein ODOACER lay) and laid siege thereto: but ODOACER so manfullie defended the same, that in three yeeres space (for so long the siege lasted) he not onely made head against THEODORICVS, but made so many sallies vpon him, and gaue him so many alarmes, as he neuer suffered his Armie to rest. But in the end wanting victuals, and out of hope of any reliefe, hauing first tried all meanes both to offend and defend, and seeing it auailed not, he resolued to yeeld to THEODORICVS, vpon condition that he should giue him assurance of his life, with promise to allow him some place in Italy, wherein he might liue; which promise was ill performed: for he commanded both him and his sonne to be slaine: and so ended the life and raigne of ODOACER, which cannot iustly be tearmed, cowardlie.

Odoacer slaine by the commandement of Theodoricus.

ODOACER being dead, the remainder of his Armie of Heruli, which escaped from the battaile, were entertained by THEODORICVS, and he gaue them pay, and in short space made himself Lord of all Italy, finding not any resistance; afterwards he went to Rome, where he was receiued with great ioy and solemnitie, as well for the fame and good report which they had heard of him, as for that he was sent thither by the Emperor ZENO. And this moreouer did greatly helpe him to get the good will of the citie; that at his very first comming thither, he caused a great quantitie of wheat to be distributed amongst the citizens; whereof they then stood in great neede: And so he remained Lord of Rome, and of all Italy, calling himself king thereof, as ODOACER had done, thirteene yeeres before.

Throdoricus went to Rome and made himself Lord thereof and of all Italy.

This THEODORICVS was a very vertuous, iust, and a most excellent Prince and gouernour, and made himself very mightie, and much beloued and feared: but aboue all, he was very wise and circumspect in preseruing his estate. And to the end to make himself the more mightie, he procured alliance with all the kings then in Europe: for he presently treated a marriage with ANDEFREDA the French Kings daughter, which he solemnized with great feasting and triumph. And of his owne three daughters, one he maried to SIGISMVND King of the Burgonians; and another to ALARICVS King of the Visogothes, and of Spaine; and his third daughter called AMALASIVNTHA, he married to a Prince of Germany called EVTHARICVS; and his sister ALMAFREDA hee maried to HONORICVS King of the Vandales and of Africa, who was GENSERICVS his heir and successor. So as with all the Princes neere vnto Italy, he made some affinitie and league of friendship, and held that kingdome, which with such honour he had conquered, with no lesse honour, the space of thirtie yeeres.

The alliance and league made by Theodoricus.

Whilest these things passed in Italy, ZENO the Emperor of Constantinople and of the East, had somewhat to doe with the Bulgarians, who euer since the death of ATTILA had inhabited Germany, and had made an incursion into the prouince of Thracia, and done much harme in that countrie: but they quickly returned to their habitation. In Constantinople also happened a great fire, which burnt a great part of that citie. There befell vnto ZENO also another great disaster, plotted by a fauourite of his, who was steward of his palace, whose name was YLLOS, which was thus: This YLLOS made the Emperour beleeue (though vniustly) that his wife the Empresse, whose name was ARIADNE, daughter to the Emperour LEO, liued dishonestly; and so ZENO being deluded, commanded her secretly to be slaine. And hee to whom the charge of the execution was committed, reuealed the secret to a young gentlewoman of the Empresse chamber, who presently aduertised her Ladie thereof. And she at the very instant without any delay, fled from the palace in the closest maner she could, leauing her in her chamber, which had aduertised her thereof, and went to the house of ACACIVS then Bishop of Constantinople. The Emperour the next day, assuring himselfe that his commandement had been effected, clad himselfe in mourning attire, faining that his wife had died naturally. But presently the Bishop, came vnto him: who with great authoritie seuerely reprehended his lightnes and hastie resolutions; aduertising him of his wiues innocencie; and that her accusation was vntrue. Finally, he handled the matter so well, as hee perswaded him of the truth, and reconciled him to his wife, and made a perfect peace betweene them. But the Empresse ARIADNE, after that she vnderstood that it was YLLOS which had accused her, as a woman would bee reuenged, and commanded a certaine man, whom she held fit for that purpose, to kill him; who the better to bring his purpose to effect, lay in wait for him: and purposing to haue striken him vpon the head, his blow failed, and it happened vnto him as to S. PETER: for missing his head, he smote off one of his eares, and so hee escaped. And dating not to remaine in the Emperor ZENO's Court, he resolued to commit a greater treason then the former; which was to goe into Asia, and there to rise and rebell, with a great part of the East: which he might easily doe, for hee was very cunning and of great account; and ZENO for his conditions was in those parts very ill beloued. But he speedily sent a good Armie against him vnder the leading of a Captaine called LEONCIVS: but this YLLO vsed such meanes and perswasions to LEONCIVS, as he did the like: and so of one tyrant there arose two, which made themselues Lords of a great part of Asia the lesse. But within few daies after, the Imperiall Armie which had conspired with them, after that the souldiers were growne rich by spoile and booty, repenting their errors, and to obtaine pardon, vpon a day mutined and slew them both, and brought their heads to Constantinople. And so was ZENO freed from this trouble and reuolt, and liued the remainder of his time in rest and peace: notwithstanding that he put certaine Noblemen to death without any iust cause. All these things being past, in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne ZENO died of a naturall death in Constantinople. It is written of him that he was exceedingly ill fauoured and deformed, and of a loathsome aspect and gesture. He is not reckoned among the good Emperours; and it is also said of him, that he would sometimes be drunke. He died in the yeere of our Lord foure hundred, fourescore and fourteene.

THE LIFE OF ANASTASIVS, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND SEVEN AND FIFTITH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE ARGVMENT.

ZEno being dead, Anastasius was chosen, who was greatly fauoured by the Empresse: to whom he was married, at the end of fortie dayes after the Obsequies of her dead Husband. This man, finding all things in peace, in the beginning of his raigne did many good deeds: but he suddenly altred his condition, and being spotted with the heresie of Eutiches or Euticetus, which made a quaternitie of the Diuinitie, he began to growe hatefull to God and men; and many countries rebelled against him. Against which putting himselfe in order to fight (although that he ouercame many of the Rebels) neuertheless hee was once brought to such an extremitie, as he was driuen shamefully to buy his peace with money; and afterwards the Persians, rising against him, gaue him many crosses in sundrie battailes: but finally he made a truce with them, and during the time of the truce, he was slaine by a thunderbolte from heauen.

ZENO had not any sonne that might succeed him in the Empire: wherefore, after his death some of the chiefest Lords procured themselues to be chosen; among which was this ANASTASIVS: who although he were not of any Noble Family, yet he was a man of great reputation, and well beloued. By reason whereof, and also for that he was in great fauour with the widow Empresse, he was chosen Emperour, with the ayde and assistance of an Eunuch, called VRBICIVS, who was of great authority in the Court. And ARIADNE did not onely procure his election aforesayd, but within forty dayes after the obse-obsequies of her dead husband were solemnized, and his body intombed, she married with the new Emperour: and by this meane obtained ANASTASIVS the Empire. In the beginning whereof, without any contradiction, but with the generall contentment of all men, he was obeyed: and he not onely found the Empire in peace, but there was peace also in Italy, France, Spaine, Germanie, and Africa; they gouerning those kingdomes as their owne, who were successors to them vvhich first vsurped and tooke them from the Empire; notvvithstanding that shortly after there arose great vvarres betvveene them. THEODORICVS, vvho vvas called King of Italy, made choise of the citie of Rauenna for his royall seate; vvhich vvas by him enobled with sumptuous buildings: and in his absence he commanded the like to be made in Rome, and did much good through all Italie, directing all things like a good and an excellent Prince; in so much as the people praised God for him, and held themselues happie, in that they had so good a man for their Lord and gouernour.

But returning to our nevv Emperour; as soone as he vvas crovvned, he commanded by a publike decree that all such debts as vvere due to his chamber of accounts, or as vve say, his exchequer, vntill that day, should be pardoned, and not be recouered from the debters; which amounted to a very great summe. He began also to giue offices and places of charge to such persons as were of vvorth, and sufficient for them, and not for money (as the custome was) by reason of late vvants. By meanes whereof and of other apparant signes of a good prince, in the beginning of his raigne, he was very well beloued. But this lasted but a while: for he was infected with the heresie of EVTICHES; who held an abominable opinion of the person of CHRIST. And for as much as nothing can be of any assurance, or acceptable without faith; this Emperour began to grovv secretly hatefull to God, and publickly odious to men; and so although that he died old, yet he died an euill death: And in his life he was neuer free from tyrants which rebelled; and other warres and troubles. The first which rebelled, were the people of Isauria (a very valiant nation in Asia the lesse) the occasion whereof was, for that hee took, from them, that pay which his predecessor ZENO had promised, and giuen them, when he subdued the tyrant ILLOS, who (as we said) falsely defamed the Empresse. This nation making choise of a valiant and expert soldier, whose name was LILINGVS for their captaine; made cruell warres vpon the lands of the Empire, for the space of sixe yeeres. In which time, betvveene the souldiers of ANASTASIVS and of LILINGVS, there happened some battailes, and many conflicts and skirmishes; vntill that LILINGVS dying, the Isaurians being scattered, and lost through want of a captaine, were cruelly punished, and many cities wer ruined, and laied waste, as relateth IORDANVS the Bishop: who although briefly, yet he expresseth the greatest part of that historie.

Lilingus rebelled in Isauria against Anastasius.

There arose also against ANASTASIVS, another captaine in Cilicia, at the same instant, called ATHEMIDORVS, but he was soone brought to ruine. In Slauonia and Dalmatia, rebelled two mightie men and very rich, called SABIANVS and MVNDO: and neere to Adrianople another whose name was POMPEY: and within the citie of Constantinople, were certaine tumults and insolencies committed, wherein many men were slaines. By reason of all which rebellions, ANASTASIVS was much perplexed; and being in great feare, he came to some compositions (little to his honour) and lost sundrie townes. Being freed from this trouble, he had another ciuill warre, which was of great importance and long continuance, against a valiant soldier, a Scythian borne; but trained and brought vp in the wars of the Romanes, and in the Emperors house, and court: he was high constable, or commander of his men of warre, and was called VATILIANVS; who either of ambition and desire to be absolute, or for some displeasure or discontentment (which historiographers write not) rebelled against ANASTASIVS; and with threescore thousand men, which he leuied, of Hunnes, and other nations, began cruell warre against him, both by sea and land; so as sometimes he came within three miles of the imperiall citie of Constantinople. Against whom the Emperour raised a great Armie, and made his nephew HIPATIAS Generall thereof; who before he could come to fight any battaile, by a wile was taken prisoner by the Hunnes, and deliuered into the power of VATILIANVS: After which, the Emperours other captaines were ouerthrowne; so as the warre continued sixe yeeres: and in the end thereof, the Emperor bought his peace of VATILIANVS, for a great sum of money which he gaue him, and so was deliuered from the peril, although not from the disgrace and dishonor of buying peace. In this warre (as writeth ZONARAS) called IOANNES MONACHVS (as reateth IOHANNES CVSPINIANVS) ANASTASIVS was greatly assisted by the skill and industrie of PROCLVS, an excellent philosopher and Mathematician, Athemidorus, Sabianus, Mundo, and Pompey, Tyrants.

Hypatias made Generall against Vatilianus.

Proclus, an excellent Philosopher.

Mathematician, who was most skilfull in inuenting instruments, engines and stratagems. Amongst other matters, they report one thing of him, which seemeth incredible, which I dare neither affirme, nor deny, but will recite it for a wonder, let the reader beliue what he listeth; yet I say that the secrets of nature are so great, as we ought not to hold all for impossible which we cannot comprehend how it may be brought to passe. That which I say, these authors write for certaine, which was, that as we now see certaine glasses, which being set in the sunne, with the reflexion of the beames thereof will set tow or flax on fire, and such like other dry stuffe neere at hand: so did this PROCLVS make a very great many of these glasses, which wrought effect with such force as being set vpon the high turrets of the walles and bulwarks, they set on fire and burnt whole fleets of shippes in the harbour, with all the people that were in them; and in like manner any other engines that were erected against the walles, wheresoeuer they were (if the sunne-beames might reuerberate from those glasses) wherewith the enemie was greatly annoyed, which was done in the same manner as we now see tow set on fire. Whilst these things passed in the Empire of Constantinople, there were great wars betweene the King of France, and Spaine, and THEODORICVS King of Italy: which for that they are long to recite, and nothing to my purpose, I omit.

Wonderfull burning glasses.

But returning to our Emperour, who seemed now to bee at some rest, being freed from warre with VATILIANVS; there happened another warre with the Persians, which was of as great importance, and no lesse perillous, the cause whereof was this. At that time in Persia raigned a King both mightie and valiant, whose name was CAVADAS; who by reason of warres and other expences, stoode in neede of a summe of money, therewith to pay a certaine King which was his neighbour to whom he was indebted: which by ambassage he requested the Emperour ANASTASIVS to lend him, as to a friend and confederate (as he then was). But ANASTASIVS taking counsell vpon the matter, was aduised not to graunt it, for that it was a meane with his owne money to ioyne in league of amitie and friendship, those which were the antient enemies of the Empire: and that therefore the best course was to take away the meane from the Persian, to bee able to make paiment; to the end that they might make warre one against another, and so waste and consume themselues. And in this manner it was concluded, in the best for that might be, to excuse the matter, without granting what the King requested. The King of Persia hauing receiued this answere, was so extremely enraged therewith, as he resolued to make warre against the Romane Empire: and putting his determination in execution, leuying a great Armie, and making great preparation for the warres, hee personally entred the limits and confines thereof, and made cruell warres, and incamped himselfe before the citie of Amida, which was then a great and a famous citie in the prouince of Mesopotamia, as writeth PROCOPIVS, before which were many conflicts: but in the end the Persian tooke it, and held the same for some space. As hee lay before this citie, ANASTASIVS raised the greatest Armie that euer hee had before; which he diuided into foure parts, and sent the same vnder the command of foure Generals against CAVADVS: whose names were ARIOVINDVS, who then was Pretor in the East; and CELER, the Captaine of the Emperours guard; and another was called PATRICIVS borne in Phrygia; and the fourth was HIPATIAS, who was the Emperours Nephew, as is before said. And with these went other great men: as IVSTINVS who afterwards was Emperour, and some other noble and and expert men in the warres.

Cauadas king of Persia.

Warres with the Persians.

Anastasius his Generals against the king of Persia, Ariouindus, Patricius, Celer, and Hipatias.

These Armies marched by seuerall waies, and directed not their course to relieue Amida; but to make warre in sundrie parts of CAVADAS his kingdomes. He being aduertised of their comming, went to meete with ARIOVINDVS; who behaued himselfe so cowardly, as not daring to fight, he retired very shamefully, and left his campe full of many rich things, and of great value, which were taken by the Persians, who had them in chace, and pursued the Imperiall Armie. The other two Generals, to wit, PATRICIVS and HIPATIAS, ioyning their forces together, being neere the enemie, began the warre, without any certaine knowledge where the King was, after the retreit, or rather flight of ARIOVINDVS; and they by chance met with eight hundred horse of his, the King being but a little behind them with a very mightie Armie: who putting themselues in order for their defence, were all slaine and cut in peeces, without any newes learned of them by the Romanes: and they hauing no sight of CAVADAS his troupes, pitched their tents vpon a riuers side; the currant whereof ranne directly that way as CAVIDAS came, and so they began to victuall and refresh themselues, of their wearie iourney; and and went into the water, and did fetch water out of the said riuer. And as CAVADAS and his Captaines saw the water come downe troubled, bringing therewith other things which seemed to be lately throwne into it, they suspected as it was, whereupon CAVADAS in all haste commanded his Armie to march in otder ready to fight. Which came so suddenly vpon the Imperialists, that before they could range themselues in order, they were broken and ouerthrowne; and the most part of all these careleſſe Captaines were slaine, except some which escaped by flight. And without question if at this time the Hunnes had not come downe out of Scythia Asiatica, and with great power had not made warre vpon the Persians, which diuerted CAVADAS his thoughts into other parts, and made him returne into his country, to take order for the defence thereof, he had after this ouerthrow done great spoiles in the Empire. But he vpon this occasion retiring himselfe, there came in good time the fourth Captaine called CELER, with his Imperiall Armie, who began in better order and more aduisedly to follow the wars: and gathering together those troups which ARIOVINDVS had left (for he himselfe was commanded by ANASTASIVS to come to Constantinople) and ioyning with PATRICIVS the Captaine which escaped, they besieged the Citie of Amida, which the Persians had taken; and after a long siege, they got it by a wile. This most cruell warre continuing two yeeres, with great slaughter and losse to either side; and the Persians being much distressed by the Hunnes, and other nations which with them entred their countries, a truce was concluded with the Empire for seuen yeeres. Afterwards, the time of the truce being expired, ANASTASIVS commanded a citie to be built in Mesopotamia, which he called after his owne name, Anastasia: wherewith the Persians were much displeased. But they were so oppressed by the Hunnes, as they durst not breake with the Emperor, and so the peace continued during the life of ANASTASIVS, wherewith he was well content: for in the warres he had lost both many men and much reputation; and being (as we said) infected with the heresie of EVTICHES, he raigned in great trouble. In the end when he least thought thereof, when he had raigned seuen and twentie yeers, a Thunderbolt fell from heauen which slew him in the yeer of our Lord, fiue hundred and nineteene, leauing not any sonne that might succeede him.

Cauadas hit victory against Anastasius his Captaines.

A truce with the Persians for 7 yeeres.

The death of the Emperor Anastasius, slain by a thunderbolt.

THE LIFE OF IVSTINVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND EIGHT AND FIFTIETH EMPEROVR of ROME.

AFter ANASTASIVS IVSTINVS EVROPALATES succeeded in the Empire. And truly it is a wonderfull thing to consider from how base an estate, and from how poore a beginning he mounted to so high a dignitie; and of the waies and meanes whereby he attained thereto. Which for an example of the strang aduentures and variable accidents in this life, I hold worthie to be related in such sort as it hapned. This IVSTINVS was borne in Thracia (yet some say, that he was of Slauonia, or Dalmatia) of poore and simple parentage; so as from his infancy he was bred vp in keeping of beasts. But as it pleased God in his secret iudgement, to ordaine him to raigne and rule, to some good end, he inspired him to leaue that base kinde of life: so as at the age of seuenteene yeeres he went to the warres, with a resolution to continue in the exercise of Arms. And he proued ſo worthy a ſouldier, that within ſhort ſpace he purchaſed the name of Valiant, and fought oftentimes with great dexterity and courage, with his enemies in ſingle combats man to man; and in all occaſions made good proof of his perſon. Wherefore within ſhort time he was made a Captain, and within a while after an Earl; which (as is already ſaid) at that time was, and ſtill is, a great dignity. In that eſtate was he when ANASTASIVS died, being now wel growne in yeers: And as preſently after his deceaſe the Lords began to conſult whom they ſhould make Emperor; a great Courtier named AMANTIVS, who was an Eunuch, and had bin the Emperors Steward, and was now the beſt monied man of his time, ſought by all means to make a great and mightie man, called THEOCRETIANVS, who was his great friend, Emperor. And for as much as the Armie and men of warre bare greateſt ſway in the election (for, now nothing was done in ſuch order as it behoued, but by force and for benefit) he therefore determined to buy the good wils of the Captains and men of warre. And to this effect hee purpoſed firſt to winne IVSTINVS, and to vſe him for a mean to perſwade the reſt; and conferred with him concerning the ſame. And, coming to a compoſition, hee gaue him a great ſumme of money, to the end he ſhould diuide the ſame among the Captaines and men of warre where he thought good; conditionally that THEOCRETIANVS might be choſen Emperor.

Amantius fought to get the Empire for his friend Theocretianus.

When IVSTINVS had gotten this money into his fingers, hee forgot to deal for THEOCRETIANVS, but ſecretly ſought to buy their good wils for himſelf; and carried the matter ſo cunningly, that when AMANTIVS thought that the ſouldiers would haue made his friend Emperor, he found that they had nominated and would haue IVSTINVS. And in this manner they preſently ſware fidelity and obedience to him, by the generall conſent both of the Senate and Army: for, beſides what is already ſaid, he was well beloued, and held for a vertuous man, and a good Chriſtian.

The meanes whereby Iuſtinus got the Empire.

AMANTIVS ſeeing himſelf deluded, although for the preſent he could not refuſe to yeeld him obedience, yet ſhortly after hee practiſed the death of the new Emperor, and conſpired with THEOCRETIANVS, who pretended to haue bin choſen Emperor; and with another called ANDREAS, and with MISSAHALE and ARDABVRIVS (all which were of the Emperors chamber) to the end they ſhould kill him as ſoon as any oportunity were offred. But it pleaſed God that their treaſon was diſcouered; and, it being proued, IVSTINVS commanded AMANTIVS, ANDREAS and THEOCRETIANVS, to be ſlain; and the reſto be perpetually baniſhed. And, the better to aſſure himſelf in the Empire, hee vſed a mean that VATILIANVS, who rebelled againſt ANASTASIVS, came to Court; whom he made ordinary Conſul, and Generall of all his men of warre, and beſtowed great gifts and honours vpon him. But, for all this, he (as ingratefull, and a Traitor) within fewe daies practiſed with ſom others againſt the life and eſtate of IVSTINVS: which being diſcouered, he was vpon a day ſlain in his Palace, together with PAVLVS and CELERIANVS, who were confederates and complices with him in his treaſon.

The treaſon and death of Vatilianus.

IVSTINVS being freed from this danger, and ſeeing himſelf in peace in the Empire, being a good Chriſtian, and knowing how far the Arrian hereſie had extended it ſelf ouer the world, reſolued to vſe therein all the remedy that poſſibly he could: whereto he was likewiſe perſwaded by Pope HORMISDA, who from Rome ſent GERMANVS, Biſhop of Capra, to confer with him of matters concerning the faith. Wherupon IVSTINVS ſent his decrees throughout all the Eaſt, commanding that no man ſhould bee accepted into the Church for Biſhop or Prieſt, that ſhould bee of the ſect of ARRIVS. At what time IVSTINVS did this good deed, TRASIMVND King of the Vandals died in Africa, who was an Arrian Heretick; and his ſonne ELDERICVS poſſeſſed his Kingdome, whom he had by the Emperor VALENTINIAN's daughter. This man, following his faithfull mother, and not his hereticall father, as ſoon as he was eſtabliſhed in the Kingdome, recalled from exile all the Catholique Biſhops which his father had baniſhed (as is aboue-ſaid), and reformed all the Churches. But the Emperor and this King hauing done ſo good a deed, THEODORICVS, who ruled in Italie, beeing of great power, and for that he was (as the moſt of the Gothes were) an Arrian Heretique, was therewith much diſpleaſed; reſoluing, if the Emperor did not reuoke his decree, to vſe through all his dominion all manner of cruelty againſt the Catholiques. But firſt hee conſtrained Pope IOHN, who ſucceeded HORMISDA, to go to Conſtantinople, and with him THEODORVS and AGAPETVS (men who had been Conſuls) to treat with the Emperor, to the end he ſhould preſently reſtore thoſe Arrian Biſhops which he had depoſed; otherwiſe that in his his dominions he would put to the ſword all ſuch as did not beleeue as he did.

Pope IOHN and the other Ambaſſadors being arriued at Conſtantinople, were very honorably received; and the Pope with teares intreated the Emperor to be pleaſed, notwithſtanding that his ſuit was vniuſt; yet to auoide the exceſſiue crueltie which was expected, for the preſent, to permit the Arrian Biſhops to be reſtored. The Emperor to eſchew this crueltie, granted his requeſt: and ſo the wicked Biſhops were reſtored to their Churches; and the Emperour did Pope IOHN great honour, and thoſe which came with him. In the meane time, whil'ſt they were in Conſtantinople, THEODORICVS King of Italie, made SIMACHVS, and BOETIVS SEVERINVS to be ſlaine, who had beene Conſuls, and were very Noble and excellent perſonages, very deuout Chriſtians, and excellently learned in all Arts. And not herewith content, hauing beene vntill then a good and a iuſt Prince; hauing Pope IOHN and the other Ambaſſadors which came with him from Conſtantinople in ſuſpicion, by reaſon of the great honour done vnto them by the Emperor, he commanded them to be apprehended and caſt in priſon; where they all three died of hunger and cruell vſage. After which crueltie, it pleaſed God that within ninetie daies he died ſuddenly, leauing a Nephew of his, called ATHALARICVS for his heire: for he had not any ſonne. And for as much as his Nephew was but eight yeers old, his mother took vpon her the gouernment of the Kingdome, as a woman who was very wiſe and valiant.

Theodoricus King of the Gothes defended the Arrians.

The cruelty of Theodoricus, and his death.

Returning to IVSTINVS the Emperor; It grieued him much for that which THEODORICVS had done: but he was not of power able to redreſſe the ſame; for, beſids the wants and neceſſities wherewith he was oppreſſed, the Perſians made warres againſt him, which was a Nation, of all others, moſt feared by the Romanes. But for the ſmall time that he liued, hee had good ſucceſſe in thoſe warres, and his Captaines obtained ſome victories; SCITA and BELISARIVS being his Generals. Of which two, BELISARIVS (who then was very yong) proued afterwards to be one of the beſt Captaines in the world, and which conquered more countries, and obtained more victories, then any other man in his time: as we will hereafter briefly declare. IVSTINE, liuing in this proſperity, ſeeing himſelfe old, and without any ſonne to ſucceede him, reſolued to make IVSTINIAN, who was his Nephew and his ſiſters ſonne, CÆSAR; and to adopt and nominate him for his ſucceſſor; and ſo preſently made him his companion in the Empire. And within foure moneths after, falling ſick, he died in the Citie of Conſtantinople, when he had raigned eleuen yeeres, or (as ſome Authors write) but nine. I finde little more written of him, then by me is rehearſed. He died in the yeere of our Lord, 529; and, as ſome ſay, 28.

THE ARGVMENT.

AFter Iuſtinus, without any contradiction, ſucceeded Iuſtinianus, who amongſt his firſt attempts, made one againſt the Perſians, vnder the leading of Beliſarius; whom with variable fortune of the warres, in the end he ouercame: Yet he made a peace with them afterwards. After this, there followed a ciuill warre in Conſtantinople, wherein Iuſtinian was likely to haue ſped but ill; but by meanes of Beliſarius, he was freed; notwithſtanding there died there in many thouſands; which being ended, he returned to make a conqueſt of Africa, which of long time had beene vſurped by the Vandales; and getting it, he came againe to Conſtantinople, where Iuſtinian prepared him a triumph. But it was not long before the Emperour sent him into Italie against the Gothes, where after many changes of fortune, and treaties of peace, and of truce, having taken the Citie of Naples (wherein as it seemed consisted the principall hope of the Gothes) he tooke his way towards Roome, where he peaceably entred, and defended the same, with great valour, against Vitiges King of the Gothes; whom Belisarius at last took prisoner. After this victory Iustinian recalled Belisarius, to employ him against the Persians, which was the occasion that Italie againe fell into the hands of the Gothes, particularly Rome, which by Totila was burnt and destroyed: and that for no other defect, but for that it could not be relieued by Belisarius, who then was sick. Who as soone as he had recouered his health, tooke it againe from the Barbarians. And returning to Constantinople, the state of Italie was very happily gouerned by Narses an Eunuch. Inwhich time Iustinian hauing applied himselfe to reforme and abbridge the Lawes; when he had raigned nine and thirtie yeeres, departed this life, no lesse replenished with yeeres then full of glory.

After the death of IVSTINVS, IVSTINIANVS was without any contradiction receiued and obeyed for Emperor; being of the age of foure and fortie yeers. He was a powerfull and a good Prince, and such a one, as might well be compared with the best in antient time, for his good gouernement, both in peace and warre. The warres and conquests which hapned in his time (which was little lesse then fortie yeeres) were so many, and so noble, that I cannot expresse the same as I would, and they deserue; following my accustomed breuitie. I will therefore write as I may; notwithstanding that the length of the time, and the variety of accidents, will compell me to exceede my prefixed limits.

The beginning of the warre betweene the Emperor Iustinian and the Persians.

As soone as IVSTINIANVS saw himselfe confirmed in the Empire, he was not contented to preserue that which he inherited from his Vncle; but (bearing the minde and hauing the iudgement of an antient and good Emperour) he began to desire, and therewith to practise, to enlarge the Empire, and to reduce the same (if it were possible) to the antient majestie and dignitie. The first occasion of warres that was offered, was against the Persians; who in the time of his predecessors, had broken and violated the peace, inuaded the bounds of the Romane Empire, and vsurped certaine countries and Prouinces thereof: in so much (as PROCOPIVS writeth) that for the space of fiftie yeers before the raigne of IVSTINIAN, in all the wars the Imperialists commonly had the worst, and all conclusions of peace were made to the aduantage of the Persians.

The cause of this warre betweene the Emperor IVSTINIAN, and CAVADAS King of Persia, was in truth the emulation and hatred which these two Empires, and the Lords thereof, had of antient time borne, and still did beare the one against the other, which was continually nourished and increased, as by that which we haue written may plainely appeare. But the occasion and principall cause was this, IVSTINIANVS, as soone as he was Emperour, sent BELISARIVS, an excellent Captaine, into those frontiers, with direction, in a certaine citie, which was on the borders of Persia, to build the strongest and most inexpugnable Castle that could be deuised, for that Citie was one of the entries and passages of greatest importance: which order BELISARIVS presently put in execution. Whereof when CAVADAS was aduertised, he was highly offended, and presently sent Captaines and men of warre, to require BELISARIVS to giue ouer the worke, which if he would not doe; that then they should throw down what he had built.

These men being come to the place where this Castle was a building, there passed many words, and some deedes betweene them: and for as much as the builders were not of force sufficient to make resistance against the Persians, the Emperor sent thither two Captaines, brothers, with some companies of souldiers. These being arriued, and the Imperialists persisting in their building, and the Persians in hindering the same, they came to fight a battaile, wherin the Imperialists being fewer in number, were by the Persians defeated and ouerthrown, and many were slaine, others were carried away captiues, and the building was laid leuell with the earth. When IVSTINIAN vnderstood of this ouerthrow, he presently made BELISARIVS Generall of all his forces in the East; who as a wise and valiant man, with all expedition raised a very mightie Armie; and taking to him another Captain cald HERMOGENES (whom the Emperor with a good supplie had sent vnto him) he took his way towards the Citie of Dura, in Mesopotamia, which at that time was the frontier of the Persians; where began a cruell warre betweene between the one and the other Nation. But as IVSTINIAN, seeking to imploy his time in recouering some other Prouinces which the Empire had lost, desired peace with the Persians, he sent an Ambassador called RVFINVS, to CAVADAS King of Persia, to treat of a peace (if vpon honourable conditions it might be concluded).

This Ambassador being comn into the Borders where the King was, before that hee was to come to his Court certain motions were made of peace: and as they treated thereof, the Imperiall Generals were giuen to vnderstand, that the Persian Army came to seek them, and was within half a daies journey, and had for Generall thereof a great man called PEROZAS, who was a Mirranes; which was the name of a Magistrate, of great dignity and authority in Persia. Whereupon BELISARIVS set his troops in order; and the two Camps came to lodge neer one to the other: and so they continued the space of two or three daies, ranging themselues euery day in order of battell; either partie expecting when the other should charge. Vpon one of those daies certain Archers of the one and other side beganne to skirmish: whereupon, the squadrons moued and brake the one vpon the other; and fought in such manner, that it was a very cruell and a bloudy battell, which lasted till neer night: wherein the Romans in the right wing had the worse, and the better in the left; and euery Captain did his best to obtain the victory: but in the end the Romans preuailed, and made great slaughter of their enemies; and PEROZAS the Mirranes escaped by flight.

Perozas, Generall for the King of Persia.

A battell with the Persians, wherein Belizarius had the victory.

BELIZARIVS, hauing obtained this notable victory, within fewe daies after recouered some places in Mesopotamia, which the Persians had vsurped; wherein also passed sundry doubtfull conflicts and encounters. In the Kingdome of Armenia, wherein the Persians held many places, SITTAS being Generall, and DOROTHEVS Pretor, the warres were followed with the like good fortune; and the Imperiall Army, obtaining victory, recouered most part of what was lost. The wars standing in these tearms, and kindled euery where, RVFINVS (who we said went Ambassador to the King of Persia) vpon safe conduct came to his Court, and had many treaties and discourses with him; but no peace could bee concluded: and CAVADAS, resoluing to prosecute the warres anew, to bee satisfied for the losses which his people had receiued; by the counsell of ALAMANDER, a valiant ould Captain of his (who in times past had gotten many victories against the Romans) he made EZARETHA, Generall of his Armie, a man both valiant and of great experience, and a Persian born. With whom, BELISARIVS, together with SITTAS the other Generall, after some encounters, came to a battell; which was one of the cruellest and greatest of all that hapned in those wars.

Sittas, Generall for Iustinian in Armenia, ouercam the Persians.

Ezaretha, Generall of the Persians.

This battell was fought neer to the Riuer Euphrates, and much against the opinion of BELISARIVS; who, knowing that the enemie had the aduantage, would not haue fought: but his troops against his will prepared themselues. Whereupon he, seeing their resolution, marshald and encouraged them against the Persians, which were already in order. And the fight began with so great fury and obstinacie on both sides, that for the greatest part of the day it appeared not whether party should haue the victory; vntill such time as the Imperialists, being vnable any longer to endure the toil therof, for they were fasting, being Easter Euen (Christians of our Age may see how inuiolably fasting daies were obserued in those times) they disbanded, and began to scatter. Whereupon the Persian horsemen charged BELIZARIVS his horse-troops with such force, that the Romans brake, and began to flee, and the like did the other squadrons of foot. Which when BELIZARIVS perceiued, after that hee had vsed all means to stay them, and to haue renewed the Fight, and could not preuail, hee alighted from his horse, and placed himself in a squadron of footmen, which kept together whole and vnbroken; and, encouraging them with his presence, they all resolued rather to dy than to be ouerthrowne. And EZARETHA and the Persians, which followed the chace of those which fled, seeing that squadron to remain whole, returned with great fury, thinking easily to haue had the execution of them: but they failed of their purpose, for they kept themselues so close together, that they could not be broken; and fought so valiantly, that they did the Persians more harm than they receiued from them; and so til night held their ground, and kept themselues in such order, that EZARETHA and his men were fain to leaue them: but they had the ransacking of their tents, and so returned to their Camp. BELISARIVS in very good order withdrew himself to a little Iland, which the riuer Euphrates maketh in that place; whither the greatest parr of his souldiers which fled, were already retired. And there the next day he again set himself in order, and gathered together his souldiers: but the Persians, houlding themselues for victorious, had the spoil of the Field. After this journey EZARETHA remoued his Camp to another quarter: for, for, there hee had receiued greater losse than BELISARIVS; insomuch that CAVADAS King of Persia, vnderstanding what number of men were lost in that battell, held not himselfe content, nor for well serued in that victory. And dying shortly after, his sonne COSROBS succeeded him in his Kingdome: with whom, after many embassies and treaties, a peace was concluded; and BELISARIVS reconquered other Countries, which other nations held in the East. Thus much honoured and victorious, being sent for by the Emperor IVSTINIAN for the warres in Africa, SITTAS remaining Generall, he came to Constantinople; where he was receiued in triumph with great solemnity.

Cauadas King of Persia dying, his son Cosroes succeeded.

This being past, within fewe daies after there fell so great an vprore and tumult in the City of Constantinople, that it was likely to haue gone ill with IVSTINIANVS: for, this tumult in the beginning, growing from the factions of the common people, came to that point, that IPATIVS and POMPEY brethren, the chief men of that City, with the fauour of the people which took their part, they being the Emperor ANASTASIVS sisters sonnes, rebelled against IVSTINIAN; and IPATIVS took the Ensignes and name of Emperor: and the warre was so cruell within the City, that 30 thousand persons were slain. But in the end IPATIVS was taken and slain, and IVSTINIAN's troops remained victors: wherein BELISARIVS did him great seruice aboue all others. Afterwards (punishing such as were offenders, and confisking their goods) the conspiracies and troubles were all appeased; and IVSTINIAN liued more in peace, and in better estimation, than euer before. But soon after followed the wars of Africa; the occasion whereof grew through the dissension between GENSERICVS his nephews, the first King of the Vandals that euer raigned in Africa, which hapned after this manner: YLDERICVS, one of the nephewes of GENSERICVS, succeeding in that Kingdome, beeing in contention with another who was his cosin germane, and nephew also to GENSERICVS, whose name was GILIMER: both which pretended to haue title to the Kingdome, vpon what occasion for breuity I will omit; This YLDERICVS grew to be so negligent, that GILIMER (who was both wise and valiant) took him prisoner, and against all reason made himself King and Lord of all Africa; vnder this title, that the other was vncapable and insufficient for the gouernment. Wherewith the Emperor IVSTINIAN was very much displeased: for before that he was Emperor he held friendship with YLDERICVS, who was now depriued of his Kingdome. Whereupon, after that he had required GILIMER by his Ambassadours to render the Kingdome to his cousin YLDERICVS, which he refused to perform, hee resolued to make a conquest of the Kingdomes of Africa, and rigged a mighty Nauy, and sent his Noble Generall BELISARIVS vpon that seruice; and to that effect commanded a great army to be leuied: with which BELISARIVS embarking himself, accompanied with many excellent Captains in fiue hundred sail of ships, and fourescore and twelue Gallies, hee began his voiage towards Africa. Wherein, a great man born in that Countrey, whose name was PRVDENTIVS, had taken Arms against GILIMER in the City of Tripoli, on the behalfe of the Emperor IVSTINIAN; and another Captain in Sardinia, whose name was GODAS, had done the like. So as when BELISARIVS arriued in Africa, hee found some which took his part: and hauing landed his Army neer to a City called Tittimuth, marching along the seacoast he took his way towards Carthage: and his Nauy did the like by Sea.

A great tumult in Constantinople

Ipatius rebelled in Constantinople, and was slain by Iustinian.

The occasion of the conquest of Africa against Gilimer, King thereof.

Belisarius went to the wars of Africa.

When the Tyrant-king GILIMER vnderstood of the coming of BELISARIVS, with the Army which he had in readinesse he departed from that City wherein he first intituled himself King, and sent commandement to his brother called AMATA, whom hee left in Carthage for the guard of the City, and of YLDERICVS the deposed King, that hee should presently kil him, and such other prisoners as were in his power; and then with his whole force he should sallie out, and take the Field against BELISARIVS, and at a certain time appointed should fight with him; for that he at the same Instant would charge him in the Arreregard. Hee sent another Captain all the day long to trouble him on the one side, and to tire his people with continuall alarms. To be brief, there passed many things in that journey worthy to bee noted: and, coming neer to the City of Carthage, AMATA, beginning to fight at such time as his brother had appointed, was slain by BELISARIVS his Vaunguard: And GILIMER, without hauing intelligence thereof, with his troops so resolutely charged in the Arereguard, that the Imperialists began to retire in such manner, that if GILIMER had not made an Alt (as PROCOPIVS affirms) that day he had gotten the victory. But when it was told him that his brother was dead, he caused his troops to stand. And BELISARIVS his souldiers, vnderstanding of the good successe of their Auantguard, which was farre before them, being by him animated and and encouraged, returned to fight with such fury, that GILIMER was wholly ouerthrowne and scattered, and many of his people slain, and hee by flight saued his life; and his souldiers, which escaped from the battell, straggled into diuerse parts: vpon which, greater execution had been done, if night had not ouertaken them.

A battel wherein king Gilimer was ouerthrown

The next day after this battell, BELISARIVS marched with his Armie towards the City of Carthage; where hee arriued in the euening, and found no resistance; for, they opened their ports, and made great lights to haue receiued him: but he would not by night come into an enemies City, leauing it vntill the next day, and then entred with great quietnes, without any spoil or murder committed by any of his souldiers; he hauing so commanded: for, his authority and reputation was such, that no man durst doo the contrary. The Vandals, which were in Carthage, withdrew themselues to the Temples and Churches; and BELIZARIVS, granting them their liues, commanded them to come forth vpon his word, which hee held inuiolably. Possessing himself of that City, he commanded the wals thereof to be repaired, which were in many places decaied; which was the occasion why GILIMER did not retire thither: BELISARIVS, being in Carthage, sent a Poste, a chief Captain called SALOMON, to the Emperor IVSTINIAN, to giue him to vnderstand of all that had passed. And GILIMER, who escaped from the battell, recouered certain fields of Getulia, called Bulla, which are foure dayes march from Carthage: where (as a man no way dismaied) he gathered together his troops that were scattered, and leuied others: and he also sent in great haste to recall his brother ZAZON, who then was in Sardinia; whither he had sent him against GODAS, which (as wee said) was in Arms in that Iland against GILIMER: whom ZAZON had ouerthrowne and slain, and recouered the Ile. But ZAZON, seeing the message from his brother, left all, and came with his forces to joyn with him. GILIMER, after that his brother was comn, hauing recouered a sufficient Army, took his way towards Carthage to besiege BELISARIVS, or to giue him battell if he would come forth and fight: but BELIZARIVS for certain daies would not take the Field, vntill he had throughly repaired the walles of the City, and taken order for the rest. Which being done, he took the Field with his Armie; drawing neer to GILIMER, who attended his coming.

Belisarius entred Carthage with victory.

Zazon, brother to king Gilimer came to his aid with succour.

The next day one Army hauing sight of the other, each of the Commanders set his people in order: and the Fight on either side began with such fury, that in the first charge ZAZON, GILIMER's brother, was slain, and certain other principall men of the Vandals; which strook such a feare among them, that they began to faint: and BELISARIVS charging with his squadron, they turned their backs, and fled to their Camp, which they had very well fortified; and GILIMER, vnable to stay them, did the like. BELIZARIVS, gathering together his forces both of foot and horse, the very same day in the euening made towards GILIMER's Camp, with intent to haue assaulted it, and to haue made a compleat victory. When King GILIMER saw the battailions march, knowing that he was not able to defend himself, with some few seruants which followed him he fled: and BELISARIVS with little resistance, by reason of the Kings absence, got their Camp: his souldiers, putting to the sword all they found were able to bear Arms, took all the women and children captiues; and in the Camp they found an infinite quantity of gold, siluer, money and jewels: Which (as PROCOPIVS affirms) was one of the greatest and richest spoils that euer was seen or taken. For, the Vandals, hauing no place or refuge which they accounted safe, carried their gold, siluer, money, and all their treasure, with them: so as within one houre they lost all they had stolne and gotten together in Africa in 95 yeers. For, so long had they been in possession thereof.

The second battell and victory obtained by Belisarius against Gilimer.

The Vandals held Africa 95 yeers.

The next day, BELISARIVS, to let slip no occasion, dispatched an excellent Captain called IOHN, with a good troop of horse to pursue GILIMER; he himself purposing to do the like. And, leauing good order for all things in Carthage, and a sufficient garrison, hee followed with some of the choice men of his Armie. King GILIMER, riding without any stay, retired himself into certain inaccessible mountains and rocks in the Prouince of Numidia, called Papua; inhabited by a people called Mauritij, who were great friends to the Vandals. But before hee came thither, he was in danger to haue been taken by IOHN; and he escaped out of his hands when he was very neer vnto him. But it was his ill hap that one of his souldiers, shooting at a bird, and missing it, slue his Captain; who, being shot through the throat, fell down dead: and by that mean had GILIMER oportunity to escape, and to take the rocks & mountains; where he staid not long ere BELISARIVS came. But forasmuch as it seemed a long work to take those rocks where GILIMER was, by force; he left one PHARAS a Captain with sufficient forces forces to compasse-in GILIMER; so as by no meanes hee could escape. And hee with the rest of the troupes returned to Carthage, and in his going and comming, tooke many Townes; and much people, with great ioy and contentment came to doe him seruice, glad to see themselues freed from so great seruitude, and so restored to the libertie of the Empire.

Gilimer besieg'd by Pharas.

Being come to Carthage, for the full accomplishment of his victorie, he sent a Captaine to take the Ile of Sardinia, and sent other Captaines into Mauritania, and into diuers other parts, in all which he had most happy successe: for the Vandales in all places (for the most part) were ill beloued. So as in little more then foure moneths, BELISARIVS reconquered all Africa, after that the Empire had lost the same the space of fourescore and sixteene yeeres. And truely it was a wonderfull thing: for all that people were Arrian hereticks, and for such the same IVSTINIAN recordeth them, in his booke de officio Pretoris: wherein although that he not therefore gainsay the ninety and six, as I haue reported: for that was written nine yeers afterwards, and he speaketh according to the day of the making of that law. But the truth is, that they possessed Africa but ninetie six yeeres. PHARAS, which remained behinde, to besiege King GILIMER, begirt him in on euery side, in such manner, that GILIMER seeing no other remedie, after many letters which past betweene them, yeelded himselfe vpon securitie of his life: which assurance BELISARIVS sent vnto him, and to certaine his kinsemen which were with him. And PHARAS as soone as he had him in his possession, came with him to Carthage to BELISARIVS, who entertained him very honorably. And so BELISARIVS ended his victories and enterprises: which truely was an admirable thing, and worthie of great consideration, if we call to minde the valour and power of those Vandales, and the great victories which they had obtained against the Romanes, of which we haue touched some. BELISARIVS presently sent to giue the Emperor IVSTINIAN notice of the successe and issue of the warres, and to intreate him to giue him leaue to make his repaire vnto him, and so bring GILIMER with him. Whereto IVSTINIAN answered, that he should doe therein what best pleased him, either to continue in the gouernment of Africa, or to repaire to him at his pleasure. But BELISARIVS to cleere himselfe of certaine whispering mutterings, vnjustly raised against him, chose rather to goe to Constantinople, and left SALOMON before named for Generall and Gouernor of Africa, with a good part of his Armie; who afterwards had wars with the Mauruſij; which rebelled, and he subdued, although with great danger and trouble.

Belisarius conquered all Africa in little more then foure moneths, which had been held by the Vandales ninety six yeers.

BELISARIVS followed his iourney, leading with him the King and many of his kindred, men and women prisoners, with infinite iewels, treasure and riches, which was the greatest and best part of all that the Vandales had stolne from Rome, Spaine, Africa, and other Prouinces, in almost a hundred yeers before. Being come to Constantinople, the Emperour commanded him to be receiued in triumph, with all the ceremonies and solemnities, which the Romane Consuls in old time, and the Emperors afterwards triumphed in Rome.

Belisarius his triumph.

The Historie of IVSTINIAN must of necessitie be longer then that of many other Emperors; as well for that he raigned a long time, as also for that the accidents which hapned in his time, were great and famous, and the feates of Armes done in that time, noble and excellent: wherefore it shall not be fit to forbeare to make mention thereof. I doe also know, and (as I thinke) haue said it, that Readers take pleasure in reading of great battailes, strange aduentures, conquests of countries, and alterations of Kingdomes and estates: wherefore the Historie of peaceable Princes, and of happy times, without warres and disasters, are nothing so pleasing, as are those which treate of slaughters, ruines of estates, alterations of kingdomes, notable victories, insurrections, factions, tumults, rebellions, and finally great accidents whether good or euill: for which reason fabulous bookes are read, and doe commonly giue content, for that they kill and cut in peeces thousands of men, batter Cities, and faine things in a manner impossible. Herein, following the aduice of HORACE, I haue determined to take care as well to please, as to profit the Reader (when I may) with the truth; relating sometimes the great deeds of Armes, without concealing the examples of peace also, and the good conditions and vertues of peaceable and milde Princes, reprouing and condemning vice and sinne, by detesting and abhorring those which committed the same; for to that end Historie are written, and are to be read; that reading vicious and wicked actions, the Readers may flie them, and follow those which are good and vertuous. And by the variable aduentures and accidents may become more

But returning to our purpose, BELISARIVS rested not long in Constantinople, before that IVSTINIAN gaue him the charge of the warres, and conquest of Italie, and Sicilie, against the Gothes, and THEODATVS who at that time was Lord thereof: which enterprise was held to be of no lesse importance and danger, than that of Africa: and the successe thereof shewed it afterwards to be far greater, in regard of the great battels and slaughters which followed.

The beginning of this war (briefly) was such, as in the end of the life of the Emperor IVSTIN was by vs related. For, the great and redoubted King THEODORICVS being dead, his Nephew ATHALARICVS (for that he had no sonne) succeeded him in the Kingdome of Italie, being of the age of eight yeers. Wherefore his mother AMALASVNTA had the gouernment of the Kingdom; who began to rule with infinite wisdome, and to bring-vp her sonne in vertuous exercises, and in the study of learning and good letters. But it was not long before that contentions and factions arose between her and her sonnes kinred; and particularly the malice and enuy grew betweene her and THEODATVS, cosin-germane to ATHALARICVS. Whereupon she, seeing her self oppressed, gaue the charge of the bringing vp of her son to certain principall men of them: and, leauing Rome, she came to Rauenna, where she still had great authority in the gouernment. The enmity increasing betweene her and THEODATVS, who was a man of great power, and openly had made himselfe Lord of the Prouince of Tuscane; either of them, to weet, AMALASVNTA and THEODATVS, sought the friendship and assistance of the Emperor IVSTINIAN, and promised to giue him entrance into Italy.

As matters stood on these tearms, the yong King ATHALARICVS died; wherewith AMALASVNTA was greatly troubled and very hartily sorrie, for that she was a widow enuied, and ill-beloued of the chief men among the Gothes. Afterwards, studying what course was best to be taken, she resolued to come to an agreement with THEODATVS, and to make him King of Italy; perswading her self, that he for so great a benefit could not chuse but be her faithfull friend; and that she should still hold the authority, and he the name and title of King. She hauing resolued heerupon, procured certain treaties and a meeting to be had: where, after long discourse and great promises, bound with solemn othes, made by the one and other party, shee proclaimed him King of Italie; and he ioyning his power with her forces (which were greater than his) without difficulty obtained the Kingdome, and all men obeyed him. But this deuice proued ill with AMALASVNTA, neither was it any sound course for her: for, as soon as THEODATVS saw himself an absolute Lord, and in possession, he began to rule, little to her liking; and within fewe daies commanded her to be apprehended, and in the end to bee put to death, like an ingratefull and wicked Christian.

Theodatus, vncle to Athalaricus, procured the kingdom of Italie for himself.

Theodatus apprehended Amalasiunta, and caused her to be slaine.

IVSTINIAN being aduertised hereof, was highly displeased (for hee tooke part with AMALASVNTA) and detesting so vile a fact, holding this for a good occasion, through the desire which he had to recouer Italy to the Empire, hee resolued suddenly to make open warre against THEODATVS, in hope to make a conquest thereof by armes, which before he sought by wiles and secret practices. And to that effect hee chose BELISARIVS for General of his armie, who then came triumphing and victorious from Africa. IVSTINIAN at that time had an Ambassadour in Italy, called PETER, who went thither to treat of peace betweene AMALASVNTA and THEODATVS, with whom THEODATVS laboured to come to some conditions of peace, for hee greatly feared the power of IVSTINIAN: and whilest that hee was busie hereabouts, BELISARIVS arriued with a Nauie and an armie in Sicilia, for that hee held it expedient first to take that Iland: and suddenly landing his men, hee presently took the citie of Catania, and within few daies after marched towards Sarragossa, and with the like fortune entred, and tooke the same, and did the like by many other townes and cities.

Then hee marched to Palermo, where he found greater force and resistance, for it defended it selfe certaine daies, and many men were slaine of both sides: but those which were within it fearing their ruine, yeelded themselues to BELISARIVS, and so did all the rest of the Iland. Such was his expedition and good hap in the warres. And so as much as hee (for his fame) was greatly feared, THEODATVS seeing what had hapned in Sicilia, standing in feare of him, treated with this Ambassadour PETER concerning certain conditions of peace, wherein he renounced his right to Sicilia: and that in Italie in all decrees & proclamations to be made IVSTINIAN should be first named, and that euery yeer THEODATVS should send him a golden crown, in token of subiection, and other things which Procopius setteth down at large.

Peter being gone with this message, fear so much increased in Theodatvs, that hee sent vpon the way to recall the Ambassador which he had sent with Peter, whose name was Rvstic vs; and made him to sweare, that hee should not reueal his resolution vntill that he came into the presence of the Emperor, and saw whether hee would accept of the first offer or no; and if he did not, that then he should offer the whole Kingdom of Italie to Ivstinian, vpon condition that he should giue him some lands and possessions in Gracia or else where, to liue in. And to that effect he wrote a notable Letter to the Emperor, with his owne hand. When Ivstinian had heard the first offer made by Theodatvs; as hee was a valiant Prince, and of an hautie courage, he would not accept thereof: whereupon, the Ambassador discouered the second, wherein he offered him Italie: wherewith hee was exceeding glad, and wrote a gratious Letter to Theodatvs, and therwith sent Ambassadors to confirm the agreement; and to command Belisarivs, that, making an end in Sicilia, he should passe ouer into Italie, and possesse himself of the forces thereof: but the accord was not so concluded. For, in the meantime that these Ambassadors went and came, Theodatvs his Captains had obtained a notable victory, and had slain Mvndvs and his son Mavricivs, who were Ivstinian's Captains in Slauonia, and had defeated the Imperiall Armie.

Theodatus ofereen to render the kingdom of Italie into the hands of Iustinian.

Theodatus refused to perform his promise

By reason of his victory, Theodatvs grew so proud, that hee not onely refused to accompliss what he had offered; but, fayning himself much displeased with some speeches vsed to him by Ivstinian's Ambassadors, he caused them to be apprehended. This also increased his presumption: for, at that instant Belisarivs was gone out of Sicilia into Africa to rescue Salomon, whom hee had left there. For, a Captain called Estorzas mutined with the greatest part of the Army; and, making himself Lord of the Country, put to death the Iudges and Gouerners thereof. But Belisarivs, arriuing in Africa, took such order, that within very fewe daies he ouercame them in battell, and vsed extreme punishment in the Country; and so, leauing all in peace and quiet, returned into Italie, the affairs whereof he found in such estate as is before said.

The Sunne gaue very little light for the space of almost a yeer.

At this time (as Procopivs writeth) there was seen so prodigious a sight in the Sun, that the like hath neuer been heard of: which was, that the greatest part of one whole yeer the Sun gaue so little light, that it was but equall or little more than the light of the Moon; the sky being cleer and without clouds, or any other thing to shadow the same. And so, without any apparant occasion, it was obscured all that time: which, as it was afterwards conjectured, was the occasion of the famin and want of grain, which generally ensued through all the world, and did prognosticate the wars and effusion of bloud which followed in Italie.

Ivstinian, seeing the inconstancy of Theodatvs, and being greatly displeased with the death of his Captains in Dalmatia, and the imprisonment of his Ambassadors in Italie, with great wisdome, and the courage and resolution of a worthy Prince, prouiding for both occasions, sent into Dalmatia and Slauonia for his Generall, a valiant Captain called Constantivs; who recouered much of that which was lost, and renewed the warre in that part. And, as for the affairs of Italie, he commanded Belisarivs speedily to enter it with the greatest power he could. Who, with his accustomed expedition and courage, left, in the fortresses and strong holds of Sicilia, such garrisons as he thought good, and transported his Army into Italie at the streight of Messina, and began to seise on the places and towns neer the sea-side, not finding any Army to hinder him; and so he conquered all the Coast to the City of Naples: wherin Theodatvs had put a great garrison of Gothes, who valiantly defended the same. Where passed many conflicts: and the Besieged sent secretly to craue relief, but in vain; for, in the end they were taken by force, and the souldiers had great spoil, and made great slaughter of the Gothes. But Belisarivs, the next day assembling his Armie, took such order with the souldiers, that they set all the Inhabitants of the City at liberty, and restored to them the greatest part of the goods which were taken from them; contenting themselues with the spoile of their enemies onely, sparing the citizens: to whom they protested, that the cause of their coming was, To set them at liberty. Great was the fear which the taking of Naples strake into the Gothes: for, they held it impregnable. Wherefore all the chief men and Captains amongst them, seeing the small prouision that Theodatvs made, and assuring them that Belisarivs would not continue long in Naples before he came to Rome; One inuiting another, they mette at a place neer vnto it; and, after long debating and consultation vpon the matter, they did chuse a wife and valiant Captain for their King, who by name was called Vitiges, to to the end that he should presently take order for the leuying of men of war, and the defense of the countrie against Belisarivs. Which which when Theodatvs vnderstood, who then was in Rome, holding himselfe to be in no securitie, he fled thence towards Rauenna: but he was ouertaken vpon the way by a Captain called Optares, whom Vitiges sent to pursue him; and so was slaine by his commandement, when he had raigned three yeeres King of Italy. Theodatvs being dead, Vitiges called a councell: and being of opinion that he had not power sufficient to attend Belisarivs in Rome, neither to sally forth to fight with him in the fields, resolued to goe to Rauenna, and there raising sufficient forces, returne to giue him battaile. And he was the rather induced thereto, for that he stood in doubt of the French, which had declared themselues for the Emperour. Being thus resolued, he left for gouernour of Rome a Captain whose name was Baderes, with fower thousand mercenarie souldiers in garrison: and encouraging the citizens to defend themselues, he tooke his way towards Rauenna.

Theodatus slaine by the commandement of Vitiges.

Belisarivs, leauing a good guard and garrison in Naples, marched with his Armie towards Rome; where the inhabitants knowing of his comming, resolued that they would not stand vpon their defence, but opened the ports & let him in: and they so agreed together, as the Gothes could not hinder it, but held it their best course to be gone. And it so hapned, that in one day, and at one instant, Belisarivs entred at one port, and they sallied out at another. Who after that he had made a most excellent speech to the Senate, and encouraged them to embrace their libertie, he presently applied himselfe to repaire the walles and to fortifie the citie; bringing in victuals and prouision from all parts: For all the countrie round about was at commandement.

Belisarius entred Rome.

In the meane while, the new King Vitiges, (who was neither idle, nor a coward) left nothing vndone that might encrease his power against Belisarivs. First he concluded a peace with the King of France, to the end he should not bee his aduersarie, and gaue him those lands which Theodoricvs held in France, thereby to be the better assured of his friendship: and sending for his ordinarie captaines and souldiers which he vsually held in France, hee commanded them to come and ioyne with him. And from Germanie and other parts he procured all the aide he possibly could. Finally, he vsed such meanes, as hee raised in Rauenna, and the marches thereof, one hundred and fiftie thousand men, of foote and horse; good souldiers, and the most of them very well armed.

Vitiges leuied an Armie of 150000 men of foote and horse.

With this Armie he began to march towards Rome, wherein Belisarivs was; but not with any such force as might suffice to take the field, or to fight with so great an enemie. Whereupon King Vitiges (nothing doubting of the victorie) grew so proud, as he not onely tooke care that Belisarivs should not flie and abandon Italie, but by the way he euer asked, whether Belisarivs were fled or no: and reioyced infinitly when it was told him that he fortified himselfe in Rome; and that it seemed, he meant to abide his comming. But the valiant Belisarivs was farre from that which Vitiges supposed, for he was resolued rather to die, then to abandon what he had gotten. But seeing his small power, in respect of his aduersarie, he sent to Blessvs and Constantianvs, Captaines which hee had sent into those marches, that they should presently returne to Rome with their troupes, where hee was with his, and had fortified and furnished the citie; with a resolution to defend the same, and to stoppe the enemie, if he purposed to goe forwards, to recouer what he had gotten in Campania, Pulia, and Calabria. But Vitiges held on his way directly towards Rome, imagining that it could not be held: and at his arriuall there happened so great an accident, that although I know it will somewhat detaine me, yet I will describe it.

Belisarivs, at a bridge ouer the riuer Tiber, about a mile from Rome where Vitiges should passe, had caused two very strong towers to bee built, and placed therein a very good guard to entertain the enemie: but Vitiges being comn with his Armie, those that had the guard at the bridge, one night were in such fear, that without any fight they presently gaue vp the place; and the same night Vitiges began to passe ouer a great part of his Army. The next morning, Belisarivs, suspecting no such matter, sallied forth of Rome with a thousand choice horse, and came towards the bridge, to the end to chuse a fit place to lodge his people, for the defense and stopping of the passage: but, being comn somewhat neer vnto it, he suddenly met with Vitiges men-at-Armes, who that night had past the riuer by the bridge: wherewith Belisarivs was so much despited (imagining the guarders of the bridge to be lost) that with lesse discretion than he ought, hee charged Vitiges men with so so great rage and fury, that there followed a cruell Fight; so as VITIGES his Vauntguard retired to the battailion wherein he himself was: whence hee charged with so great a troop of Gothes, that BELISARIVS his company was held for lost; and hee in his owne person did wonders, slaying and wounding many of his enemies; and charged so farre in amongst them, that all Authors which write thereof affirm, that he discharged the part of an excellent man at Arms, but not of a good and discreet Generall. For, he put his person in such danger, that hee was held for dead; and so it was presently reported in Rome by some of his people which fled. He being in this distresse, wherein he lost many of his friends and seruants, being vnable any longer to maintain the Fight, his people began to retire a main gallop, and he did the like, after they had slain 1000 of the Gothes. And many of VITIGES his horsemen pursued them euen to the very gates of Rome, which were shut: and those which held the guard there would not open them, fearing to let in the enemie. And for that with the noise and callings, they knew not BELISARIVS by his voice, whom they accounted for dead; he, hauing fought the greatest part of the day, was driuen to lean to the wall; and, ranging his souldiers into a squadron, made head against the enemie, and so continued fighting, without any meat or sustenance, till it was night: in the which he did a valiant, though a dangerous and desperate, exploit; which was, that he charged the Gothes with such fury, that they all beleeued (through the darknes of the night) that great troops had sallied forth of the City: and in this doubt they began to retire towards their Camp, BELISARIVS still charging them in the arieregard, til he found a free place, and then returned; and, coming to the Port, was knowne and receiued into the city with his people, although many, fewer in number than they sallied. And so he escaped this perilous conflict, with a great number of arrows sticking in his horse & armor; and had some blowes and cuts with the sword, but none of them toucht his flesh: which was held for a wonder by those which saw in how great danger he had been.

A desperate attempt.

The next day VITIGES arriued, and ouerran the fields of Rome; and, being vnable to besiege the City round on euery side, by reason of the greatnes thereof, hee diuiding his Armie, inuested it with six Camps: and forasmuch as it would be too long to recite the conflicts which passed in that siege, they were so great and strange, I will leaue them all. Onely let this suffice, to vnderstand, that it was one of the most terrible and bloudy sieges that euer was before any city: for, it continued one whole yeer and nine daies; and the first seuen moneths of that time, VITIGES and his Gothes (who were valiant men) neuer ceased to batter and assault the City on all parts; where they did and receiued much hurt. And BELISARIVS and his people neuer suffred their aduersaries to rest, neither forbare to sallie forth and to fight with them in field; so as in skirmishes and sallies Writers affirm, that they slue aboue 40000 of the Gothes: in which time he did maruels in Arms, aswell for valour and hardinesse, as for wisdome and policie, as an excellent Captain.

Rome terribly besieged and assaulted by the Gothes.

Vitiges besieg'd Rome.

The Emperour IVSTINIAN was not careless of this siege, but sent reliefe and succor both of men and munition to BELISARIVS; and supplied him with certaine Captains and companies of horse and foote, with corne and other victualls, which without great trouble and daunger could not come to Rome. But this was not so sufficient, but that they endured extreme famine. Yet that not withstanding, he managed things so wisely and valiantly, as VITIGES seeing himselfe and his Armie tired, and weakned, sought to make a truce with him, which was concluded for three moneths: but it continued not so long, for VITIGES through the cunning and treacheric of some, demanded to haue leaue to come in, and to see the citie, within the time of the truce: whereupon the warres were renewed. And BALISARIVS sent commandement to a Captain of his called IOHN, who was Marshall of his Armie, that he should make cruell warres in the marches of Rauenna, whither he had sent him with aboue two thousand horse, and certaine other souldiers before the time of the truce, imagining that he harrying that quarter, VITIGES would rise from before Rome. This Captain sped so well in his enterprise, as he took the citie of Arimino, and other places. And VITIGES standing in feare to lose Rauenna, raised his siege from before Rome, and returned to defend the rest. But in his retreit BELISARIVS charged him so furiously in the arieruguard, as he slew a great number of his men. And so with shame, dishonor, and losse of his forces, VITIGES returned to the countrie of Rauenna, and very resolutely besieged Arimino, wherein this Captaine IOHN was.

Rome hardly besieged.

Vitiges took truce with Belisarius for three monthes.

Vitiges raised his siege from before Rome.

BELISARIVS, to auoid losse of time, leuying such forces as hee could get, staied not any longer: but whil'st he went to Naples, and fortified that City, he then presently took his way towards the city of Rauenna: and so the warres were renewed in diuerse parts of Italie. And to to BELISARIVS came a Captain sent by IVSTINIAN, called NARSES, an Eunuch, with a great supply of souldiers. This NARSES afterwards was Generall, and an excellent man: with whom, and those which he had already, BELISARIVS relieued IOHN, who was besieged in Arimino; and with some losse of men constrained VITIGES to raise his siege. Before and after which, in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lombardy, Milan, Bergama, Nauarra, and other Cities, took part with BELISARIVS; whither hee sent some Captains, and there followed great conflicts and battels, as well with the Gothes, as with THEODOBERTVS King of France, who came with a resolution to haue made himself Lord of that Country, while they were busied in these wars. BELISARIVS, after many great aduentures, fought a battell with VITIGES, who had drawn together his whole power to that end. And, to vse breuitie, BELISARIVS getting the victory, VITIGES, fleeing to Rauenna, was therein besieged: which siege lasted many daies, and there were many treaties of the one and the other side; so far forth, as to offer to make BELISARIVS King of Italie. But hee continuing his siege, and the Citie being taken, VITIGES was deliuered into his hands, with whom in a manner all Italie came vnder his obedience.

Narses sent by the Emperor to the aid of Belisarius.

The affairs of Italy standing in this estate, by the commandement of IVSTINIAN, BELISARIVS was to depart from Italy (which he ought not to haue done): for, the Emperor meant to imploy his person in his wars against the Persians, leauing Italy in subjection; although that afterwards through his absence there followed great alterations & combustions. For, although that IOHN, BESA and VITALIS (all valiant men, and of great esteem) remain'd for Commanders and Gouerners in his place, yet there was no comparison between them and him: for, he was a most excellent Captain. This great Captain BELISARIVS departed from Italie, carrying with him King VITIGES, and the Queen his wife, with many of his kinred, and other principall men of the Gothes, prisoners; and was receiued into Constantinople with exceeding honour and much joy: And he was so beloued and esteem'd, that all men, both inhabitants and strangers, went to see him as a wonder of the world, extolling his vertues and noble acts; which for the breuity of my stile I am not able to expresse. This was also a great help thereto, in that hee was a man of a most pleasing countenance, tall of stature, of an excellent constitution, Noble of condition, milde, courteous, and endued with many other rare and heroicall vertues.

Belisarius carried King Vitiges and his wife prisoners to Constantinople.

Within fewe daies after that BELISARIVS was gone out of Italie, some Cities rebelled, and chose YDIBALDVS for their King, a valiant Captain, and of great authority among the Gothes; who began to growe mighty by means of the euill gouernment, and the powlings and extortions, vsed by the Emperors Captains in the Country. He leuying an Army (which vntil then hee durst not do) presumed to fight with VITALIS, and ouerthrew him in battell, and began to be feared by the Imperialists. But, because hee slue a nephew of VITIGES, one of his guard slue him, when he had raigned little more than one yeer. In his place was chosen ARARICVS (whom PAVLVS DIACONVS and IORDANVS call ARARIVS) who was also slain within fiue moneths. And then they chose TOTILA for their King; who wrought the miserie and destruction of Rome, as I will presently tell you, when as we haue declared how and vpon what occasion BELISARIVS was drawn out of Italie by the Emperor IVSTINIAN, which before we spake not of; which passed in this manner:

Ydibaldus was chosen by the Gothes for king of Italie, and after him Araricius.

Totila made king.

COSROES King of Persia, seeing that BELISARIVS (whom he chiefly feared) was busied in the wars of Italie, sought some occasions, whether fained or just, to make warre vpon the territories of the Empire; and, entring some Prouinces, took certain Imperiall Cities. Whereupon IVSTINIAN, who very circumspectly prouided for all parts, besides the ordinary garrisons sent an Armie into the East, and for Generall thereof a valiant Gentleman named SITTAS, who in a battell was ouerthrowne and slain. And IVSTINIAN sent another called BVCEN, a very rare man at Arms; and also a nephew of his called GERMANVS, and other Captains and souldiers: so as the war was very cruell and bloudy between COSROES and them; which I haue not time to relate. But the Imperialists could not make sufficient resistance against the Persians: and so COSROES entred far into the Empire; and, leauing Mesopotamia on the right hand, marched towards Syria and Cilicia, and by assault took many good Cities. Wherfore IVSTINIAN, holding no man sufficient for that war but BELISARIVS, sent for him out of Italie: at what time he had brought it all vnder subjection, excepting some fewe Holds and Castles in Lombardy, wherein the Gothes had fortified themselues.

Cosroes, king of Persia, made warr in the Empire.

Captains sent against the Persians, Sittas, Bucen and Germanus.

The Persians took many cities in the Empire.

BELISARIVS leauing Italie, and arriuing at Constantinople, within fewe daies after was sent into the East, against COSROES the mightie King of Persia: And with his comming the Imperialists tooke heart, and he reuiued the warre with such discretion and courage, as there was present alteration in all things: and hauing obtained some victories against certaine of COSROES Captaines (for he himselfe durst not fight with him) he recouered much of that which was vsurped, By meanes whereof the affaires of the East were daily from well to better, through the presence and good gouernement of BELISARIVS. But in the meane season (which were two yeeres) the estate of Italy waxed worse: for as we said, TOTILA, being made King of the Gothes, followed the warres with so great courage and in so good order, as hauing ouerthrowne and slaine some of the Emperour IVSTINIAN's Captaines, the Gothes wanne such reputation, as all the townes tookpart with them, excepting such as were held by garrisons.

Totila his good successe in Italy.

And TOTILA marched through all Italy, without finding any resistance; and besieged the great citie of Naples: which after many exploites both by sea and land, he tooke, and many others in that quarter, and prospered so well in his enterprises, as it seemed, that in short space he would (without speedie redresse) make himselfe Lord of the whole. Which when IVSTINIAN perceiued, grieuing more for Italy, then for all the rest, he commanded BELISARIVS, that leauing the affaires of the East in the best order he could, he should make his repaire vnto him, and be as a seruant accustomed to obey; did so. Leauing his people in the East, and comming to Constantinople, without any stay he was sent by the Emperor into Italy; whither he went with so great haste, that he could not leade with him aboue fiftie thousand men: for it was thought that he should haue found sufficient forces there; and was made to beleeue that the Emperours partie was not brought to so great extremitie as it was. But he found all quite contrarie, in so much as it did partly seeme that his comming did more harme then good: for, being wished for, and expected by his friends, and feared by his enemies, seeing him come with so small forces, the one were dismaied, and the other took courage: and so in the beginning his enterprise was very doubtfull and tedious. Putting himselfe into Rauenna, to fortifie and defend the same, within few daies he took such order, as notwithstanding that he could not keepe the field and heard the enemie (for that he was too mightie for him) yet the Gothes neuertheless did rather lose then get.

Belisarius by the Emperors commandement returned into Italy.

Totila besieged Rome.

Wherwith TOTILA being much displeased, and desirous to make warres to the vttermost, assembled all his whole power, and sent Captaines and companies to Rauenna against BELISARIVS. And he with his whole Armie went to Rome, which was so slenderly prouided for, either with men or munition, that it seemed it could not long be defended.

BELISARIVS vnderstanding hereof, and remembring with how much trouble and extremitie he had defended that citie in former time, and seeing that he had not forces to keepe the field, neither could put himselfe into it by land, was much displeased and sorrowfull, and wrote an earnest letter to the Emperour IVSTINIAN, desiring him to send him men and money; resoluing to put himselfe into Rome by sea from Rauenna, where he then was. And passing ouer into Dalmatia, and thence to Durasso, he found captaine IOHN, whom IVSTINIAN had sent with a good Armie, wherewith he was of opinion to be able to fight with TOTILA. But the reliefe of Rome he held necessarie to be prouided for, with greater expedition then could be made with that Armie: for if TOTILA should take it, he feared that all Italy would reuolt. Wherefore he resolued to goe thither by sea, and to put himselfe into Rome by the riuer Tiber: (for the citie called Porto in the mouth of Tiber, held for the Emperour; and Ostia on the other side of the riuer held for the Gothes) and that Captaine IOHN should crosse the Sea with his Armie, and comming into Calabria, should march by land, to relieue him.

This being thus concluded, BELISARIVS sailed, and arriued at Porto in the mouth of Tiber; and hauing no sufficient power to march by land, by reason of TOTILA his great Armie, hee speedily rigged a great number of Barkes and Fregates, which he fraughted with men and munition, and so passed vp the riuer. And notwithstanding that TOTILA had in the narrowest place of that riuer drawne chaines, and made a bridge, and two Castles at the ends of the bridge, guarded with a great number of souldiers, by this meanes to stop his passage; yet BELISARIVS followed his course vp the Riuer: and comming to the bridge, he and his people in such sort charged those which guarded the same, that they brake and scattered them and passed through and Rome had been presently relieued, and euery thing had had good successe, had there not befallen a strange mishap, which troubled and altered all.

Belisarius passed vp the riuer Tiber, with a determination to relieue Rome.

BELIZARIVS had left his wife and familie (which wife he loued so much, as in his other warres he euer carried her with him) in the port before named, at the entrie of the Riuer, with with a Garison which held the fort, and a good Captaine, whose name was ISAAZ, with expresse commandement that he should not sallie forth without the walles, but should keepe the fortresse. But ISAAZ hearing the newes of BELISARIVS his victorie, and being desirous to doe some notable exploit of himselfe, sallied out of the towne with his Garison, to charge TOTILA his souldiers, which lay there against him: and although that at the first he disordered them and made them retire, yet in the end he was ouerthrowne by them and taken prisoner. Whereof BELISARIVS was presently aduertised by some which fled, and the report went (without any author) that the Towne was taken, and that his wife was in the enemies hands. Which when he vnderstood, he was so grieued and enraged, that without expecting any further newes, he returned downe the Riuer, with a determination either to die, or to set his wife at libertie; imagining that if he sped well, he might speedily returne to the rescue of Rome. But being come to the port, he found the place at his deuotion, and that his wife was well and at libertie, although the Captaine were lost. Whereupon he tooke greater displeasure to see himselfe thus deluded, then at the first euill newes; and the same night after his arriuall at the port, through extreme choler and griefe which he had taken, or some other vnknowne occasion, he was so extremely taken with a feuer, that he fell downe for dead, and his disease daily encreasing, he was oftentimes at the point of death. In this meane time, which was for the space of many daies, TOTILA did so straightly besiege the Citie, that they within died of hunger, and did eate dogs, cats, rats, and other things which seemed impossible. And TOTILA in the end, hauing the Citie in his power, sent his Ambassadours to IVSTINIAN, offering to be his seruant and good friend, and to preserue and keepe the Citie, if hee would grant him peace; if not, that then he would raze it and make the most cruell warre he could. IVSTINIAN answered that his Generall BELISARIVS was in Italie, to whom he referred all matters.

A great misfortune which befell Belisarius

Totila tooke Rome.

TOTILA was so enraged with this answere, that hee resolued to ruine Rome, and so hee did: For hee made the Capitoll it selfe to bee burned, and the best part of all the Citie, and the third part of the walles hee caused to be throwne downe, and commanded the inhabitants to abandon the Citie, vpon paine of death, and to goe to liue in some other place. And so he left burned, desolate, and waste, that Citie which had commanded the World, and which had beene the greatest, most frequented, and best peopled of all others. Then he marched against IOHN, who with the Armie sent by IVSTINIAN, came through Calabria, towards Rome, who shewed himselfe so very a coward, that hee durst not attend him in the field, but put himselfe into Otranto, the furthest place of all Calabria. And so TOTILA without any resistance tooke all Calabria, Abruzzo and Lucania, which vntill then held for the Emperour IVSTINIAN.

Totila burnt and destroyed Rome.

In the meane time, BELIZARIVS recouered his health, and performed one of the most desperate attempts, that euer he had done at any time before; which was with those troupes which he had, to goe and put himselfe into Rome, with a resolution to repaire, reedefie and defend the same; and so he did. And so first sending his wife to Constantinople, he presently went to Rome (as desolate as it lay) and caused with all expedition, trenches to be digged, and rampiers to be made, where the walles were throwne downe, and all the victuals that possibly could be gotten, to be brought thither, and made a Citie of that which lay waste. Through the fame hereof, many Citizens, that could get to him; for the loue of their countrie came, and put themselues thereinto with him. Whereof as soone as TOTILA was aduertised, by long iourneys without any intermission, he returned againe, assuring himselfe presently to enter it, and there to take BELISARIVS: But BELISARIVS so valiantly defended the same, that to his great losse, TOTILA was driuen to raise his siege. Whereby it may be imagined, how well he would haue defended it before it was ruinated, and he repaired it with new ports and rampiers. In the meane season captaine IOHN in Calabria and Pulia gathered the Citizens of Rome together and sent them thither, in whose Citie BELISARIVS remained; and hauing fortified it, and left a good Garrison therein, with an excellent Gouernour called GONON; he went to ioyne with IOHN, and other Captaines, to pursue TOTILA: where many things hapned too long to be recited. But the King of Persia againe making warres in the East, IVSTINIAN resolued to send BELISARIVS thither, although that afterwards he went not, for peace was concluded betweene them. Vpon this occasion BELISARIVS againe went out of Italie, although not with so great good fortune, and victories, as at the first, yet with no disgrace, neither with any lesse honor, for he neuer failed in any thing, to doe what bebehoued him, or what he was able; and so in summe went to Constantinople, where he remained all the remainder of his life. After he had liued there certaine yeeres, AGATHIVS writeth, that the Huns came down into Thracia, euen very neer to Constantinople, robbing and spoiling the countrie. And BELISARIVS being now old, was sent against them, and ouerthrew them in battaile; and had not IVSTINIAN sent for him to returne, hee had wholly ruined them.

Totila besieged and took Rome.

Within few daies after that BELISARIVS was departed out of Italy, TOTILA returned to Rome, and againe besieged it, and after a long siege and great extremities and famine endured by the besieged, through the negligence of IOHN who should haue relieued it, and the treason of some others, the fierce barbarian tooke it, but the taking of it at this time was quite contrarie to the last: for now he did not any harme, but sought to repaire and repeople it, and gaue great gifts, priuiledges, and exemptions to the inhabitants, to the end they should returne and dwell there. Afterwards he took many other places, and passed ouer into Sicilia: and for that he could not easily make a conquest thereof, he left foure captaines with many men of warre therein, and returned into Italy. And if NARSES a captaine whom IVSTINIAN sent, had not come thither, he had within short space made himselfe absolute Lord of the whole countrie. This NARSES was a famous Captain, valiant, and of great experience, and very priuate with the Emperor IVSTINIAN; and therefore rich, and of great authoritie; who came into Italy with a great Armie, leuied of sundrie nations, as Hunnes, Herüli, and other warlike people. Amongst which there came to his seruice, a people called Longobardi, who then dwelt in Hungarie; and he marched by land along all the coast of the Adriaticque sea; now called the gulfe of Venice, vntill he came to Rauenna; notwithstanding that at his entrie into Italy, he had some encounters and conflicts with some of TOTILA his Captaines, where there came to ioyne with him some of those Captaines and companies, which BELISARIVS had left, Staying but few daies in Rauenna, he tooke the field with his Armie, directing his course for Rome. But TOTILA who was not any way a coward, attended his comming vpon the way; and presenting him battaile, they fought, and in the fight TOTILA was slaine, and his people scattered and ouerthrowne. Which victorie was the occasion that NARSES easily reconquered all Italy: for after this fight, he held on his iourney and besieged Rome. And notwithstanding that the Gothes which TOTILA left there in garrison, did defend it well, yet NARSES took it by assault, with great losse of the defendants. And departing from thence, he took all the townes and cities round about.

Narses came generall in Italy against Totila.

After the death of TOTILA, the Gothes made a great man amongst them whose name was TEYAS, their King, who took all TOTILA his treasure which lay in Pauia; and sought to get men and aide against NARSES, and sent to intreate relefe of the French, who would not intermeddle in that warre. But TEYAS seeing that NARSES tooke cities and townes, without finding any man to fight with him, departed out of Lombardie with all the power hee could make, and marched towards Campania, where NARSES staied for him. They both lodged their Armies vpon a riuer side: where after some notable skirmishes, they came to a battaile, which was one of the most cruell that had been fought in all that warre. For historians report wonders wrought by this TEYAS, King of the Gothes in his owne person; but in the end being ouer-borne by NARSES his men, he was by them slaine, iust at twelue of the clocke at noone, at which time he had fought about six howers; and yet notwithstanding his death, the battaile ceased not, vntill that darke night parted them, without apparance of any victorie of either side: and reposing themselues as well as they could that night, the next morning the Gothes in despaire, and the Imperialists despited, to see that a people without a Captaine should so defend themselues, returned againe to fight, without ceassing; and the Gothes taking the benefit of the side of an hill, defended themselues. But in the end towards night they sent their Ambassadors vnto NARSES, offering to render all that they held in Italy, conditionally that he should giue them leaue to liue in it, without any armour or weapons. Which request NARSES graunted, for that he would not fight with a desperate people, and for the great losse which his Armie had already receiued: and so they deliuered what they possessed, and some of them continued in Italie, subiect to the inhabitants, in such manner, that within a very short space the name of the Gothes was wholly extinct, rooted out and forgotten, although not presently after the victory: for some Captains and companies which remained in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lombardy, and in the Prouince of Traspadana, now Piemont, began to fortifie; and they craning aide and succours comming out of Fraunce and Burgundy, the war was renued, which lasted welneere neere one whole yeere, and therein passed great battailes: but in the end NARSES obtained both the field and the victorie, and was absolute commander of all Italie. And it pleased God to make him the instrument to roote out, and to extinguish the name of the Gothes and Ostrogothes in Italie, 18 yeers after the beginning of this warre; and threescore and twelue, after that THEODORICVS first entred and made himselfe Lord of that countrey. But to the contrary, the Visogothes in Spaine grew daily more powerfull, and the name of the Alanes and Suevians extinct, the Gothes only remaining. At that time reigned ATHANAGILDVS in great prosperitie in Spaine, and ruled that kingdome the space of 22 yeers. These enterprises being ended, NARSES applied himselfe to the vttermost of his power, to the reedifying of Rome: and for asmuch as it was extremely ruinated and lay waste, and many of the Citizens absent, he caused the inhabitants to reduce themselues to one part thereof; and so he tooke the best order he could, both for the gouernment of the same, and of Italie also. This NARSES was a man of great iudgement, a good christian, very zealous in Religion, and desirous of the good of the common-wealth, and besides all this, was one of the most excellent captaines of the World. By reason whereof he held the gouernment of Italie as long as the Emperor IVSTINIAN liued; who during all the time of these great wars, made his continuall abode in Constantinople, prouiding men and money for the wars in all parts; as well for those of Italie as in the East, where hee had dangerous wars against COSROES King of Persia.

There hapned in the time of IVSTINIAN (besides the warres and conquests before specified, and many others, which for breuitie, and for that they were of no great importance, I omit) earth-quakes, famine, and other great calamities. For in his raigne the times were so variable, and there hapned such strange accidents, as the like had neuer beene. And he (as I said in the beginning) was as an excellent prince, and exceedingly carefull for the wars; prouiding captaines, souldiers and money, without taxing or oppressing his subiects, with incredible magnanimity and bounty. By meanes whereof, he preserued the Empire of the East, and reconquered the Prouinces of Africa, wholly subuerting and expelling the Vandales out of those countries, and did the like by the Gothes in Italie. And concerning his Gouernment in time of peace, he was no lesse carefull; so as it seemed he neuer had applied himselfe to any thing else: for as the lawes and statutes made by other Emperors his predecessors, were so many, that a man could hardly reade them; and so variable and intricate as it seemed that many of them did contradict one the other; he reduced them all to a conformitie and breuitie; drawing out of them that onely which was necessarie, and made other new. And in this manner he abridged all the lawes of the antient Magistrates, Iudges and Lawyers, which contained about 2000 bookes, and reduced them to fiftie, called the Digest; and compiled the 4 books of the Institutions, commonly called Institutes. And the lawes and decrees of all the Emperours and CÆSARS, which were dispearsed abroade in very many bookes, he reduced to twelue; called IVSTINIANS Codex. And he made another book intituled, The Volume, wherin he included three of those twelue bookes aforesaid. To bring these things to effect he held about him great learned men: but the principall ministers and authors thereof were, IOHN PATRICIVS, and THEOPHITVS, and DOROTHEVS, but chiefly TRIBVNIANVS; all singular Lawyers and Philosophers. Besides all this, IVSTINIAN was very curious in Architecture, and built many great and sumptuous edifices. But he was taxed with this vice, that he willingly gaue eare, and was a friend to bake-biters, and such as spake ill of others, and was very reuengefull against such as any way offended him. He was also noted of ingradice, and couetousnesse, and that by all waies and meanes he sought to encrease his rents, and treasure; but he afterwards spent it all frankely and bountifully in the warres, and vpon his souldiers.

Being now very old and hauing no sonne that might succeede him, he chose his Nephew IVSTIN, for his companion in the Empire; which IVSTIN, was his daughters sonne. They write of him, that in his old age, he was infected with the heresie of those, which beleeued, that the flesh and bodie of CHRIST was impassible. Which heresie is to be supposed proceeded through want of iudgement, whereof he was bereaued some daies before he died. Finally, after so many noble acts and many others, which for breuitie cannot be expressed, the good Emperor IVSTINIAN being aboue 80 yeers old, left this for a better life, when he had raigned 39 yeers, in the yeer of our Lord, 568, and was greatly lamented and deplored through all the whole Empire.

THE ARGVMENT.

VPon the death of Iustinian, his daughters sonne Iustin tooke possession of the Empire; whoviu farre vnlike to his Grandfather, both in condition, and in his vigilant care for the gouernment: for he left the administration thereof to his wife Sophia. He had warres with the Persians, but they were soone ended, and he particularly applied himselfe to the affaires of Italy, which for the Empire was gouerned by Narses: For, Iustin in the East, gaue himselfe to pleasure and sensualitie. This Narses, hauing to his great glory performed many worthie enterprises, was ill rewarded by Iustin, and his wife Sophia: But the iniuries done vnto him were the occasion of so great miseries, as poore Italy shall euer haue cause to lament them. For Narses calling Alboinus King of the Longobards into Italy, and afterwards desiring to haue stayed them (when hee could not) hee was the cause of the ruine thereof: For they made themselues Lords of the greatest part thereof, and possessed the same aboue two hundred yeeres. In time of which warre, Iustin died of the Gowte, when hee had raigned eleuen yeeres.

IT was so hard a matter to abbreuiate, and to relate, the accidents happened in the time of the Emperour IVSTINIAN; and I was so much troubled therewith, they were so many and so notable, that I doe not onely feele my selfe eased of that burthen, and doe likewise reioyce in that I haue brought that worke to an end, but am also of opinion that from henceforth I shal be lesse troubled: And although I be in some danger to be deceiued therein, neuertheless I reioyce in this hope; wherein (with the grace of God) I will proceede. IVSTINIAN being dead, his daughters son IVSTIN the second without any difficultie obtained the Empire: for (as we haue said) his Grandfather in his life time made him his companion and proclaimed him his successor; his mother (as we said) was IVSTINIANS daughter. His father was a great Noble-man in the countrie of Slauonia; he himselfe was of a quick and actiue wit, and both apt and sufficient for any thing; but ill conditioned and vnworthie of the Empire, prouing farre vnlike his Grandfather. For, as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth, he became couetous and tyrannous, a robber and a despiser of the poore, and aboue all, he was retchlesse and negligent in matters of justice and gouernement; and thereof left all the charge and care to his wife the Empresse, whose name was SOPHIA, whose wit was incapable thereof, neither had she conditions or vertues deseruing the same.

same. At his first comming to the Empire, this SOPHIA, to win the loue and good will of the people, counselled IVSTIN, out of his Exchequer, to pay the debts of such poore men as were vnable to make satisfaction without their vndoing, which he did: wherefore in the beginning of his raigne he was generally well beloued.

There also happened warre between him and HORMISDA King of Persia, who through the death of COSROES succeeded in that Kingdome: whither he sent a Noble-man called MARTIN for Generall, and there passed great matters, but principally a cruell and bloudie battaile, wherein the Imperialists preuailed; and finally they returned to treate of peace; and that was confirmed, which was made in the time of the Emperour IVSTINIAN. So the East remained in peace, and IVSTIN passed his time without care in pleasure, giuing himselfe ouer to vice and sensualitie. So as of him there is no notable matter to be written, but of the affaires of Italie: which happened in this manner. In the fourth yeere (as some write) of the raigne of the Emperor IVSTIN, and the tenth or twelfth of NARSES his gouernement in Italie, after the great victorie obtained through his wisedome and policie against the Gothes; some malicious men enuying his great honour and dignitie, and the great riches which he had gotten in former warres, reported and wrote to IVSTIN much euill of NARSES; and as in Court (an vsuall thing) there wanted not some that enuied him, and were glad thereof, so they found the fauour to be heard; and IVSTIN through want of iudgement, and the Empresse SOPHIA being light of beleefe, were perswaded that what was told them of him was true. So without respect or regard of the daungers and troubles wherewith he had conquered Italy, they resolued to depose him from his gouernment, and to send him a successor, which was one of the greatest indignities that could be done him. And it pleased God to permit so great an ingratitude to bee punished. For SOPHIA was not content to embase NARSES by depriuing him of his gouernment, but she also disgraced him in her speeches, saying, that she would haue him come to spinne amongst her women at Constantinople. And a principall man called LONGINVS, was presently sent to take his place and to succeed him.

Narses deposed from his gouernment of Italy.

Longinus sent to gouern Italy.

When NARSES vnderstood of this, his courage could not endure so shamefull a disgrace, without great disdaine. Wherefore being no lesse grieued with the words vsed by SOPHIA, then with what they had done; it is written that he sayd: That, seeing that she meant to make him to spinne, he promised to twist her such a web, as she should neuer be able to vntwine: which he well performed, as hereafter shall be sayd. And vnderstanding that LONGINVS was come to Rauenna, he durst not goe to Constantinople, but came from Rome (where he then liued) to Naples; where he was so much beloued and honored, as he held himselfe to be there in security. From thence as a man disgraced and in despaire, he by often letters and otherwise, sollicited ALBOINVS King of the Longobards, who was his friend, and had sent men to ayde him in his warre against the Gothes, and at that time made his residence in Hungarie, that he should come into Italy, and make himselfe Lord thereof; and that he would assist and direct him in what he had to do in that conquest. And ALBOINVS afterwards followed his direction. These Longobardi, as some say, were so called, for that they ware long beards. Their originall and the place of their breeding (as PAVLVS DIACONVS writeth of them) was in an Iland in the Germane sea, then called Scandinauia: from whence they being many, and accounting their Country too little for them (as many other Northerly Nations had done) with two Captaines, the one called AYON, and the other THATON, left their Countrie, and went to seeke some place wherein they might inhabite, either by peace or warre.

The Lombards what people they were.

These Captaines being dead, they chose one AGELMOND for their King, and afterwards had other Kings, and diuers warres at sundrie times with variable successe, against the Gothes, the Vandales, and other nations; vntill that after many yeeres they became Lords of Hungary; from whence their King ALBOINVS sent men of warre (as wee said) to the aide of NARSES against the Gothes; whereof grew the occasion that he called him into Italy, to the end that he should make himselfe Lord thereof; who resolued to goe thither, as well for the proffer made to him by NARSES, as for that hee had heard of the fruitfulnes of that soile, not onely by common report, but also by the particular relation, made by those whom hee had sent to serue NARSES in those warres. Whilest that he mustered vp his souldiers, and made such preparation as for so great an enterprise was requisite, LONGINVS the new Captaine and gouernour of Italy, settled a new forme and order of gouernment, which continued a long time after: which was, that comming into Italy hee tooke the name and title of Exarch, which is is, Generall or supreme gouernor. And resting in Rauenna, careless of seeing Rome, in euery city of Italy he placed a gouernor called Dux: whereof (as I imagine) sprang the beginning of the title and dignitie of a Duke, which now is vsed throughout all the World. And so each of them gouerned a Citie, and not as in former times, when euery Prouince had some principall man of great authoritie for their particular Captaine or Gouernour. In Rome for the greater honour was placed a Gouernor called Præfes, who was (as we say) a President or Lord Deputie. And so the Authoritie of the Senate, and dignitie of the Consuls, was wholly lost and extinct, so as they were neuer after in that manner as in antient times: for NARSES and his companion BASILIVS were the last Consuls.

This forme of gouernement being established, and ALBOINVS king of the Longobards being in a readinesse to take his iourney towards Italy, it followed that Pope IOHN the third, with the generall consent of all the Roman people, who infinitely loued NARSES, went from Rome to Naples, where he then was; and perswading him to returne to Rome, preuailed so much as he brought him with him; where he was receiued with great loue and ioy, they pretending to protect him, and to keepe him there amongst them. Whereupon NARSES repented that euer he had called ALBOINVS, and againe wrote to him, to take no care to come into Italy, alleaging many difficulties. But as ALBOINVS was resolued, and knew the small force that was in Italy, with the gouernement of LONGINVS, and the little discretion and care of the Emperor IVSTIN, he would not be disswaded from his intended enterprise, but hastened his comming. Before which, NARSES died in Rome, where he left great treasure hidden, which afterwards was found; and his bodie was carried to Constantinople. And at the same time died Pope IOHN who brought him from Naples.

King ALBOINVS departing with a great Armie of Longobards from Hungary, together with a great number of Saxons and other Nations which he had leuied, and were ioyned with him, through the desire they had to dwell in Italie, all which might amount to the number of two hundred thousand men, with their wiues, children, heards of Cattell, and moueable goods, such as they could carrie, would not abandon Hungaria, but left the Hunnes, which liued in that countrie, and were the remainder of the great Armie of the fierce King ATTILA (of whom heretofore we haue made much mention) to guard it. Which Hunnes (as the Longobards prospered well in Italie) remained owners and possessors of the countrie, which after their name is now called Hungarie, which before was called Pannonia, as some say; yet some others affirme (as is before noted) that a certaine people called Hungri, came from the frozen sea, and together with them the Hunnes dwelt in Pannonia, and so after these two Nations it was called Hungary. But howsoeuer it was, vntill this day it is so called, and the successors of the Hunnes haue possessed it, and valiantly defended the same against the Infidels, vntill our time, that for our sinnes SOLIMAN the Turkish Emperour tooke the greatest part thereof.

ALBOINVS passing with his Armie towards Italy, came into that Prouince which now is called Friuli: where he tooke many Cities, and vsed no small cruelty, and much more would haue done, if he had not beene somewhat pacified by the prayers and intreaties of PAVL the Patriarch of Aquileia, and of FELIX Bishop of Treuigi. But being desirous to enter further into Italie, and to leaue that to safe keeping which he had gotten, he left therein for gouernour and to guard the passages into those countries, a valiant Captaine which was his Nephew called SISVLPHVS, and he proceeded in his iourney: It was the will of God, that hee found small resistance in Italie, for it was then afflicted, both with famine and pestilence. By reason whereof LONGINVS, the Gouernor and Exarch before named, was not of power to leuie any sufficient Armie to fight with ALBOINVS, and therefore held himselfe in Rauenna, where he drew together the best men and the greatest number he was able, with a resolution to make frontier warres by fortifying the Townes, and putting good Garrisons in them; which hee principally did in Cesarea, which at that time was a very noble Citie, neere to Rauenna, whither he drew the greatest number of souldiers he could possibly leuie, and fortifyed Patauia, and therein put a Garrison, which is now called Padoua, and is vnder the gouernment of the Venetians. The like he did by Cremona and Mantua, and in other of the strongest Cities, imagining if he could hold those countries, ALBOINVS would passe no further; and if he did, he should be greatly anoyed by them in his Arriereguard. Which was no ill deuice, if in that Prouince there had beene any Armie to haue made head against ALBOINVS and his forces in the field. But LONGINVS had neither heart nor power to doe it: and ALBOINVS holding it for a long peece of worke to batter and assault all those Townes, tooke another course, withdrawing himselfe from them, for that he would not be forced to stay before any of these Townes: but went and assaulted Verona and Vicenza, wherein were no Garrisons; which with others, yeelded without resistance. From whence passing ouer the riuer Adda, he tooke his way towards Milane, where the Citizens (induced thereto by the perswasion of HONORATVS their Bishop) gaue vp the Citie, to free themselues from slaughter and sack.

Alboinus tooke Milan and other townes.

After this, other places did the like: for the famine was so great, and so generall, as without any force the townes yeelded, being vnable to victuall themselues for a siege; excepting those places which were victualled by LONGINVS: amongst which in that quarter were Pauia and Briselli, now called Vercelli, which by the said LONGINVS were sufficiently furnished with all things needefull. ALBOINVS resolued to besiege them: and hauing beene now six moneths in Italie, he besieged Pauia: but it defended it selfe so valiantly, that the siege continued three yeeres. In the beginning of which time, perceiuing that it would be a long siege, remaining before it with such part of his armie as he thought sufficient, he sent the rest to make warre in other parts of Italie, and to make a conquest thereof: and they all sped as he desired: for they tooke many Townes, Cities and Castles in Italie. And the President or gouernor of Rome fearing to be besieged, and seeing the great scarcitie and famine which was in the Citie, sent to desire reliefe of men and victuals of the Emperor IVSTIN, who commanded a great quantitie of wheate to be brought from Africa to Rome, and some souldiers also. Wherewith the citie was well relieued, and the Longobards at that time came not thither, neither durst they inuade Rauenna, nor the cities adioyning: for they were all verie well fortified and garrisoned by LONGINVS. But in other places they made themselues Lords of a great part of Italy, in so much that between Bologna and Milan there were few places of strength, but within three yeeres war were brought vnder their subiection: and so they afterwards possessed all that prouince aboue two hundred yeeres, with variable fortune, as hereafter wee will relate; and by them it was called Lombardy, and is so still vnto this day. About the end of this time ALBOINVS tooke Pauia: and seeing himselfe mightie, hee tooke his way towards Verona, whither hee had caused his wife Queene ROSAMVND to come, with his treasure and wardrobe; and there holding his Court hee gaue himselfe to feasting and banketting, and was slaine by treason, by the order and consent of his wife, whose father hee had slaine, and in a banquet gaue her to drink in her fathers scull: for reuenge whereof shee worthily practised his death.

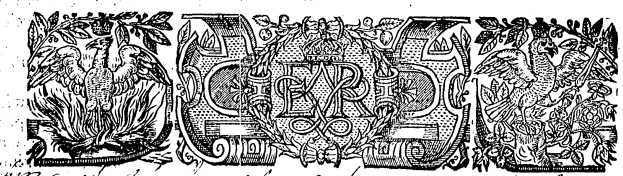
The death of Alboinus.



ALBOINVS dying in this manner, after many incounters and battails, the Longobards chose for their King a great man of bloud and of worth amongst them, called CLEPHIS, or CLEVE, who prooued a most cruell Prince; and renewing the warres, committed great cruelties in those cities which held of the Empire, in the prouince of Venetia: for in those daies the citie of Venice, which in the time of ATTILA began to be inhabited, was greatly increased by those which (to escape the cruelty of the Lombards) went to dwell in those Ilands, and were now of force able to defend themselues; and this citie began to bee famous and of great account, and hath continued and increased vntill this day: so as it is now one of the most famous cities in the world. At this time the Emperour IVSTIN who liued viciously, careless and negligent, in Constantinople was taken with so grieuous paine of the gowte in his feete, as he died thereof. And some daies before his death, by the consent of his wife SOPHIA, by whom he was wholly gouerned (for that he had no sonne) he made an excellent Nobleman, CÆSAR, whose name was TIBERIVS: and hauing exhorted him very effectually to yeelde obedience vnto SOPHIA, hauing swaied the Imperiall scepter 11 yeers, he died, in the yeere of our Lord 579: and after some, 576.

SVch were the conditions of the Emperour IVSTIN in his life time, that when he was dead, no man lamented or mourned for him, exeept his wife SOPHIA, who through her husbands insufficiency gouerned and commanded all, and had a conceite to haue continued it; meaning to haue married with TIBERIVS, who presently vpon the death of IVSTIN was created and crowned Emperor. But, as he was a vertuous man, iust, pitifull, milde, charitable, and endued with such vertues, as in a good and Christian Emperor were requisit, he would not haue her to wife; all whose conditions he knew to be quite contrary; and with whom euen in the life time of IVSTIN (as some write) he was at some controuersie. TIBERIVS when he was created CÆSAR, made distribution of much of the Imperiall treasure to the poore; and afterwards at his Coronation named for Empresse a great Ladie whose name was ANASTASIA, with whom hee was secretly married. Whereupon SOPHIA at the same feast practised by treason to haue had him slaine, with a determination to haue made one IVSTINIAN, another of IVSTINIANS nephews, Emperor. But, as it pleased God, the good TIBERIVS escaped this treason, and others also which SOPHIA practised; and his Coronation was held with great solemnitie: and the treacherie of SOPHIA being discouered (she craning mercie) hee pardoned both her and IVSTINIAN. But many daies passed not before shee attempted the like, in a house of pleasure whither TIBERIVS went for his recreation. At this time hee caused her to be apprehended, and despoiled of all her riches. But as hee was milde and pitifull, hee pardoned her her life, and gaue her maintenance, and made her to be serued with great respect and honour; but he took from her all her old seruants, placing others to attend her by his appointment; he againe pardoned IVSTINIAN: for hee knew that hee was induced to all that hee did by SOPHIA. And hee was afterwards greatly beloued by TIBERIVS, and serued him faithfully, as PAVLVS DIACONVS writes.

The vertues of Tiberius.

The treason of Sophia.

These were the priuate and domesticall accidents which in the beginning befell TIBERIVS. In the generall estate of the Empire, he euer maintained iustice, and raigned valiantlie. Africa, and all the prouinces which the Empire held in Asia and in Europe, peaceably obeyed him. But the warres in Italie against the Lombards, and in the East against the Persians, did put him to much care and trouble. In the warres of Persia hee had good successe, whereof wee will first speake briefly. For as soone as TIBERIVS came to the Empire, hee sent his Ambassadors to King HORMISDA, to confirme the peace in such manner as his predecessors held the

the same before him. But HORMISDA, who saw himself rich and mightie, would not accept thereof, but made warre vpon the Frontiers of the Empire. TIBERIVS speedily sent a mighty Army against him: but at that time they fought not. For, there was a truce concluded for a time: which being expired, a cruell warre began chiefly in the Kingdome of Armenia; where the Roman Generall and Armie came to a battell with HORMISDA: which Fight was very cruell, and of long continuance. Neuertheless, the Romans had the victory, and HORMISDA saued himself by flight; and therein were taken the greatest and richest spoiles that euer were gotten from the Persians: all which were giuen to the men of warre, excepting the Kings treasure, and the vessell of gold and siluer for his seruice; which (as PAVLVS DIACONVS saith) was carried to TIBERIVS in Constantinople vpon twenty Elephants (which had not other loading) with a great number of prisoners; to whom the Emperor commanded rich and gallant apparell to be giuen, and then to be set at liberty, to return to their Countrey. And in the mean time the Imperiall Armie entred the Countries subiect to the Persians; and, burning and spoiling the same, returned with victorie. But within a small time after, HORMISDA leuied the greatest forces that he was able, and made a very valiant and expert man of warre, Generall thereof: for, by reason of his last ouerthrowe, hee made a law, that the Kings of Persia should neuer be present in any battell; and so hee again renewed the warre against the Empire, to recouer his lost honour. Against whom the Emperor sent a new Generall, a valiant and wise Earle named MAVRICE, who afterwards was Emperor; who with the like good fortune sought to fight with the Persians: and, leuying infinite numbers of souldiers on either side, they fought a great part of the day, vntill that, after many thousands of the one and other side were slain, the victorie shewed it self to be of MAVRICE his side: and he recouered certain places, and conquered others from the Persians; so as HORMISDA was constrained of necessity to conclude some peace or truce with the Emperor. And MAVRICE came with victory to Constantinople: where hee was solemnly receiued by TIBERIVS, who married him to his owne daughter, in reward of so noble a victory.

Whil'st these things past in the East, the affairs of Italy prospered not so wel: for, CLEPHIS, the new King of the Lombards, made cruell wars against those Towns and Countries which held of the Empire; and all things hapned so according to his desire, that he took many cities: and, being desirous to repose himself for a while, he sent his Captains and their companies towards Rome. And they took all the Cities in the marches thereof; and Rome it self was besieged by them, and was in great danger to haue been entred by force. So that (as Authors affirm) if CLEPHIS had liued but a little while longer, he had made himself Lord of Rome and Rauenna, which were the two eyes and fortresses of all Italy. But his designes were made frustrate by death, like to other Kings and Captains, who haue been as great and greater than euer hee was; whose death was practised by the treason of his owne people. After his decease the Lombards would neither chuse nor haue any more Kings at that time: but there arose thirty principall men, or (to speak more properly) thirty tyrants; who inuested themselues in thirty of the best Towns which they held in Italie. And so euery of them gouerned his Town and the Territorie thereof. And each of them likewise made wars apart by himself; sometimes the one aiding and assisting the other against the Empire. And as the Emperor TIBERIVS was busied in making prouision for his wars against the Persians, and did not sufficiently prouide for Italy, these Captains of the Lombards had oportunity to extend their power there; and took many other Cities, coming before Rome and Naples. In which warre they committed such cruelties, robberies and insolencies, as the like had neuer been seen. So that from Rome to the Eastwards there remained little more subiect to the Empire than the Kingdom of Naples, and the City of Rome, with some Towns in the marches thereof; and the City of Naples fell also into the hands of the Lombards: but we cannot certainly say, whether at this time or afterwards. Yet Rauenna held for the Empire, and some other strong houlds neer vnto it; which, through the wisdome and foresight of LONGINVS, were defended. And there also held for the Empire of either side of the riuer of Po, Como, Cremona, Mantoa, Padoa, Bologna and Percelli: and the Lombards at this time had all the rest. Thus the warre was managed on either side with great cruelty: for, the Lombards as they were barbarous, and had not yet well receiued the faith of CHRIST, robd and spoil'd all, aswell sacred as profane, without any difference. Whereto, besides what is already said, this was a great furtherance, that in the time of this combustion TIBERIVS fell so sorely sick, that he could not apply himself to the gouernment of the Empire; and his infirmity neuer left him till he died. Wherefore the Romans, oppressed by the Longobards, motioned a trea-treatie of peace; and a truce was concluded betweene them for a certain time. Which truce the Lombards graunted, for that the kings of France (wherein at that time raigned three brothers) being much grieued to see the Lombards growne so mightie in Italy, sent a great Army against them, which was already entred Lombardy. And they also the more willingly granted the truce, for that the Saxons, which vntill then had aided them in their warres, had now left them and were returned. TIBERIVS being sick in Constantinople (as we said) as a good Emperour desirous as well to prouide for the time to come, as he had done for the present and past, nominated for CÆSAR and his successor his sonne in law MAVRICE. And afterwards leauing all the Empire entire and in peace, as he inherited the same (the state of Italie onely except) in the seuenth yeere of his raigne (although some say lesse) he died, in the yeere of our Lord, fiue hundred fourescore and fiue; and after some others, fiue hundred fourescore and nine. His death was much lamented by all estates, for his great vertue and integritie, and for that he was liberall and bountifull to all men.

The death of Tiberius.

THE LIFE OF MAVRICIVS, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND TWO ROMANE EMPEROVR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Empire being come to Mauricius, sonne in law to Tiberius, he shewed himselfe to be of a very vile disposition, and particularly sinned in couetousnesse, notwithstanding that in Martiall affaires he was very wise and politick. He sent Captaines and men of warre into Italie against the Lombards, accordingly as Pope Pelagius had requested, with whom after long warre, in the end a truce was concluded: he afterwards brake the peace with the Persians, and the warre had this issue, that after many routes and ouerthrowes equally giuen and receiued, of the one side and the other; the new King of Persia, to suppresse a Tyrant which rose against him, became a friend to the Emperour of Constantinople. After which peace, binding himselfe to the affaires of the West, he gouerned the estate with indifferent good fortune, through the valour of the Exarch, which he sent into Italy: yet in this time God sent many plagues and scourges into the World, as inundations and ouerflowings of waters, famine, and Pestilence, which happened more in Rome then in any other country. Besides which miseries, it was besieged by the Lombards: and Maurice for the hatred which he bare to Gregorie (who then succeeding Pelagius, was Pope) would not relieue it, so as to abase the Pope, he was content to lose all Italie, which God afterwards seuerely punished. For his owne souldiers rebelling against him, made a priuate Colonell, whose name was Phocas, Emperour, who comming towards Constantinople with an Armie, made Maurice to flie: and he being vnable to leuie such forces as might defend him, taken by the souldiers of the new tyrant, was brought back to Constantinople, where hauing first seene the death of his wife and children, by the hands of an executioner he had his head stricken off; all which he endured with great resolution when he had raigned twentie yeeres.

MAVRICIVS peaceably obtained the Empire, by the death of his father in law TIBERIVS, whom he nothing resembled in his vertues, for hee was both vicious and couetous; yet in the affaires of the warres, he was very prouident and diligent: and as he was both valiant and politique in martiall actions, so he made choice of singular Captaines for the warres which were many, very great and dangerous. Whereof great part happened at one instant, notwithstanding that they were in sundrie parts and Prouinces. Wherefore to deliuer that in fewe wordes which I haue gathered together, it is requisite I should write each seuerall accident apart: which which I will performe in the best manner I can, so as in the end of all, the whole may bee vnderstood. Beginning then with the affaires of Italy, I say that the truce made with the Lombards, was not of their part throughly obserued, but that daily from one citie or other, there were robberies committed, and some encounters and bickerings. Wherefore as LONGINVS was but of small power, and the Romans were in great feare to be besieged, Pope PELAGIVS the second wrote a Letter from Rome to GREGORIE whom he had sent to Constantinople, informing him of the state of Italy, and of the great danger and necessitie wherein it was, and gaue him especiall charge to be an earnest futor to the Emperor, to send relefe and men against the Lombards: which hee procured with such efficacie, as the Emperor MAVRICE (notwithstanding that he was much troubled with the warres of Persia, whereof wee will speake hereafter) prouided a new Exarch and gouernor for Italy, who was a good souldier and a wise man, called SMARAGDVS, with a good number of souldiers; and sent for LONGINVS to returne. SMARAGDVS came by sea to Rauenna, and with him Saint GREGORIE. His comming, for the fame and good report which was spred of him, gaue great ioy and hope to the Imperialists in Italie; and hee presently tooke order for martiall affaires. And forasmuch as neer vnto Rauenna, a valiant captain of the Lombards called FEROALDVS, held a citie called Classi, and had made, and still did make, cruell warre against those of Rauenna; hee resolued to vse all meanes to dispossesse him thereof, and to driue him quite from thence. And to this effect hee sent to DOCTRVLA an Imperiall captaine and gouernor of the citie of Parcelli, that leauing a competent garrison in that citie hee should come with his forces to ioyne with him: who making prouision of boates and barkes, purposed for his better securitie, to passe down the riuer of Po, to the end that being arriued at Aspenetico, which is at the mouth of the riuer, he might sayle from thence by sea to Rauenna. But FEROALDVS had intelligence heereof, and with the greatest power that hee could make, came likewise with barkes to stoppe his passage downe the riuer: where they came to blowes, and DOCTRVLA by means of the aid which came to him from Rauenna, had the victorie, and FEROALDVS was ouerthrowne and fled by water to Classi, which the new Exarch SMARAGDVS in the meane time had besieged and battered, so as it was readie to haue yeelded when FEROALDVS came, who then hindered the same, by encouraging the besieged.

Smaragdus came Exarch into Italie.

But as soone as they vnderstood that hee was ouerthrowne by the enemy and came thither by flight, they resolued to yeeld, and did so. SMARAGDVS entred the citie, where all the Lombards which were found therein, were put to the sword, and in like manner their gouernour FEROALDVS, in reuenge of the like cruelties committed by them.

This victorie obtained by SMARAGDVS, was so highly esteemed, as those of his partie resuming hart and courage, and their aduersaries waxing fearfull, hee recouered some cities and holds, the greatest part whereof yeelded of themselues. Which the captaines of the Lombards considering, who after the death of CLEPHIS continued as tyrants and would not chuse them any King, they resolued to make choise of one whom they all should obey, and vnder whom they might liue, for they were of opinion, that if they continued so diuided, they should be ouerthrowne and brought to confusion, as they already began. Hauing resolued hereupon they chose one of King CLEPHIS his sonnes, whose name was ANTHARIS; a young man of great spirit, and who had purchased greater fame in the warres then any other man of his nation; and so was much spoken of both among his friends and enemies. The name of a King, and so valiant, as was ANTHARIS, caused a great alteration in the estate; to whom all the Capitaines and gouernours contributed of their treasure, each of them giuing him the one halfe of what he had, for the maintenance of the warres, and his new estate. The first enterprise he vndertooke, was against Parcelli, and DOCTRVLA the gouernor thereof, as well for the late dishonour which hee had done them, as for that the citie at that time was of great importance; wherefore he besieged it both by water vpon the riuer of Po with barkes, and by land with great forces which he had raised, and forced it in such manner, as notwithstanding that DOCTRVLA did all that possibly he was able to doe, being out of hope to hold the place, hee came to a composition with him, and gaue it vp; and so hee came downe the riuer to Rauenna; and ANTHARIS made great spoile in the citie, destroying the best part thereof, and raced the walles downe to the earth, so as they were neuer after repaired or made like as in former time they had been.

Antharis the King of the Lombards.

ANTHARIS hauing obtained this victorie, resolued to goe against FRANCILIONE, who held the citie of Como, and other fortresses in the Lake of Como, and had verie gallantly defended the same for the space of seuenteene yeeres. But in the meane season motions were made of peace or truce, and either partie was glad to treate thereof. SMARAGDVS, for that he stood in feare of the King, who was both young and valiant, and also for that he imagined himselfe to haue no sufficient power to make head against him, and the King being but newly come to his gouernment, holding not himselfe throughly settled and confirmed, the better to establish himselfe therein, thought it best to conclude a peace, and to bring vnder some, to whom his election was nothing pleasing. All which laid together, gaue occasion that a truce was taken for a certaine time, although the Lombards neuer truly obserued the same. During that time all Italie enioyed some rest, and SMARAGDVS sent to Rome for Prefect or gouernour thereof, a noble Knight borne in Constantinople, whose name was GERMANVS, with whom went S. GREGORIE, and they were receiued with great ioy and solemnitie: for GREGORIE for his good life and conuersation, was generally beloued and honoured. So as with their comming, and the good hope which was conceiued of their new Exarch, they thought to haue a hand in recouering al that which the Lombards held, and had vsurped; and in the meane time, to enioy the peace in rest and prosperitie. But it followed not according to their expectation: for God sent other persecutions, as you shall heare. But vs leaue Italie in this truce, and briefly speake of those warres which MAVRICE made by his Captaines in the East against the Persians, which for numbers of men, battailes and great conflicts, were farre greater then those of Italie: for they were betweene two the most mightie Monarchs which then were in the world, to wit, the King of Persia, and the Romane Emperor.

Germanus gouernour of Rome.

MAVRICIVS then sent his Armie, and for Generall a worthie Noble-man called PHILIPPICVS, to whom hee had married his sister. Against whome K. HORMISDA raised greater forces, and made a great man called CARDARIGA his Generall. With whom, after som notable skirmishes and encounters, PHILIPPICVS came to a maine battaile, with power against power, which lasted aboue tenne houres, the one charging the other, in such manner that no aduantage could be seene. But in the end PHILIPPICVS and his troupes had the victorie, and slew a very great number of the Persians, and took two thousand prisoners, which hee sent to the Emperour to Constantinople: and the rest escaped by flight, and with them their Generall CARDARIGA. PHILIPPICVS, hauing obtained this notable victorie, marched forwards with his Armie, and sent a good Commander called HERACLIVS, with some selected troupes, with direction to enter as farre as he might into the Persians countrie, he promising to second him. Notwithstanding that CARDARIGA was ouerthrowne, yet was he not discouraged, neither omitted to vse all the meanes and diligence which to a good Generall did belong: and so, gathering together such forces as he could, making, shew that hee would reinforce his Armie, with those small troupes hee had, passing ouer certaine mountaines, in a very darke night he set vpon PHILIPPICVS his Arierguard, wherein the feare was so great, that PHILIPPICVS, as though he had not been victorious, shamefully fled all the whole night long, with no smalle losse and slaughter of his people: in so much that the Persians imagining their flight to haue beene fained (seeing how few they were) dared not to follow the chace, and so rested vntill that the day light freed the one from feare, and shewed the other the aduantage they had lost. But HERACLIVS, whom PHILIPPICVS had sent before, followed his direction with better discretion, and greater diligence: for passing ouer the riuer Tigris, with the fame of the late victorie, he took some cities, and did much hurt, and returned towards PHILIPPICVS very rich with the prey and spoiles of the victorie.

Philippicus, Generall against the Persians.

A battaile wherein Philippicus had the victorie.

The shamefull flight of Philippicus.

This being past, and the Romane Armie being gathered againe together, the Emperor commanded PHILIPPICVS, that leauing the Armie with HERACLIVS, he should make his repaire to Constantinople, and PHILIPPICVS obeyed his commandement. In his place was sent a valiant and expert captaine called PRISCVS, who being come to the Armie, shewed himselfe so proud and haughtie to the Captaines and men of warre, as they mutined against him, and he was generally so ill intreated by all men, that he was driuen to saue himselfe by flight, hauing receiued such blowes and knockes with stones as he was in daunger to haue been slaine: and they amongst themselues chose (against his will) GERMANVS for their General, who was a man of great account in the Armie. But at that time MAVRICIVS was so oppressed with the warres against CAYANY, and the Auares and against the Slauons in Slauonia, in Missia, and other prouinces (whereof we will speake hereafter) as he could not then punish so great an insolencie: and therefore as soone as he vnderstood thereof, he held it for most expedient to send backe PHILIPPICVS, for their Gouernor and Generall, and that PRISCVS should should returne. And besides PHILIPPICVS, hee also sent another Noble-man of great estimation, called ARISTOBVLVS, to pacifie the mutinie and rebellion of the Armie, by entreaty, gifts, or otherwise in the best manner he could: which he performed. And so PHILIPPICVS againe vndertook his charge: and returned to warre against MARYZAS a new Generall of the Persians; who with a greater Armie then any of those before named, came against him. Which is an argument of the great wealth and power of the Kings of Persia, who being so often ouerthrowne, they still returned with great forces, and that alwaies when they desired peace, the Empire willingly graunted it. And in the end the Emperors were well contented to defend their confines against them, and held it for a matter of great consequence.

Philippicus restored to his charge.

These two great Captaines and Armies came so neere together, that both parties desired to giue battaile, wherein they fought so obstinately, as it was one of the most cruell battailes in the World: and both the one and other partie fought with such obstinacie and courage, that it lasted the greatest part of the day, but the Persians were ouerthrowne; not for that they were eyther discouraged or ranne away, but for that they were almost all slaine. For in the Annales of Constantinople I finde written, that three thousand of them were taken prisoners, and two thousand escaped by flight, and that all the rest died fighting, and with them their Generall MARVZAS; so as their Campe was left to the Romanes, who found no man therein to make resistance. And so they spent one whole yeere in frontier warres, at the end whereof King HORMISDA commanded a very great Army to be leuied.

PHILIPPICVS, presuming on his former victories, made no doubt to giue them battaile; and the Persians refused it not, and so they fought neere to the Citie Martiopolis; and therein was PHILIPPICVS and the Romanes ouerthrowne, to their great losse and confusion. For which the Emperor was very sorrie, and prouided a new Generall for the East, and sent for PHILIPPICVS to come to Constantinople, with direction to leaue the Armie with HERACLIVS, of whom we made late mention, till that another General should come: which was performed. Afterwards ROMANVS was sent, and the King of Persia sent another, whose name was BARAS. These two Generals being arriued with their new charges, either of them sought to winne honour against the other; and in diuers incounters, lost many men, burned Townes, and did the greatest harme euery where they could, vntill at last they drew neere, and fought in a ranged battaile, wherein BARAS and the Persians were ouerthrowne, in the fields of Albania in Asia, which is a very great Prouince in the East, bordering vpon Armenia. HORMISDA was so grieued for this losse, imagining that it happened through the defect of his Generall, as thereby to disgrace him, he sent him a womans Garment, and commaunded him presently to leaue his gouernement. Yet notwithstanding, he had set matters in very good order, and had gathered together his scattered Armie. But he stood in such feare of his King, that the best remedie he could deuise, was to rebell against him; which he might easily effect, for HORMISDA was very cruell, and therefore hated by his subiects. After this (vpon the rebellion of BARAS) VINDOIS, a man of great power (whose brother HORMISDA kept in prison) conspired against him, with many others, which for his cruelty and couetousnesse extremely hated him: and they took him prisoner, and made his sonne COSROES their king. But his other sonne, with his wife, they put to death, and pluckt out his eyes; and afterwards his owne sonne caused him to be slaine: and so ended the raigne and life of HORMISDA. But the cruelties which the sonne vsed against his father, seemed so horrible and odious, that hee presently fell into as great hatred of all men, as his father had been in his life time; in so much that going to fight with BARAS, who as I said rebelled, the greatest part of the men of warre which he led, forsooke him, and went ouer to BARAS. So as COSROES seeing himselfe abandoned, resolued to sue to his enemies for reliefe, and fled into the territories of the Empire, and put himselfe into the power of PROBVS PATRICIVS, who had the guard of the frontiers, through which he passed, where he was very honourably entertained. Wherof when the Emperour MAVRICIVS was giuen to vnderstand, he was very glad, and sent vnto him a very honourable Captaine, whose name was NARSES, and a Bishop, a man of great authoritie and his kinsman, offering him all fauour and aide for the recouerie of his kingdome, and adopted and took him for his son.

Hormisda king of the Persians put to death by his son Cosroes.

Cosroes king of the Persians fled into the Empire.

NARSES, who went for Generall in this action, putting the same in execution, commanded all the Armies and men of warre which the Empire held in Asia, to be drawne to an head: and so he and COSROES went to seeke BARAS, who with the courage of a valiant Tyrant staied for them, and fighting was ouerthrowne, and by flight escaped into certaine mountaines.

Baras ouerthrowne in a battell by Cosroes.

After this noble victorie, COSROES recouered all his kingdomes, and he and the Emperor continued great friends: and so ceased the warres betweene the Empire and the Persians, which had continued six yeeres. This happened in the eight yeere of the raigne of the Emperour MAVRICE.

Whilest the Emperour MAVRICE managed these warres in the East, Europe continued not in rest nor peace; for besides the miseries and calamities of Italy (as I will presently relate) the Hunnes which dwelt in Hungarie, and in part of Noricum, now called Bauaria (whom wee but now cald Auares) after the name of a King of theirs who was called by that name, then raigning ouer them a King called CAYANVS, who was both proud and very valiant, and therewith very mightie, they and he concluded amongst themselues to make warre against the Empire: which they followed with such resolution as it caused no small feare: for entring through the vpper Missia, which now containeth the two prouinces of Seruia, and Bassina, he found so small resistance, as he came into Thracia, now called Gracia or Turkey, for that therein standeth the great citie of Constantinople: against whom MAVRICE sent an Armie, and for Generall thereof a valiant and prudent captaine whose name was COMENCIOLVS. These two made cruell warres, and after many skirmishes came to a battaile, which I leaue, being too long to recite; wherein CAYANVS was ouerthrowne with great losse of his people, and so was constrained to retire. But within short space after, he returned againe with no lesse power then at the first, to warre in the marches of Slauonia, and MAVRICE sent thither his sonne THEODOSIVS and his father in law GERMANVS, with other Captaines; who had so good successe, that although they lost in some encounters, yet they not only draue them out of that which they had formerly vsurped, but also wholly rooted them out of all Hungarie. But MAVRICE either for feare or retchlesnes forslowed those warres, and losing oportunitie (which is seldome recouered) the inconueniences ensued, which we will describe. For a kinde of people called Slauons, a nation inhabiting farre in the north, which vntill that time had neuer been heard of, sent their Ambassadors to the Hunnes Auares (moued thereto, by the newes which they had heard from them) and offered to come to their aid, as in deede they afterwards did, ioyned with them, and did much harme in the lands of the Empire, and out of it, as hereafter we will relate in few words.

Noricum Bauaria.

Warres betweene Cayanus and Commenciolus.

Cayanus & his people driuen out of Hungarie.

The Slauons came to make warres in the Empire.

Let vs now returne to Italie, which wee left in peace and at truce with the Lombards: wherein it happened, that as neither partie concluded the peace for any remorse of conscience, or for the feare or loue of God or their neighbours, but for their owne aduantage and priuate interest, and to awaite a fitter time and opportunitie for the warres (as for our sinnes it often happeneth) and as it was not pleasing to God, neither made according to his will, so he pleased not him to maintaine the same: for he sent his wrath and scourge vpon Italie, and chiefly vpon Rome, as a place which most needed amendment. The first was with raine, which fell in the moneth of September and October, for the space of many daies continually without ceasing, in such sort, that the water was so high, as the riuers and lakes of Italie ouerflowed and drowned an infinite number of people and cattell; and the riuer Tiber waxed so high, that all the fields which were not hillie and mountainous, were ouerflowne with water; so as all men feared that it would haue procured another generall deluge, particularly in Rome, where the riuer Tiber did swell so much, that in some parts it was as high, and in some other it exceeded and ouerflowed the walles of that citie, and the water entred in such manner into it, that it spoiled and defaced the greatest part of the buildings neere to the riuer. The cloud afterwards ceasing, the fields remained so filthie, so muddie and so soft, that they could not be tilled nor sowne; by reason whereof a generall famine ensued through all Italy. And in like manner through the excessiue moisture of the earth and the aire was so corrupted, as the plague began, which raged in such manner, that many townes were left desolate, and dispeopled; and where they died least, two third parts of the people perished. But in the citie of Rome (as all writers affirme) was the greatest affliction: for in the beginning it took away Pope PELAGIVS the second, in whose place succeeded (against his will and perforce) was chosen Saint GREGORIE, who seeing the wrath of heauen, that did mightily denoun prayers to God, and many sermons and orations to the people, exhorting them to amendment of life, and repentance for their sinnes, to the end, that it might please him to cease to with hold his punishment from them. And in this extremitie he ordained the Letanie, which is to this day vsed in the Church.

A wonderfull deluge in Rome and all Italy.

Pope Pelagius the second, famine, and pestilence.

The Letanie ordained to be said in the Church by Saint Gregorie.

Finally the Lord of his mercy took pitie on them, and the plague ceased, and the earth began to be more cheerfull, and to change colour, and to bring forth fruit. But yet this fauour which the Lord bestowed on them, auailed not to establish any peace or amity among those which escaped this plague: for, the Lombards, hauing gotten supplies of men of warre, without any respect of the feare or loue of God (the time of the truce being expired) renewed the wars with greater furie than at the first. And forasmuch as the Land had been punished with so great calamities, and lay waste and dispeopled, it was an easie matter for them to do great harm among the Imperialists. First, their King ANTHARIS in person went against FRANCILION, who commanded in the City of Como, with two other strong fortresses in the Lake of Como: and besieging him the space of six moneths, being no longer able to defend the City, he gaue it vp, and went to Rauenna; that City hauing valiantly defended it self with much honor the space of twenty yeers.

The taking of this City greatly enriched King ANTHARIS: for, FRANCILION had in that time gathered together and had in it much treasure. Departing from thence with great honour and wealth, he took other places. Whereupon the Emperor MAVRICE, at the intreaty of Pope GREGORIE, and the Exarch SMARAGDVS (who daily solicited him for aid and relefe) sent to CHILDEBERT, who at that time raigned King of France, a great summe of money, to the end hee should enter Italie with some great power, in his behalf: and the King of France promised to doo so, and began to put it in execution. Who coming into Italie, the fame of his coming began to work great effect; and some Captains of the Lombards reuolted to him. But CHILDEBERT imagining, that, if the Emperor again recouered Italie wholly to himself, he should hardly liue in safety in France; he therefore, coming to a composition with ANTHARIS, returned into his Country, without intermeddling in other mens quarels. At his return died ANTHARIS, King of the Lombards: and the principall men of that Nation, falling at variance among themselues about chusing of a new King, at last agreed that hee should bee King whom TEODELINDA (which was the last Kings widow) should take to husband; and she made choice of AGISVLPHVS, Gouerner of Taurino, now called Turin: and so he was made King, who was as valiant a Prince as any his Predecessors had been before him.

At that time the Emperor deposed SMARAGDVS from the gouernment of Italie, and sent thither for Exarch a Knight called ROMANVS (of whom we made mention in the warres of Persia) with some companies of souldiers for the defense of Rome, and to make warre in other places. ROMANVS, coming in the mean time, whil'st the new King AGISVLPHVS was busied with some of his Captains, who houlding certain Cities rebelled against him; prouided and furnished, with men and victuals, Padua, Mantua, Cremona, and the rest of the Cities which were in greatest danger: and, setting all things there in order, he came to Rome; from whence afterwards, with those forces which he brought, and those also which before his coming were in the City, he departed to recouer the Towns and Castles which the Lombards possessed in that Quarter: many of which hee did winne by force, and others voluntarily yeelded themselues.

Whilst the Exarch was busie about these things, the Pope sent three very learned men into England; who with their preaching conuerted the King and the Inhabitants thereof to the true faith, which vntill then was not throughly received among them. The like care hee took for Italie, and for all the other Prouinces: and TEODELINDA (the wife of King AGISVLPHVS) being a deuout Christian, he perswaded her and her husband to cause their people to leaue their idolatrie; which hee obtained: and afterwards hee intreated him to surrender to the Church the goods and reuenewes which he withheld from it.

About this time grew great contention between the Bishops of Rome and of Constantinople about the supremacy: for, IOHN Bishop of Constantinople alleaged, that to him did appertaine the Papacy, and to be Vniuersall Bishop of the Church, seeing that Constantinople was the head of the Empire. Against which, the Bishop of Rome opposed himself with all his power; alledging himself to bee CHRIST's Vicar, and Head of the Church: so as there passed many things of the one side and the other about this matter. In this mean time died ROMANVS the Exarch, and another was sent in his place, whose name was GALLICIANVS or GALLICANVS, who was a vertuous man and very valiant: and he presently applied himself to redresse many things which ROMANVS had peruerted and put of order. And although he much desired warre, yet through the counsell of the Pope he took truce: which being expired, he carried himself so valiantly in the warres, that he took the City of Parma by assault from the Lombards, and therein took a daughter of King AGISVLPHVS, whom he had by his first wife; and Contention betwixt the bishops of Rome and of Constantinople for the supremacy.

The Exarch Romanus dying, Gallicanus was sent in his place.

and grew to be so strong in field, that AGISVLPHVS durst not giue him battell. Whereupon, seeing himself ouermatcht, he sent to the Slauons for aid, who were already joyned with the Auares: and GALLICANVS leuying new forces died in Rauenna, and SMARAGDVS was again sent thither to be Exarch; who came into Italy with so small forces, that his coming did rather encourage, than dismay or daunt, the enemie: which proceeded from this; The Emperor so deadly hated the Popes presumption, that, rather than to endure the same, he was content to lose all Italie.

And to this his dislike was ioyned the trouble which the Slauons, who came to his enemies aide, did put him to: for CAYANVS the fierce and proud King of the Auares (the Slauons and their king MVSACIVS being come into Germany) ioyned his forces with his enemies, and some Frenchmen came also to them, and entred the bounds of the Empire. The Emperor sent against them one PRISCVS, a captaine of great account, with a mightie Armie, to stop their passage ouer the riuer Ister, now called Danubius; who warred so aduisedly and with so great valour and discretion, as most times that he fought with them he obtained the victorie. And one night he gaue the Slauons a Camizado, and took their King MVSACIVS prisoner, and slew a great number of them. There afterwards happened many things in that warre, which would be too long to relate: for CAYANVS King of the Auares, as he had many men, and those very expert and accustomed to the warres, besides the multitude of the Slauons, neuer ceased to make cruell warre against the Emperour MAVRICE; yet sometime they tooke truce, which lasted some space: and PRISCVS and he met and spake together concerning an agreement.

Musacius King of the Slauons taken prisoner by Priscus, General of the Emperours forces.

After all this, CAYANVS with his Auares and Slauons entred Dalmatia, and did great harme, robbing and spoiling many townes there. But PRISCVS comming to relieue them, he retired to his losse, and altring his course took his way towards Thracia: and marching without stay, came within few daies iourney of Constantinople. And as the report and feare is vsually greater then the daunger; so hee strake so great a terror into the citizens of Constantinople, as they were of the minde to haue abandoned the citie, and to haue passed ouer that arme of the Sea into Asia, as the Annales of Constantinople doe testifie. But the Emperor MAVRICE (as in truth he was valiant) commanded all the people to be put in Armes, and the gates of the citie to bee shut, and order to be taken in all things that were needfull, vsing infinite diligence; and gaue direction for the defence of the countries through which CAYANVS was to passe.

Cayanus inuaded the Empire.

A great plague in Cayanus his campe, where of seuen of his sons died in one day.

But all this needed not, for at that instant there fell so pestilent a mortalitie in CAYANVS his Armie, that in one day seuen of his sonnes (for he had many) and a great number of other people died of the plague: wherefore he was constrained to return into his countrie: And the Emperour sent for Generall another Captaine, whose name was COMENCIOLVS, who ioyning with PRISCVS, obtained certaine victories against CAYANVS. But he was of so haughtie a minde, and therewith so politicke, that notwithstanding that hee was ouerthrowne, yet within very few daies he euer reinforced his Armie, in such sort that he put his enemies in greater feare, then at the first; and in the end at the request and entreatie of the Lombards which liued in Italy, he resolued to warre in Slauonia, drawing neere vnto Italy: where, although that he found some resistance, yet the Slauons which came with him seised vpon a great part of that countrie, and remained there: and in processe of time it left the name of Illyricum, and after their name vntill this day is called Slauonia; and so from henceforth we will call it. From this nation (as BLONDVS, VOLATERRANVS, and others affirme) the Bohemians and Polonians are descended: for part of them tooke those countries, and vpon sundrie occasions took these names.

Illyricum called Slauonia.

The origine of the Bohemians and Polonians.

As matters stood vpon these tearms, the Lombards in Italie and their King AGISVLPHVS, knowing how much the Emperour hated the Pope, resolued to besiege Rome; which they did with a very great Armie, and the Pope was therein besieged aboue one whole yeere, and by his industrie onely the citie was defended, for from the Emperor came no reliefe at all: whereupon he wrote him certaine letters, which are yet extant, out of which is drawne great part of this historie. But notwithstanding all this, the Emperour MAVRICE would not relieue him, but rather wisht his destruction: but yet both he and the citie escaped, and at the yeeres end AGISVLPHVS raised his siege and departed.

It is written, that vpon a day about noone, in the citie of Constantinople, in the open market place of that citie, there appeared a man to the Emperor in the habit of a Monk, holding a sword in his hand, who speaking with a lowd voice, said, The Emperor MAVRICE shall die by this sword: and this man presently vanished amongst the people, so as no man could say whence he came, nor who he was. This is written by Pope GREGORIE, which you may beleeue if you will.

Prodigious visions appeared to the Emperor Maurice, prognosticating his death.

They

They also say, that in his steepe he saw a souldier whose name was PHOCAS, who murthered his wife and his children, and afterwards slew him also. With this dreame he was so much troubled, that he presently commanded his sone in law PHILIPPICVS to be sent for, who was charged by him to haue had a determination to rebell against him; and hee (not without great fear) came to him. The Emperor, after hee had desired him to pardon him for the false accusation wherewith he had slandered him, asked him whether hee knew any man of account in the Armie called by the name of PHOCAS: whereto he answered, that he knew a Centurion in the Camp of that name, whom hee had a little before made Pourioier for the Camp. MAVRICE again demanded, what manner of man he was: Quoth he, He is a cholerick, licentious yong fellow; but therewith fearfull, and a coward. Whereto they say, the Emperor (being much troubled and in despair) replied: If he be a coward, of necessity hee must bee cruell, and desirous to shed bloud: and so, shedding many tears, he told PHILIPPICVS what he had dreamt; who was therewith also much troubled. In the mean time there came messengers vnto him, which he had sent to certain religious persons to desire them to pray for him; who in some sort did recomfort him, perswading him to bee of good cheer: for, God would haue mercy on his soule. But yet he neuer ceased to bewail his sinnes, and liued in continuall sorrow and contrition. And PHILIPPICVS perswaded him to vse some great liberality to his Armie and men of warre, thereby to winne their loue, and the better to liue in safety from them. But he followed not his good counsell: and so within fewe daies after, his death was practised, in such manner as followeth.

He commanded his brother PETER, whom he had made Generall of his Armie, against the Slauons in Slauonia, that to auoide charge and expenses, in any case he should winter in the same prouince, and lodge his Armie in such villages and other places, where he might most annoy the enemie. Whereto notwithstanding that PETER answered to the contrarie, and entreated that hee might not doe so, alleaging that the Armie should sustaine intolerable trouble and extremitie in those mountaines; yet he continued so obstinate in his command, as PETER of force must obey, although against his will: and the Armie tooke this in so ill part, that without any respect of dutie and alleageance they mutined; and chusing the aforenamed PHOCAS for Generall, they marched against PETER, who was lodged about a daies iourney from thence, and he fled to the Emperour. BLONDVS writeth that the Captaines which fled, were THEODOSIVS, the Emperors son, and GERMANVS his father-in-law. But I heerin follow the Commentaries of Constantinople, and ZONORAS, which seem to be more conformable to the truth: for, they write, that the whole Armie sent an Ambassage to THEODOSIVS, willing him to come vnto them, and they would make him Emperor; and if he would not that then GERMANVS should come: but, they refusing, or not daring, to accept their offer, the Armie chose the same PHOCAS for Emperor; and he took his way towards Constantinople. Which when the Emperor MAVRICE vnderstood, calling to him his sonne THEODOSIVS, and GERMANVS his father-in-law, with COMINCIOLVS, PHILIPPICVS, and other great Captains, he began to take order for the defense of the City, and to leuie souldiers, and to make preparation for the warres. But, as this reuolt hapned through the permission and ordinance of God: so the people mutined in such manner, that nothing could bee done to any purpose; and there were many great tumults in the Citie. And among the people, and the Emperors owne kinred also, some laid the fault of what was befaln, vpon others; and some were in hope to be Emperors if MAVRICE lost the Empire: and others took part with PHOCAS the new Tyrant or Emperor.

Phocas chosen Emperour.

During this confusion and hurly-burly, PHOCAS, as fast as hee could march, came to Constantinople, accompanied with all the men of warre: and MAVRICE, who (vntill then) had euer bin so mightie against all nations, hauing now no sufficient power to defend himself, fled out of the City, and took shipping in a small Bark, with his wife and children, and passed ouer the Streight called Saint GEORGE his Chanell; and, entring into the Citie of Calcedonia (which is on the other side) was there ouertaken and apprehended by PHOCAS his souldiers, who was already comn to Constantinople. And, being brought back again, PHOCAS commanded him to be put to death: but he first made his two sons, three daughters, and his wife the Empresse, for his greater torment, to be slain in his presence; which he saw and endured with admirable magnanimity: and, as a faithfull Christian, recommending himself to God, he called vpon his holy Name, many times repeating these words; Iustus es Domine, & rectum iudicium tuum. And so he patiently suffred death, and had his head stricken off.

The Emperour Maurice fled for Constantinople

Hee

Hee died in the 63. yeere of his age, and the twentith of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord (after moſt writers) 603. Some write that when he fled from Conſtantinople, he ſent his ſonne THEODOSIVS to the King of Perſia, there to be kept, and that afterwards he was deliuered into the power of PHOCAS. And ſo ended and was extinguiſhed the whole houſe and linage of the Emperour MAVRICH. There were alſo put to death, by PHOCAS his commandement, the Emperors brother, PETER, and other principall men. In the time of this Emperour there were warres betweene the Kings of Spaine, and France, and betweene the Saxons and the Sueuians, betweene the French and the Auares, and ſome others: which for that they concerne not my hiſtorie, I omit. In this time alſo the Turkes began to be knowne in the world: for it is found written, that they made warres in Aſia againſt the Perſians. Then alſo began the name of the Bulgarians to bee knowne in Europe, a fierce people, of whom wee will ſpeake hereafter.

THE LIFE OF PHOCAS, ONELY OF THAT NAME, AND THREE-SCORE AND THIRD ROMANE EMPEROVR.

AFter the manner as I haue before declared, was the Emperor MAVRICE put to death: who, as he was valiant, wiſe, and venturous in the wars, if he had bin bountifull and liberall, hee had been accounted for a good Prince, and had longer enioyed the Empire. For all authors affirme, his couetouſnes and ſparing to haue bin the cauſe of his death, I meane of his corporall death: for the waies and iudgements of the Lord are vnſearchable and incomprehenſible. And to ſay the truth, couetouſnes is one of the moſt dangerous and hatefull vices wherewith a Prince can be infected: for beſides that it maketh him ill beloued and odious to his ſubiects, it is the fountaine and roote of greater euills in thoſe which are rich and mightie: for from thence grow violences, wrongs, rapine, briberie, extortion, crueltie, intolerable taxes, and impoſitions, no reward for ſeruice, condemning the innocent, abſoluing the guiltie for money, coueting other mens goods, vniuſt warre, and ſhamefull peace. Finally, in Kings and Potentates couetouſnes is the mother of all euills, and a vice which maketh their raigne and gouernment ſhort and miſerable; as may be prooued by many examples. And to the contrarie, liberalitie hath been the occaſion that many (notwithſtanding that they were wicked) raigned longer then others. And foraſmuch as I haue not time to make any long digreſſion, I conclude that the couetouſnes and miſerable ſparing of the Emperour MAVRICE, made PHOCAS ſo mightie, as to be able to bereaue him both of his Empire and life. And the ſame vice was afterwards the cauſe of his death alſo: as we will ſhew you, as ſoone as we ſhall haue related what happened in the Empire. When the Emperour MAVRICE was dead, there was none that durſt durſt lift vp his hand againſt PHOCAS, and therefore he was generally obeyed of all men (excepting NARSES, the generall commander in the Eaſt, before named.) This NARSES when he vnderſtood that PHOCAS had cauſed MAVRICE to bee ſlaine, he with an Armie went into a citie of Arabia, called Edeſſa; with a reſolution to yeeld him no obedience, but with the aide of the Perſians to make himſelfe ſtrong againſt him.

But PHOCAS was crowned in Conſtantinople by the Patriarch thereof with great ſolemnitie, and great ioy and gladnes of the people, who are euer deſirous of innouations: And as they ſuddenly deſire them, ſo they as ſuddenly abhor them. And the like happened in Rome vpon the newes of his election: for the Romanes hated MAVRICE, for the enmitie betweene him and the Pope whom they loued. As ſoone as Pope GREGORIE vnderſtood that PHOCAS was made Emperor, he wrote vnto him a notable epiſtle, which vntill this day is extant; wherein he admoniſhed and counſelleth him what he ought to doe, to be a perfect Emperor.

The firſt thing that PHOCAS did, was to ſend into all the prouinces and nations of the Empire, priuiledges, exemptions and kind letters, with new garriſons and ſouldiers where need required: all which he did with ſuch expedition and in ſo good order, that he made himſelfe well beloued of his ſubiects, and reſpected and feared by ſtrangers: but both in the one and in the other it continued but ſhort ſpace. And to GERMANVS who was Pretor and gouernor in the Eaſt, he ſent commandement preſently to goe and beſiege NARSES who rebelled againſt him. In the meane ſeaſon, AGISVLPHVS King of the Lombards (who in the troubleſome time wherein PHOCAS was choſen, and before his election, had taken the cities of Cremona, Mantua, and Volturnia, and therein had done irreparable harmes, aſwell in the walles and buildings of the citie, as among the citizens, the inhabitants, and their goods) for feare of the new Emperor concluded a truce with SMARAGDVS the Exarch, and with Pope GREGORIE, and with all Italy, for one yeere. And from thenceforth to be the better able to liue in ſecurity, he ſought to match his eldeſt ſon ADOALDVS with the daughter of THEODOBERTVS King of France. And ſo PHOCAS raigned in great proſperitie the firſt yeere; vntill hee began to diſcouer his baſe condition, and little worth, together with his extreame couetouſnes, and negligence in all things; by meanes whereof he became little regarded and eſteemed by all men, whereof enſued warres and troubles. In the ſecond yeere of his raigne died Pope GREGORIE, and SABINIANVS ſucceeded him, who alſo tooke truce for another yeere with AGISVLPHVS, which was afterwards prolonged for other three yeeres more, by Ambaſſadors ſent by AGISVLPHVS to the Emperor PHOCAS. And in the ſecond yeere alſo of the raigne of PHOCAS, began the warre againſt the Perſians, which in all mens iudgement was leaſt to be feared, conſidering how greatly COSROES King of Perſia, ſtoode bound to the Emperor MAVRICE, and to the Empire, for reſtoring him to his kingdome. The cauſe of of this warre is written ſo diuerſly, that I therefore leaue to ſet it downe: in the beginning wherof, GERMANVS the Generall in the Eaſt, leuied an Armie to make head againſt him, and they fought a battaile, wherein GERMANVS was ouerthrowne, and the greateſt part of the Imperiall Armie ſlaine: he being wounded eſcaped by flight, and within eleuen daies died thereof. When PHOCAS vnderſtoode of this loſſe, he then graunted the peace, which we ſpake of, to the Lombards, and procured the like with the Auares, with the Hunnes, and with the Slauons. With great diligence and little diſcretion, he ſent the greateſt part of his power into Syria, for the warres in the Eaſt, vnder the conduct of very good Captaines; and commanded LEONTIVS, and MAGNATES, who were two of them, to make warre vpon NARSES; who vpon the faith and ſecuritie giuen vnto him yeelded himſelfe: but PHOCAS breaking his faith and promiſe, made him moſt cruelly to be burnt. His Armie in the Eaſt had yet another battaile with COSROES, and was againe ouerthrowne with great diſhonour and confuſion. Whileſt the Emperors Captaines loſt theſe battailes, there grew very great tumults and factions in Conſtantinople, and in many other cities in Aſia; which roſe of very light and friuolous occaſions. Which were, that as in auntient time, in Rome, and afterwards in Conſtantinople, they vſed certaine ſports and games of running with chariots, and on horſe backe, after a kinde of turneying; as heretofore in the life of DOMICIANVS we haue declared: ſo now ſome clothing themſelues in greene, and others in gray, the common people which ſaw the ſame (as their manner is) affected ſome the one colour, and ſome the other; and this ſo much encreaſed, that (as in times paſt there had been great ſcandales, and murthers done vpon the like occaſions) ſo it pleaſed God to permit, that in the time of PHOCAS, the matter grew to that extremitie, as there were infinite ſlaughters and murthers committed, in Syria, in Egypt, in Graecia, and in many other prouinces:

Warre with the Perſians.

uinces: which the Emperor by his letters and commandements was not able to preuent. For notwithstanding that he was very cruell, and did wrongfully put many to death; yet was there small account made of him; for all men knew the basenes of his mind, and his disordinate vices, and couetousnes, and how that he applied himselfe to nothing, but to his pleasure amongst women, and to seeke new meanes to encrease his tributes, and to heape vp money: by reason whereof euery where were tumults, confusions, and riots; and the princes and nations bordering vpon the Empire knowing this, determined to seise vpon such part thereof as they could. CAYANVS with the Bauarians and Hunnes, comming from Noricum (by them called Bauaria) and from the countries of Hungarie and Austria; after they had enlarged their teritorie, concluded to make warre vpon the Lombards (which was the onely thing that kept the Empire in peace) and fighting a battaile with a great Armie, and a Captaine of them, the Bauarians obtained the victorie. After which CAYANVS took by force a citie called Forum Iulij, which hee wholly destroyed, and hauing done much harme and taken great spoiles in the prouince of Venice, he returned to his kingdome. Then the Slauons who before had made themselues Lords of a great part of Illyricum, in this time took all Illyricum, and Dalmatia, which now containes all the coast and countrey from Friuli to Durasso, by them called Slauonia. In this meane time, COSROES King of Persia was not idle, but entred with a mightie power into Mesopotamia, and took it all, and part of Syria, where, in battailes and conflicts, he wholy defeated the legions and Romane Armie. On the other side, his men of warre made themselues Lords of Armenia, and Cappadocia, and did much hurt in other prouinces of the Empire. Whilest these things passed in these parts; In Africa, which of long time (euen since the death of the Emperour IVSTINIAN) had been in peace, and in the seruice and obedience of the Empire; HERACLIVS whom some call HERACLIANVS, who for the Emperor PHOCAS was gouernour thereof, seeing his pusillanimitie and euill gouernment, began to leaue his seruice and to doe what best pleased himselfe, without any respect or regarde to his decrees or commandements. And to the end the mischiefe should be generall, in the citie of Antioch in Soria, the Infidels rose against the Christians, and slew a great number of them, together with the Patriarch of that citie; vpon whom PHOCAS commanded great punishment to be inflicted. Finally, in all the prouinces there was great disorder and little iustice, and those prouinces which bordered vpon the enemies were spoiled, and a great part of them lost. And the matter came to this issue, that one of these two things of necessitie must ensue; which were, that either the Empire must be rent in sunder, and wholly lost, or else PHOCAS must die. Whereupon the principall Captaines, and his chiefest friends, seeing it expedient for the common good, and the estate of the Empire, conspired against him, and resolued to kill him. Among which was his greatest fauourit PRISCVS, who by letters agreed with HERACLIVS (who gouerned Africa and rebelled, and to whose daughter PRISCVS was maried) to kill him, and make his sonne HERACLIVS which was his wiues brother, Emperor. There were also confederates in this treason (if it may be said to be treason to kill a tyrant and a traitor) PATRICIVS, and other principall men. And as PRISCVS was in great credit with PHOCAS, so he fained to reduce his father in law HERACLIVS to his seruice; and vnder this pretext, hee first brought his brother in law HERACLIVS to Constantinople, for a pledge and assurance of his fathers loyaltie. This treatie was double: for his father was presently to come to Constantinople, with the greatest power that hee was able to make, vnder colour to passe into Asia, against the King of Persia; and according to this rumor he did so, and came with a very great Armie, and suddenly landed in Thracia, which coast is now called Romania. And his sonne who remained in Constantinople with the fauour and in companie of PRISCVS, and many others, entred the palace and slew PHOCAS; and then presently arriued his father with his forces, and according to the agreement betweene them, young HERACLIVS was made Emperor, and generally obeied. In the manner of PHOCAS his death, authors which write thereof make some difference: but they all concur in this, that hee was slaine through the conspiracie of the Captaines, and great men before named; in the eight yeere of his raigne, and of the incarnation of our Sauiour CHRIST six hundred and eleuen, without leauing any sonne to succeede him in the Empire.

THE ARGVMENT.

HEraclius hauing slaine the tyrant Phocas, without any contradiction was made Emperor, who found the Empire very weake and in great combustion. In the beginning of his gouernment, the citie of Ierusalem was taken by Cosroes King of Persia; and the crosse of Christ which was left there by Helena mother to Constantine the great, was caried away. He obtained victorie against Iohn Campsinus a Captaine of his, which rebelled against him, and made himselfe a tyrant ouer part of Italy; by another of his Captaines whose name was Elutherius, who by reason of this victorie grew so proud, that he also dared to rebell, and to call himselfe King of Italy; but he was presently slaine by the same Captaines which tooke his part. And hauing concluded a peace with the Bauarians, he made his sonne Constantine, Cæsar, and his companion in the Empire; and leauing him (for that he was very yong,) vnder good keeping in Constantinople, he went against Cosroes, who had taken from him a great part of the Empire. To which warre he went himselfe in person; and hauing giuen his enemie two great ouerthrowes, he constrained him to flie. When he had expelled Cosroes, and recouered many countries of the Empire, he made peace with Cosroes sonne, who rose against his father, for an iniurie receiued from him; which peace was a great helpe to the Empire, and very hurtfull to Cosroes: but by meanes thereof, the sonne bereaued the father both of his kingdome and life. In these times began the seck of Mahomet, against which Heraclius in the beginning made no resistance, making no account thereof: but afterwards he began to feare the same when he could not suppresse it. This Emperour made a great exchange from vertue to vice; so as when he grew old, he became superstitious, an hereticke, and libidinous, giuing himselfe to pleasure, as a young man, when it had been more requisite and more honorable for him to haue liued gracely, as an old man; and took to wife a young woman, giuing himselfe more to carnall delight, then for his yeeres, and the dignitie of so mightie an Emperor was fit. But falling into the dropsie, he died suddenly, when he had raigned twentie yeeres.

AS the life and conditions of PHOCAS were odious to the world, and his raigne so vnhappie and infortunate, that the Imperiall sceptre and dignity was likely to haue wholly falne and to haue come to ruine; so all men reioiced at his death. And forasmuch as HERACLIVS was the actor and executioner thereof, they very peaceably and ioyfully receiued him for Emperor; who was a man fortunate in the warres, and obtained many noble victories, and possessed the Empire many yeeres, although that in the end many things happened contrarie, for his sinnes and little constancie in the Christian faith; as in his historie we will relate, as briefly as possibly we may. PHOCAS and those of his partie being put to death, HERACLIVS was with great ioy and solemnitie crowned in Constantinople, by the hands of SERGIVS, Patriarch thereof; his father HERACLIVS being there present, with PRISCVS and other great men, who had bin confederates in the conspiracie against PHOCAS. And vpon the same day he solemnized his mariage with a great Lady, whose name was EVDOXIA, who afterwards in the second yeere of his raigne died in childbed, of a sonne called CONSTANTINE: and he married for his second wife with a neece of his owne called MARTINA, which also bare him a sonne called HERACLIVS.

In what state Heraclius found the Empire.

This Emperor HERACLIVS found the Empire in such combustion, and so rent in peeces, as it seemed impossible to continue. The affaires of the East were in such case, as wee told you, where COSROES had defeated all the armies, and entring into the Empire, daily tooke townes and forts. In the prouince of Arabia Petrea, which bordreth vpon Egypt and Iudea, the Sarazins rebelled, with whome accursed MAHOMET afterwards made himself very mightie. CAYANVS and the Bauarians which inhabited Bauaria, Austria and Hungarie, seeing the Empire so weakened, come into Thracia, and made warres there. In Illyricum or Slauonia, the Slauons were of great power: and in Italy, although there was peace with the Lombards (for they were defeated and weakened by the ouerthrowes which they had receiued from the Bauarians and Slauons) yet there wanted not combustions and tumults: for PHOCAS before his death had bereaued SMARAGDVS (oftentimes before named) of his Exarchat and gouernment, and had sent thither another Captaine called IOHN; who comming to Rauenna, with his wife and family, and a great number of Iudges and officers for all Italy, PHOCAS was by that time dead; and IOHN being more earnest in demanding tributes, and other exactions then hee ought to haue been, the people were therewith so much incensed as they slew him: and so Italy remained without a gouernour. And at that time the Church of Rome being without a Bishop by the death of Pope BONIFACE, and by reason of discord among the Clergie, that seat being voide the space of eight moneths, a Captaine which liued in Naples, called IOHN CAMPSINVS, who gouerned that citie with the territorie thereof, determined to rebell and make himselfe Lord of Pulia, Calabria, Campania, and of a great part of that countrie, which at this day is the kingdom of Naples; imagining that the new Emperour should haue enough to do to defend or to recouer the rest, and so he might make himselfe King of Italy.

HERACLIVS comming to the Empire so torne and dismembred; to encounter with so many extremities, in the begining vsed not such diligence, as was requisite, neither had hee power or meanes. For as all Authors write he found the Empire so disarmed & vnfurnished of men of warre, as there were neither old souldiers, neither experienced legions left, but they were all slaine and scattered. Neuertheless hee began to make Captaines, and to leuie men of warre, and sent CRISPVS with such forces as he could get, together with such as his father brought him out of Africa, into the prouinces of Asia the lesse (now called Turkie) to guard and defend the same; seeing they were not able to giue battaile to the Persians: and hee caused his father to returne into Africa, which was all that the Empire peaceably enioyed, together with Sicilia and Sardinia; and he himselfe remained in Constantinople, procuring peace with the Bauarians and their King CAYANVS, by all possible meanes, as well by gifts as entreatie. But these things were so long adoing, that COSROES King of Persia, as master of the field, taking some Cities by surprise, and others by force, came conquering all Syria, and from thence into Palestina, and so to the Citie of Ierusalem; not the old Ierusalem, for that (as is already said) was destroied and laid waste by TITVS and VESPASIAN, but to that which the Emperour ADRIAN new builded, in the same place, or at least neere vnto it, as already is declared; which then was a great and an excellent City. And entring it by force he vsed great cruelty, and did much harme to the Christians; so as therein (as it is written) were slaine 80000 persons; and taking the wood of the crosse of Christ, which HELEN mother to CONSTANTINE the Great had left there, and carrying it thence with him, he set it with great reuerence vpon the top of his chaire, or royall Throne, made of fine Gold, set with many Iewels and Pearles. He likewise carried with him prisoner ZACHARIAS the Patriarch of Ierusalem, who was an excellent Prelate.

The Citie of Ierusalem taken by the Persians.

This taking of Ierusalem, some Authors write to haue happened about the end of the raigne of the Emperour PHOCAS: but the most certaine and true opinion is, that it befell in the time of HERACLIVS, wherein I place the same. CRISPVS who was sent by the Emperor, and then was in the prouince of Cappadocia in Asia the lesse, endeuoured to leuie souldiers, and to prouide (so much as in him lay) for the defence of those Countries, against the great power of the Persians: but it auailed not at that time. And for as much as it was bruited that the Persian meant to goe into Egypt, and thence to make a conquest of Africa; HERACLIVS father to the Emperour being then in the City of Carthage, leuying a great number of men of war, departed thence, marching along the Sea coast, to goe into Egypt to make head against the Persians; where we will leaue him, and tell you first what ensued after that IOHN CAMPSINVS rebelled with the City of Naples, and all that Prouince.

The Emperour being much moued with his audaciousrebellion, sent a Captaine into Italie, whose whose name was ELEVTHERIVS, with a good number of souldiers; which captaine was of a great and noble familie, and very wise and expert in the warres. He as soone as he arriued at Rauenna with his fleete, was receiued end obeyed there; and vnderstanding who they were which had conspired in the rebellion and insurrections past, he punished some of them, vsing greater clemency then seueritie. And therewithall hee speedily assembled such forces as remained in the gouernement of Rauenna; with which, and with those which hee brought with him, he purposed to take his way against CAMPSINVS, who lay in Naples; and by the way went to Rome, where he was well entertained and honoured by DEVS DEDIT, who then was Pope. And marching towards Naples, CAMPSINVS considering that by prolonging the wars he daily lost, and the Emperors partie encreased; with the greatest and best power that he was able to make he took the field, and neer to the citie of Naples they two fought a cruel battell; but ELEVTHERIVS obtained the victorie, although very hardly; for CAMPSINVS fought valiantly, and died fighting.

Eleutherius sent by the Emperor against Iohn Campsinus.

Campsinus ouerth rowne and slaine by Eleutherius.

After this battell, ELEVTHERIVS with small difficultie recouered all that CAMPSINVS had vsurped, and returned with victorie to Rome: and for his better securitie, and to bring to effect such things as he had proiected (which we will presently tell you) he practised to prolong the peace with AGISVLPHVS King of the Lombards, which was concluded for other ten yeers. And he procured and leuied money, wherewith he payed and contented his souldiers and men of warre: for which his doings so valiantly and so speedily accomplished, the Emperor HERACLIVS sent him the authoritie and title of Exarch and Gouernor of all Italie; wherewith he came to Rauenna, which was the seate of the Gouernors, leauing all Italie in peace and in quiet subiection (Lombardy excepted, and the rest which the Lombards possessed) by meanes whereof he grew so proud and so ambitious, as without the feare of God, or respect to the Emperor, knowing himselfe to be greatly beloued by his souldiers, he rebelled against his soueraigne Lord, and tooke vpon him the title of King of Italie, and presently departed with his Armie from Rauenna towards Rome, meaning to make himselfe Lord of all the countrie. But it pleased God to giue him speedy punishment: for the same Captains which aduanced him, and vpon whom he had grounded his disloyaltie; the same I say, to shew themselues loyall to the Emperor, within few daies iourney from Rome slew him, when he nothing suspected any such matter; and the Armie approued his death; and they altogether returned to Rauenna, and sent his head to the Emperor to Constantinople; who being aduertised of what had passed, was very well pleased with what they had done. Then he sent for a new Exarch, a Noble Constantinopolitane, called YSANTIVS, who was very well entertained. And at the same time died the valiant AGISVLPHVS king of the Lombards, and his son ODOALDVS being a childe of tender age, was made their King; and the wife and Christian Queene THEVDELINDA his mother, took vpon her the gouernement, and gouerned that kingdome very wisely and discreetly, and obserued and renewed the peace made with the Italians, and the Imperialists; and so Italie remained for some space in rest. But in the warre against the Persians, matters hapned to the contrary: whereof we will make a briefe relation, and what end it had.

The death of Agisulphus king of the Lombards

HERACLIVS the Emperors father, who was Gouernor of Africa, marching with great power towards Egypt, to make head against the Persians, being very ioyfull, and of great power, by the way died of an infirmity. By his death all was out of order and came to nothing: for there was not any man amongst them capable of the gouernment, or fit to leade an Army. This hapned in the sixt yeer of the raigne of the Emperor HERACLIVS; who all that time remained in Constantinople giuing himselfe to pleasure and ease. When the King of Persia vnderstood of the death of HERACLIVS the gouernour of Africa; with the greatest haste hee could make, hee sent a very mightie armie into Egypt; and as that kingdome was vnfurnished of men of warre, and the Persians became victorious, so in few daies they made themselues absolute Lords thereof: and the same yeere passing further, they conquered Africa euen to the citie of Carthage; for no citie neither people were of power able to make head against them. Which HERACLIVS vnderstanding, hee sent Ambassadors to King COSROES, with milde words entreating him for peace, desiring him to desist from shedding so much bloud, and to rest satisfied with what he had done. To this Embassie the Infidell made answere, so hautily, and with such pride, that among other things he sent him word, that he would grant no peace to HERACLIVS, except he would renounce the Faith of IESVS CHRIST, and adore his Idols. With this answer the Ambassadors returned, and the Persians the yeer following (prosecuting their warres) besieged the Citie of Carthage, and tooke it, with the marches thereof, and leauing gouernours and Garrisons in that countrey, returned into Asia most richly loden with spoiles.

HERACLIVS hauing obserued how much of the Empire hee had lost, resolued with himselfe to goe in person to recouer the same, or to lose the rest; whereto the Bauarians and their King CAYANVS, were a great hinderance. But to the end that the reader may the better vnderstand the matter, let him know, that these Bauarians (in former time called Hunnes Auares) of a long time called their Kings CAYANI, as the Egyptians called their Kings PHARAONES, and as many other nations gaue their Kings ordinarie and peculiar names. I say then, that CAYANVS returned with his forces to infest the countrie of Thracia, which till then had free passage. And this was the cause that the Emperor HERACLIVS was detained two or three yeers, after that which hapned in Africa; vntill at length he sought all waies and means to come to a peace with CAYANVS, although to his dishonor & with losse of reputation. Finally, it was concluded and confirmed with great othes and promises: and so leauing all Italie and Grecia in peace, he resolued to march against the Persians, and to that end he named and ordained for CÆSAR and his companion in the Empire, his sonne CONSTANTINE, to make his abode in the citie of Constantinople. And forasmuch as hee was very yong, hee appointed SERGIVS, Patriarch of Constantinople, and BONOSVS a wise and noble gentleman, for his gouernours and tutors. Which being ordained, preparing the greatest power and munition that hee was able, with many praiers and solemne processions, he departed from Constantinople with great solemnitie, and embarking himselfe with his people, hee passed ouer into those prouinces which were vnder his obedience in Asia, and entertained into his pay many other nations. And forasmuch as his souldiers were but newly raised, hee thought it not fit presently to march vntill that they were better practised and trained. Which being done, calling vpon the Lord for aide, he entred into his enemies countries. This his iourney was so much bruited and obserued by all the nations of the world, as there was no man but had an especiall eye thereto.

Heraclius made his sonne Constantine, Cæsar.

COSROES K. of Persia, being well informed, how valiant & good a captain HERACLIVS was & how resolute an armie he led, resolued not to giue him battel, but retired himselfe within his countrie, and made all the victualls to bee withdrawne and carried away, and the trees to bee cut downe, and laid athwart the waies where hee supposed the Emperor would passe. And on the other side, hee sent an huge armie of very expert old souldiers, vnder the leading of a captaine called SAVARAGVS, or SALVARVS (for in these names the authors euer vary) to the end that hee should charge the Emperor; either on the flanke or on the backe, who with great resolution and in good order marched against King COSROES; and by the way recouered and wonne many cities. But holding it for no assured course to leaue so great an armie behinde him, hee tooke another way, and fought out SARAVAGVS; and hauing passed the great mountaine Taurus, the two armies approched the one neere the other, not far from a riuer: before which time there passed many conflicts and other accidents between them, which I cannot possibly set down at large. The conclusion therof was, that they came to blowes: and as the Persians of long time had been victorious, and made small account of the Romans (I alwaies call those Romanes which were of the Emperors armie: for although that the seate of the Empire was in Grecia, yet the Emperors euer tooke a glory to bee called Romane Emperours, and their armies, the Romane armies) and as the Imperialists holding themselues for disgraced and dishoneſt, had a great desire to bee reuenged (the presence and great valor of the Emperor being a great helpe thereto) both the one and the other fought with so great courage and obstinacie, as the battaile continued long, and was very cruell. And although that in the beginning it was very doubtfull, yet in the end the Emperour obtained the victorie, and made great slaughter of his enemies. With this victorie the Imperialists were so much incouraged, as they abandoned the feare, which vntill then had possessed them; and the Emperor was wonderfull ioyfull to see himselfe victorious. And forasmuch as winter drew on, he purposed to retire himselfe, being loden with exceeding rich spoiles, and many prisoners; intending to returne the next spring with greater force, which was in the eleuenth yeere of his raigne.

A battaile betweene the Romans and the Persians, with the successe.

But on the contrarie side, COSROES was very sorrie, and much grieued; and imputing the fault to his Generall, deposed him from his charge, purposing to haue caused him to be slaine, and made another Generall, called SAIN, or SATHIN, a very valiant man and of great account: and gathering together the remainder of the last Armie, he commanded him to raise one one farre greater; and that he should follow the warre with a greater resolution and vehemencie. The Emperour who had not shaken off all care that was needfull, although he would willingly haue accepted of peace, conditionally that he might haue had that restor'd which was taken from him (which he attempted, but could not obtaine) after that he had made his accustomed praiers to God, courageously returned to the warres. And as this SAIN desired to excell his predecessor SARAVAGVS, and to recouer what he had lost, without delaying of time, he went to meete the Emperor, and desiring to come to a battaile with him, he drew his Armie neere vnto his; which wanted neither force nor courage to fight.

The next day in the morning (seeing themselues so neere together) they began to set their people in order: but their troupes of either side were so great, as they spent almost one whole day. Whereupon they took truce, vntill the next day, to auoide fighting by night: so resolute was either partie, and so they slept in the same place, and in the same order as they were set. The next morning by sunne rising, the one Armie began to moue toward the other; and there began one of the most bloudie and cruell Battailes that had been seene, which continued most part of the day without any signe of aduantage or victorie of either side, fighting at equall hand: but by that time the Persians had so oppressed the Romanes, as they began to shew their weaknes, and the Emperour was in feare to haue been ouerthrowne: but it pleased God miraculously to relieue him, for suddenly fell so much raine and haile, with so terrible winde and tempest, beating vpon the backes of the Romanes, and in the faces of the Persians, which did so much trouble them and put them out of order, that in a very short space they were broken and ouerthrowne, and turning their backes ranne away. The Emperour HERACLIVS remained with the victorie, maister of the field, when he had slaine thirtie thousand of his enemies in the battaile; although with no small losse of his owne people; hauing obtained two so great and notable victories against the Infidels. The Emperour sent to make all this knowne in Constantinople, in Italy, and in all the other prouinces of the Empire; for which euery where was made great ioy: and in the meane while he himselfe was not idle; but reinforcing his Armie, and encouraging his people, he recouered a great part of Syria, and Mesopotamia, which he had lost; part in his owne person, and part by his Captaines, and he still followed his victorie, vntill that the great waters, by reason of the winter staied him and forced him to returne, and to winter that yeere in the prouince of Albania. COSROES King of Persia, as he was a mightie prince, and his dominion great, so the losse of these two battailes, was not such as to bereaue him of meanes againe to make head against his enemie: for gathering together his whole forces, he leuied men of warre, and issuing his treasure, raised a greater and a more mightie Armie, then any of the former; and made a prudent and resolute Captaine called RAZATENES Generall thereof: who being very valiant, was not afraid to draw neere to the way, where he knew the Emperor was to passe the nex spring.

A truce for one night betweene the Persians and the Romanes.

A miraculous victorie.

Finally, after many skirmishes and effusion of much blood, and such like casualties of the warre, HERACLIVS putting his whole trust in God, sought to come to a battaile, which the Persian refused not; so as with equall mindes, and in a manner, with equall force and Armies, two squadrons first began the fight in the morning, and afterwards others, and in the end all, and this battaile continued vntill about sun-set: wherein the Imperialists in power and courage surpassing the Persians, constrained them to turne their backes, and to yeeld themselues for ouerthrowne. And RAZATENES as a good Captaine, failing in no part of his office, died fighting, for that he would not liue being ouercome; after that many thousands of men were slaine and wounded of the one side and the other. In these three great battailes, and in many other of lesse account, it is written, that the Emperor himselfe in person, shewed great valour, especially in this last, where he slew with his owne hand, three men of great esteeme which he encountred in sundrie places of the battaile, besides others which hee slew and wounded of lesse account.

The Persians the third time ouerthrowne by the Emperour and their generall slaine fighting.

By meanes of this victorie, HERACLIVS grew so powerfull, and COSROES so weake, and his forces were so much diminished, that daring no longer to defend that which hee had vsurped in Armenia, and Mesopotamia, he abandoned the same; and passing ouer the riuer Tigris fled into Persia: HERACLIVS also passed that riuer, and ouerranne the countrie burning and spoiling great cities. In this manner conquering the kingdomes of COSROES, and COSROES not so hardie as to defend the same, but by flight hiding himselfe; for his refuge and defence in his life time he made his second sonne whose name was MEDARSES, against all equitie and reason, equall with himselfe in his kingdome; for he had an elder sonne, a man of greater spirit, and of more discretion, called SIROES; and (as it often happeneth to the wicked) by the same meanes whereby he thought to haue defended his kingdome, he lost it, together with his life: for his eldest sonne took this iniurie done to him by his father in so ill part, as he practised to bereaue him both of life and kingdome. To which purpose he began by Letters and secret messengers, to treate with the Emperour, entreating his fauour, and to bee at peace with him: in requitall whereof, when he should be established in the kingdome, hee promised to yeeld vnto him what he should require, if it were in his power. In conclusion, briefly to set down the Composition, they agreed vpon these conditions: That hee should resigne to the Emperour all those lands and countries which his father and predecessors had vsurped in the prouinces of Asia, and all that which they had gotten by conquest in Africa, and all the treasure of his fathers royall house. And that he should resigne the two inuincible fortresses, which the Persians held in the principall passages of the riuer Tigris, with the crosse, and the Patriarch which they brought from Ierusalem, and that hee should bee a perpetuall friend and allie to the Emperour.

Cosroes made his second son equall with him in his kingdome, whereby he lost the sonne together with his life.

This league being concluded, SIROES was so magnanimous, and therewith so well beloued, as within few daies, with the aid and fauour of HERACLIVS, and such forces as hee sent him, he gat both his father and his brother into his power, whom hee caused to be slaine; and throughly performed al that which he had agreed vpon with HERACLIVS; and so enioyed the kingdome in peace, although of lesse power then his father was. And HERACLVS returned, leauing all the prouinces of the Empire restored and furnished, and all the passages of the riuer Tigris fortified, the most ioyfull and honoured Prince that then liued in the world. Being come to Ierusalem, he sent his Captaines into Africa, which he wholly recouered, and reduced the same to a quiet gouernement. This was in the sixt yeere after that he began the warre in his owne person, and the sixteenth and seuenteenth of his raigne; although in these computations there be euer some difference betweene authors. When he came to Ierusalem, hee restored ZACHARIAS the Patriarch thereof, and the crosse which had been fourteene yeeres in the power of COSROES, and came into the citie bearing the same vpon his shoulders, with the greatest ioy, feasting and solemnitie that could be made: and this restitution of the crosse was so highly esteemed, as it was afterwards solemnized euery yeer vpon the fourteenth day of September, which is called the exaltation of the crosse.

Heraclius restored the crosse to Ierusalem. The exaltation of the crosse.

In those daies the false Prophet MAHOMET, the deceiuer and seducer of the greatest part of the world, with his illusions and tromperies, in the countrie of Arabia drew many to his sect, and grew a mightie tyrant; whom HERACLIVS might then easily haue defeated: but making small account of him, he contented himselfe with the taking of a certaine people from him called Sarazins, which falsely boasted themselues to be descended from SARA, ABRAHAMS wife; who were also called Scenites, and liued in the fields, as the Arabians doe at this day: and giuing them pay, the Emperour sent them into other prouinces, which at that time seemed to haue been a sufficient redresse. Hauing taken order for his affaires in those quarters, he returned to Constantinople, whither hee came with the greatest triumph that could be made. Herein is some difference: for some authors write, that before his going to Ierusalem he returned to Constantinople: but it importeth not whether were the first; but in the end the Emperour came to repose himselfe in Constantinople, with very great honour and reputation amongst his subiects, and was by all other Kings and Princes at that time much beloued and feared.

The succesſe of the false Prophet Mahomet.

The Emperor Heraclius came victorious and triumphant to Constantinople.

In Italie all was in peace with the Lombards in those daies, ODOALDVS raigning with his mother THEVDOLINDA; and she dying, the subiects making no account of him, for that he was a very childe, denied him their obedience, and chose ARIOLDVS, who was of the bloud royal: and he maintained the peace with the Empire in as ample manner as did ODOALDVS and THEVDOLINDA. HERACLIVS hauing so good succesſe in all things, as aforesaid, prosperitie (as ordinarily it worketh in many men) made him proud and careleſſe, forgetting God, and those workes and exercises of pietie whereby he had attained to that prosperitie. For in steede of prayer and contemplation, he gaue himselfe to pleasure, to augurie, southsaying and diuination, prognosticating things to come, by superstitious and vnlawfull Arts and meanes; and from one to another fell into hereſies: for being seduced by two wicked Prelates, the one called PIRRHVS, Patriarch of Alexandria, and the other a Bishop called CIRVS, he came to beleeue that there was a will onely in Christ, and so consequently hee denyed the two natures, diuine and humane. Neither could the admonitions and Letters of Pope HONORIVS auaile to diſſwade him from that hereſie, who banished PIRRHVS into Africa. It pleased pleased God to permit, in his secret & incomprehensible judgement, that MAHOMET began so to prosper and preuail in his proceedings, that HERACLIVS began to stand in fear of him, of whom in former time he made small account: for, he had daily news, that he leuied men of warre, which came vnto him as well out of Arabia, as out of Persia; some deluded through his allurements and suggestions; others, to enioy the great liberty which hee gaue them to rob and steal: for, these were the miracles wherewith in the beginning he planted his diueliſh sect. And it followed that the Sarazins, which we said HERACLIVS had gotten from him, by reason of the Emperors ill pay and entertainment, mutined, and went to MAHOMET into Arabia. So as he went out of Arabia felix, where he first gathered head; and, making himself Lord of the three Arabiæ, went into Egypt, and afterwards into Syria, and into Mesopotamia; and had so good succesſe, that with those Sarazins, and such other forces as he could get, hee resolued to make himself King of Persia. Whereto, this was a great help; for as much as that Kingdome was much wasted and weakned, as well by ciuill diſſension, as through the great slaughter made therein by HERACLIVS: and besides this, the Inhabitants of meer lightnes reuolted to MAHOMET.

Mahomet his succesſe.

There raigned at that time in Persia a great man whose name was HORMISDA, allied to the fore-passed Kings: for, SIROES (who was HERACLIVS friend) raigned but one yeer in that Kingdome; and after him his sonne ADHESSER likewise but a yeer. By the death of which two, HORMISDA attained to the Kingdome; but not in peace, nor without great tumults and contradictions.

At that time MAHOMET marched towards Persia with his Sarazins, and much other people; against whom came HORMISDA: and they two fought a very great battell; wherein HORMISDA was ouerthrowne and slain. Yet some write, that MAHOMET was first ouerthrowne. This onely battell, and the illusion and deceit of his sect and superstitious religion, brought all Asia vnder his obedience, together with all Africa, Babylon, and all the other Prouinces subiect to the mighty Kings of Persia. And he wholly subuerted that Empire; so as from that time forwards it had not any title of a Kingdome: but all those Nations lost their names, and from thenceforth were called Sarazins and Mahometists, after their false Prophet and Leader; whereas in truth they ought to haue bin called Agarenes, Ismaelites: for, MAHOMET descended from ABRAHAM, by AGAR a bond-woman, and his son ISMAEL.

The originall of the Sarazins & their succesſe.

The Emperor, vnderstanding of these victories, applied not himself to resist the course thereof with such magnanimity as he ought to haue done, notwithstanding that he knew he returned into Syria and Palestina, with a resolution to take Ierusalem: but hee sent thither onely to fetch from thence the Crosse of CHRIST, and to bring it to Constantinople: from whence afterwards in processe of time it was brought to Rome. MAHOMET then came, and took many great Cities in Syria, wherein he found small resistance; and, among them, the City of Ierusalem, publishing himself euery where to be the Prophet of God. Yet some write, that Ierusalem was not taken by MAHOMET; but, by his Succesſors, after his death: but it imports not greatly whether it were taken by him or others.

Within fewe daies after these victories, MAHOMET deceased, being of the age of two and fortie yeers: but, leauing disciples of his wickednes, his sect and superstition died not, nor took any end; but continueth vntill this day, and will continue vntill it shall please God for his mercies sake to cure this contagion. For, his Succesſor remained, a great Arabian Captain called CALIPHA: and him others succeeded, who conquered Africa, and other Countries; as in the processe of this Hiſtory shall be expressed.

The death of Mahomet.

Calipha, Mahomets succesſor.

While these things passed in the East; in Italy, notwithstanding that there was peace with the Lombards, as it is often seen that forrain peace breeds ciuill warre; so MAVRICE CARTVLARIVS, who was President of Rome, making small account of the Emperor, or of his Exarch ISANCIVS, rebelling made himself a Tyrant. Against whom, ISANCIVS came from Rauenna, and after many aduentures apprehended him, with many other his confederates; and, carrying him to Rome, smote off his head: and shortly after this, ISANCIVS died. And the Emperor HERACLIVS sent a Noble-man, cald THEODORE GALLIOPA, to be Gouerner of Italy. But none of all these things could moue the minde of HERACLIVS to leuie any Armie against the Sarazins; he gaue himself so much to his pleasure and licentious liuing, marrying in his old age with his brothers daughter, who was a yong damsell, called MARTINA: and so it pleased God that vpon a time he was taken with the dropsie; whereof hee died suddenly, when he had raigned thirty yeers, in the yeer of our Lord 641. Others say, that hee died died of a diſeaſe called Priapiſmus, a ſtrange ſickneſs, and ſuch as with modeſty cannot be expreſſed. He left behinde him two ſonnes, and one daughter, which hee had by his firſt wife. His daughters name was EPIPHANIA: one of his ſons was called HERACLIVS; the other, CONSTANTINE, whom he made CÆSAR, when he went to the wars in the Eaſt againſt the Perſians. By his ſecond wife he had one ſonne, a childe of ten yeers ould, called HERACLIVS alſo. And ſo ended this Emperor: of whom it may be ſaid, that two Emperors might well haue been made; one very good, and the other paſſing ill, conſidering the contrariety in his actions.

At what time the Emperor HERACLIVS died, the Empire of the Eaſt was much decaied; for, all the Prouinces of Syria, Meſopotamia, Egypt and Arabia, were in the power of the Infidels. In Italy, THEODORE GALLIOPA was Gouerner: and in Lombardie, through the death of ARIOLDVS, ROTARIVS was King. The Slauons poſſeſſed Illyricum: and the Hunnes and Bauarians held Hungarie, Bauiere, and Auſtria. In Spain raigned the Gothes: and the French proſpered in France; and in Germany ſundry other Princes. So as the Empire contained Thracia, the Prouinces of Gracia, the Iles of Sicilia and Sardinia and the greateſt part of Italie in Europe; and in Aſia, Armenia, Aſia the leſſe, Cilicia, Pamphilia, Galacia, Bythinia, Cappadocia, and other Prouinces, with all Africa: which I haue ſet down of purpoſe, to the end the Reader may the better vnderſtand what ſhall be ſaid heerafter.

IN the Hiſtory of the liues of the two ſonnes of the Emperor HERACLIVS, PAVLVS DIACONVS and BEDA ſeem to diſſent from other Hiſtoriographers; firſt placing the Empire of HERACLIANVS, who was yonger than CONSTANTINE, and ſonne of his ſecond wife MARTINA: but I follow the opinion of other authors. The Emperor HERACLIVS beeing dead and buried, there was no open contradiction that might hinder his eldeſt ſon, born of his firſt wife EVDOXIA, who died in childe-bed of this CONSTANTINE (which CONSTANTINE had a yong man to his ſonne, called CONSTANS) from obtaining the Empire; aſwell for that he was made CÆSAR in his fathers time, as alſo for that in right he ought to haue it, being his fathers eldeſt ſonne, and of full age; and alſo for the hope which they conceiued that he would proue a good Prince. He was then preſently accepted and crowned with great joy and ſolemnity; but to the great diſcontentment and grief of his his mother in law MARTINA; whoſe wickednes did ſo ſhorten the raigne of her ſonne in law, as there can be no worthie action written of him, that hee either did, or that paſſed in his time; ſauing that he gaue good ſignes and ſhewes of a good Emperor, and began to be beloued by his ſubiectes; which encreaſed the hatred of that miſchieuous woman his ſtepdame; and he repoſing his truſt in hir, ſhe gaue him poiſon in his meate, whereof he died in the fourth moneth of his raigne: and they alſo ſay, that it was done by the direction and counſell of PETER the hereticall Patriarch of Conſtantinople. The Emperor CONSTANTINE being thus wickedly made away; the murthereſſe MARTINA, with ſuch fauour and aide as ſhe procured, made her ſonne HERACLIANVS Emperour, brother to him whom ſhe had poiſoned, being of the age of eleuen yeeres; and ſhe took vpon her the gouernment: but this villany could not long continue, for the Nobility deteſting ſo deteſtable a fact, roſe againſt MARTINA and her ſon, when he had raigned ſcarcely two yeeres: in which time I finde not any thing written to haue been done of importance; and therefore I cannot diuine ought, ſauing that in this yeere the Sarazins took the city of Ceſaria, which they had beſieged the ſpace of ſeuen yeeres; and therein ſlew ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers of the Empire. The Senate and Nobility ioyning with CONSTANS, ſon of the deceaſed CONSTANTINE, and Nephew of the Emperor HERACLIVS, made him Emperor; apprehending MARTINA and her ſonne HERACLIANVS: and ſo ended the vnluckie and vnfortunate raigne of thoſe two brothers, which ſcarcely merit to be accounted amongſt the Emperors. When as the mother and ſonne were apprehended, the mother had her tongue cut out, and the ſonne his noſe cut off, and both were exiled into the prouince of Cappadocia in Aſia the leſſe. Alſo PIRRHVS the Patriarch which came from baniſhment out of Africa, and came to intrude himſelfe into theſe counſels, died likewiſe, as an hereticall Wolfe clad in ſhepheards rayment; and in his place was choſen PAVL, who in the end proued like to his predeceſſor. Which befell in the yeere of our Lord ſix hundred fortie fower.

The Emperor Conſtantine the third put ſo-ned by his ſtep-mother Martina.

Heraclianus ſucceeded his brother Conſtantine in the Empire.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND SIXT Romane Emperor.

THE making of CONSTANS Emperour (whom ſome call CONSTANTINE) by the Senate of Conſtantinople (which we may call Romane;) and the death of his vncle HERACLIANVS, of whom we now left writing, was all at one inſtant: and the great wickedneſſe vſed by MARTINA in poiſoning his father, made the raigne of the ſonne more firme and aſſured. But CONSTANS proued not ſuch a one as they hoped, and as indeed was needfull for the preſent eſtate of the Empire; for he was infected with the Arrian Hereſie: and concerning the affaires of the Eaſt, he contented himſelf to make head againſt MAHOMET'S ſucceſſors, by placing garriſons in the paſſages of Cilicia, to keep them from entring into Aſia the leſſe; and ſo they remained Lords of thoſe prouinces which they had gotten in the Eaſt. Pope THEODORE vnderſtanding that PAVL the new Patriarch of Conſtantinople held held some erronious opinions of the Christian faith, wrote vnto him certaine louing monitory Letters, perswading him to amendment, and to conforme himselfe to the truth. But when hee perceiued his labour to be in vaine, he proceeded otherwise against him, and depriuing him of his dignitie, he commanded him to be banished: but the new Emperor would not permit it, but rather shewed himselfe to be of the same opinion; which made a generall confusion euery where; for the head being sicke, the rest of the members ill execute their office.

In Constantinople and in Grecia, the catholike Christians were much afflicted with the new heritickes; for that the Emperor took their part; and in Asia, they held warres with the Mahometicall Sarazins. In Italy, although there were peace with the Lombards, through the good gouernment of the Exarch THEODORVS, and the care and endeuour of the Pope, yet the diuell after his accustomed manner sowed tares among the good seede; which was, that by the meanes of some of his disciples, he perswaded ROTHARIVS King of the Lombards to leane to the opinion of his ancestors, which was the Arrian heresie; and the more earnest the catholike Christians were in resisting the same, with so much the greater obstinacie he placed in euery citie an Arrian Bishop, where before had been catholike Bishops. Pope MARTIN who succeeded Pope THEODORE, against the new heresie held by the Emperour and some prelates in the East, assembled a councell of one hundred and fiue Bishops; wherein they which held those opinions, were condemned and proclaimed heretikes, and he depriued the said Patriarch and sundry Bishops of their prelacies and dignities: wherewith the Emperor CONSTANS was highly offended, and did that which hereafter shall be declared. On the other side, the Pope by all meanes sought a reformation in the Lombards, which hee could not effect during the life of ROTHARIVS; for he made warre against the Imperialists, after they had liued many yeeres together in peace: which warre was very resolutely begun with great preparation, by ROTHARIVS of his part, and by the Exarch THEODORE of the other side. The Exarch comming from Rauenna drew his forces to an head in the citie of Bologna; for now the cities of Italy by reason of their long peace and rest, were growne rich and populous; and ROTHARIVS leuied no lesse an Armie in the citie of Parma; and the one taking his way against the other, they came to ioyneneere the citie of Modena: where (as SIGIBERTVS and PAVLVS DIACONVS doe report) after some encounters and skirmishes, they fought a very cruell battaile; wherein the Romanes were ouerthrowne, and seauen thousand of them slaine; and the Exarch THEODORE escaped by flight.

A counsell held in the time of Pope Martin.

Warres betweene the Lombards and Imperialists.

The victorie of the Lombards.

ROTHARIVS hauing obtained this victory, came to the coast of Genoa; and assaulted and tooke many Cities, which vntill then he could not doe, and so marched victorious, vntill that THEODORE the Exarch gathering together those which were scattered, leuied a new Army; wherewith he entertained the enemy, and victualled his frontier Garrisons. The Emperor CONSTANS vnderstanding hereof, tooke no care to relieue his Exarch, but being very much offended with Pope MARTIN, he put THEODORE out of the gouernment of Italie; and in his place sent another called OLIMPIVS (as very an Hereticke as himselfe) giuing him direction, to seeke to bring all the Bishops in Italie to hold of his opinion; and if that he could not bring it to passe, that then he should vse his best meanes to get the Pope into his hands, or to kill him. With which commission and resolution being arriued in Italie, he departed from Rauenna, and tooke his way towards Rome, vnder colour to goe visit the Pope; accompanied with many Souldiers and men of warre; first procuring an agreement and truce with the Lombards. Being come to Rome he sought how to apprehend the Pope, but being vnable to effect the same, he agreed with a desperate bold Souldier to kill him, vvhich tooke no effect.

During the time that these things passed in Italie, the Infidels (MAHOMETS successors) were growen so mighty, as they now contented not themselues with Egypt, and those prouinces which they held in the East; but preparing a great Fleet in Alexandria in Egypt, they inuaded the Ile of Rhodes, and took it, and afterwards other Ilands in those Seas; and from thence came spoiling and robbing through all the Leuant Seas, euen to the Ile of Sicilia, wherein they took some townes vpon the coast; and landing their Armie, there burnt and spoiled the countrie in the maine land: whereof when OLIMPIVS the gouernour or Exarch of Italy was aduertised, within whose gouernment Sicilia was contained; comming first to an agreement with the Pope, he took his way towards Naples; whither he had commanded to be brought, the greatest number of men and ships that could be gotten from all parts of Italy: and finding himselfe sufficiently furnished, he went to seeke his enemies, resolute and in very good order: and they vnderstan-derstanding of his coming, assembled themselues, with resolution to fight with him; which he refused not: And so, when as the two Nauies came within sight one of the other, they set themselues in order; and each Generall animated and encouraged his people, and the fight began with great furie, and was maintained with such resolution, as many thousands of men of the one and other side were slaine. Notwithstanding, in the end the victorie seemed to encline to the Imperialists; yet before they could obtaine it, they had lost so many men and ships, that although the Exarch might haue driuen the enemies out of the Iland, and haue recouered what was lost; yet he was so beaten and distressed, as it seemed not that he had ouercome. And (as Historians affirme) he endured so great toyle, and was so tired in the battaile before and after it, as he fell so extremely sicke, that within few daies he died.

The death of the Exarch Olimpius.

The Emperor CONSTANS vnderstanding of this victorie; Being then in great care and suspence, forgetting to amend his leud life, to leaue his hereticall opinion, and to giue God thanks for this victorie, he grew very proud, resoluing againe to procure the destruction of the Pope: and to that end gaue the charge of the gouernment againe to THEODORE, from whom he had taken the same. In the end he sent THEODORE into Italy, with a secret charge, to doe that which he afterwards performed, and I will discouer: and for his consort and companion therein, another aduenturous fellow whose name was PAVLVS PELLARIVS. In this time died ROTARIVS King of the Lombards; and another called RODOALDVS succeeded him; who shortly after falling in loue with a great mans wife, and being taken with her; was slaine by her husband; and ARRIOPERTVS succeeded him. All which obserued the peace with the Empire. And the new Exarch THEODORE comming into Italy, and with him his friend and companion, was very well entertained afterwards in Rome: for from the first time of his being there, the people were well content with his gouernment. Remaining certaine daies in Rome with his people, and concealing his purpose, he went one day to the palace, as though he had gone to visit the Pope; and seising thereon, apprehended him, and deliuered him to his associate PYVL: who presently departed with him towards Rauenna, and speedily took the Sea and went to Constantinople, where the Emperor held him for certaine daies prisoner, and then banished him to Cherson in Pontus, which was in the confines of the Empire; where he afterwards died, when he had been Bishop of Rome six yeeres. A little before this, died the king of the Lombards ARRIOPERTVS, who (as I said) succeeded RODOALDVS.

Pope Martine died in exile.

This ARRIOPERTVS left behinde him two sonnes, which were but young, the one called PERTHERITVS, and the other GVNDIBERTVS; betweene which (each desiring to be absolute) there grew dissension and discord: and GVNDIBERTVS which was the younger rose with Milan; the elder brother which ought to haue been King, remaining in Pauia, then the head of that kingdome. When this came to the knowledge of one GRIMOALDVS, a great Captaine of the Lombards, Duke and Gouernour of Beneuent, and other townes; he leauing his son ROMOALDVS with a good garrison therein, came to the citie of Pauia; which he entred by force, and drawe out the young King PERTHERITVS, and took such order in all the rest, as the two brethren were driuen to abandon their countrie; and he remained in their place a mightie King.

The death of Arriopertus king of the Lombards.

Grimoaldus made king of the Lombards.

The Emperor CONSTANS in Constantinople, surmizing that by meanes of the wars which the Lombards made amongst themselues, he comming with any great power might driue them out of Italy; this his desire hee resolued to put in execution, and to that effect made his sonne CONSTANTINE his companion in the Empire; that he might remaine in Constantinople. And so preparing a great fleete by Sea, and a great Armie by land; he came into Italy to the citie of Tarentum; where landing his men, he marched therewith to ioyne with the ordinarie companies which THEODORE commanded. GRIMOALDVS the tyrant King of the Lombards (more like a wise and prouident Prince, then one that was any way fearefull or a coward) had by that time leuied al the power that he was able to make, both to defend himself and to offend his enemie. After many aduentures in this warre, the Emperour went to besiege RIMOALDVS the sonne of GRIMOALDVS in Beneuent, and did put him and the citie to great distresse: shewing himselfe very valiant; he published that he came to restore Italy to her former libertie, and that he would againe make Rome the seate of the Empire; alleaging that it was greater reason to honour the mother, then the daughter. Whether this were fained, or in earnest, I know not; but I am sure the Kings soonne being besieged, sent to his father for aide, who (as I said) was not careless thereof, but daily increased his forces, that hee might bee able to fight with the Emperor. But he staying longer then RIMOALDVS would (for so was the son called) he he wrote certain pitiful Letters to his father, by one who was husband to her which had nurſed him at her breaſt: whom the father, meeting vpon the way, ſent back again to certifie his ſonne of what he had ſeen, and to tell him that he came to viſit him. This man, ſeeking to gette into the City, was apprehended by the Emperors ſouldiers: and beeing brought into his preſence, and examined, and his reports found conformable to that wherof he was otherwiſe aduertiſed, the Emperor being in great fear, reſolued not to abide his coming; deſiring firſt to do ſome notable exploit, whereby he thought to haue taken the City; but it hapned contrary to his expectation: which I haue thought good to relate for an example to others which are ſeruants and vaſſals to Kings and Princes; which was thus:

CONSTANS, promiſing great matters to his Nurſe, requeſted him to go to the wals; and that, calling the beſiged Prince, he ſhould aduiſe and counſell him to giue vp the City, for that his father was not able to relieue him. And heerwitnall he threatned the Nurſe, that if hee did not ſo, hee would preſently cauſe him to bee ſlain. The Nurſe, ſeeing that there was no other way left for him to encourage the Beſieged, faining a deſire to ſatisfie the Emperor, promiſed to perform his command. Whereupon the Emperor, the next night following, commanded him to be brought neer to the wall, with a guard which held him faſt bound: and hee, coming thither, called aloud to thoſe within, willing them to call ROMOALDVS to him, for that there was a man which much loued him, deſired to ſpeak with him. ROMOALDVS, as ſoon as he was aduertiſed heerof, came to the wals, and with a loud voice asked who would ſpeak with him. His Nurſe, knowing him well by his ſpeech, and hee him alſo, anſwered: It is the Nurſe which bringeth you an anſwer from your father; who willeth you to be of good cheer: for, this day he arriueth at the Riuer Satrico, and within theſe three daies will bee heer with an infinite Army. I can ſay no more: for, I am in the enemies hands, who already begin to murder me: I recommend vnto thee my wife and children.

The loyalty of a Nurſe.

Hauing ſaid theſe words, thoſe which were within the City were therewith greatly encouraged: and thoſe without were ſo much deſpited, that they preſently ſlue him, by the Emperors commandement: who, not daring to ſtay any longer (to his great ſhame and diſhonor) raiſed his ſiege from before Beneuent, and took his way with his Army towards Naples. GRIMOALDVS, being comn with a very great Army, ſent an excellent Captain cald VITOLA, with the beſt and moſt choice men of the Army to purſue the Emperor: and hee, marching a great paſe, ouertook him at the paſſage of a riuer called Caloro. The Emperor, being already paſſed with the greateſt part of his Army, VITOLA charged his arieregard: and there beganne a fierce battell; wherein the Emperors people (for that they could not be ſeconded by reaſon of the riuer) were ouerthrowne, and the moſt part of them ſlain: and ſo the Emperor was driuen to retire to Naples both with loſſe and diſhonour.

Being to depart from Naples to Rome, he commanded a Captain of his whoſe name was SABVRVS, born in Naples, that he with twenty thouſand choſen men ſhould ſtay behind to guard that City and Prouince: who more hardy than wiſe (the Emperor being gone) with the Army aforeſaid drew ſo neer to the Lombards, that the Kings ſonne, ROMOALDVS, deſiring his father to giue him leaue, came with his forces to fight with him; in ſuch ſort, that with equall deſire of both the Captains the two Armies joyned, with Enſignes diſplaied: and, after great ſlaughter of men of the one and other ſide, the Lombards obtained the victory, and following the chace ſlue SABVRVS the Generall, and many of his men. The Emperuor with all his troops was ſolemnly receiued into Rome, as well by VITILIANVS who then was Pope, as by the Citizens and Inhabitants thereof; but he continued there but twelue daies: and when hee had viſited the whole City; not as an Emperor and their Lord, but rather like an enemie, hee commanded to be carried out of the City all the beſt ſtatues of Marble and Metall, of moſt excellent and curious workmanſhip, and much gold and ſiluer, and other rare things: all which being brought aboord his Ships and Gallies, he commanded them preſently to depart; and he himſelf went from Rome to Naples, without making any prouiſion againſt the Lombards: by reaſon whereof, they became mightier than before.

The victory of the Lombards.

The Emperor came to Naples, purpoſing to paſſe ouer into Sicilia: and, being paſt with much people, he went to the City of Syracuſa, now called Sarragoſſa, hauing (to no purpoſe) all his Army together in Arms, as though hee had meant to haue done ſome great exploit; ſo as men greatly ſuſpected it, and were of ſundry opinions. But he did it to no other end, than, vnder colour to repair the harms which he had receiued, with exceſſiue greedineſſe to gather the rents and ſeruices of all the Prouinces of the Empire; and to impoſe new taxes and tolls in Africa, in Italy, Italy, in the Iles of Sardinia and Sicilia, and in all the reſt of his dominions: which as it vſually happeneth vnto all Princes which doe ſo without iuſt cauſe or reaſon, he grew to be extremely hated through all the Empire; and was afterwards the cauſe of his death. He remaining thus in the Ile of Sicilia, continually feaſting and banketting, neuer leauing to require loanes and impreſts, and to lay new impoſitions vpon the people, raunſoming and pilling them through out all the Iland, and in Africa and Italy in like manner; and being hated of all men, the Sicilians aduentured vpon a day (he being in a bath) to kill him; by the direction and commandement of a Captaine of his called MEZENCIVS, or as others write, MEZENCIVS and MAGVENCIVS, a bold audacious fellow and well beloued, more for the conſtitution of his body (which was very comely, tall, and well proportioned) than for his valour or nobilitie.

Conſtans ſlain by the Sicilians in a Bath.

This happened in the ſeauen and twentith yeere of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord, ſix hundred ſixtie and eight. CONSTANS left behinde him three ſons; CONSTANTINE who remained in Conſtantinople, for CAESAR and gouernor, HERACLIVS and TIBERIVS. About this time in Italy dyed King GRIMOALDVS, whom we but now ſaid to haue made warres with the Emperor; and he being dead, thither came out of France, whither before hee had fled for refuge, PARTHARIS, or PARTHERITVS King ARRIOPERTVS ſonne, whom GRIMOALDVS had throwne out of Pauia, and depriued of his eſtate, as we haue alreadie related.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND SEVENTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

THE Emperour CONSTANS (as I haue ſayd) was ſlaine in Sarragoſſa in Sicilia: and as ſoone as he was dead, MEZENCIVS who cauſed him to be ſlain, or (after ſome) whom he himſelfe ſlue; with the fauour of thoſe which aſſiſted him in that action, tooke vpon him the title of Emperour, and for the preſent, all the reſt of the people of Sicilia approued and confirmed the ſame; more for the deſire of innouations which are euer pleaſing, than for any good liking they had to his perſon. Whereof the Emperors ſon CONSTANTINE was ſoone aduertiſed, who then remained in Conſtantinople, and held the name of Emperour, and had done ſo euer ſince his father departed thence; and was therwith ſo much perplexed & in ſuch feare, conſidering the ſtrangeneſſe of the accident, as he for the time not onely had not the heart to doe ought in reuenge of his fathers death, but was alſo in feare to haue loſt the name of Emperor, which he then held; and therewithall ſcarcely durſt maintaine what he poſſeſſed in Gracia. The like in a manner befell THEODORE the Exarch or gouernor of Italy: for notwithſtanding that hee had a good troope of ſouldiers, well trained, and of good experience; yet he durſt not ſeeme to bee greatly grieued for the death of his ſoueraigne LORD, neither to attempt ought againſt MEZENCIVS. The cauſe was for that all the people greatly reioyced at his death; for he was generally hated for his couetousnesse.

In this confusion all things passed for some daies; all men expecting the successe of the new tyrant; not daring to declare themselues either for the one or other partie; for he had with him many good men of warre. But as his entrie was by treason, and grounded vpon an ill foundation; and in him were neither the vertues nor merites requisit in an Emperor; the Captaines and men of warre began to murmur as what hee had done, and to wish his death; which was speedily published, and it gaue all men occasion to take heart, and to seeke reuenge for the treason and murther committed vpon the person of the dead Emperor CONSTANS. The first were the Italians; and so THEODORE the Exarch began to stirre, leuying and mustering forces, therewith to passe into Sicilia, as he did; and the companies which were in the prouinces of Africa did the like; whereto the peace with the Sarazins and other nations, was a great helpe; for it seemeth, that CONSTANS being in Sicilia so accompanied with men of warre, they durst not make warre against him. These great forces comming into Sicilia against MEZENCIVS, and he being slenderly supported by his owne people, was in short space taken and slaine; and many of his friends which were with him, were taken and carried prisoners to Constantinople, to the young Emperor CONSTANTINE; who presently after this victorie began euery where to bee obeied and held for Emperor, and tooke vpon him the resolution and courage of a Prince. Some also write that he went into Sicilia. And notwithstanding that afterwards hee prooued a good and vertuous Emperour; yet in his beginning he committed a most cruell fact, which was; to put to death his younger brothers, thereby to liue assured that they should not seeke to depriue him of the Empire: and some also write that he caused the toppes of their noses to be cut off: but the truth is, that he commanded them to be slaine; and so he became Lord of the whole Empire, without any difficultie.

Constantine made Emperor.

But the Sarazins, Mahometists, and PHADALAS or SOPHIAS their King, seeing this combustion, and the fit oportunitie to inuade the Empire, by reason of the before recited accidents in Sicilia, and also for that it seemed that CONSTANTINE was not yet firmely settled in his throne; they as closely and couertly as might be rigged a mightie nauie at Alexandria in Egypt; with a resolution to inuade Thracia, and Grecia: and if the dissension happened which they expected, then to take those prouinces: but afterwards as matters proued better in Constantinople then was hoped for; they altered their determination, and inuaded Sicilia, which was lest ill prouided of men of war: and they came with such force and power, as they entered the cities of Sarragossa, and some other towns; where robbing and spoiling, they continued certaine daies: and it seeming to them an hard matter to hold those places, carrying away with them an infinit number of prisoners and great richesse of gold, siluer, and other iewels; they returned to Alexandria.

The Sarazins made warre in Sicilia.

In the Constantinopolitane Commentaries I find this warre written more at large; where it is affirmed, that they first made warre on the borders of Thracia and Grecia, the space of many dayes, and tooke many places; and that in the end being repelled thence by the Emperor, they went to Sicilia, so writeth ZONARAS: but after the first manner, writeth PAVLVS DIACONVS, an Author neere to that time, and afterwards others of lesse antiquity. I sometimes set downe the sundry opinions of Authors (although it shall not beneedfull alwayes to doe so;) to satisfie the curious Readers, that they may not condemne my History, finding therein any thing contrary or differing from that they shall read in some others. But although that I doe not alwayes thus, let them rest assured that I follow an Author, which writeth it as I relate it; for in the diuersity of opinions, I follow that which seemeth to bee most true and probable, weighing all coniectures: and when I cannot or desire not to doe so, I briefly set downe both opinions; as now I haue done. That which to mee seemeth to be the most certaine, is, that they first inuaded Sicilia, and did as I haue related; and afterwards raysing greater power through their successe and victory, there ensued that which these Authours set downe, which is, that they a long time made warre on the Coast of Gracia, and the confines of Constantinople; where they tooke many places; out of which by the diligence and valour of the Emperour, they were driuen by force: this warre lasted full sixe yeeres.

Victory of the christians against the Sarazins.

All authors affirme that CONSTANTINE herewith not contented, sent a great Armie by land against the Mahometicke Sarazins, into the prouince of Soria, which is the auntient Syria, which fought with all their whole power, and the Christians obtained the victorie; and of the infidels were slaine thirty thousand. And they were brought to such distresse, as their Prince or King, whose name was MAVIAS, sent to intreate the Emperor for peace, offering very profitable and honourable conditions; and thereby bound himselfe to pay yeerely to the Emperor, a great number of pounds or markes of golde; and for the present, to release many thousand prisoners, which he held captiues: whereupon the peace was graunted and confirmed by CONSANTINE, to ease himselfe of that trouble; that he might apply himselfe to the reformation of some other matters concerning the Christian faith; for hee was concerning what hee ought to beleeue, a very good Christian. This was concluded in the tenth yeere of his raigne.

Mauias King of the Sarazins sought to the Emperor Constantine for peace.

But there presently ensued another trouble and a warre equall to the former; which was; that a certaine people of the prouinces of Scithia (the fountaine of many others before mentioned) called Bulgarians; not those which I heretofore spake of, but others, of the same name and nation, came downe into Thracia, being in number aboue one hundred thousand persons; and they began to make warre in the Empire, with a desire to take some good countrie, wherein they might dwell and inhabit, as many other nations before them had done. For the Northren countries are barren and ill inhabited; yet by reason of the cold, men multiplie and encrease in them exceedingly; as we daily see by experience, and PAVLVS DIACONVS noteth the same. The furie wherewith this people came, was so great, as they did infinite harme; and they made themselues Lords of some especiall countries; which being made knowne to the Emperor (in whom there wanted not the courage of a valiant Prince) he raised his forces, and in his owne person went to defend his subiects; and the war for some daies was very sharpe and cruell; and the Bulgarians sought to fight with him in the plaine field: which he (presuming much of his people) as a valiant Prince, refused not; so as they sought with banners displaied, which battaile was exceeding terrible. But it seemeth that through some his ill direction, or the great force of his aduersaries, the Emperour was ouerthrowne, and many of his people slaine, and he himselfe was constrained to vse the common remedy of those which are ouercome, which is to flie, by that meane to escape and to saue his life. And as in the battaile he had done what he was able; so afterwards gathering his people together, he retired with great good order and discretion. But it pleased God that at what time, as it seemed, and when it was feared, that the Bulgarians would haue brought the Empire into great distresse, meerely of their owne accord they sent to the Emperor, and suing for peace desired him to giue them some place where they might inhabit, and they would become his friends, yea and his subiects: whereto he gaue eare (considering his present estate,) with a very good will. And so treating of the matter for a certaine space, the prouince of the lower Misia was assigned vnto them, and was (after their name) called Bulgaria: wherein they haue quietly and peaceably inhabited, vntill that of late yeeres they were subdued and conquered by the Turkes; a new scourge and plague to the Christians, after MAHOMET.

Warres betweene the Emperor and the Bulgarians.

A battaile betweene Constantine and the Bulgarians, wherein he was ouerthrowne and put to flight.

The Bulgarians sue to Constantine for peace.

The province of Seruia giuen to the Bulgarians, and therefore called Bulgaria.

While these things passed in Sicilia, in Grecia, and in Asia, which was during the space of tenne yeeres; in Italy although there were peace betweene the Lombards and Italians, yet there failed not other miseries and persecutions: And there happened so great and so many tempests and alterations in the air, as it seemed that the foure elements had conspired against mankinde: for the windes were so furious and violent, as they ouerthrew many buildings, and rent vp many trees by the rootes: and the raine likewise was so great and tempestuous, as it destroyed all their tillage, as well for bread-corne as all other kind of hearbs and seedes: And therewith fell an infinite number of thunderbolts, and fires from heauen, which slew a great number of people: and the earth with these so great alterations became so corrupt, as there ensued many contagious diseases. Wherfore the people repenting them of their sinnes, made their prayers and supplications to God, that it would please him to cease these so great calamities: but yet the reliques thereof remained a long time after.

Wonderfull alteration of the elements in Italy.

At this time died Pope DEODATVS, and by reason of his death the seate was voide foure moneths: making a new election in Rome, DONVS onely so called, was chosen Pope, who was held for a Saint, and liued two yeeres and a halfe (as saith PLATINA). In his time THEODORE Archbishop of Rauenna wholly submitted himselfe to the Church of Rome, whereas some of his predecessors, with the fauor of the Exarchs or gouernors had before him denied the same. Others (amongst which is BLONDVS) affirme, that this hapned in the time of his successor AGATHVS, who liued two yeers & a half: in which time, although but short, he treated with the Emperor concerning a general councel to be held, principally against the heresy of the Monothelites, which was dispersed ouer all the Churches of Grecia, which confounded the two Natures in CHRIST, Humane and Diuine; affirming that in him was but a will only. And so for this time the Greeke Church remained vnited with the Latine: but it pleased GOD afterwards to suffer it to come (as wee now see) into the power and subiection of Infidels.

In this Councell were many other matters handled concerning the reformation of the Church and the Ceremonies thereof; and this was the sixt of those Councels vvhich for their excellencies were so renowned and famous, and among the rest called Vniuersall. Great was the reputation which the Emperour CONSTANTINE purchased to haue celebrated this Councell in his time, and to haue finished so holy a worke. Within few dayes after, Pope AGATHVS dyed, by whose authority it had been called; and LEO the second borne in Sicilie succeeded him, who was worthily aduanced, being learned, eloquent and of a holy life: he ordained the Paxe to be giuen in the Church, which is obserued in the Church of Rome vntill this day. He being dead, BENEDICT the second succeeded him: with whose election the Emperour was so well pleased, as after he had confirmed the same, he renounced the right and custome which the Emperors held to confirme the election of Popes; to the end that from thenceforth, as soone as by the Clergy they were chosen, they might vse their authority, without any need of the Emperors confirmation, or of their Exarchs or gouernours, as of long time they had vsed.

CONSTANTINE liuing in this prosperity, had peace with the Sarazins; and the Prouinces of Africa, and the Ile of Sicilia were in quiet, and so was Italie: for the Lombards being at variance and dissension among themselues, very firmely maintained the peace with the Empire: and the estates of Græcia with the territorie of Constantinople, were all in very quiet subiection. But this good forme and manner of gouernment, was disturbed by the Emperours death, which shortly after ensued, when hee had raigned seuenteene yeeres, and had protected and defended the Empire which he inherited, with iustice and equity, reforming exsours in the Christian Religion, as aforesayd. And thus it was, that falling grieuously sicke in Constantinople, and the incurableness of his disease being in short space bruited abroad through the World (as vsually it happeneth) in some parts his death vvas published before that hee was dead: vvhereof GIZET King of the Sarazins, vvhom they called AMVRATES, beeing aduertised, and beleeuing the same to bee true, with all haste leuied a very great Army both by Sea and Land, which hee forth-with sent from Egypt, and conquered all the coast of Africa to Carthage: wherein, by reason of the Emperours death, hee found no sufficient resistance.

Warres made by Gizet King of the Sarazins.

The warres of Africa proceeding in this manner, the Emperour dyed before hee was able to prouide for the same, as hee would haue done if hee had liued. Hee departed out of this World in the yeere of our Lord, fixe hundred fourescore and sixe; his wiues name was ANASTASIA, by whom hee had lawfull Heires; of which IVSTINIAN and IVSTIN succeeded him in the Empire; as presently shall be declared.

THE

THE LIFE OF IVSTINIAN, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND EIGHT ROMANE EMPEROVR.

()

THE ARGVMENT.

THis Emperor attained to the dignitie being very young: in the beginning of his raigne he made warres against the Turkes, and constrained them to sue for peace: which for that he maintained not, it so hapned that losing a battaile in the second war, he was driuen to sue for peace: and returning home with disgrace was deposed from his Empire, hauing his nose and his eares cut off: and in his place Leoncius, a captaine of his was made Emperour. Afterwards another of his Captaines, whose name was Tiberius, rose against Leoncius, and deposed him from the Empire, and condemned him to perpetuall imprisonment, with a determination to haue put him to death with greater torment. Which Tiberius, was likewise driuen out of the Empire by Iustinian: who with the aide of his father in law the King of Bauaria, returned and reconcred the Empire; whereinvsing extreme crueltie against the fauourites of Tiberius and Leoncius: finally moouing warres against the Bulgarians, wherein he had but little good successe, he was compelled to returne home, to his great shame and dishonour. And beginning to stand in feare of one Philippicus, whom Tiberius had banished, and seeking meanes to kill him; Philippicus rebelled against him, and being made Emperor came to a battaile, wherein both Iustinian and his sonne Tiberius miserably ended their tragedie, represented in this scene of the world with such varietie of fortune, as neuer any other Emperour was so much tossed and turmoiled as hee was: and hee gouerned the Empire at both times six and twentie yeeres.

A rule in Rhetorike.

IT is a rule in Rhetorike, obserued by great Orators, in the beginning of what they purpose to treate of, whether in writing, or pleading; to procure the attention, and willing audience of their hearers, or readers: which is principally done when they extol or magnifie that which they haue to say; letting them know that it shall be very pleasing or profitable: for with a desire to know some great matter, or moued with the greedinesse of profit, or allured with the hope of the delight and contentment which is promised; they attentiuely heare, or willingly reade what is proponed: yet the author must alwaies be carefull to performe what he doth promise, and that in his speech he come not short of the expectation held of him.

Comming now to write the life of the Emperour IVSTINIAN the second, sonne to the Emperour CONSTANTINE the fourth; with an imagination to bee found true in what I shall say, and that he which shall reade the same shall not be deceiued, I entreate the reader to be attentiue. And although I tell not wonders and marueilous things happened in the heauens and on earth: yet truly he which with attention shall reade the historie of fifteene yeeres succeeding, shall see a pleasant and strange Comedie, which Fortune, or (to say better) the world represented in those times. The principall and chiefe parts whereof, we may say, were acted in the person of IVSTINIAN; who sometimes as an Emperour, and sometimes as a priuate man, came vpon the stage: I may very well say so, seeing that hee was twice chosen and obeyed, and twice also vtterly depriued and bereaued of his Empire: so as it seemed hee went in and out, making a shew vpon the theatre of the world: and with him other two or three Emperors or tyrants, which were in his time: as LEONCIVS, TIBERIVS, and PHILIPPICVS: which like actors in a tragedy did nothing but put off and on their maskes: for sometimes you should see them come in with a nose, and sometimes noseless: sometimes by force, and sometime by fauour; the one supplanting the other. Finally, I say that in my opinion, this historie seemeth to be like an old wiues tale, or a fained fable, only to depaint some strange aduentures, or great misfortunes, it being for certaine a most true history: from which may be drawne a notable example of of the inconstancie and vncertainty of the estate of this life, and lightly to account thereof; and to the end that men leaue to toyle and to take such care for the obtaining of riches and soueraignitie; and that they grow not proud when they haue attayned the same, neither be greeued or dismaied when they lose them, but alwaies account them for doubtfull, without any firme continuance: considering what perill and daunger they vndergoe in getting them, and how little assurance they haue to enioy them.

Comming now to our historie, it passed thus: After the death of the Emperor CONSTANTINE, as he held the Empire in good order and gouernment in his life time; so his sonne IVSTINIAN after his decease found no difficultie, but was gladly receiued and obeyed of al men: and notwithstanding that he was very young, being but sixteene yeeres old, yet he began peaceably to gouerne his Empire; sauing that in Africa in the time of his fathers sicknes, and after his decease, the Sarazins became Lords of a great part thereof.

In the beginning of his raigne hee commanded great forces to be leuied, for the defence and recouerie of Africa; and as to a new Prince, so many and so good men of warre made repaire vnto him, as the Sarazins stood in feare of him. Wherefore VALDVLA their King and Captaine which succeeded GIZITES (the authors differ much in these names) sent to him for peace: and for as much as he offered very large conditions, IVSTINIAN graunted the same for ten yeeres. The first of which was, that he should restore all that which hee held in Africa; which was the Citie of Carthage, and all that which lieth betweene that and Egypt, neere vnto the Sea side, besides other contributions of money and horses, which were to bee paid vnto him yeerely: and this peace being confirmed, there was generally peace through the whole Empire, without any suspicion of warre: yea and some Historians report, that there was an vniuersall peace through all the world: so as neither the Kings of France, Spaine, nor England; neither the Princes of Germany, or the Kings of the Bauarians, of Slauonia, of Misia, of Bulgaria, neither the Hunnes which inhabited Hungarie, among themselues had any warres, or were at contention with any others: The like was in the estates and Prouinces of the East. Which peace and concord IVSTINIAN through pride and euill counsell disturbed, by warring contrary to his promise and agreement made with the Sarazins which hee began very resolutely with great preparation: and after that he had sent LEONCIVS for his Generall, he went in person and did much harme, and recouered some Countries in Soria, and entred Mesopotamia; where the Sarazins reinforcing their troupes, and repairing their Armies, gathered together an infinite number of them, and came to giue him battaile: which the yong Emperor refused not; but yet after great slaughter of his people he was ouercome, and driuen to flie, and to abandon what he had recouered, being brought to such extremitie, as he was forced to sue and entreat them for peace: which after many treaties and demands was concluded, & the Sarazins for that time remained in quiet. In this time died THEODOR Exarch or Gouernor of Italie, and in his place was sent another prime man called IOHN, and Pope CONON aforesayd also dyed: after much controuersie about the election of a new Bishop, for an Archbishop called THEODORE, and another called PASCAL, sought to haue been Popes, and with money had bribed the Exarch IOHN, to assist them with his voice and fauour; the matter being likely to haue come to blowes, they all agreed to chuse one whose name was SERGIVS, borne in the Citie of Antioch in Syria, who was chosen and obeyed for Pope: yet afterwards there were some tumults about that matter, which concern me not.

Iustinian contrary to his league, made warres against the Sarazines, and what ensued,

In those daies died CYMPERTVS, who then was King of the Lombards, and there succeeded a sonne of his called LIMPERTVS, of whom we haue not made any mention, for that they liued in peace with the Italians and the Emperors subiects. The Emperor IVSTINIAN being returned out of Asia to Constantinople, with great losse and disgrace for the warre aforesaid said; repairing his losses received, and making new prouision with little discretion and worse direction, resolued to begin the war againe: wherein he had no better successe then in the former: And this was against the Bulgarians which inhabited Misia, with whom his father had made a perpetuall league of amity; and IVSTINIAN (as a light inconstant young man) breaking the conditions, entred their Country with a great Armie, with such power and fury, as neither the Bulgarians, nor their King durst take the field to give him battaile; but retired, and abandoning many places, fortified themselues in the strongest; which so much emboldened the Emperour, as he prosecuted this warre with lesse heede and circumspection, then so important a case required: which when the Bulgarians perceiued, recouering courage, they assembled a multitude of men: & cutting off all victuals from the Emperors Army, & stopping the passages of certaine riuers, they brought him to such extremitie, that although he would retire, he found so great danger and difficultie therein, as he was compelled to sue to them for peace, against whom, of his owne minde, voluntarily and without reason he had made warre; which they granted, vpon condition that he should restore to them all the prisoner, and the Townes and other things which hee had taken: And that hee should personally sweare, well and faithfully to maintaine the same, as well by himselfe as by all his Princes and chiefe Captaines.

Warre made by Constantine against the Bulgarians.

Constantine sued to the Bulgarians for peace.

IVSTINIAN returning from this iourney, with no more honour then from the first, caused a new Councell to be assembled in Constantinople, to disannull that which in the former had been determined, concerning certaine points in religion: The Pope being herewith discontented, sent his Legates to hold his place there, and to see what the Councell would treate of: wherein by the Emperors authoritie there were some things handled against the resolution of the last Councell: wherof the Pope being advertised, he reproued and disannulled what was there concluded; and confirmed the last Councell, and sent commandement to dissolue the present. Wherewith the Emperor was so highly displeased, as hee presently sent ZACHARIAS the Commander Generall of all his men of warre, to Rome, with commission to apprehend the Pope, and to send him to Constantinople.

The Pope began to contend with the Emperor.

ZACHARIE being arrived in Italy about this exploite, notwithstanding that he dissembled the matter, yet was it soone discouered, and SERGIVS had so wonne the hearts of the people, that all the companies which lay in Rauenna, and the marches therof, and in other parts of Italie, came with all speede to Rome, with intent to haue slaine ZACHARIE, and to haue released the Pope, whom ZACHARIE had already seized on. When ZACHARIE vnderstood with what furie these men of warre came against him, despayring of any other remedie, he yeelded himselfe to the Popes mercie, whom he then held prisoner: And the Pope pardoning the offence, protected him, and hid him in his Palace; then sitting in his Throne, holding a great state, he attended the comming of the Armie which came from Rauenna, together with the Roman people: who very earnestly desiring him to deliuer ZACHARIE into their hands, he made an Oration vnto them, perswading them to moderate their displeasure, seeing that he had pardoned the offence: whereto they all consented, and ZACHARIE, being brought into his presence, had leaue to depart, although with much shame and disgrace. And the Pope so cunningly handled the matter, that he brought the Emperour into such hatred, and made him so odious to the people, as their whole studie was how to depose him from the Empire: and as they were all willing thereto, the effect easily ensued.

IVSTINIAN hauing represented (as I said) the first act of the Tragedie, a great Captaine called LEONCIVS before mentioned, whom he had of long time held prisoner, resolued to rebell against him: and hauing secretly conferred of the matter with GALLICANVS the Patriarch of Constantinople, and with his other friends; vpon a day hee suddenly came from his house, accompanied with many armed-men; and gathering men together against the Emperor, he went to the Prisons, and set all the prisoners at libertie; and the people very willingly accompanying him, he went to the Emperours palace, where he easily apprehended him: And proclaiming himselfe Emperour, depriued the other of his Empire; and he was crowned with great ioy of the people, which euer delighteth in nouelties, but chiefly with the change of Princes, and great Magistrates; for the present estate doth never please them, they euer commend that which is past, and still desire a new.

Leoncius rebelled against the Emperor.

LEONCIVS was crowned, and IVSTINIAN had his eares and his nose cut off, and some say his tongue also, to make him seeme vgly and the more to be abhorred; and having brought him to this estate, he banished him for euer, to the Citie of Chersona in Pontus, the further-thermoſt bounds of the Empire. Which befell him in the tenth yeer of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord GOD 696, yet ſome ſay more; where let vs leaue him for ſome ſpace, whileſt that LEONCIVS may in the meane time act his part of the Tragedy which we promiſed.

The great hatred which the people bare againſt the Emperour IVSTINIAN, was the chiefe occaſion that moued the Tyrant LEONCIVS to rebell and take vpon him the name and ſtate of Emperor: for IVSTINIAN was brought into ſuch hatred with the people, that they would haue accepted of any man that had dared to attempt to haue made himſelfe Emperor; and much ſooner of LEONCIVS, who was a valiant and expert man of warre, and had held great charges and offices. In the beginning all things ſucceeded according to his deſire; for IVSTINIAN had neither the heart nor meanes, during his baniſhment, to reſtore himſelfe; neither was there found any reſiſtance or contradiction in any other man in the Empire: and ſo LEONCIVS began to enioy his Empire in peace. But the Sarazins or Agarenes and HADIMILECH their King, who already had a reſolution to ſubuert and wholly to ruine the Empire; ſeeing the diſſenſion therein, and not holding the ſtate of LEONCIVS firme, with a great and mightie Armie from Egypt (as at other times they had done) they inuaded the Prouinces of Africa, and took many Cities and ſtrong holds therein: againſt whom LEONCIVS, with no ſmall feare and care, ſent a ſingular Captaine called IOHN; but he gaue him no ſuch Army as he might be able to giue his enemies battaile; by reaſon whereof, he was conſtrained by policie and ſtratagems, to maintaine the warres; ſo as he defended the Countrie for ſome time, daily ſoliciting the Emperor, to ſend him ſuch ſupplie of ſouldiers, as therewith he might be able to fight with them: and ſeeing that neither by Letters nor meſſengers he could obtaine his ſuite; vpon a time when he thought his abſence might be leaſt prejudiciall; leauing his Army in the beſt order he could, and a very good Captaine called TIBERIVS ABSIMARVS for commander in his place; he tooke his way towards Conſtantinople, to conferre with LEONCIVS about the ſending of ſome better ſupplie for the warres of Africa, and comming ſuddenly thither, he found not that prouiſion which he expected and was neceſſarie; and therefore was driuen to ſtay longer then was expedient; for the Emperor buſying himſelfe about other matters of ſmall moment, tooke leaſt care for thoſe things which were of greateſt importance.

The Sarazins inuade Africa.

The Army in Africa ſeeing his long abſence, began to murmur againſt their Captaine, for ſo leauing them; and likewiſe againſt the Emperor LEONCIVS: and from murmuring in ſpeeches, they became ſo audacious, as to perſwade TIBERIVS ABSIMARVS, (who was left for their commander, to make himſelfe Emperor; and he was preſently created and obeyed by the whole Armie. And as ambition and deſire to command is a thing which chiefly inflameth the hearts of men; ſo TIBERIVS to his owne ruine, accepted that which they offered him; as hereafter this Hiſtorie ſhall make manifeſt. But as he was neither careleſſe nor a coward; ſo he ſpeedily, when he had taken vpon him the title of Emperor, reſolued to get the poſſeſſion and gouernement thereof; and preparing with the greateſt haſte that might be to take the Emperor LEONCIVS vnprouided, he departed from Africa, abandoning the ſame to the Infidels, which was the cauſe that afterwards it was wholly loſt: and he with a very good fleet brought his people to the coaſt of Grecia; where, with the aid and fauour of his friends and kinred which were on Land, he took harborough, and came to Conſtantinople, wherein LEONCIVS had fortified himſelf, thinking to defend the ſame: whereupon they came to blowes, without any juſt cauſe of either ſide; for, hee which came to depriue the Tyrant, did it to the end to bee ſo himſelf: but in the end he preuailed, and TIBERIVS entred by force, and became Lord both of the City and of LEONCIVS; although not without much trouble, and ſlaughter of many men. And vpon LEONCIVS he commanded the ſame puniſhment to bee inflicted which he had giuen to IVSTINIAN; which was, To haue his noſe and ears cut off; and to be committed to perpetuall impriſonment; with an intent to haue ſhewed him greater cruelty; LEONCIVS hauing raigned theree yeeres only: which was about the yeere of our Lord ſix hundred ninety and nine. After this manner LEONCIVS left the Theatre, and TIBERIVS played his part, during the time that LEONCIVS was in priſon, and IVSTINIAN baniſhed; and vntill ſuch time as IVSTINIAN returned to the ſtage, which was as ſoone as TIBERIVS had acted his part.

In ſuch manner as I haue declared, TIBERIVS tyrannized the Empire, and as it may be coniectured by Hiſtories, had continued long, if he could haue beene contented, and not haue attempted attempted more than was fit for him to haue done; ſo as he himſelf wrought his owne confuſion. The firſt thing he did after that he was Lord and abſolute, was, To command many of LEONCIVS his friends to bee either ſlain or deſpoiled of their goods; as Fauorites of a Tyrant. And truely he had reaſon on his ſide, if he had had authority to haue inflicted ſuch puniſhment, and had not himſelf been guilty of the ſame crime, and been a Traitor and a Tyrant to him to whom he had ſworn fidelity, as to his Emperor; and alſo to the Commander who left him in his place; puniſhing the treaſon wherein he himſelf had been a partaker, and had approued the ſame. And this his holy zeal extended it ſelf ſo farre, that a great familiar friend of his whoſe name was PHILIPPICVS, and who had greatly aided him in his enterpriſe, and to bring him to that eſtate, onely for ſaying that vpon a night in his ſleep he dreamt that an Eagle alighted vpon his head (imagining that to prognoſticate him to be an Emperor) he was by his commandement apprehended and baniſhed into an Iland, where hee could haue no conference or ſociety with any body; notwithſtanding that hee was a Noble Gentleman, and of high parentage: from whence he afterwards ſent him to the City of Cherſona, whither the depoſed Emperor IVSTINIAN was alſo baniſhed. We will tell you heerafter what hapned to this PHILIPPICVS: for, he was one of the Actors in this Comedie.

TIBERIVS, hauing executed theſe his cruelties, ſent his brother HERACLIVS with an Armie to aid the Armenians, who in antient time had been ſubject to the Empire, and now rebeld againſt the Infidels; where he won a great battell, and ſlue a great number of them: but it ſeemeth that he did not long enjoy the victory; for, the Infidels in proceſſe of time preuailed, and their Empire greatly encreaſed. In Italie alſo there fell diſcord and diſſenſion between the Lombards and Italians, who had liued together a long time in peace. The cauſe whereof was, for that TIBERIVS, through the death or abſence of IOHN the Exarch aboue-named, ſent into Italie for Exarch or Gouerner, a Chamberlain of his called THEOPHILATVS; wherewith all Italie was much grieued: for, the greateſt part thereof now pretended to bee ſubject to the Pope; or at leaſt hated the gouernment and Empire of the Greeks. THEOPHILATVS came not to Rauenna as his Predeceſſors vſed to doo, but landed in Sicilia, from thence to come to Rome: which when it was publiſhed, all the companies which lay in Rauenna, and in other places, came to Rome, attending his coming; rather as an enemie, than as their Generall: and ſo being arriued, if IOHN which at that time was Pope had not protected him, hee had been ſlain. But through his fauour he had liberty to depart and go to Rauenna, beeing out of hope to do what he had projected; for, in Rome they would not obey him. Whereupon he procured the Lombards to make war againſt the Romans, or at leaſt againſt thoſe Cities which the Romans held neereſt to Rome; principally Beneuent: whereof was Duke and Gouerner a great man cald SISVLPHVS, who was therewith much annoyed: but the Pope repaired all his loſſes with his riches and treaſure; and, buying peace, the eſtate of Italie recouered reſt and quiet. But our Lord would not permit TIBERIVS to reſt in peace: for, wexing jealous of the Emperour IVSTINIAN, which earleſſe and noſeleſſe liued an exile in Cherſona, or, as ſome ſay, vnderſtanding that IVSTINIAN intended to procure aid to recouer the Empire, whereof hee was diſpoſſeſſed by the Emperor LEONCIVS, hee began to practiſe his death; and to that effect ſent ſome to deal with the Inhabitants of that City.

IVSTINIAN being aduertiſed hereof, and ſtanding in great feare of his life, in the beſt manner he could, took ſhipping; and ſailing ouer the Sea called Euxinum or Ponticum, landed in Europe, and came to the King of the Bauarians, who was a very mighty Prince; by whom he was not only well receiued, but was alſo maried to his ſiſter or daughter. And he appointed him an houſe and eſtate, promiſing him all aide and fauour to reſtore him; ſo as there began to be a great alteration throughout all the Empire, ſeeing that IVSTINIAN was now to returne to play his part vpon the Theatre of this world. TIBERIVS being aduertiſed hereof, tooke it to heart (as indeede he had reaſon) and imagining that he ſhould preuaile little by force, he practiſed to ſee whether money would take effect, which commonly can doe more then eyther ſword or launce; and to that effect dealt with CAYANVS (for as I ſaid ſo the Bauarians called their King) to deliuer IVSTINIAN into his hands; for whom he would giue him a great ſum of mony. And this couetous and inconſtant King, greedy thereof, agreed with him vpon the ſumme, and promiſed to accompliſh his deſire: and being ready to haue put it in execution, by chance IVSTINIAN had intelligence thereof; and ſo alone purſued by him which was either his father in law, or his brother in law, he eſcaped by flight. About one yeer after that hee had long wandred, he went to the King of Bulgaria, whoſe name was TREBELLIVS; who pittying pittying his calamitie, gaue him great entertainement; and in short space made so great prouision of men and armes, as he took his way with him towards Constantinople; where were many which desired his returne, for the hatred they bare to TIBERIVS. To be briefe, in short time and with little difficultie, although with some effusion of bloud, he came to the Imperiall citie, and entring it by force TIBERIVS fled: but being afterwards ouertaken and brought backe into his power, he committed him to that prison wherein LEONCIVS was, whom hee had deposed and cut off his nose and his eares: and making them both to be first carried through all the publike streetes of the citie, he caused them openly to be slaine, after that TIBERIVS had raigned seauen yeers. Such are the rewards which the world giueth to those, who to beare sway and to commaund, forget God. And so ended these two mightie Emperors, or more properly, proud tyrants. And IVSTINIAN, not content to execute his wrath vpon those two alone, caused TIBERIVS brother to be hanged; and many of the friends to both of them, to be either spoiled or slaine: the Patriarch GALLICANVS, who conspired with LEONCIVS against him, had his eyes pluckt out. And they further report of him, that as often as hee would haue wiped his nose (if he had had it) he caused some of those which had been followers of his enemie LEONCIVS to be slaine. And so the banished Emperor IVSTINIAN recouered his throne and Empire; and returned againe to the theatre, to act the rest of his tragedie, which was nine yeeres after that hee had been cast out of it; in the yeere of our Sauiour IESVS CHRIST 706.

Iustinian returned to his Empire.

Presently after that IVSTINIAN saw himself restored and settled in his Empire, hauing executed such cruelties, as the like had seldome bin heard of, vpon those he supposed had offended him; he sent great and rich presents to TREBELLIVS King of Bulgaria, who had holpen him to recouer his Empire, with a very solemne and pleasing ambassage: but as it shall hereafter appeare, he continued but a while so, gratefull. He also sent for his wife THEODORA, daughter of CAYANVS King of the Bauarians, from whose Court he fled; who liued in a certaine place absent from her father: for as some write, she aduertised her husband of the treason which her father pretended against him. And she being come, he made her to be honoured as Empresse and Augusta: and his young sonne whom he had by her in the time of his exile, he caused to be chosen and called Emperor. Other matters concerning his gouernment and execution of iustice, were corrupt and out of order: for as the Princes were wicked, so were the subiects; for such as is the head, such are the members: so that so farre as I can coniecture, these were the most miserable and lamentable times, that euer the Christian Common-wealth endured since CHRIST was borne; GOD permitting it for a punishment of the wicked, wherewith the world did then abound; and for the greater reward of those which suffered amongst them: for besides the wars & troubles of the tyrannizing Emperors, there was so little faith and feare of God, that the Church lost then all the prouinces of Africa, wherin, in steede of Christ perfect God and man, MAHOMET is adored and worshipt vnto this day, without recouery. Which to relate in such manner as it passed, I neither haue time, neither find I it distinctly written: but that after that TIBERIVS went thence with the name of Emperor, and deposed LEONCIVS from the Empire; the Sarazins seeing the countrie abandoned, came out of Egypt, Arabia, and other Prouinces of the East, and made a conquest thereof; finding so small resistance, that within the space of foure yeers they became Lords of all the Countries, from Egypt, vnto the Prouince of Mauritania Tingitania, and to that which now is Ceuta, Tangiar and Arzila; wherfore we call those of Mauritania, Mauri or Moores and Arabians, for that they came out of Arabia; being 170 yeers after that Africa was recouered from the Vandales, and had serued and been subiect to the Empire. And within ten yeers after, with the ioy of their victorie (DON RODRIGO then raigning King in Spaine) they being ayded by a traiterous Earle called DON IVLIAN, and others, they came ouer into Spaine, and in threee yeers conquered almost all the countrie, slaying in battaile King RODRIGO, and the most part of the Gothes, excepting some few which liued in the Mountaines of Biscay, Galicia and Oniedo: from whence afterwards (although abandoned by the Christian Kings and Princes) they haue by little and little, not without great trouble and effusion of much blood, recouered their countrie: and finally about 100 yeers since, the Infidels were driuen out of all Spaine by King FERDINAND and Queen ISABEL. So as if other Christian kings had done their parts as well as the Kings of Spaine, it is to be thought that Christendome had not been so much diminished, but had againe recouered what it then lost, and had been restored to that greatnes wherein it was in the time of some antient Emperors. But seeing it is the iudgement of God, we will leaue it to him, and returne turne to our Historie, which is of the Emperors onely. IVSTINIAN being in Constantinople, executing his cruelties against the friends and kinsfolks of TIBERIVS and LEONCIVS, it so hapned that the subiects to the King of Bulgaria, which had beene so much his friend, fell at oddes with some of the Emperors subiects of Thracia, a prouince of the Empire, wherein standeth Constantinople, about parting their bounds: which when he vnderstood (forgetting the benefits receiued) vpon this small occasion he raised an Armie against TREBELLIVS King of Bulgaria, and entring his Countrie, ruined many places, and committed great spoiles: wherwith the King, being greatly moued, gathered such forces together as he could, and came to fight with the Emperor; and they two fought a cruell battaile, wherein the Emperor was iustly ouerthrowne, and fled out of the Countrie of the Bulgarians: and so this warre was ended to his dishonor. But as God neuer made any thing without some goodnes; so this Emperor euer respected and reuerenced the Church of Rome and the Pope, namely CONSTANTINE who then was Pope, after the two IOHNS, the sixt and the seuenth, which succeeded SERGIVS, who went to Constantinople to see the Emperor, and by the way met with IOHN TOZOCOPOS, who came to be Gouernor of Italy; and comming to Rome would haue taken vp the Church rents and goods, but he was resisted by the Popes ministers; some of which he slew: wherefore he grew so hatefull, as he was driuen to go to Rauenna; where for the same cause, or the hatred which they bare against the Exarchs and former gouernors, the people vpon a day mutined, and killed him. The Pope was with great honor receiued by the Emperor, and when they had seene one the other, the Emperor prostrated himselfe vpon the Earth, and so much abased himselfe, as to kisse the Popes foote, with wonderfull shew of obedience: for as it may be gathered by this Princes doings, he was both fearefull and reuengefull, which are vices vsually going together. Hence it sprang, that in his greatest prosperity, he began to stand in feare of PHILIPPICVS, who liued in exile in Pontus, by the commandement of the tyrant TIBERIVS; and for no other cause, but for saying that he had dreamt of an Eagle. And IVSTINIAN desired also to be reuenged of the City Chersona, alleaging for his reason, that the Citizens had abused him when he lay there in the time of his banishment: wherfore he commanded a great Army to be leuied, and a Nauy to be rigged, to go and ruine that City, and to kill PHILIPPICVS, who liued there merrily and well content with his banishment, if they would haue suffered him to haue been at rest. But it pleased God to order matters in such sort, that what IVSTINIAN did to assure himself in the Empire, was the cause of his ruin, and the losse therof: for PHILIPPICVS vnderstanding that he came against him, and acquainting those of Chersona therewith, who also expected their owne destruction, he resolued to take vpon him the name of Emperor, and to die like a souldier fighting. Before which there passed other matters, which I omit: but the conclusion is, that seeing no other remedy, they all consented together, and the Army and Captains, sent by IVSTINIAN against Chersona, for taking him reuolted to PHILIPPICVS, who by his surname was called BARDANIVS. And he seeing himself fitted with power for his purpose, insteed of being assailed, resolued now to giue the assault; and therfore in great haste, with a very great power, he went towards Constantinople, where IVSTINIAN expected him: for after that he vnderstood what passed, he had raised a new Army; and encamping himselfe about twelue miles from the City, attended the comming of PHILIPPICVS: who as soon as he arriued set himself in order of battell, and IVSTINIAN did the like; and they fought the greatest part of the day very resolutely: but in the end the victory remained with PHILIPPICVS, and IVSTINIAN was ouerthrowne and slaine in the battaile, and together with him his son TIBERIVS, being but a very child, with much people of eyther side. And so ended the cares and Empire of the most vnfortunate Prince IVSTINIAN; seeing that in his time were so many disasters and calamities: whose life and acts were such as I haue shewed you. And if the Reader haue attentiuely obserued what I haue written, I guesse he will not holde me for a lyer, in that which I said in the beginning, that the Historie of his time, for the variety of changes which then hapned, was as a fained Comedie; or to say more properly, a Tragedy, consideringe the beginning and end thereof. Hee died in the yeere of our Lord 712 little more or lesse, and in the 27 yeere after he first began to raigne.

THE Emperor IVSTINIAN being ouerthrowne and slaine, PHILIPPICVS called also BARDANIVS or BARDANES, remained Emperor: of whom there is little to be written, for that he enioyed the Empire so little, and for that the Authors which I follow, make small mention of him. And of that little which we know of him, the first is, that as soone as he came to Constantinople, and was there sworne and crowned, he began to hold certaine doubtfull opinions of the Christian faith, aswell concerning the Diuinity of Christ, as some other matters, contrary to the resolution of the sixt generall councell, holding with the Monothelites: and hereupon he assembled certain Bishops in Constantinople, banishing CYRVS the Patriarch thereof, and in his Rome placing a Monke called IOHN. And therewith not satisfied, he wrote his Letters and sent an Ambassage to the Pope, requiring him to approue his opinions. Which the Pope not onely refused to doe, but for answere, commanded him vpon great curses and excommunications to renounce the opinions which he held: and in Rome, in the Cloysters, and the Porches of Saint PETERS Church, he commanded the Conclusions of the sixt generall Councell to be written, to the end that all men might know and beleeue the same. Whereof when the Emperor was aduertised, he presently commaunded that painting and writing to be rased and defaced, and the like to be done to all the crucifixes, images, and pictures of CHRIST, of our Ladie, and of the Saints, which he affirmed were not to be adored, or to be set vp in Churches. But his commandements were little regarded by the Pope, or the Roman people; for by a generall decree they proclaimed him a schismatick and an Heretick: and the Pope further commanded that in their diuine seruice he should not be prayed for, neither should there be any mention made of his name in any publike act or proclamation; which was executed accordingly: by meanes whereof he became odious and hatefull to the people of Rome, and generally of all Italy, wherein the Empire and gouernement of the Greekes began to be of small authority; by reason of the great power of the Lombards, and the great commaund and Authoritie of the Popes. For as much as the Emperors were contrary to them in some points of Religion, the people abhorred them, and denied to be their subjects: but PHILIPPICVS, notwithstanding the Popes fulminations, would not be diuerted from his determination; wherfore and for some other occasions, certaine principall men secretly conspired against him; the chiefe of which, was one ANTHEMIVS; which succeeded in this manner. The Emperour resting himselfe vpon a Whitsonday euen, after certaine disports on horsebacke, vsed in those times; the conspiratours violently rushing into his lodging apprehended him, and carrying him thence to another place pluckt out his eyes; and leauing him blind and imprisoned, refusing to kill him, they depriued him of his Empire, when he had raigned but one yeere and a halfe: and they aduanced the same ANTHEMIVS to the Empire, and gaue him to name, ANASTASIVS. This happened in the yeere of our Lord, seauen hundred and fourteene.

714

IF the malice and libertie to sinne in those times had not taken such roote, ANASTASIVS had beene an excellent Emperor, and had well gouerned the Commonwealth; for he was a vertuous and iust man, and of a deepe vnderstanding and iudgement: But by reason of the former gouernement, the wicked were so accustomed to the libertie of ill dooing, as they could not endure to be ruled by any one that should minister and execute iustice. For, as in a body diseased and so full of corrupt Humors, that the naturall vertue is therewith oppressed and ouercome, being vnable to resist the humor, no Physick can preuaile or worke any effect, but is rather loathsome and cast vp againe: euen so it happened to ANASTASIVS, and to THEODOSIVS the third also, who was his successor: for men were then so hardened and nousled in doing ill, and so accustomed to escape without any punishment for the same, as it seemed an hard and intolerable matter for them to endure their good gouernement, for the small time they liued in subjection: as in their places shall appeare.

Anastasius his chiefest care.

As soone as ANASTASIVS was Emperor, of two things he tooke especiall care; the first and principall was for the Christian faith and religion, wherein some of his predecessors had erred: the other was to take order for the defence of the Empire, which he found ill guarded and out of order.

Touching the first, he sent his Letters and Ambassadours to the Pope, whereby he protested to beleeue and to hold that faith which the Church of Rome beleeued: and approuing and ratifying the generall Councells, hee commaunded all his subjects to hold and beleeue the same. And as concerning the Empire, knowing that the greatest harme that it receiued was from the Sarazins (MAHOMETS Disciples) who then had conquered all Africa; against them only he resolued to employ all his whole force and power, seeing that hee could not obtaine the peace which he had first procured. And thereupon hee speedily leuied Captaines and Souldiers, and made a man of great esteeme (whose name was LEO) Generall of his Armie for the defence of the frontiers against Soria, for from thence the Infidels inuaded Asia the lesse. And for the Seas, he rigged a very great fleete, and therein shipped ped his mightie Army with an intent to sayle into Egypt, and to make a Conquest thereof, attempting first, the Citie of Alexandria. All which being set in order, and sufficient prouision made of all things necessarie, the Emperor being very ioyfull, hoping that some great exploite would haue beene done, the fleete departed from Constantinople and sayled to Alexandria, where the feare wherewith the inhabitants were striken, was greater than the hurt they receiued. For, the Imperialists, hauing besieged the Citie, through want of certaine necessaries (either in deede or fained) raised their siege, and returned to their shippes, sayled to the Isle of Rhodes, and some say to Phœnicia in Asia the lesse, to make prouision of Engines, and other necessaries, which they said were needefull for the battering of Alexandria, and other Townes. Whereof when the Emperor had intelligence he was greatly displeased, and reprehending his Captaines, sent them new prouision of all things necessarie, commaunding them presently to returne to the warre which they had already begunne. But in that age militarie Discipline was as much decayed and corrupted as other Sciences; and as I said in the beginning, The people being accustomed to liue licentiously after their owne fantasie, and being discontented with the gouernement of a good Emperour, the Armie mutined, and agreed among themselues to leaue their enterprise against the Infidels, and to turne head against the Emperour ANASTASIVS. And taking land in Asia the lesse, the greatest and chiefest part of the Armie marched ouer land: and imagining, that without an head and leader, the Army could hardly be well gouerned, they made choice of one to be their Emperour, whose name was THEODOSIVS, a man of meane parentage, but yet honest and of good behauior, and well knowne to them all, for he had been treasurer or receiuer of the Exchequer, and of the reuenues of the Empire: Who, for his good conditions, was well beloued of all men, and him they chose and made Emperour against his will.

In my judgement hee had reason to refuse it: For in truth the estate of the Empire and the faith and obedience borne to the Emperours in those times was such as not onely those which were vnworthy ought not to accept of the Empire, but euen those also which were capeable, and most sufficient and of greatest power, had reason by all waies and means possible to eschue the same.

ANASTASIVS vnderstanding of the Rebellion of his men of warre, and how they had chosen THEODOSIVS for their Emperour, made little account thereof (for hee disdained him for the baseneſse of his birth, and the small experience he had in the warres) neuertheleſse he raised a great power, and went into Asia to seeke him: and meeting him neere vnto the Citie of Nicea, the principall Citie in Bythinia, they fought a battaile, wherein through the secret judgement of God, ANASTASIVS was ouerthowne and taken prisoner, when he had raigned one yeere and three moneths onely; yet some say three yeeres: And the new chosen THEODOSIVS obtayned the victory, together with the Empire; and ANASTASIVS being deposed, remained prisoner and in his power, whom he made a priest. Which after the computation of ABBAS WESPERGENSIS, and of MATHEVV PALMERIVS, was in the yeere of our Lord, seuen hundred and seuenteene; PHILIPPICVS being yet liuing, whom ANASTASIVS had depriued of the Empire; so as he was his companion both in estate and fortune.

It seemeth that in the time of this ANASTASIVS, the Infidels made an end of the conquest of Spaine.

THE LIFE OF THEODOSIVS, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND ELEVENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THEODOSIVS seeing himselfe such as hee neuer thought to haue been (obeyed, and sworne Emperor, without any resistance or contradiction) went to Constantinople: and as he was noble in bountie and goodnesse, so he lost no iote of his good conditions, by being aduanced to the greatnesse and height of the Empire, but rather seemed to haue encreased the same. First he would not suffer ANASTASIVS to be put to death, neither to be any way grieued in his person; but onely to be assured of him, he caused him to be made a priest, and gaue him exhibition, wherein he continued vntill the time of the Emperour LEO, when by perswasion of a certaine captaine he sought to haue recouered the Empire: which cost him his life, as hereafter we wil recount, if so it shall be expedient. THEODOSIVS hauing set matters in order for the generall, he particularly commanded the images and pictures which PHILIPPICVS had caused to bee raised and defaced, to be repaired and new made; and in other matters concerning religion, he commanded his subiects to obserue and hold that which the councels had decreed, and the Church of Rome maintained, and so made shew of a pleasing Emperor. But fortune neuertheleſse shewed herselfe his enemy; for Leo whom his predecessour ANASTASIVS had made Generall for the defence of Asia the lesse against the Sarazins, and who yet had not done him any homage; vnder the pretence and colour to restore his master ANASTASIVS, ioyned himself with ARTAMASDVS another captain, which in the confines of Armenia commanded the ordinarie garrisons of the Empire, and they both with all their whole power came against THEODOSIVS; and comming to Nicomedia they apprehended a son of his which was there, and from thence marching forwards he began to vsurpe the name of Emperor. Against this force and violence wherewith LEO came; THEODOSIVS durst make no resistance; but vpon assurance that hee should not bee put to death, or receiue other wrong in his person, he yeelded himselfe into his hands, and chose to liue a religious life in a Monasterie, and taking the habit remained therein, before that one yeare was expired, after that (against his will) he had been made Emperor: so as now with him there were three Emperors which liued deposed. The first was PHILIPPICVS, whom ANASTASIVS had cast in prison, and had pluckt out his eyes, whose end what it was I finde not written: the second was ANASTASIVS, whom (as I said) this THEODOSIVS made to take religious orders and habit: and now the third was the same THEODOSIVS, who yeelding himselfe to LEO, made choise rather of a religious life than to stand to his defence. Wherein if voluntarily hee did it, or at least endured it with patience, (as is most likely) seeing that he was made Emperour perforce and against his will, truly he was in the right, and chose the better part and left the worse to LEO, which was the Empire: which he most wickedly gouerned, as hereafter shall appeare. This was in the yeere of our Lord seuen hundred and seuenteene.

THE LIFE OF LEO, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND TWELFTH ROMANE EMPEROVR.

WHilest that these Emperors of a yeeres standing, as Constables of Countrie villages, or (to speake more properly) Tyrants, did striue to subuert one another, they had no care to make head against the Sarazins and Infidels, which daily increased, and grew more mightie, so that Christendome was now despised and oppressed: for besides that which happened in the Empire, which now was of small force in the Kingdomes of France and Germany, were also warres betweene the French and the Burgonians, and likewise betweene the Frizons and the Sucuians, and betweene the Saxons and the Bauarians, and other Nations too long to be recited in this Historie. At which time CHARLES MARTEL in France (through the fame of his noble acts) grew to be very much esteemed, and conquered and subdued some, or the most part of all these said Nations. This CHARLES MARTEL was Pretorian Prefect, or rather High Constable of France, which was the highest dignity in that time next to the King; who by reason of the insufficiency of King CHILDERICVS, who afterwards was deposed, and of his owne great valour (although the other had the name) he had the authority of King. And in Italy also were some iunouations, so as the Infidels daily more and more preuailed: and hauing conquered the greatest part of all Spaine, they extended their power thence into France, and tooke Catalonia, and afterwards Narbone, and besieged Auignon; which was within the bounds of the Gothish kings of Spaine. But those countries being afterwards recouered by the Kings of France, they continued in their subiection. These heathen Princes also conquered the Iles of Maiorica and Minorica, and other Islands in that Sea, with the Isle of Sardinia. Presently after that THEODOSIVS was deposed from his Empire, and that LEO the third of that name, was receiued and established, being vnworthy thereof; ZVLEMON (whom some call after another manner) King and Captaine of the Sarazins, and now Lord of Asia, of Africa, and of Spaine, making small account of LEO, or of the decayed and weakened Empire; resolued with himselfe wholly to subuert the same; And to that effect vsed all the meanes and deuices possible, to leuie men and prouide shipping, to goe or send against the great Citie of Constantinople, together with all Thracia and Gracia. The prouision which he made was so great, that some authors affirme, he had in his fleete three thousand saile of shippes, and an incredible number of men of warre, which he sent vnder the conduct of two Generals, the one called MASGILDVS, and the other SOLIMAN.

Zulemon king of the Sarazins made warre against the Empire.

These Armies came into Europe, and passed the Streight of Constantinople, without any resistance: for although that the Emperor LEO had intelligence of their comming, yet was hee not able to raise so great power as might suffice to keepe them from landing. Wherefore hee thought thought it a better course to defend the City; and so suffred himself to be besieged, rather than to abandon it to the enemies, who made themselues Lords both of Sea and Land, and besieged the City round both by Land and by Sea, for the space of three yeers continually. And notwithstanding that the Besieged valiantly defended it, yet it was thought for certain, that it would haue been lost, if in the Besiegers had been such valour and policie as was to haue been expected in such men: but, through a desire to rob, they dispersed themselues so ouer the land, that they were thereby greatly endamaged, and the City was the lesse distressed, and had the better oportunity to prouide such things as were wanting. And particularly some Captaines with part of this Army, seeing that no man made resistance against them, wandred vp & downe the Countrey ouer all Thracia, killing and robbing vntill they came into Bulgaria, which in antient time was called the lower Misia: for defense whereof, the King of that Countrey sent so good an Army, that he not onely defended his Frontiers, but ouerthrew his enemies, and slue of them (as some Historians haue written) two and thirty thousand. But their power was so great, that all Christendome stood in extreme fear of them, and held the Emperor LEO and all Gracia for lost.

Bulgaria whilome cald lower Misia.

At that time there was so much ambition and so little charity among Christians, that they could not be induced to giue ouer the warres and priuate contentions among themselues: for, in Italie the Lombards inlarged their dominion, and took all such towns as they could get either by force or policy. The Frenchmen and other Princes did the like; and euen their owne Captains and seruants failed them in this extremity: for, SERGIVS, who was Pretor or Gouerner for LEO in Sicilia, houlding the Emperor for lost, with the consent of some others chose one GREGORIE for Emperor; and, making him to change his name, they called him TIBERIVS: what end he made I will tell you hereafter. Onely the Bulgarians assisted the Empire: for, in truth they had interest therein, considering the danger that hung ouer their owne heads if the Sarazins preuailed. And the Christians which in Constantinople were besieged, made such praiers and supplications, that it seemd the Lord took compassion of them, and protected them: for, no humane power was sufficient to haue resisted so great forces. Which, as Historians affirm, was manifestly a diuine miracle, that in so long time as the siege lasted, the whole Empire had not been lost, comparing the garrison which was within to defend the City, with the multitude and power of those which besieged it: to whom, by Gods appointment, befell so many misfortunes and disasters, that without any mans help they were ruined. First, in the time of the siege died their King ZVLEMON, whom they also called AMVRATH; and about the chusing of a new King they fell at so great variance and dissension among themselues, that they were disordred, and the Besieged greatly recomforted; vntill at the last AMINTHAS HVMAR was chosen, who followed the warre more faintly and retchlesly than before: and there afterwards followed such colde weather, such storms, and so many plagues of famine and pestilence among them, that the greatest part of them died, as well by Land as by Sea. Besides this, there followed so many tempests and violent windes vpon the seas, that in the best and safest harbours their ships were ouerset and cast away; in such sort, that the Infidels were so much diminished and decaid, that the City of Constantinople was not only freed and deliuered from that siege, but also fewe of them escaped with their liues from before it: for, of three thousand saile which they brought thither in the beginning, so fewe returned with their people, that it seems to be a matter incredible: and, besides those that were cast away by foul weather at sea, the Historians write, that very many of their ships were burnt by one mans industry. Finally, all that great multitude and number of men and shipping, which seemed to haue been sufficient to haue ouerrun the whole world, and to haue laid the same waste, in little more than two yeers was lost and consumed: and LEO remained the sole absolute Lord of all that which before he possessed; who shewed not himself so thankfull to God for his so great benefits as he ought to haue done. He had also no lesse good hap against TIBERIVS a Tyrant, which rebelled in Sicilia, who in short space was brought to confusion: for, the Emperor LEO sending from Constantinople the Captain of his horsemen called PAVL, with the title and authority of Gouerner of Sicilia, and with Letters to the Captains and souldiers there; PAVL by a stratagem got into the City of Syracusa, now called Sarragossa: where he shewed his authority to those of the City & of the Army; and they all, knowing that the Emperor whom they held for lost, was aliue and at liberty, obeyed his command; and with such fauour receiued and entertained their new Captain, that they apprehended their new King, and deliuered him into the power of this PAVL, who put him to death: and SERGIVS the Pretor of Sicilia, who was the Author and Ori-

The death of Zulemon, King of the Sarazins. Aminthas Humar chosen king of the Sarazins.

Paul put Gregory to death.

Originall of this rebellion, fled into Italy to the Lombards; and so that Iland remained in peace and obedience to the Emperor.

The Emperor LEO being freed from so great distresse and oppression, ought truly to haue applied himselfe to the seruice of God, and to haue rendred thankes for the same, and to haue relieued his poore subiects and vassals, of the losses and harmes by them sustained: but hee to the contrarie, vnder colour to recouer the charges which he had been at, laid new impositions and taxes vpon the people, and tooke order that the Churches should haue been ransacked; against which Pope GREGORIE, to the vttermost of his power, opposed himselfe. By reason whereof (dislike growing betweene them) the Emperour sought to haue made away the Pope, or to haue taken him prisoner; and to that end he sent thither for Gouernour one MARINVS, and afterwards the Exarch PAVL, where there happened many accidents which I omit; vntill that at last the Pope found reliefe where he neuer thought to haue had any, which was in LEVTPRAND King of the Lombards. After this, the Emperor seeming desirous to beat peace with the Pope, requested him to cause the images to be taken from the Altars, and to bee put out of the Churches and temples, in such manner as he had done in Constantinople: whereto the Pope making a presumptuous answere, with great authoritie sent his Letters and Buls through all Christendome, excommunicating the Emperour, and commanding the images to be honoured and had in reuerence. The pontificall command of this Pope GREGORIE, was of such authoritie, and the Emperour was thereby brought into such disliking with the people, as most of the cities in Italy, and the men of warre in Rauenna tooke part with the Pope against him; and there was so great debate and dissension in Rauenna, that they slew the Exarch PAVL, and desired the Pope to depose the Emperor LEO, and to chuse another in his place. This dissension gaue occasion and oportunitie to the Lombards (contrarie to the peace) to take the citie of Bologna, and many other cities and townes in that quarter. Which the Emperor perceiuing, he desired and practised the Popes death or imprisonment, and to that end sent a new Exarch or gouernour into Italy, called EVRISTIVS; who landing at Naples (to be neere to Rome) endeuoured either by force or policie to execute his commission, writing letters to many his friends in Rome and else-where, to that effect: which put the Pope and his friends in great feare and perplexitie, seeing themselues of the one side oppressed by the Emperor, and on the other standing in feare of the Lombards. Wherefore they sought by all meanes to be at peace with them: which LEVTPRAND their King in consideration of his owne aduantage and benefit, granted, and came to Rome; hauing occasion to passe by it with an Army against certaine Captaines which rebelled in Spoleto and Beneuent; so as the Emperors practice was the second time made frustrate, but he had his will in throwing downe and burning all the images: and for as much as the Patriarch GERMANVS would not consent thereto, he deposed him from his prelacie, and placed another in his roome. Matters standing in this estate, Pope GREGORIE died, who was the second of that name; and another of the same name borne in Syria, succeeded him, who commanded a generall councell to be assembled in Rome, whither came many Bishops: and therein the vse and veneration of images was againe approoued and ratified, and the Pope proceeded against the Emperor, in such manner, that he was excommunicate and Anathematized by the councell. In that time hapned many terrible earthquakes, whereby many cities in Asia the lesse, and in Gracia, were ruined: and the Sarazins came out of Syria into Asia the lesse, doing much hurt, and tooke certaine cities in Cappadocia. Before this, the Emperor made his eldest sonne being a young man, whose name was CONSTANTINE, CÆSAR, and nominating him his successor, married him to the Kings daughter of Bauaria called YRENI. This seemeth to haue passed in the seauenteenth yeere of his raigne, all which time with the rest of his Empire, which was in all foure and twentie yeeres, he gouerned with greater rigor then beseemed a King or an Emperor: and notwithstanding that he wanted neither valour nor policie to maintaine himselfe in the Empire; yet matters were carried with such violence and couetousnes, that in his time were great warres. In Italy the Lombards took many cities, and besieged Rauenna: and the people within it, once againe slew their Exarch or gouernor. In Asia the lesse the Infidels entred the countrie, and robbing and spoiling the same, carried away an infinit number of captiues, and made conquest of a great part of the countrie. And all the prouinces thereof, with Gracia, Italy, the Isles of Sicilia and Creta, now called Candia, which were in his subiection, were greatly oppressed with tributes, imprests, and other intolerable exactions; in such manner, that many reioiced at his death: which happened in the yeere of our Lord seuen hundered and one and fortie, he dying of a Dysenteria; and in his place remained his son CONSTANTINE

THE ARGVMENT.

CONstantine, being established in the Empire, made present preparation for the warres against the Iustelcin Egypt; but he was molested and hindred by Artausius a Tyrant, who took Armes against him, and intituled himself Emperor: wherefore he returned, notwithstanding that hee was alreadie arriued at Alexandria, and took Constantinople by force, and punished the tyrant, although not with such seuerity as his offense deserued. At that time, Aistolphus King of the Lombards making warre against Rome, Pope Stephen sued to the Emperor for aid: but hee prouided no such Army as the importance of the case required; thinking to pacifie Aistolphus by Letters and Ambassages. Whereupon the Pope, seeing the delay and little regard of the Emperor, called the French into Italie to relieue him; and they, coming, twice freed the City of Rome from the hands of the Lombards: wherewith Constantine (vnderstanding what the Pope had done) was displeased, and sent him an Ambassage promising succours; which came not in time: for, the French, being already passed the Alps, had compelled Aistolphus to render the Cities which Pepin gaue to the Church of Rome. A Councell was called in Rome, and the Emperor was condemned for an Heretick about the pulling down of Images: and at that time also ended the Kingdome of the Lombards vnder Desiderius their King. And Constantine, making warre against the Bulgarians, fell sick of a kinde of Leprosie, called Elephantia; and, dying, left the Empire to his son Leo, when he had gouerned the same 35 yeers.

NOtwithstanding that LEO was but a bad Emperor, and therefore ill-beloued; yet, as soon as hee was dead, his sonne was receiued and obeyed, in hope that he would haue proued better than his father, or else for that in his fathers time he was growne so mightie, that they durst not attempt to make choice of any other. But he proued so good a scholar to his father LEO, that in all things hee excelled and surpassed him much, and liued longer than he; so as these seem not to bee the liues of Emperors which we now relate, in comparison of those which are past: but, like as in great vessels wherein wine or some other good liquor hath been kept, as it consumeth, so it becometh of a worse taste, and in the bottom there remain some lees and dregs; so befell it in the Eastern Empire, wherein had been verie great and mighty Princes, whose beginning was such as you haue seen, and whose end we may say drew neer; seeing that within fewe yeers the title & dignity of the Empire was transiated from them to the French and Germans; notwithstanding that in Gracia there remained Emperors a long time after.

Presently after that CONSTANTINE was crowned; to giue some signe of a future good Emperor, hee prouided a great Armie and a Nauy, therewith to go in person into Egypt: and Pope ZACHARY, vnderstanding thereof, sent him two Ambassadors to congratulate his coming to the Empire, according to the custome of his Predecessors; disswading him from his fathers opinions, and exhorting him to beleeue as the Church of Rome did: and hee therewith sent him in writing the Articles which he would haue him to beleeue.

Pope Zacharie sent his Legats to Constantinople with Articles to be held and beleeued.

These Ambassadors staied so long vpon their way, that, when they arriued at Constantinople, the Emperor was already departed with his fleet towards Egypt against the Infidels, thinking to haue surprised the City of Alexandria, and afterwards to haue conquered the whole Countrey: for, in that Kingdome, and in other Prouinces which were but lately lost, liued many Christians, which continued therein a long time; and in some Cities were Bishops, by the permission of the Sarazins.

Within fewe daies after the Emperor was embarked, an eminent man which remained in Constantinople, whose name was ARTHAVSTVS, being assisted by many which took his part, rose with the City, and was called Emperor: whereof CONSTANTINE was speedily aduertised, euen at such time as with his fleet hee was comn within sight of Alexandria in Egypt. Hauing certain notice thereof, without any longer stay he returned towards Constantinople: and ARTHAVSTVS, who was in possession thereof, put himself in Arms, with much people to defend the same. But CONSTANTINE, landing, besieged the City, and, entring it by force, apprehended the Tyrant, and commanded his eies to be pluckt out, and to be perpetually banished: which in my opinion was too small a punishment for so great a treason: but then was vsed so much disloyalty, that it was not punished accordingly as it deserued. This beeing soon ended (although not without bloudshed) he heard the Popes Ambassage, finding his Ambassadors there in that confusion: which he answered with good words, but without performing what they required; persisting in his opinion concerning the abolishing of Images, and other points which his father held; and therewith hee desired that the Church of Rome should doo the like: which put the Pope into a great agony, as well by reason heerof, as of the tyranny and wars of the Lombards. And the Emperors succours failing, it pleased God to send it from other parts; all which, from the root and ground, passed in this manner:

Constantine put out Arthaustus eies.

At that time the Christian faith and religion flourished in the Kingdome of France, principally among the Princes & great Lords thereof; wherein by the death of CHARLES MARTEL, who as we said was high Constable of that Kingdome, his two sonnes, whereof the one was called CARLOMAN, and the other PEPIN, remaining in their fathers place, came to the gouernment as absolute Lords of the whole Countrey. Which Kingdome was then much greater than now it is (although it be yet very great): for, besides that which the French now hould, they then possessed a great part of Germany; as, Austria, Saxonie, Flanders, Burgundie, Suesia, and other Prouinces. The elder of these two brethren (which was CARLOMAN) making no account of the would, wherein he had such part, determined to leaue it, and went to Rome to Pope ZACHARY, who gaue him Church-orders; and he became a Monk of the Order of S. BENEDICT, wherein he continued and died. His brother PEPIN remained alone in the gouernment of the Kingdom of France, and did many noble feats of Arms, inlarging that kingdome against the enemies thereof; and he gouerned the same so well, that there was no speech or mention made of King CHILDERICK. Wherefore, forasmuch as in truth the King was a man of small discretion, and altogether incapable of the gouernment, Pope ZACHARIE deposed him from the Kingdome, and confirmed and approued the election of King PEPIN, as, THOMAS AQVINAS, ROBERT GAGVIN, and PAVLVS EMILIVS, French Historiographers, write. CHILDERICK became a religious man, and in him ended the line and lineall descent of the Kings of France, extract from the bloud of the famous Francons: and the Crown passed to the line of this PEPIN, wherein it continued almost two hundred and forty yeers, vntill such time as there happened another change; as shall bee declared when time and place shall permit. This PEPIN was father to CHARLES the Great, who afterwards was Emperor: wherefore it behoues me heer to make mention of him.

The state of France standing in this maner, in Italy died Pope ZACHARIE, and STEPHEN the second of that name succeeded him: in the beginning of whose Papacy, AISTOLPHVS was King of the Lombards; and, as we may say, of all Italie: for, his brother RACHISIVS, who was King, became a Monk of the Order of Saint BENEDICT. This new King, seeing the small care the Emperor took for the affairs of Italy; breaking the peace whereto hee himself was sworn, raised a great power (as a man that had sufficient means) and cruelly harried the Land, and then besieged, battered, and took the City of Rauenna, which of long time (excepting Rome) had been the principall City of all Italie, and the seat of the Exarchs or Gouerners: and he also wonne many other Towns, which vntill then had valiantly defended themselues; so as there remained no more but the City of Rome and the Territorie thereof: for, in a manner all Pulia and Calabria were held by them. Which when Pope STEPHEN the Second saw, he sent to giue the Emperor to vnderstand thereof; plainly manifesting to him, that if hee did not speedily send relief, all Italie would come into the power of the Lombards.

Rachisius, king of the Lombards renounced the kingdom, and became a Monk.

The Emperor in this case made not such prouision of an Army and men of warre as the necessity of the cause required, and sent but onely an Ambassador to the King of the Lombards; and other Ambassadors were sent by the King to the Emperor, and long treaties and many speeches were spent about the matter: but AISTVLPHVS, without respect of any person, sent to the Pope, requiring him to giue vp the City of Rome into his power; if not, that hee would then come and take it by force, and cut off the heads of all such as he should finde therein. The Pope seeing this, after long consideration and consultation had about the matter, with the consent of the whole City, seeing there was no other remedy, resolued to send to PEPIN King of France for relief; which was done with the greatest secrecy that could bee, hee seeking by other means to entertain King AISTVLPHVS with presents & promises. The King of France willingly heard his Ambassage, and promised to doo what he required; and therewith sent to the Pope, counselling him for his more safety to come into France.

King Aistulphus his message to the pope.

In the mean time returned the Ambassadors which were sent to the Emperor to Constantinople; who brought no other relief, but direction for the Pope to go in person to King AISTVLPHVS, and to entreat him for peace. The Pope, hauing already fully determined of his journy, must of necessity passe through AISTVLPHVS dominions, and therfore resolued to do both; and so departed from Rome, accompanied with the Ambassadors of both the Kings, and of the Emperor, and came to Pauia where the proud King AISTVLPHVS then lay; but could not come to any composition with him: for, he required to haue the dominion and rule of Rome and the rest of Italie, and that they should yeerly giue him a certain peece of gold for euery head. And notwithstanding that they treated of peace, yet he daily made preparation for the warres: soas the Pope, in the best manner he could, took his leaue of him, and by long journies came into France, houlding his way towards King PEPINS Court; who commanded his eldest sonne CHARLES, who afterwards was Emperor, that as soon as he were com into France, he should conduct and accompany him; and he himself afterwards came three miles from Paris, where he then held his Court, to meet him: and, alighting from his horse, he kist the Popes foot, and would ride no more; but led the Popes horse by the bridle. And in this manner, with too great humility, he conducted him to his Palace; where he was magnificently receiued, and royally entertained: and there he confirmed King PEPIN's election, and so anointed and crowned him King of France.

King PEPIN, after many matters which passed about this business, resoluing to relieue the Pope, caused an Armie to be leuied: but hee first sent Ambassadors to King AISTVLPHVS, to treat with him concerning a settling of peace; offering him reasonable and honourable conditions. Whereto he answerd with greater pride than befitted him: for, making small account of King PEPIN, hee reposed his chief trust in the multitude of his men. The peace beeing broken, and the warre resolued, PEPIN commanded his troops to march; whose Vauntgard, in passing the Alps, fought with AISTVLPHVS his forces which guarded the passages: which being broken and scattered, the King passed with his whole Armie; and, AISTVLPHVS, staying in the Plains with the rest of his power, and vnable to make head against him, was forced to retire: whom King PEPIN pursued, vntill he had shut him vp in the City of Pauia, where (being Master of the Field) he besieged him: during which siege, many rapines, robberies and outrages, were committed. Pope STEPHEN seeing what ill was befalln, notwithstanding that he apparantly saw the victory, and that hee himself was the procurer of the war, yet he laboured for peace, and dealt with AISTVLPHVS to that effect, perswading him to resigne what he had taken, and to binde himself by oath to maintain the peace, and to giue hostages and security for the obseruing of the same.

Warres between King Pepin and Aistulphus King of the Lombards.

AIS-

AISTVLPHVS being thus beſieged, and hearing theſe newes, in outward ſhew praiſed God, faining great humilitie and thankfulnes to the Pope; and extolling him, he promiſed and ſware to his moſt obedient ſon, and ſo a peace was concluded: for King PEPIN pretended nothing, but reſtitution to be made to the Pope, and the quiet of the Church of Rome: and as it ſeemed that he had effected the ſame, taking with him fortie men of account, which AISTVLPHVS deliuered vnto him for hoſtages and pledges, for the performance of his promiſe, he within a certaine prefixed time, raiſed his ſiege from before Pauia, and returned towards France, leauing a great Noble-man called VERNERIVS to ſee the conditions performed: whereof the Pope holding himſelfe aſſured, departed alſo towards Rome; and AISTVLPHVS accompliſhing ſome matters of ſmall importance, with faire words deferring the principall (which was the rendring of cities and townes) temporized, vntill that King PEPIN was returned into his countrie. Afterwards contrarie to his oth, he would performe nothing of what he had promiſed, but went to Rauenna, and thither ſent for the greateſt part of his forces; and continuing his pretended purpoſe, within a very ſmall time after, took his way towards Rome, where the Pope was; and encamping himſelfe before it, held it beſieged the ſpace of three moneths; in which time (as all hiſtories beare record) hee did greater harme in the fields and teritorie thereof, then had been done before in three hundred and fortie yeeres, by the Viſogothes, the Oſtrogothes, the Heruli, the Lombards themſelues, or any other nation. In the beginning of this ſiege, what paſſed I haue not time to ſet downe; but that the Pope ſent his Ambaſſadours downe the riuer of Tiber, and thence by ſea to king PEPIN into France who was then the Popes only refuge, to entreate him to come to his reliefe; whom they found buſie in making preparation for his voiage, notwithſtanding that they had not requeſted him: but with their comming farre greater haſte was made. Whereof when AISTVLPHVS had intelligence, he raiſed his ſiege from before Rome, and came into Lombardy, with an intent to haue ſtopped king PEPINS deſcent from the Alpes; where we will leaue them for a while, to the end hereafter to make an end of the ſtorie. And let vs now ſpeake of Conſtantine, of whom this Hiſtorie treats, whom wee haue not without reaſon forgotten: for in truth it hath bin to giue light to the reader, to vnderſtand the cauſe and reaſon why the Pope tranſported the Empire into the Weſterne parts, and firſt into the houſe of France; for which cauſe it was requiſite to declare what is ſaid, and what ſhall be ſpoken hereafter: for although it be not directly of the Emperours, yet it is very expedient for the hiſtorie, and the cleerenes and order of what we ſhall write hereafter. I ſay then that CONSTANTINE was not idle all the while that theſe things paſſed in Italy, but attempted to make warre againſt the Infidels, ſomtimes in Egypt, and ſometimes in Syria, but euer with ill ſucceſſe.

Rome beſieged by the Lombards.

His Empire was alſo much diſtreſſed and weakned, by reaſon of a great peſtilence, which fell among the inhabitants in thoſe parts, which was ſo terrible, that it was feared the land would haue been diſpeopled; which, as HVGO FLORIACENSIS writeth, began in Calabria, and from thence paſſed into Sicilia, and afterwards into Gracia, and to Conſtantinople, afflicting thoſe countries. So as it is thought and held for certaine, that if there had not happened to ariſe new and vnexpected enemies againſt the Sarazins, the Eaſt Empire had beene in great danger to haue beene loſt. But in the time of this calamitie the Turkes deſcended, in a moſt huge multitude, out of Scithia Aſiatica; for being in a manner innumerable, and in a cold and barren countrie; moued thereto through the fame of the wealth of Aſia, they came into the prouince of the Alanes, and afterwards into the countries of the Colchi, and from thence deſcended into Armenia; and laſtly into Perſia, and ſo into Aſia the leſſe, ſpoiling and ſubduing thoſe countries: in ſuch ſort that the Mahometiſts could not attempt ought againſt the Chriſtians, neither were of power ſufficiently able to defend themſelues, and therefore concluded a peace with them: and ſo the Turkes remained Lords of a great part of thoſe prouinces, and afterwards receiued the accurſed ſect of MAHOMET, which they found in the countries by them ſubdued.

The origine of the Turkes.

The Sarazins being much troubled in this warre, ſuffered CONSTANTINE to liue in peace. But the Turkes did him much harme, for they took from him certaine prouinces in Aſia the leſſe and therein, and in the reſt of Aſia, continued a long time after, mixed with other nations, hauing no rule or dominion, but liued obſcurely, vntill that about two hundred and fiftie yeeres afterwards, (as when time ſhall ſerue wee will tell you) one amongſt them whoſe name was OTTOMAN, began the dominion and Empire which they hold this day. This nation of the Turkes (ſetting a part all other opinions) had their originall beginning in Scithia in Aſia: Of all the ancient writers, onely PLINY in his ſixt booke, and POMPONIVS MELA in the end of

of his firſt booke, make mention of them, and place them amongſt the Sarmates in the confines of Scithia, ouer the Caſpian paſſages in the Hyperborean mountaines; and they ſay that they liued diſperſed in the fields, by that which they could get by hunting; ſo as they were vnknowne (yet ſome mention was made of them) vntill this their deſcent in the time of CONSTANTINE the fift; and ſo for almoſt other fiue hundred yeeres, there was no great account made of them. The opinion of thoſe which ſay that the Turkes deſcended from the Troianes, is meerely falſe, and ſhall not needs to be reproued, or impugned, for that it is ridiculous, and not to be regarded: for what is before ſaid is true. But returning to my ſtorie, I ſay that the affaires of the Eaſt remaining in this eſtate, and the Emperor knowing that AISTVLPHVS King of the Lombards had beſieged Rome, and that the Pope had ſent to the French King for aide, and that hee made preparation to come to relieue him; being greatly grieued therewith, in great haſte he ſent two of his fauourites to the Pope, requeſting him not to retaine the ſuccours of France, for that hee himſelfe would aſſiſt him. But this tooke no effect, for as much as they ſpake too late, and alſo for that the Pope and ſtate of Rome had no good conceite or hope of him: ſo as the Emperors Ambaſſadours ſtaied not in Rome, but went to the French court, where they ſought to haue diuerted the King, and to haue diſſwaded him from going into Italy. But King PEPIN relented not, but rather with a greater and better Armie paſſed the Alpes; in which paſſage were many skirmiſhes, and many men were loſt of the one ſide and the other. But in the end AISTVLPHVS durſt not abide the battaile: but ſetting al matters in the beſt order that poſſibly he could, he retired himſelfe into the citie of Pauia, which was the head and royal ſeate of that Kingdome; wherein King PEPIN againe beſieged him, and he preſently began to treate of peace, offering to render whatſoeuer he had taken. The Emperors Ambaſſadors ſolicited, that Rauenna and all that gouernment might be reſtored to the Emperor, and the reſt to the Pope: Whereto King PEPIN anſwered, that he came to that war, onely for the defence of the Church of Rome, and that all that therein was conquered, ſhould be her inheritance, and no bodies elſe. Finally, a peace was concluded: and AISTVLPHVS, before the ſiege was raiſed, rendred vnto the Pope, Rauenna, and all the cities which in thoſe warres he had taken, in that Exarchate, or out of it; amongſt which were Bologna, Mantua, Ceſena, Modena, Rezzo, Parma, Placentia, Ferrara, Fauencia, and many other cities and townes, whereof King PEPIN made to the Church of Rome a perpetuall donation; as a thing by him conquered and gotten.

King Pepin came the ſecond time into Italy.

King Pepin his donation to the Church of Rome.

The Emperors Ambaſſadors ſeeing this (being out of hope) returned, and the peace was confirmed. So as the gouernment and dignitie of the Exarches was wholly ended and extinguiſhed in Italy, the which had continued one hundred threeſcore and fiftreene yeeres, and the Popes remained ſole Lords of all thoſe countries, and poſſeſſed the ſame together with the citie of Rome, and the reſt. King PEPIN being returned into France, King AISTVLPHVS which deferred the deliuerie of certaine places, thinking to haue effected ſome innouation, was ouertaken by death, the manner whereof is written diuerſly. And after his deceaſe one DESIDERIVS, a great man among the Lombards, was choſen for their King; who was Duke of Hetruria, now Tuſcane. And notwithſtanding that ſome great men perſwaded RACHISIVS, brother to AISTVLPHVS, who of long time had been a Monk, to take vpon him the name and title of King, yet this took no effect: and DESIDERIVS, with the fauour of Pope STEPHEN, to whom he promiſed to be a perpetuall friend, remained King; and ſo the peace was eſtabliſhed. Pope STEPHEN applied himſelfe to the gouernment of his Church, and the eſtate thereof. But when he was moſt buſie about thoſe matters, hee was taken with an infirmitie; whereof he died, and PAVL the firſt of that name, a Romane borne, ſucceeded him.

The death of King Aiſtulphus.

In the mean while that K. PEPIN made warres againſt the Lombards in Italie, the Emperor CONSTANTINE endeuoured to put the Images out of the Churches, and made peace with HADALIA King of the Sarazins, to the end that he ſhould induce the Chriſtians to doe the like, which were in Armenia, Paleſtina, Soria, and in all the other Prouinces in his ſubiection; which were infinit, and continued in thoſe countries a long time after, and it is ſayd that many liue there vntill this day. This Emperor is reported to haue reſtrained the liberty of the Monks and Prelates very much, without reſpect to their immunities and priuiledges; amongſt which he cut off the head of CONSTANTINE the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, for oppoſing himſelf againſt him, and therewith ſuppreſſed certaine Monaſteries.

The Emperor made peace with Hadalia King of the Sarazins.

Conſtantine cauſed the Patriarch of Conſtantinople to be beheaded.

In this time there grew warre and diſſenſion betweene him and THESSALIVS, King of Bulgaria; who entred Thracia, and did much harme, ſpoiling and waſting the lands of the Empire; againſt vvhom CONSTANTINE leuied an Armie, and fighting with him obtained

tained the victory; and THESSALIVS returned by flight, with loſſe of many of his men; for which diſgrace, and for his euill carriage in the battell, his people roſe againſt him, and ſlue him; and choſe another called SABINVS for their King: who, to make the Emperour his friend, conſented and agreed with him to deface and caſt the Images out of the Churches; wherewith his Subjects were ſo much diſcontented, that, if hee had not eſcaped from them by flight, they had ſlain him: but he went to the Emperor, and was there protected; and the Bulgarians choſe another for their King, whoſe name was PAGANVS.

At this time, CONSTANTINE made his eldeſt ſonne, called LEO, his companion and ſucceſſor in the Empire: this LEO was afterwards abſolute Emperor, and the fourth of that name.

The death of King Pepin, Charles ſurnamed the Great, and his brother Carloman, ſucceeded their father.

Whil'ſt that CONSTANTINE was buſied about theſe matters, Pope PAVL in Italy liued in peace with the Lombards and their King DESIDERIVS, according to the compoſition made and eſtabliſhed by King PEPIN of France; who within ſhort ſpace after died, hauing bin one of the moſt excellent Princes of the world. After the death of PEPIN, CHARLS and CARLOMAN his ſonnes ſucceeded him, which diuided the Kingdome between them; and, by the death of CARLOMAN, it came wholly to CHARLES.

Pope Conſtantine depoſed and made a Monk.

Preſently after that King PEPIN was dead, Pope PAVL alſo died; whoſe death cauſed a Schiſm in the Church of Rome: for, DESIDERIVS King of the Lombards, ſending a Captain of his with certain troops of ſouldiers to Rome, procured his brother CONSTANTINI to be made Pope; who, without regard of the order of election, took poſſeſſion of the Palace, and held the papall ſtate for the ſpace of one yeer: and others of a contrary faction and opinion, choſe another Pope, whoſe name was PHILIPPICVS; but, CONSTANTINE being of greater power, PHILIPPICVS was depoſed. But, as all was done by force and violence, ſo by the like force it was determined: for, the people and clergie agreeing together made choice of STEPHEN the Third, who was a Sicilian born, and compeld CONSTANTINE to reſigne the Papacy, and put himſelf into a Cloiſter.

The firſt thing that the new Pope did, was, Again to ſet vp Images in Churches; and to that effect wrote to the two ſons of PEPIN the deceaſed King of France, to ſend to the Emperour ſome of the Prelates which were in their Kingdome; which then was ſo great, that it extended it ſelf from the Alps to the Pirenean Mountains, and thence ſo far as to Hungary, and on the other ſide to the ſea: ſo as theſe two Brothers were Lords of all that which we now call France, together with Flanders, Frieſeland, Braband, and on both ſides of the riuer Rhine, of Auſtria, Bauire, and other Prouinces of Germany, beſides what rebelled in his time, which was a great part: all which, this CHARLES conquerd and pacified, although not without great trauell, and made himſelf abſolute Lord of the Whole. The Pope by their conſent ſummoned a Councell to bee held in Rome, wherein the Emperor CONSTANTINE was again condemned; and all that he and his father had commanded to be done in Conſtantinople, was reproued and diſannulled: but this took ſmall effect, for he little regarded it.

The Councell being diſſolued, DESIDERIVS King of the Lombards ſought to haue cauſed ſome alteration in Rome and in Italy, by means of one ANFIARATA the Emperors chamberlain, who then was in Rome: wherein although there were no Gouerners for the Empire as in former time (for, it now ſeemed, that the Popes had the ſole gouernment) yet was this ANFIARATA of great authority; who (with the aſſiſtance of DESIDERIVS, which ſought to procure the Emperor to haue ſome footing again in Italie, thereby to weaken the power of the Pope, and of the French) apprehended certain Romanes, and committed them vnto priſon.

The death of Pope Stephen.

Three yeers paſt in theſe matters; and, Pope STEPHEN dying, ADRIAN the firſt of thoſe which were ſo called was choſen: who at his firſt entrance releaſed thoſe out of priſon which were committed in the time of Pope STEPHEN by ANFIARATA. Whereupon King DESIDERIVS, ſeeing how much the papall power by means of France increaſed, ſought to haue made a league with him: which the Pope refuſed, alleaging that hee would not beleeue him who had no better held his word.

At this time died CARLOMAN King of France, and his brother, who afterwards for his great acts was called CHARLES the Great, made himſelf Lord of that Kingdome: and the widow Queen, wife of the deceaſed King, went with her ſons to King DESIDERIVS into Italy; who, being glad of her coming, receiued and entertaind her very honourably, thinking to haue raiſed ſome trouble & diſſenſion among the French; and to that effect practiſed with Pope ADRI-

ADRIAN, to make the eldeſt ſonne of King CARLOMAN King of that part of France which his father enioyed, with intent by that meanes to haue ſet him and King CHARLES at variance, whom hereafter we will call CHARLES the Great: whereto the Pope would not be induced, and DESIDERIVS purpoſing by force to bring it to paſſe, began to make warre on euery ſide. The firſt was againſt the Citie of Rauenna and the marches thereof, and beſooke the Cities of Ferrara, Rauentia, and other Townes: and the Pope by Ambaſſages and Letters entreating him to deſiſt from thoſe warres, he threatned to beſiege Rome it ſelfe, and tooke his way thitherwards. Whereupon the Pope ſent three Biſhops to meete him vpon the way, and by them ſent him a decree, wherein he charged him not to paſſe any further, neither to preſume to come within the bounds of the territory of Rome, vpon paine to be preſently excommunicated. And notwithſtanding that DESIDERIVS was a very reſolute man, and of an hautie ſpirit, yet as ſoone as he had receiued this decree, without ſetting one foote further, he returned with his forces to the Citie of Pauia; but the warres ceaſed not. For all which the Emperour CONSTANTINE was nothing ſorrie, he ſo much enuied the Popes greatneſſe: and in Conſtantinople he cauſed one STEPHEN to be ſlaine, for defending the ambition of the Romiſh Prelates. About this time he rigged a very great fleete of about two thouſand ſaile of ſhippes, to tranſport his Armie ouer the ſea called Euxinum, againſt the king of Bulgaria; which fleete was ouerthrowne with ſo great a Tempeſt, as the greateſt part thereof was caſt away and ſunk.

The Pope knowing that by the Emperor he ſhould not be relieued in his warres againſt DESIDERIVS, ſent to CHARLES the Great for aide, who with very great forces tooke his way towards Italy: but he firſt required DESIDERIVS by Ambaſſadors to make ſatisfaction for the harmes which he had done, and to be at peace with the Church. And ſeeing that hee preuailed not, he marched forwards with his troupes; and DESIDERIVS engroſſed his forces to ſtop his paſſage: but being vnable to compaſſe it, he ſent the wife and children of CARLOMAN to Verona, fortified Pauia, and ſuffered himſelfe to be there beſieged. Wherein he was ill aduiſed: for by reaſon thereof the greateſt part of his gouernours and Captaines, ſeeing him thus diſtreſſed, loſing all courage, ſent to yeelde their obedience to the Pope, and deſired to be receiued for his friends and vaſſailes; and gluing vp their holds, many of their people went to Rome, to dwell and abide where the Pope ſhould appoint. CHARLES the Great leauing an vncle of his at the ſiege of Pauia, went againſt Verona; which he tooke without any great difficultie, together with his ſiſter in law, and nephews which were therein; and from thence went to Rome, to kiſſe the Popes foote, and to hold the Feaſt of Eaſter, where hee was receiued with all the ſolemnity that could be deuiſed.

At his his comming thither he confirmed to the Church and to the Popes of Rome, the donation which his father had made, of Rauenna, and other lands; and made another of many other places, amongſt which is reckoned the Iſle of Corſica, and all the coaſt of Genoa, with the Cities of Parma, Ancona, Vrbin, and many other Townes, which BIBLIOTHECARIVS ſetteth downe, beſides Rome and the territorie thereof; which the Popes had already in poſſeſſion, whether by the pretended donation of CONSTANTINE the Great, or by the donation made by the ſaid King PEPIN, or by common conſent or ancient preſcription, I know not. So as to the Emperors remained but only that part of Italy, which was called Magna Græcia, which is part of Calabria, and of Pulia, and a great part of that which now is the Kingdome of Naples. CHARLES the Great hauing been only eight daies in Rome, returned againſt DESIDERIVS; who, after ſixe moneths beſieging in Pauia, yeelded vpon Compoſition, and CHARLES carried him with him, and baniſhed both him and his ſonnes into a certaine Iland; and then tooke Milan, and all the other Cities in Lombardy, which is the antient Gallia Ciſalpina, where he placed Frenchmen for Dukes and Gouernors; and in other Duchies and Cities of that Kingdome, he placed Dukes of the ſame nation of the Lombards, which became his ſubjects and did him homage; and ſo Italy remained in his obedience and ſubjection, excepting thoſe Prouinces and lands which were left to the Church, and thoſe which the Pope held in former time; but all in peace and quiet. And ſo ended the Kingdome of the Lombards, which had continued 204 yeers in Italy.

CHARLES the Great hauing ended theſe exploits, returned with triumph and victory into his kingdome of France; and within ſhort ſpace after there befell him a very dangerous war, againſt certaine nations in Germany, which rebelled againſt him, namely the Saxons and other people in thoſe quarters, which he ſubdued, although it were long firſt, and with great trauaile, but with great honor and the fame of an excellent captaine. But for as much as it is tedious to relate it, and also for that it hapned before that he was Emperor, we will speak no more thereof, to be the better able to relate what happened after he was Emperor; as shall be said hereafter. The Emperor CONSTANTINE, who now had raigned a long time, renewd the war against the King of the Bulgarians: which began between them with great fury and violence; but it lasted not long: for, he was taken with a kinde of leprosie called Elephantia, whereof hee afterwards died: but he first concluded a peace with the King of Bulgaria. After which, his infirmity increased in such manner, that he died; leauing his son LEO, whom he had by his first wife YRENE (who already was in possession) for his successor, when he had raigned 35 yeers, in the yeer of our Lord 777.

THE LIFE OF LEO, FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND FOVRTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

IN the time of the Emperor CONSTANTINE, by his order and commandement, his son LEO was chosen Emperor, and his companion; whom hee had by the Kings daughter of Bulgaria, with whom he was married, whose name was YRENE. And LEO had to wife a woman born in Athens, whose name was also YRENE, which was the fairest woman of her time; and for wisdome and policy, one of the most Noble and excellent Ladies that euer was in the world. Wherefore without any contradiction he was presently held and obeyed as Emperor, in the place of his deceased father. In the beginning of his Empire he made shew to bee very deuout and affected to the churches, and to religious persons of whatsoeuer order, seeking to aduance them to dignities. And he likewise made preparation of men and shipping against the Infidels, and went into Asia in person, and inuaded the Prouince of Soria; but his journey took small effect: for, within short time after, hee returned, with losse of some of his people, and of his owne reputation.

This Emperor LEO had also other wars with the Infidels, by his Captains; wherein hapned many accidents, but not of any account. In this manner he past the first three yeers of his raign; and in the fourth with this shew and apparance of a good Prince, he practised with his subjects, to chuse a yong son which he had, called CONSTANTINE (as was his grandfather) Emperor. And in the same yeer also; he, knowing that sundry of his Court were of the Romish Sect concerning the worshipping of Images, he made many of them to be apprehended, and openly disgraced, and depriued and deposed them from their dignities; whereupon he began to be hated, and held for an euill Prince. But by his wiues means, and his owne death which shortly ensued, it was mitigated: for, he died of a carbuncle which arose in his head; without leauing ought done by him worthy of memory, at least that I haue found written. This

The death of the Emperor Leo.

This hapned in the fist yeer of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord seuen hundred fourescore and two. He was much condemned for the taking of a Crowne of Golde, and certaine stones of great price, out of the famous temple of S. Sophia, which by the Emperor MAVRICE were offered and dedicated to the Image of our Ladie in Constantinople, which he tooke from thence, and put vpon his owne head.

In this time in France and Germany flourished CHARLES the Great, of whom (for that he was afterwards Emperour) I haue made this mention, as well in matters of war, as peace; who honoured and fauored valiant and hardie knights, and letters also and learned men: he procured justice to be maintained in all his dominions, and that his gouernment should be just and vpright. Whereupon he created many Dukes and other dignities, and among them the twelue Peeres of France, which are so famous in all Histories. He also made and ordained the parliament at Paris: afterwards in the yeere 790, in the life time of CONSTANTINE sonne of this LEO, he founded an Vniuersitie in the same Citie, which hath beene famous and excellent, and is yet so vnto this day: and another in the Citie of Pauia, which was the cause that both chiualrie and learning so much flourished in his time.

In the time of the Emperor LEO, of whom we now leaue to make any more mention, the said CHARLES came into Spaine; where he was by treason ouerthrowne at Roncesualx, and lost the flowre of his nobilitie and Chiualrie: by meanes of ALONSO the Second, called the Chaste, aided and assisted by the Moores and Infidels which then lined in Arragon, and in the territorie thereof. In matters which preceded and succeeded this battaile and the causes therof, and which passed therin, there is great difference between the French and Spanish chroniclers, and among themselues of either Nation. Wherfore, and for as much as the acts of CHARLES the Great (before that he was Emperor) concerne not my Historie, I therefore leaue to speake any more thereof. And also for that we know that FLORIAN DE CAMPO hath written thereof at large in his generall Historie of Spaine: of whose singular diligence there is no doubt to be made, but that he hath inuiolably obserued the truth, without omitting any thing worthy of memory, especially in a matter so famous and memorable; and therefore referring the Reader to him, I will returne to prosecute my iourney.

THE LIFE OF CONSTANTINE, THE SIXT OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND FIFTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR.

THE ARGVMENT.

LEO being dead, his sonne Constantine (notwithstanding that he was but a childe) succeeded him, and through the wisedome of his mother, and the oath of the men of warre, was obeyed. This woman was so discreete, that she ruled the Empire ten yeeres, and was the cause of the Councell assembled about the controuersie for Images, and agreement to be made betweene the Greekes and Latine Churches. But the yong man comming to riper age, bereaued her of the gouernement, and made her to liue apart from him; and became so displeasing, that his owne people conspired against him, although the conspiracy took not the wished effect. But he being ill beloued, certaine of the principall men of the Empire incited her to resume the gouernement; and she setting aside the loue of a mother towards her sonne, apprehended him, and caused his eyes to bee plucke out, as he had done by many others. This was the cause that the Eastern Empire was translated into the West; for the Pope seeing the East Empire to decline, and that it was governed by a woman, hee annointed and crowned Charles the Great, Emperour, with whom Yrene sought to haue beene married: but it tooke no effect, shee being disswaded by the Princes of Grecia; but shee made a firme and assured peace with him, which shee not long enioyed: for sundrie valiant men, which tooke in ill part to be ruled by a woman, conspiring against her, by a wile apprehended, and deposed her from the Empire, giuing the charge thereof to a very Noble man, whose name was Nicephorus.

WHen as LEO the fourth was dead, his sonne CONSTANTINE being little more then twelue yeeres old, was receiued for Emperor (notwithstanding his small age); whereto his mothers wisedome and valour was a great helpe, and also for that the subjects of the Empire were sworne to him in the life time of his father, yet this could not be effected without difficultie; for some principall men disdaining to be commanded by a childe, and a woman, secretly practised to make NICEPHORVS Emperor, who was the yong mans Vncle, and brother to his father LEO: although that through forgetfulnes, no mention was before made of him. But this was not so secretly done, but that YRENE had intelligence thereof, and tooke so good order, that she apprehended and banished those which were the Authors thereof, and made their hayre to be cut, which then was a great disgrace: yet vpon NICEPHORVS she inflicted no other punishment, but onely made him take a Monasticall habit; and so the Empire remained in peace to her sonne. But notwithstanding that the yong man was Emperor, yet his mother commanded all, and (as all Authors write) very vprightly and prudently; for she was a wise and a very excellent woman, and aboue all was very much deuoted to the Romish religion, whereof this may serue for proofe; for she seeing the discord betweene the Greekes and Latins about the worshipping of Images, and other points in Religion wherein they disagreed, endeuoured very earnestly, that a generall Councell might be called; and her industrie tooke such effect (although somewhat long first) that a councell was assembled in the Citie of Nicen, in the Prouince of Bythinia, where other councels in former time had beene held; in which were three hundred and fiftie Bishops, and therein were handled many matters concerning the estate of the Clergie, and those were condemned for Hereticks, which denied the veneration of Images in the Church. So as during the gouernment of YRENE, the Images and pictures of CHRIST, and our Ladie, and sundrie other Saints in the Easterne Churches were againe set vp; whereat the common people which euer delighted in nouelties, was very joyfull; and so was THERASIVS the Patriarch of Constantinople, which succeeded PAVL, who had sought & much desired the same. And for that he could not obtaine it of the Emperour, LEO, seeing himselfe growne old and sickly, before his death, he left his dignitie and made himself a Monk: who going to visite the Empresse YRENE, she demanded of him the reason of so noble a change; she making an eloquent Oration, he told her, that he had left the world, for that hee could not resist the Emperour, and for that hee would not die separated from the Vnion and obedience of the Catholique Romish Church, beseeching her to procure the said Vnion, which could not be but by a generall Councell; for the effecting whereof, she should vse her Authority, & that for his part he would not liue out of the Church, but continue in his Monasterie to doe penance for his sinnes, the which he said was to discharge his Conscience before his death.

Punishment inflicted vpon such as conspired against the Emperor Constantine.

Councell held in the Citie of Nicene.

It is said, that this THERASIVS was he which principally moued YRENE so earnestly to sollicite the calling of a Councell; the resolution whereof concerning Images, is contained in two verses, which then were made, and at this day are placed in a Church in Venice, which in Latin are thus:

Nam Deus quod Imago docet, sed non Deus ipsa, Hanc video as, sed mente colas, quod cernis in ipsa.

Which in effect is as much to say, as, That which this Image doth shew and signifie, is God; but the Image is not so: behold the same, but with the minde reuerence that which thereby is represented.

Hauing ended a matter of so great importance as that which I recited; in all the rest of the time time of her gouernment, both before and after the Councell which were some yeers, shee bare her self farre more like a politick valiant man, than a delicate and beautifull woman as she was: but her sonne CONSTANTINE, who was now comn to mans estate, and like to his father, disliked his mothers gouernment, and in the end deposed her from the same, and from the Councell also, making her to liue priuately, without any authority, when shee had with great wisdome gouerned in his name the space of ten yeers, and maintained the Empire with justice, in peace with all the world.

It is written, that in those daies was found in Constantinople, in a very old Sepulchre, a plate or leaf of gold vpon the breast of a corpse, which therein had been buried; wherein were written these words, CHRIST shall be born of the Virgin MARY: Thou shalt see mee again at such time as CONSTANTINE and his mother YRENE shall be Emperors. This was held for a great matter, and YRENE and her son made great account of this Table: for, it seemed to be written before the coming of CHRIST.

A wonder, if true.

The Emperor, being now at liberty, began freely to vse those qualities whereto hee was naturally inclined; in such sort, that he became ill beloued, and they again the second time conspired against him, seeking to make his vncle NICEPHORVS, Emperor. But, as to Princes (whether good or bad) most matters are commonly discouered: so this conspiracy was likewise reuealed; and he, knowing it, commanded some of those which had been practicers therein, to be apprehended, whom he seuerely punished; and commanded his vncle NICEPHORVS to be perpetually banished. After this, he put away his wife, who was a very Noble woman called MARY; and, diuorcing himself from her, shut her vp in a Nunnerie, and maried one of her maids called THEODORA, of whom he was enamoured; a woman of no desert, but onely that she was fair and very beautifull.

At such time as CONSTANTINE and his mother raigned in the East, CHARLES the Great was King of France; so called for the great exploits which he had performed: yet some are of opinion, that he was so called by reason of the great constitution of his body; for, he was corpulent, very big limd and tall, and had not liued at his ease, but had vndergon great and dangerous wars.

Charles the Great, why so called.

In the beginning of the Emperor CONSTANTINE's Raign, King CHARLES came in person into Italy to see the Pope, and to pacifie certain combustions raised by some Dukes, who were desirous of innouations: which being quieted, hee had intelligence that the Duke of Bauiere (for, now they were no more called Kings) rebelled against him, with an intent to exempt himself from his subjection; and to that end had leuied his forces. Whereupon, CHARLES resolued to go against him in person, and by another way to send his sonne PEPIN vpon the same seruice; and so he beganne to make cruell warre against him: whereof when the Eastern Emperor CONSTANTINE was aduertised, imagining that CHARLES, beeing busied in those warres, would not be able to prouide for the affairs of Italy, hee sent commandement into those Countries which he held for him, and som new troops which he leuied for that purpose, that they should make warre against the Pope and King CHARLES; which they presently put in execution: but the Dukes of Beneuent and Spoleto, and of other Cities, made such speedy preparation against them, that they were easily repelled and ouerthrowne; so as from thence-forth they liued quiet and at peace. And CHARLES had likewise so good successe in his warre against the Bauarians (although not without effusion of much bloud) that hee pacified all that state, and reduced the Prouinces to his seruice.

From thence hee went against the Slauons, which held the Prouinces of Istria and Dalmatia; by them called Slauonia; and in one Summer brought all vnder his dominion. Afterwards, raising a new power, he resolued to make a conquest of Hungary and Austria, beeing the antient Pannonie, which the Hunnes Auares, had of long time possessed, as is before said: And notwithstanding that this was a very dangerous warre, and that therein were many great and notable battels (wherein all the Nobility, and the greatest part of the common people of those Countries, died; so as the Land lay in a manner waste and dispeopled) yet in the end, in the eighth yeer after the beginning thereof, he became absolute Lord of all the Countrey. After these foresaid warres, he had warres with the King of Denmark: for, the Danes harried the sea-coasts with their fleets; and herein (as well as in the rest) this glorious Prince had the victory: and he afterwards made peace with their King, and resolued to make an end of subduing the Saxons; whose warres at times, as they rebelled, continued thirty yeers; and he slue of them in one battell thirty thousand: and in another, which he fought with them afterwards, he brought them wholly to obedience, and made them subject to the Empire; and, for his better security, he led the principal of them with him into France. In which conquests which I so briefly haue recited, some battels were fought by himself in person, and some by his son PEPIN: in all which, he won the name and reputation of a most excellent Captain.

These things being past, in the yeer of our Lord seuen hundred ninety & fiue, Pope ADRIAN died in Rome: through whose death they chose Pope LEO the third of that name; who presently after his election, sent great Presents and a solemn Ambassage to CHARLES the Great. In these times the Emperor CONSTANTINE's men of war did greatly annoy those of CHARLES the Great: for, after that he liued apart from his mother, he became very cruell, and in his gouernment negligent and disorderly: wherefore he grew to be so ill beloued by his Subjects, that some of the chief of them perswaded his mother YRENE to depose him, and resume the gouernment of the Empire into her owne hands; whereto they promised to assist her. The mother, who had a courage more like a reuengefull man, than a delicate woman, preferring the displeasure which she had conceiued, before the loue of a mother to her son, with the aid of those which took her part in that action, vpon a day by a wile seised on him, and caused his eies to be presently pluckt out, as hee had done to many others: which was one of the strangest and most cruell and inhumane parts that euer woman plaid in the world. And this being done, all obeyed her; and she alone had the gouernment of the Empire, which yet was very great: for, it contained, in Europe, Thracia, and all the Prouinces of Gracia, the Iles of Sicilia, Candia, and those in the great sea called Archipelagus, and that part of Italie which was called Magna Gracia, and all the Prouinces of Asia the Lesse: all which were gouerned by this valiant woman, with great policy and authority. Who when she vnderstood of the victories & great power of CHARLES the Great, desiring to bee at peace with him, and fearing his greatnes, she commanded those Cities which she held in Italie, and the Gouerners of them, to hold good correspondence and neighbourhood with those Cities which were vnder the Pope, or King CHARLES: and, besides this, she sent her Ambassadors vnto him, excusing herselfe of that which had hapned concerning her son, and made him many great offers. Which, CHARLES gladly entertained: for, he was a milde Prince to the meek, and rough and cruell to the proud and rebellious.

All Italie being in peace vnder the shadow and protection of CHARLES the Great, where now was no memory of the Lombards which were wont to oppresse it, the diuell, a sower of dissension, acted his part in the City of Rome: which was, that Pope LEO sitting (as they say) in Saint PETER's Chair, two Priests, Cardinals of great account, called PASCAL & CAMPVLVS, conspired against him, and held so strong a hand among their complices, that they vpon a day apprehended him going in Procession; which they did with such an vproare and tumult, that they had almost slain him; and handled him in such manner, that (as most Writers affirm) they put out his eies, and cut out his tongue, and so they committed him prisoner to a Monasterie of Saint ERASMVS; publishing abroad, that they did it for the crimes by him committed, and the errors which he maintained: and being there, as BIBLIOTHECARIVS and some others affirm, he was miraculously restored to his sight and speech; and a chamberlain of his vsed such secret means, or with the permission of his Keepers, that he was hidden in a certain graue or sepulchre, and by night conuayed to the Duke of Spoleto, who then was Lieutenant to CHARLES the Great in Italie (which offices then were giuen for euer, or for term of life); by whose aid he went to King CHARLES in Germany, to complain of the violence done vnto him: whither already messengers were sent by the other two, PASCAL and CAMPVLVS, with informations and accusations against him. But, notwithstanding, the Pope was solemnly entertaind & honourd by him: and, remaining there som few daies, the King promised to come in person to Rome; and appointed so many Prelates and religious men to accompany him, as sufficed to bring him thither, and to restore him to his seat and estate, with great processions which were made for him: and the two Priests Cardinals aforesaid, which were so mightie, absenting themselues, euer gaue out in speeches, that they attended the coming of the King.

Charles the Great came to Rome.

King CHARLES the Great, hauing taken order for the affairs of France and Germany, wherein he was a most mightie prince, determined to come into Italy; and at his coming, by the hand of his son PEPIN, he pacified some tumults there, and came to the citie of Rome, accompanied with many great Dukes and other princes his subiects; whither repaired out of Italy and from other parts, many Bishops, prelates and other great men; and he was receiued with such honour as to him did appertaine; where kissing the Popes foote he did him such other superstitions reuerence, as the custome was. After this, hauing continued eight daies in Rome, he commanded all the prelates and Princes which then were in the citie to be assembled; and the Pope himself, and all the rest being together, there were some which complained and accused the Pope to the Emperour: and so the Emperor began openly to aske euery mans opinion concerning those accusations; wherto all answered, That no man ought to iudge the Head of the Church: which the King obseruing, he forbare to aske any more questions. Then the Pope which hitherto had been silent, rose from the place where he sate, and went into a pulpit which was there, and with a loud voyce said, That seeing of his life and behauiour, no man would or had authoritie to make enquirie, or to giue sentence, yet the next day (following the custome of his predecessors) he would purge and cleere himselfe, as it behoued: and therewith for that day the Consistorie was dissolued: And vpon the next day, they all being assembled in like manner, he againe went vp into the same place, and taking a booke of the holy Euangelists in his hands, said with so lowd a voice as they all might heare him, that he sware by God, and those holie Euangelists, that all that which his aduersaries had laid to his charge, was false and vntrue, and that he had neither committed or thought any such matter as they obiected; but that they had of malice and enuie slandered him: and that he therefore publikely made this protestation, and confirmed by his oath, seeing that to them all the manner of his life and gouernment was well knowne.

Pope Leo his speech in the Consistorie in his owne defence.

Hauing ended this his protestation, his oath was allowed, and himselfe commended; and the King commanded his accusers, PASCAL and CAPVLVS, to be sought out and apprehended, and would haue condemned them to death: but the Pope was contented to spare their liues, so as they might be committed to prison, and thence condemned to perpetual exile. Eight dais after, the Pope hauing first considered how much the Greeke Emperors enuied his greatnes, together with the small affection they bare to the worshipping of Images, and other points wherein they were opposite, and seperated from the Church of Rome; and how requisite it was to haue an Emperor which might maintaine the prouinces of Italy in peace, which vpon euery light occasion were disturbed: but chiefly to shew himselfe gratefull for the benefits which he and the Church of Rome had receiued from him and the house of France, but aboue all for accepting his protestation in his owne defence, for a sufficient proofe of his honestie; he resolued to make CHARLES the Great, Emperor; and to translate the head of the Empire into the West. Wherewith, as most writers affirme, he did not acquaint the King, conceiuing the greatnes of his minde to be such, that he neither had desired it, neither would haue accepted the same. And hauing ruminated hereupon, against the day of the natiuitie of CHRIST, hee commanded all the Priest Cardinalls, and all the other prelates to come to a Masse, whither CHARLES was also inuited, and came, together with all the other princes; and so about the middest of the Masse, the Pope then saying it, hee turned about from the Altar to the people, and with a loud voice said, That he did there elect, create, and publish CHARLES the great, the most mightie and victorious King of Italy, of the Germanes, and of the French-men, Emperor, and euer AVGVSTVS. Which being done, hee set the Imperiall Crowne vpon his head, and all those which were present consented thereto, with acclamations and applauses, saying, To the most godly, euer AVGVSTVS, great and most victorious Emperor CHARLES, God graunt long life and victorie.

Charles the great crowned Emperor and his sonne Pepin King of Italy by Pope Leo.

This acclamation being ended, the Pope anointed him, and therewith anointed and intitled his sonne PEPIN with the good liking and consent of his father) King of Italy; which coronations were performed, with such feastings and solemnitie, as the discreete Reader may well imagine; vpon the birth day of CHRIST, which was the siue and twentith of December, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred, foure hundred threescore and eight yeeres from the time that CONSTANTINE the great transferred the seate of the Empire into Thracia, to the citie of Constantinople, and three hundred and thirtie yeeres from the time that AVGVSTVLVS was the last Emperor in Italy. And so CHARLES remained Emperor, and the Empire was transported from the Greekes to the Germanes; for although that CHARLES was King of France, yet his originall, linage, and countrie was in Germanie, and so it appeareth by histories; and notwithstanding that he was King of the French, he was borne in Germanie, and the French-men also had their originall and descent from Germanie; and the kingdome of France extended it selfe so farre in the time of this Emperor, that the most of the prouinces of Germanie were called by the name, and contained within the Kingdome of France; so as there is no reason that any authors should say, that the Empire was first transposed to the French, and afterwards in processe of

of time to the Germanes; the which is maintained by OTHO FRISENGENSIS, GODERID VITERBENSIS, WESPERGENSIS ABBAS; and others, although of lesse antiquitie, yet of no lesse diligence, as PLATINA, MARTIANVS, ROBERTVS GAGVINS and most diligently IOHANNES NAVCLERVS; and aboue all, BEATVS RENANVS, HENRICVS MVCIVS, in his notable bookes of the state of Germanie, and CVSPINIANVS in the life of the same CHARLES.

Fauours bestowed by Charles the Great vpon the citie of Florence.

These matters being thus ended, the new Emperour returned towards his Kingdome and countries; leauing his sonne PEPIN King in Italy, which hee left in very good order. In this his iourney (authors write) that hee did many graces and fauours to the citie of Florence, and that he commanded the decaied walles and buildings thereof to be reedefied, and many other faire edifices to be erected; and that he procured gentlemen to come and inhabit the same. The fame of this his election being spred ouer the world, the manly Empresse YRENE, which ruled the Empire of the East, sent Ambassadors vnto him, desiring peace with him, and (as some write) to treat of a marriage betweene them, seeing that they both were single: and although that the treatie of marriage took no effect (for the Princes of Greece perswaded YRENE to the contrarie) yet a peace was concluded betweene the two Empires: The Empire of Gracia containing that which it then held in Asia, which I haue alreadie mentioned; with that countrie which now is the Kingdome of Naples, or the greatest part thereof; the Iles of Sicilia, Candia, and the rest; with Albania, part of Slauonia, and all Gracia and Thracia, the citie of Venice and the dominion thereof, which is not lightly to be regarded, remained friend to all, and subiect to none. This being concluded, YRENE the Empresse enioyed not the same long after: for in the end, as shee was a woman, men of haughtie spirits, holding it for baseneſs, disdained to be commanded by her, and found meanes that a man of high degree, great power, and of noble parentage, whose name was NICEPHORVS, should rebell against her, and take vpon him the title of Emperor: which took effect, so as by a stratagem shee was taken, and dispossessed of her Empire.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE GREAT, AND THREESCORE AND SIXTEENTH ROMANE EMPEROR; & OF NICEPHORVS in Constantinople.

THE ARGVMENT.

WHen as Charles the great was made Emperor, he was of the age of fiftie and eight yeeres: and returning into Germany, he wholly conuerted the Saxons to the Christian faith, and made an accord with Nicephorus Emperor of the Greekes: which afterwards was broken, for that Nicephorus ayded the Venetians, against him and his sonne Pepin; but Charles finally making peace with the Venetians, left them in that liberty, wherein they haue maintained themselues vntill this present, and came to a full peace with Nicephorus. He diuided the Empire betweene his three sonnes, and commanded Pepin to go to Corsica and Sardinia, to defend the same against the Infidels which went thither to inhabit. And vnder the command of Charles his sonne he ouercame many other Nations, Rebels, and Infidels, and became so great as the King of the Mahomets Mahometists sought his friendship. Two of his sonnes dyed, to wit, Pepin and Charles, so as his whole hope remained in Lewes, whom he made his successor; And being now very old, departed out of this world, ouercome with a paine in his side, hauing gouerned the Empire fourteene yeeres; and his kingdome, seuen and forty.

CONsidering the great paines I haue taken in writing this Historie (I take God to record) that I stand in more need of some rest, and to be eased of so great a burthen, by abbreuiating the Historie, and leauing out as much as may be without confusion, then to redouble my toile, through the occasions which now present themselues. I say this, for that the Pope in this time had transferred the Empire to CHARLES the Great; and it hath euer since continued in Germany: And in Gracia also remained Princes, which in like manner were called Emperours, and pretended good right; so as we may say that the Empire and the title thereof was diuided, and came to be two Empires and to haue two Emperours. But I finde my selfe in a great confusion, to thinke how this matter may be handled: for, first to write of one, and then to returne to write of the other, as did BAPTISTA IGNATIVS, in the short epitomie which he wrote of the Emperors; it seemeth to be inconuenient to bring one of them to an end, and then to make the Reader turne backe againe seauen or eight hundred yeeres in the historie. And to write one or two liues of the Empire, and then as many of the other, as did IOHN CVSPINIAN, that lieth me as ill: for it greatly confoundeth the historie, and so in a manner neither the one nor the other can be vnderstood; and to relate all together at large (for the many occasions which are offered, and the diuersitie of the times and places) I see not how it can be. To treate onely of the one (as some haue done) and wholly to leaue out and forget the other, I also hold it for an iniurie and crueltie. To let sink and die in obliuion a matter of so great importance as is the dominion of the Greek Emperors, which continued so long afterwards: or to leaue the successours of CHARLES the Great, in which at this day the Empire remaineth, were to leaue the right way which leadeth to the place whither I am bound, and to take another whereby I should neuer attaine to my iournies end whither I am to trauaile. Wherefore seeing that I cannot goe both waies; after some considerations, I haue resolued to take for my principall subiect and historie of the Empire, that which the Church of Rome approued and then established, which is that of Italy and Germany, in the person of CHARLES and his successors; recounting their liues and actes with such order as I haue obserued in those which are alreadie past; and by the way of discourse euer to make some mention of the Greeke Emperors, as occasion shall be offered: whereby he that shall reade this historie, may vnderstand the successe of both Empires, vnder the name and title of one only.

Hauing resolued vpon this course, let vs returne to our CHARLES the Great, whom we left newly made Emperor; and to NICEPHORVS who tyrannically vsurped the Empire of Constantinople, by deposing the Empresse YRENE. I say then that CHARLES was fiftie eight yeeres old, when (as I haue related) he was by Pope LEO the third crowned Emperor in the citie of Rome; and had raigned three and thirtie yeeres the mightie King of France and Germany; all which time he had spent in the warres, against rebels and Infidels (whereof in Germany were many) with great felicitie and victorie, taming and subduing diuers nations and prouinces. CHARLES being come into Germany, wholly subdued the Saxons, and reduced them to the faith, wherein as the other nations of Germany, they euer were inconstant and stubborn. NICEPHORVS who then raigned in Constantinople, knowing his great power; after that he had settled himselfe in his throne, and was well assured of those whome hee had dispossessed, and had most cause to suspect, and had banished YRENE; hee sent Ambassadors of great account to CHARLES the Great, very louingly desiring him to hold him for his brother and friend. The Emperor CHARLES who was a benigne Prince, knowing how mightie the Sarazins were, and the great danger that all Christendome should incurre through discord betweene the two Empires, concluded a peace with NICEPHORVS; and with his Ambassadours sent others of his owne, to confirme the same: which was established in the same manner and with the same conditions, as it was made with the Empresse YRENE; the citie of Venice remaining friend to both parties without any subiection to either. There was also a peace concluded betweene him and GODFREY King of Denmarke, which some call DACIA; whereupon the said GODFREY

FREY departed out of his kingdome, roially accompanied, to see and speake with the Emperour although that this interuiew tooke no effect; for his people disswading him, counselled him not to see him: neuertheless the peace was made, and took place.

After this, it followed that for some matters which the Venetians attempted against the Empire of CHARLES, in the behalfe of NICEPHORVS Emperor of Constantinople (yet some affirme that it was through the false information of FORTVNATVS Patriarch of Grado) CHARLES the Great commanded his sonne PEPIN King of Italy, to make warres against them: which he began very resolutely, and took the cities and fortresses which they held in the maine land, and besieged the citie of Venice it selfe both by sea and land; to the reliefe whereof the Greeke Emperor NICEPHORVS sent a fleete. Of these warres of Venice antient authors doe write so diuersly, that a man can hardly say which was the truth: for some say that Venice was wholly taken; and others say that but some Ilands thereof, and that the place which is called Rio alto defended it selfe: howsoeuer it was, the warre continued many daies, and CHARLES graunted peace and libertie to the Venetians, to liue after their lawes and customes, for that hee was to renew the peace with the Greeke Emperour, which he had broken by reason of the Venetian warres. Some write that the Emperor receiued a great affront in these warres: but howsoeuer, the Venetians wonne much reputation to haue valiantly made head against him.

Charles his and testament.

CHARLES liuing in this prosperitie, made his will and testament: wherein he diuided his kingdomes betweene three legitimate sonnes which he had, to wit, CHARLES, which was his eldest sonne, PEPIN, and LEVVES; wherein hee made his sonne CHARLES King of the greatest and best parts of France and Germany; PEPIN he made King of Italy and Bauaria, and other prouinces; and LEVVES of Prouance, and of that part of France which bordereth vpon Spaine, and other prouinces. Which his testament he sent to be ratified by Pope LEO; and shortly after gaue to his sonnes the names and titles of Kings: but all succeeded after another manner; for God otherwise disposed thereof at his pleasure. This testament I haue seene written by some authors. It afterwards happened that a great fleete of Infidels which inhabited Spaine, with the aide and assistance of the Africans, inuaded the Iles of Sardinia and Corsica: for the defence whereof the Emperor CHARLES sent commandement to his sonne PEPIN, that he should send thither a Captaine, whose name was BVCARDVS; who tooke so good order, as he draue the Infidels out of those Ilands, and slew fiue thousand of them in one bataile. And with no lesse good successe, he vndertook another warre with the Dukes of the Bohemians, and of the Polonians, which is part of the antient Sarmatia, who infested the countries vnder his dominion; against which he sent his sonne CHARLES, with great forces of Burgonians, Saxons and Germanes. And the young CHARLES imitating his father, warred valiantly and with discretion: and comming first to a battaile with the Bohemians and LEO their Duke, he ouercame them, and slew LEO; although that therein passed many daies, and there was an intermission in this war: and in the end he had the like successe with the Polacres, so as they all became subiect to his father. For which his victories he was so much feared and renowned through the world, that a great King of the East, and AMVRATH the greatest of all the Mahometists, sent their Ambassadors with rich presents to him, desiring peace and friendship; and the like did all the Kings Christian.

Ambassadours sent to Charles the Great.

Whilest as these and such like matters happened vnto CHARLES the Great, NICEPHORVS Emperor of Constantinople, shewed himself to be very couetous, imposing new taxes and tributes vpon his countries and subiects; hauing euer a desire to disturbe the Empire of CHARLES, the Great (which he neuer forbare to doe) endamaging his countries, by robbing and spoiling the same, and secretly fauouring his enemies, whereby he gat little honour, and lesse profit: for this enuie and malice being fixed in his heart, he not onely left to make wars against the Infidels, as he ought to haue done, but knowing that they would warre with him, he bought his peace of them; and to his great shame and disgrace bound himselfe to pay them yeerly a great summe of money; and for that instant sent them great gifts and presents, hauing his purpose wholly bent against the Christians: which cost him his life, as presently shall be declared.

CHARLES liuing in this tranquillitie, GODFREY King of Denmarke made warre against him, who was a mightie Prince, and commanded a large dominion; and with great forces came into Friseland and into Saxony, where he did great harm. Against whom the Emperor addressing himselfe (although now old and vnweldie) speedily departed with a great Armie, and by the way newes was brought him, that the said King was dead, and his Armie returned; which was held held for great newes, considering how great warres were expected. And, vpon the same day, newes came also, how that his son PEPIN, who in great prosperity raigned in Italie, was dead in the City of Milan: for the which he was sorry, and returned to the City of Aken, or Aix; whither Ambassadors came to him from HERMIGVS King of Denmark, which succeeded GODFREY, humbly desiring peace: the like came from NICEPHORVS, Emperour of Grecia; and the like petition also came from AMEVLAT, a King of the Moors, who raigned in a great part of Spaine: to all which, he made gratious answers; and, granting their petitions, gaue harty thanks to God, for that he was generally so well esteemed. But, after this prosperity, a great calamity and scourge ensued; which was, that it pleased God to take away his other sonne called CHARLES, who lay on the Borders of Germany, for the defense thereof: so as now his whole hope rested in his third son LEVVES.

The death of Pepin, King of Italy.

NICEPHORVS the Emperor of Grecia, being assured of CHARLES the Great, and hauing bought his peace of the Infidels, took his son STAVRATIVS for his companion in the Empire; determining to make warre against his neighbours the Bulgarians, whose King was then called CRVNVS, with whom he fought some battels; wherein he had the victorie, and slue many of his enemies. By reason of these victories he grew so proud and insolent, that, making small account of his enemies, he managed the warres with little care or discretion: which this CRVNVS perceiuing, he raised the greatest and best power that he was able to make, and the most secretly that might be, marcht by night, and, before that it was day, assaulted the Emperors Camp; who being vnable to set his people in order, they were defeated, and the Emperor was there slain; and his son STAVRATIVS, being sore wounded, escaped by flight: and so ended the life and Raign of NICEPHORVS. At this ouerthrowe great treasure was lost, and much of the Greek Nobility then perished: which happened in the yeer of our Sauiour CHRIST eight hundred and fiue, he hauing raigned nine yeers. His sonne STAVRATIVS, coming to Adrianople, and saluted and sworn Emperor, was so ill inclined, and so insufficient, and therewith (aboue all) so deformed, ill fauoured, and churlish in behauiour, that there was not any man pleased with his succession; so as within foure moneths after hee came to the Empire, hee was dispossessed thereof by his brother in law MICHAEL; who, apprehending him, put him into a Monastery: and this MICHAEL, remaining peacefull Emperor, was a vertuous man, and a good Gouerner; but so inclined to peace, that afterwards, through his excessiue fear of war, he lost his Empire, as we will shew. Now, as soon as he was chosen Emperor, he with all expedition sent his Ambassadors to the old Emperor CHARLES the Great, desiring friendship and peace with him; which was concluded in such manner as it was with his Predecessor NICEPHORVS. And CHARLES the Great, being now very old, desiring to take order for the estate of the Empire, called a most solemn Parliament in the City of Aquisgran or Aken, where he made his son LEVVES to be intituled CÆSAR, and his Successor; and his nephew BERNARD, son to PEPIN, King of Italy, with the consent of Pope LEO, who vntill then liued. And, this being performed, the rest of his time he spent in alms-giuing, enriching the Churches and Clergie, releeuing the poor; and reforming abuses, hee ordained good lawes and statutes. The yeer following, the Infidell-Sarazins of Spaine and Africa, inuaded Sardinia and Corsica; wherein they made cruell war, and did the like on the Coast of Italie: but yet (though not without great trouble) they were repelled and scattered by the Emperours Captains, and by his nephew BERNARD King of Italy. It followed, that MICHAEL Emperor of Constantinople, being assailed by CRVNVS King of Bulgaria, against his wil was forced to take the Field, and to fight with him; and in the first battell got the victory: but fighring again the second time, he was ouerthrowne, and therewith lost both the day, and the courage to rule; so as he voluntarily renounced the Empire: or (as some say) a principall Captain of his, called LEO, rebelling, and he not daring to make head against him, deposed himself from the Empire, and went into a Cloister, hauing raigned not fully three yeers. And this LEO, who was son of a Gentleman called PARDVS, was made Emperor: and presently, in the like manner as MICHAEL had done, he sent his Ambassadors to CHARLES the Great, to establish and confirm the peace concluded with his Predecessors; which was performed.

Stauratius, succeeding Nicephorus, was deposed by Michael who succeeded him.

Michael, Emperor of Constantinople, deposed himself from his Empire

In the mean time that LEO was chosen and crowned, CRVNVS King of Bulgaria, following the victory which he had obtained against the Emperor MICHAEL, marched with his Army the direct way towards Constantinople, whither the Emperor LEO had drawn his forces, and had raised new; and CRVNVS came so neer vnto the City, that hee might well see the same. Which disgrace LEO could not with patience endure (being a very valiant man) but but took the field with all his forces, in very good order, and made head against his enemie; who with the ioy of the late victorie attended him: and there was fought betweene them a cruel battaile, which lasted a great part of the day, and many men were slaine of either partie. And therein happened a notable accident seldome seene in other encounters, which was, that in the furie of the fight the Emperor and the king chanced to meete; and either knowing his aduersary, there charging one the other, the Emperor carried himselfe so well, as he ouerthrew the King dead to the earth; so that within a while after, the Bulgarians began to retire, and presently to runne away, in such manner that LEO had a full compleat and noble victorie, together with the spoile of their Campe; and so returned to Constantinople with great ioy. The Bulgarians being now contented to defend their owne limits, the Greeke Emperour remained in peace, as CHARLES the Great did in Germany. But as all things in this world haue an end; so ended the good fortunes and great power of CHARLES the Great, together with his life: for being then of the age of threescore and eleuen yeeres, he was taken with a paine in his side, whereof within the space of seuen daies he died, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and fourteen, when he had raigned Emperor fourteene yeeres, and seuen and fortith King of Brance and of Germany; and of Italy forty two.

Crunus King of the Bulgarians slaine by the Emperor Leo.

The death of Charles the Great.

During his whole life he had much reuerenced the Church & imployed his authoritie to aduance it, and bountifully imparted his treasure to inrich it: but this great abundance in so plentiful a peace, made Church-men to grow dissolute. The Emperor CHARLES being wel instructed in religion, knowing how much it did import that learning and good life should shine in those which were to instruct others, he called fiue Councels in diuers parts of his dominions: at Mentz, at Rheines, Tours, Chalons and at Arles: and by the aduice of these Assemblies he set downe orders for the reformation of the Church, in a booke intituled, Capitula Caroli Magni; a reuerent testimonie of the singular piety of this great Prince.

This noble Prince was endued with so many excellent vertues, that we reade of very few in auntient histories that excelled him, so as iustly he may be compared with any of the most excellent whosoeuer; for in martiall discipline, in valour, and dexteritie in armes, I know not any that hath exceeded him: he obtained so many victories, fought so many battailes, and subdued so many fierce and warlike nations, before, and after that he was Emperour, as any of the most famous that euer was. He was tall of stature, very well proportioned in all parts, passing strong, of a faire and graue countenance, valiant, mild, pitifull, a louer of iustice, liberall, very affable, pleasant, well read in historie, a great friend to Arts and Sciences, and sufficiently well seene in them, and a man which aboue all honoured and rewarded learned men. He was very charitable and a great almes giuer; and so good an harbourer of strangers, that in Syria, in Africk, in Egypt, and in other prouinces of the Infidels, wherein Christians liued, he found meanes to haue hospitals, and almes houses, for such as were poore; and in his kingdomes, and euen in his court, he harboured and relieued strangers and pilgrimes. Concerning his faith and religion, he was very zealous; and the most of the warres which he made, were to enlarge the Christian faith. He superstitiously honoured & obeied the Church of Rome, and the Pope Bishop thereof, and other Bishops and prelates, and commaunded his subiects to doe the like; whereof besides histories, some chapters in the Decretals, beare record. He was likewise very deuout, and spent great part of the time in prayer, and hearing diuine seruice. In his diet he was very temperate, and a great enemie to all riot and excesse; for at his table were neuer serued aboue fower or fiue dishes, and those of such meate as best pleased his taste; which he vsed to the same end that God created them: which was for his sustenance, and not for a shew and pompe, as now adaies is vsed; in such sort that the meates which naturally are but to please the taste, or at the most the sauour or smell, they will now haue them to satisfie all the other senses; and likewise finding new inuentions, the greatest part of their life is spent at the table; and so they eate of a greater number of exquisit meats, dresst in such manner and with such sauces, that it is hard to know what taste they haue, so as they seeme strange and rare: and sometime meate is made of such things as were not created of GOD to such purpose, no more then he made Goates to draw carts, or to till the earth.

Our CHARLES was not as some are at this day; for as he was rich and mightie, so hee was temperate and vertuous; and maintained his body with what was needfull and wholesome. His ordinarie exercise was hunting, when hee had leasure, in time of warre; and in time of peace, hee gaue eare to such as did reade histories to him; and sometimes hee heard musicke, wherewith hee was much delighted, and had good skill therein. He

He was much condemned for hauing many base sonnes and daughters, but this was in the time of his youth; for afterwards it is to be supposed, that he contented himselfe with his wife: and for remedy of this imperfection, although he was three or foure times a widower, yet he euer married againe the daughters of mightie Kings and Princes. Finally, to make an end of that whereof I haue treated at large, he was an excellent Emperour, and feared and loued God, and died, as I said, very olde and honourably; in peace with the Kings of Spaine, England, Denmarke, Bulgaria, the Greeke Emperor LEO, and with all the Princes of that time. His body was buried in a sumptuous temple, which he caused to be built in the citie of Aquisgrane or Aix.

The authors from whom I haue drawne this relation, and where the Reader may reade the rest, concerning CHARLES the Great, and the other Emperors, and the histories of those times, are those which ordinarily I vse to alleage, since that the most auntient authors haue failed; to wit, the Annales of Constantinople in the twentie third booke, where they make an end, BLONDVS in his second booke of his Decades, ZONARAS a Greek author, SIGISBERTVS, and the Abbot WESPERGENSIS, and MATHEVV PALMERIVS, all three in the processe of their Chronicles; PLATINA in the life of the Popes, CVSPINIAN, BAPTISTA IGNATIVS, BENEVENTANVS DE ROMALDVS, IOHN CARION, IOHN EVTICHIVS, RAPHAEL VOLATERANVS, al these in their Emperors, VINCENCIVS an Historiographer in his Mirror. Besides the which it shall bee necessarie to see, and so may he doe which shall be a curious Reader, the French Historiographers, in matters which concerne the time of CHARLES the Great, which are PAVLVS EMILIVS a singular author, ROBERT GAGVIN, and MARTIN, OTHO FRISINGENSIS in the fift booke of his histories, wherein he treateth at large of CHARLES the Great, and likewise RICHARD of Saint Victor, and the Archbishop TVRPIN.

THE ARGVMENT.

LEwes boing come to the Empire, confirmed the peace with the Emperor of Gracia, and made warre in Dacia; from which it was requisite that he should returne in person, for redresse of certaine accidents which happened in Italie; which hee easily pacified by meanes of his Nephew Bernard, then King of Italie. This Emperour renounced all authority to confirme the Popes election. Bernard King of Italy rebelled; but being ouercome, hee was led prisoner into France by his Vncle Lewes, who gaue to his eldest sonne Lotharius that gouernment. He ouercame some Tyrants which rebelled against him, and confirmed to the Church the donation made by his father. There hapned vnto this Emperor one pitifull accident: which was, that his own children rebelled against him, and deposed him from the Empire: but they afterwards repenting, restored him to his estate. In which time befell a verie great disaster and ruine to Rome and Italy; for the Mahometists vnderstanding of the discord betweene Christian Princes, and standing in no feare of Michael the Greeke Emperor, hauing having prepared a good Nauy, scaled Ciuita Vecchia, and robbing and burning, came to beſiege Rome: from whence (ſo ſoone as they ſaw ſuccours come out of Lumbardy) they returned. They alſo did much harme in Sicilia. After which ruine, Lewes, falling ſicke of a grieuous infirmitie, dyed within fortie dayes, hauing firſt ſet in order the ſtate of the Empire.

Peace betweene the Emperors Lewes and Leo.

N ſuch manner as I haue related in the hiſtorie of CHARLES the Great, his ſonne LEVVES was by him in his life time nominated, and choſen Emperor. Wherefore when as his father was dead, he was by al men peaceably held and obeyed for ſuch, and proued a vertuous Prince, and for his vertue and goodneſſe was called PIVS. The firſt thing he vndertooke, was to come to the citie of Aken, where he held a generall Diet or Parliament, and tooke order for all things, concerning the peace, and gouernment of the Empire, and the kingdomes which he inherited; whither came Ambaſſadours from LEO Emperour of Greece, to ratifie the peace made with his father: for the better aſſurance whereof, he ſent Ambaſſadours with thoſe which came, to the end that LEO ſhould confirme the ſame in Conſtantinople. He reſolued alſo, as a new Emperour, and greedie of honour, to make warre againſt the Danes, in the behalfe of EROALDVS, and RANFREDVS, two Kings which were friends and ſubiect to the Empire, and were depoſed from their kingdomes by the ſonnes of GODFREY. For this enterpriſe he made great preparation, ſending for his nephew BERNARD King of Italy, as is before ſaid: and for the better defence of his countries he left his 3 ſons, to wit, LOTHARIVS, PEPIN, and LEVVES. LOTHARIVS which was his eldeſt ſonne, hee made gouernour of Bauaria, and the marches thereof; and to PEPIN he left the gouernment of Aquitania, and other places thereabout: in the other prouinces, hee confirmed the Dukes thereof, and in all he ſet very good order. Departing with his Armie, and being come into Saxony, the weather grew ſo cold, as during all that winter he could march no further: ſo as he was conſtrained to winter in a citie in Saxony called Parburnia, or Parburina; for the cold was ſo extreame, as the ſeas in all that coaſt were frozen, and the warre was afterwards made by his Captaines.

LEVVES returned into France, by reaſon of other accidents which happened: for it fell out that in Rome, ſome great men ſeeing Pope LEO old and ſickly, conſpired againſt him. Againſt whom he proceeded, determining to haue done iuſtice vpon them; for which cauſe there was a tumult in Rome, and in ſome part of Italy: whereof when LEVVES was aduertiſed, he ſent commandement to King BERNARD, ſpeedily to go thither, to preuent rebellion in thoſe parts: And BERNARD did ſo with all poſſible expedition, and fully pacified all matters in Rome, and in all Italy. Within few daies after, Pope LEO died, hauing beene Pope one and twenty yeeres: and in his place was choſen STEPHEN the fourth, who preſently after his election went into France to the Emperour; and finding him in the Citie of Arles, was honorably receiued, and he with very great ceremonies and ſolemnities, crowned and anointed LEVVES Emperor, and then returned to Rome.

The Emperor Lewes crowned by Pope Stephen.

The coronation and ſolemnities being ended, there enſued ſome rebellions in the Dominions of LEVVES; for the Gaſcons, and other people their neighbours, rebelled; for that LEVVES had taken from them their Duke and Gouernor, called SIGVINIVS: for it ſeemeth that then Dukes were made gouernours of Prouinces, and that they for the moſt part, continued their whole life time in their gouernments, or at leaſt a very long time; from whence afterwards came the great houſes of Germany, and other parts: ſome by the Emperors gift; and others by force, making themſelues tyrants; which in proceſſe of time were ratified, and confirmed in their dignities. Theſe aforeſaid gouernements were alſo giuen with the titles of Earledomes, and Marqueſſes, as it appeareth by Hiſtories: For, there was giuen vnto them a marke of land, or land (contained within certaine bounds or markes) to gouerne; ſo as they deriued their titles in ſuch manner as did the Dukes. At this time another king of certaine Ilands in the North ſea, taking part with the King of Denmarke, made warre alſo againſt the Emperour LEVVES: vpon theſe two occaſions LEVVES raiſed new Armies. The matters of Gaſcony were ended in few daies with little difficultie; but the warres with the Danes were more doubtfull, for in the beginning the Saxons and the Imperialiſts had ill ſucceſſe: but at laſt the Emperor prouided ſuch Captaines and Souldiers, as they not onely obtained the victorie, but reſtored red EROALDVS to his kingdome; who liued in ſubiection to the Empire, hauing beene before depriued.

This happened in the third yeere of the raigne of the Emperor LEVVES: in the beginning of which, newes came that Pope STEPHEN was dead, who had been Pope but ſeuen months; whom PASCAL the firſt ſucceeded, and executed his authoritie in the Popedome, without the Emperors confirmation, being thereto vrged by both eſtates of Rome, eccleſiaſticall and ſecular: whereupon he ſent to excuſe himſelfe to the Emperor; for Pope Adrian and the clergie had graunted that preheminence to his father CHARLES the Great, and to his ſucceſſors, which was obſerued vntill this time; which authoritie LEVVES renounced, as it appeareth by the chapter Ego Ludouicus in the diſtinction 63. LEVVES accepted this excuſe, and ordained that from thenceforth the Imperiall authoritie ſhould be obſerued in this manner, viz. that as ſoone as the Pope was choſen, he ſhould giue the Emperor to vnderſtand thereof, as to a friend deuoted to that Church; but not that he ſhould ſtay vntill the Emperor had confirmed his election. Yet notwithſtanding, the Popes afterwards vſed to ſue to the Emperors to approoue their election, vntill the time of LEVVES nephew to his LEVVES, who voluntarily left this cuſtome: which had continued from the time of ADRIAN the ſecond, as ſhall be declared in time and place, if our memorie faile vs not.

Whileſt theſe things paſſed in France, in Germany, and in Italy, LEO (as I haue aboue ſaid) ruling the Empire of Conſtantinople, and through his victorie obtained againſt the King of Bulgaria, liuing ſome ſpace in peace and proſperitie, and highly eſteemed; waxed ſo proud, and therewith ſo ſeuere and cruell to his ſubiects, as he purchaſed their hatred; whereto this was a furtherance, in that he ſought to put downe the images in their Churches, as ſome of his predeceſſors had done. And it afterwards happened that one MICHAEL, a man of meane parentage, whom he had aduanced and preferred to great eſtate, and had placed neere about himſelfe, and then held in priſon, with a reſolution to haue cut off his eares, was of power with the fauour of many men of great reputation which took him out of priſon, and aſſiſted him herein, to murther the Emperor LEO, and to ſeize vpon the Empire; when he had raigned ſeuen yeeres and certaine moneths. He left behinde him foure ſonnes, which afterwards had diuers aduentures; but none of them obtained the Empire. In this manner MICHAEL gat the Empire of Conſtantinople, wherein we will leaue him, to make a concluſion of the hiſtorie of LEVVES the Emperour of the Weſt. And thus it paſſed, that hauing vntill then had good ſucceſſe in his affaires; in the parliament which he lately had commanded to be held in Aken, among other matters, which therein were ordained, one was, that his eldeſt ſonne LOTHARIVS was made his companion in the Empire, and his ſecond ſonne PEPIN King of Aquitania, which containeth Languedoc, Gaſcony, Vienne, and Aniow: and his third ſonne LEVVES was made King of Bauaria: and theſe three brethren preſently tooke vpon them the gouernment of their principalities.

Michael ſucceeded Leo in the Greeke Empire.

The Emperor Lewes made his ſonne Lotharius his companion in the Empire.

But (as nothing in this world is permanent) after this there befell ſome troubles and warres between the Emperors and the Danes, who began to rebell: through which occaſion, by the counſell and perſwaſion of certaine wicked perſons, whereof ſome were prelates, his nephew BERNARD, King of the greateſt part of Italy, rebelled alſo, and denied the dutie of ſuperioritie, which he owed to his vncle LEVVES; and leuying an Army, held the Alpes and the paſſages into Italy, thereby to defend himſelfe. Whereof when the Emperor had aduertiſement, adiudging him in the Parliament for an open enemy, he departed towards Italy, and by the way leuied men of warre: whither when he came he was of ſuch power, that BERNARD durſt not ſtand to his defence, but yeelded himſelfe into the Emperors hands; who after that he had pacified the ſtate of Italy, returned into France, and leading BERNARD with him priſoner, would that his doing ſhould be determined by iuſtice, as ſo great an offence required: and he, was condemned to death, and ſo was executed: others write, he caſt him into priſon and put out his eyes. And LEVVES in BERNARDS place made his ſonne LOTHARIVS king of Italy, whom before he had made CÆSAR, and his companion in the Empire: and he departing thitherwards, at his arrinall was there anointed and crowned by Pope PASCAL. After this little dangerous warre, there followed another againſt the Duke, or Gouernor of little Britainy (a Prouince of France) who alſo rebelled, with the people of that Prouince, intitling himſelfe in ſtile of a King; and not ſubiect to the Emperour; and his courage was ſo great, that he leuied an Armie, and came with him to a battaile, wherein this tyrant whoſe name was VIOMARCHVS was ouerthrowne, but not without great difficultie and effuſion of blood; but the Emperor had the victorie. After which, enſued the death of his wife the Empreſſe called HERNEGOAR, for whom he was exceeding ſorrowfull; but yet he ſhortly after married the ſecond time. After this, the Emperor LEVVES liued two or three yeeres in peace; at the end whereof, a Duke, Gouernor of Hungary, moued with a deſire to raigne, rebelled and began to warre in Auſtria, which in antient time was called the vpper Pannonia, and in Dalmatia and Slauonia likewiſe; againſt whom LEVVES raiſed a great Army, and the tyrant being in ſundry skirmiſhes and battailes ouerthrowne, ſubmitted himſelfe, and the Emperour granted him his life; and ſo thoſe Prouinces remained in peace.

Lewes pacified the tumules in Hungary.

After this, certaine Romanes came to complaine to the Emperor againſt Pope PASCAL, pretending that he had cauſed certaine principall men to be ſlaine, for that they were his followers and deſirous to doe him ſeruice: whereof the Pope excuſed himſelfe by his Ambaſſadors: which the Emperor not only accepted, but much fauored and honored the Papall Sea. And for as much as there aroſe ſundrie doubts and queſtions, which of the Townes and Cities of Italy appertained to the Empire, and which to the Pope; the Emperour LEVVES made a new donation to the Church of Rome, ratifying the charters of his father, and grandfather; which RAPHAEL VOLATERANVS writeth in the third booke of his Geographie, as hauing ſeene the Originall in the Popes library, in the Vaticane; the tenor whereof, as he ſetteth it downe, is as followeth, at whoſe perill I write the ſame.

A new donation to the Church of Rome, made by the Emperor Ludouicus Pius.

In the name of God Almighty, the Father, the Sonne, and the holy-Ghoſt; I LEVVES the Emperor, doe graunt vnto thee PETER the Apoſtle, prince of the Apoſtles, and for thee, to thy Vicar, the Lord PASCAL the higheſt Biſhop, and to his ſucceſſors for euer, the Citie of Rome, with all the jurisdiction thereof, and lands and marches thereabouts, the confines, cities, ports and places vpon the Tuſcane and Mediterranean Sea, Ciuita, Vecchia, Valneo, Reggio, Viterbo, Sauona, Papulonia, Roſello, Perugia, Maturano, Sutri, Nepe, and towards the countrie called Terra di Lauoro, Amenia, Seguia, Settentino, Alano, Patrico, Fruſino, with all the lands and places in their ſubiection, and alſo all the gouernement of the Citty of Rauenna, accordingly as my father the Emperor CHARLES of holy memory, and alſo our grand-father PEPIN, in time paſt granted the ſame to Saint PETER the Apoſtle, that is to ſay, Rauenna, Bonio, Emillia, Europopuli, Forli, Faenza, Imola, Bologna, Ferrara, Comacchio, Adeia, Cernia, and in the Marca, Peſero, Fano, Senigaglia, Ancona, Auſino, Numana, Eſio, Foſſombrone, Feltro, Vrbino, the territory of Valuenſe, Caglio, Luccolo, Ogobio, and alſo in Terra di Lauoro, Aſola, Aquino, Arpino, Theano, Caput, and all the lands therein appertaining to our jurisdiction, to wit, the dukedomes of Beneuent, Salerno, and Calabria the ſuperior and inferior, and that of Naples, of Spoleto, Tuderto, Oricalco, Nurnia, and all that jurisdiction; and alſo the Ilands in the Sea called the inferior, Corſica, Sardegna, and Sicilia. All which lands and Cities, PEPIN our grandfather of holy memory, and afterwards our father CHARLES, by their prerogatiue in writing, gaue and granted by their Ambaſſadors, ATHERIVS and MAYNADVS Abbots, of their owne franke and free will, ſent to Saint PETER and his ſucceſſors, and we alſo doe grant and allow the ſame. Moreouer we will and declare, that the power and authority to chuſe the Pope, is, and ſhall remaine free to the Romane Councell and Colledge, to be made without any ſchiſme or diſcord; and that after that he is choſen and conſecrated, for the preſeruation of loue and friendſhippe between vs, he ſhall ſend his Ambaſſadors to me, and to my ſucceſſors which ſhall be Kings of France, as the cuſtome was in the time of my great grand-father CHARLES MARTELL, and PEPIN my grand-father, and of my father CHARLES, and this our will and grace which we doe, we giue in writing, and confirme with an Oath, and ſend the ſame to Pope PASCAL our Lord, ſubſcribed with our owne hand, by THEODORE the Legate of the Holy Church of Rome. Signed, Ego Ludouicus.

This donation was likewiſe atteſted by the Emperors three ſonnes, tenne Biſhoppes, eight Abbots, fifteene Earles, one Secretary, a chamber-keeper, and a doore-keeper. The which donation the ſame Author VOLATERANVS, affirmeth to haue ſeene confirmed by the Emperor OTHO the third, in the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred ſeuenty and two, in the time of Pope IOHN the twelfth.

Of this donation (although not ſo much at large) mention is made in the Decretall, in the chapter Ego Ludouicus, in the diſtinction 63. In which chapter is expreſſed, the city of Rome, with all that Dukedome, which then contained all the lands, townes and cities vpon the ſea ſide, and the Hauons thereto appertaining, with all the other townes and cities of Tuſcane: but their names are not ſet down, neither the Ilands aboue named.

This

This donation being made, the Pope within fewe daies after died, hauing been Pope eight yeers; and EVGENIVS the Second was choſen, after that there had been a ſchiſm, wherein two were choſen, who were perſwaded by mutuall conſent to renounce their election, and in their ſteed was choſen EVGENIVS, in the yeer of our Lord eight hundred, foure and twenty, and in the eleuenth yeer of the Raign of the Emperor LEVVES. At the ſame time the Emperor with three Armies inuaded Britanny in France, which again rebelled, and with the effuſion of much bloud ſubdued the ſame. In like manner, the yeer following, hee defended the Kingdome of Hungary againſt the King of Bulgaria, which made warre there, and compelled him to ſue for peace. He alſo ſent an Army to the relief of BERNALDVS Earle of Barcelona, againſt the Infidels of Spain, who made cruell warres vpon him. And ſo the Emperor LEVVES liued euer (although not without ſome troubles) in proſperity and with good ſucceſſe.

In the mean time there were no leſſe wars and troubles in the Eaſt Empire, wherein the Emperor MICHAEL raigned; a wicked and misbeleeuing Prince, who held abſurd and wicked opinions, faſting the Saturday with the Iewes, and denying the reſurrection of the dead: and it pleaſed God, that the whole time of his Raign was infeſted with warres and troubles, and the Infidels eclipſed both his honour and Empire. Firſt, he had very dangerous wars with a great Lord called THOMAS; who taking part with LEO, whom MICHAEL had put to death, being in Aſia he drew together much people, and, with the aid of the Infidels, took many Cities; and, coming into Europe againſt the new Emperor MICHAEL, took many cities in Grecia, and beſieged the City of Conſtantinople wherein the Emperor was, and did put him ſo to his ſhifts, that he hardly eſcaped from being either taken or ſlain. But, being thus diſtreſſed and in deſpair, he reſolued to try the laſt and moſt perilous remedy; which was, That he, arming the greateſt number of ſouldiers he could get, ſallied forth, and with ſuch fury aſſailed his aduerſaries vpon the ſudden, that he ſlue a great number of them; in ſuch ſort, that within very fewe daies THOMAS was driuen to raiſe his ſiege, and to retire: And it followed alſo, that his fleet at ſea was ouerthrowne by the Emperors Nauy; ſo as his power euery where began to decay.

Thomas rebelled againſt Michael the Emperor of Grecia.

Shortly after this, the King of Bulgaria came with an Armie to aide the Emperor: whom THOMAS reſolued to encounter, before that he ſhould ioyne with him; and comming to a battaile THOMAS was ouerthrowne, and the Bulgarians returned to their countrie, rich, with the ſpoiles of their victorie. Whereupon the Emperour aduentured to take the field: wherein his force ſo much encreaſed, that THOMAS not daring to fight with him, ſuffered himſelfe to be beſieged in Adrianople; where after many chances of warre, he fell into the Emperors hands, by whoſe commandement he was put to death: and pardoning ſome, and puniſhing others, hee ſubuerted all his enemies, and his people returned to their obedience. Neuertheleſſe, the Infidels in the warres and enterpriſes paſt became ſo hardie, that they euery where inuaded the territories of the Empire, ſpoiling and taking many places: principally there came a great fleet of them into the Iln of Candia, wherein they made great ſlaughter, and obtained a notable victorie by ſea againſt the Imperialiſts. They likewiſe came into the Ile of Sicilia, and took a great part thereof, as IOHANNES MONACVS, BLONDVS, and SABELLICVS do write.

The Bulgarians come to aid the Emperor of Conſtantinople.

Thomas are-bel put to death by the commandement of Michael, Emperor of Conſtantinople.

The Emperor LEVVES was required by Pope GREGORIE the fourth (EVGENIVS being dead, after whom VALENTINIAN was choſen, who enioyed the Papacie but fortie daies, and after his deceaſe this GREGORIE was made Pope) to relieue Sicilia: which LEVVES hauing other occaſions, refuſed; alleaging, that the Emperor MICHAEL ought to defend it, for that Sicilia was of his Empire. By reaſon whereof the ſtate of the Eaſt Empire at that time endured many calamities, and MICHAEL the Emperor of Conſtantinople liuing in great trouble, continued but a while, as hereafter we will declare. And although that for that time the Ile of Sicilia was relieued by the Venetians, who then were very mighty by ſea; yet that had not ſufficed, if a mightie man called BONIFACE, Earle and Gouerner of the Iſle of Corſica, with the aid of a brother of his, and other great men in Italie, had not leuied a good Armie, and ſailing ouer into Africa, made ſo cruell warres in the marches of Carthage, ouerthrowing the Infidels in foure battels, as they were conſtrained to recall their Army from Sicilia (as they did in the time of SCIPIO the Africane, and HANNIBAL of Carthage). By this mean was the Ile of Sicilia freed from the Sarazins: for, conſtrained by this neceſſity, they abandoned what they had gotten, and returned into Africa.

The Emperor LVDOVICVS PIVS liuing in great honour and proſperitie, it pleaſed God to lay ſome affliction vpon him: for his owne ſonnes, vpon whom he had beſtowed kingdomes and prouinces, conſpired againſt him, and began to refuſe to yeeld any obedience; and leuying ſoul-souldiers, raised armies against him. The causes mouing them thereto, or as they falsly pretended, Historians relate diuersly. Some say it was, because he so tenderly loued his young son called CHARLES, whom he had by his second wife, his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS, fearing to be disinherited, sought the ruine of his owne father. Others say it was, for that hee retained into his seruice a valiant Spaniard called BERNARDO DEL CARPIO, nephew to King ALONSO, of whom Spanish Historians write wonders: of whom he made so great account for his valour in the warres, that in all matters of importance he was wholly led by his counsell. Others say, that his wife IVDITH, who was a woman very ill conditioned, onely ruled and bare all the sway with him: so as charging him with these defects, and others as vntrue and vnjust as these, they opposed themselues against their father. Some great Prelates interposed themselues to pacifie so dishonest a controuersie: and, seeking to reconcile them, this milde Emperor loued his sonnes so tenderly, and was so desirous of peace, that, to grace his sonnes, he repudiated his wife (although much against his will); and, bestowing many great rewards vpon BERNARDO DEL CARPIO, hee discharged him. But the true cause was ambition and arrogancy; which increasing in them, this fained agreement endured not long: for, the sonnes, by the consent of certain great men which joyned with them, apprehended their father; and, bereauing him of the robes and ensignes of Emperor and King, and generally of all gouernment & authority, put him into a Monastery: which hee endured with such exceeding great patience, that when (being prisoner) he saw any of them, he neuer vttered any euill speeches; but wild them to take heed, that those their priuate friends and fauourites did not one day deceiue them; and to remember what duty and obedience they ought vnto him being their father. Finally, there passed many treaties about this matter; and he liued one whole yeer deposed, and as a prisoner: at the end whereof, his sonnes acknowledging their error (although some write, against the will of his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS) restored him to his former estate, and hee forgaue them: and as for the rest of their confederates, hee was content in giuing them a very light punishment.

The Emperor Lewes deposed, and put into a Monastery by his sons.

The Emperor LEWES being restored, his second son PEPIN (whom he had made king of Aquitania) deceased, and left one sonne called after his name. This domesticall and ciuill dissension between the Emperor and his sonnes, was very prejudiciall to all Christendome: for, the Sarazins of Africa, being of great power and very mighty, and making small account of MICHAEL the Emperor of Constantinople, seeing the Emperor LEWES to be prisoner, and Italie abandoned, they with an exceeding great Nauy, and a great number of men of warre, cam into Italy, and at their first landing took Ciuita Vecchia; and, dispersing sundry companies of horse and foot into diuerse parts, they spoiled and burnt many Townes in Italie. And, not content therewith, they besieged the City of Rome it self, and battered the same for many daies space; whereby Pope GREGORY the Fourth, and the Inhabitants thereof, were much distressed; and many of them were slain. And although that VINCENTIVS VILVACENSIS, GINARDVS, and some other Historiographers, say, that they entred and took the City, yet it was not so; for, the City defended it self: but they took all the Suburbs called Vaticane, and burned the Church of Saint PETER. Which, coming to the knowledge of GVIDO, an excellent Captain, Marquesse of Lombardy, and Gouerner thereof for the Emperor; being thereto moued by Letters from the Pope, and sundry other considerations, hee raised a great power, and took his way towards Rome: which when the Infidels vnderstood, being loaden with the riches and spoils of Italie, they raised their siege; and, doing all the harm they could, went to Ciuita Vecchia, where they embarked themselues, carrying with them an infinite number of captiues and great wealth, and returned into Africa: and in their way they made what spoile they could in Sicilia.

The Sarazins came into Italie, and besieged Rome.

The Vaticane in Rome taken and sacked by the Sarazins.

At such time as Italy endured this calamity, the Emperor MICHAEL died in Constantinople, when hee had raigned nine yeers; and (as it had not of long time before been seen in that Empire) his sonne THEOPHILVS succeeded him; who although that in conditions hee was a better Emperor than his father, yet was he no better affected to the Pope, nor to the adoring of Images: for which cause hee put many to death. What befell him wee will hereafter briefly declare.

The death of Michael, Emperor of Constantinople.

But returning to the affairs of Italy, which was freed from the danger and oppression of the Infidels; Pope GREGORY the Fourth died, hauing been so aboue fifteen yeers. This Pope instituted the Feast of All Saints, which is celebrated in the Church vnto this day. After the decease of this Pope, a Cardinall called SVVINESFACE was chosen: and for as much as it was a very vnseemely name for so high a dignity, by a generall consent it was changed; and hee was called SERGIVS the Second. This was the cause why it hath been euer since vntill this day held for a custome, that the new chosen Popes leaue their old names, whereby they were called before, and take the name of some of their predecessors. Within few daies after the death of the Pope, in the same moneth LEWES the Emperor of Rome and King of France fell sick and died; so as within the space of foure daies died three the most famous heads of the world, viz. two Emperors, MICHAEL and LEWES; and Pope GREGORY IIII. LEWES before he died, made his yongest and well-beloued son CHARLES, King and Lord of Austria. And LOTHARY, who was Emperor Elect, remained his heire generall of all the rest, excepting Bauaria, whereof his other sonne LEWES was King. And so ended the life and Empire of LVDOVICVS PIVS, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and fortie, when he had raigned full twenty sixe yeeres, and had liued sixty foure yeeres; SERGIVS SVVINESNOVT being then Pope in Rome, and THEOPHILVS sonne of MICHAEL raigning Emperor in Constantinople.

The death of the emperor Lewes.

THE LIFE OF LOTHARIVS, FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND THREE-SCORE AND EIGHTEENTH ROMAN EMPEROR; AND OF THEOPHILVS, Emperour in Constantinople.

AFter the death of LVDOVICVS PIVS, the Westerne Empire descended to his eldest sonne LOTHARIVS: and ioyntly therewith his father left vnto him those kingdoms, which he and his father CHARLES the Great, possessed in France, in Germany, and in Italy, excepting those Prouinces which were giuen to his brothers LEWES and CHARLES, which were Bauiere and Austria, with some others thereto adioyning. As soone as the father was dead, these two sonnes, discontent with their portions, determined to take Armes against their elder brother LOTHARIVS; and LOTHARIVS in like manner pretending all to be his, for that he was the first borne, meant therefore to depose them: whereupon there presently beganne betweene them a very cruell warre, eyther party being ayded by sundrie Dukes and great personages. Some writers affirme, that these two brethren LOTHARIVS and LEWES, who were sonnes of one mother, held together in this warre against CHARLES, who was the Emperors sonne by his second wife. But there is no reason why it should be so: for it seemeth not likely, that CHARLES alone could haue power sufficient to make head against the other two; and also for that LOTHARIVS sought to be Lord of the whole, allowing neither the one nor the other. And it afterwards plainly appeared, approached, that LOTHARIVS in the peace which they made, entred not as a partaker, but as absolute and alone: wherefore I follow the most common and most likely opinion, which is, that LOTHARIVS warned against the other two. LEWES and CHARLES came out of Germany, with many valiant men, against the Emperour LOTHARIVS, who in like manner out of France, Germany and Italy, leuied the greatest and best Army that of long time had been seen: so as all Authors which write thereof affirm, that since the warres between ECIVS and ATTILA, there had not been drawne together in Europe the like number of good men of war. The hatred and enuie between those brethren was so great, that they could not auoid a battell, which was fought neere to a little Town called Fontany: and as the Captains and souldiers of either party were valiant and expert in Arms, the Fight was the more cruell, and one of the most bloudy that hath been seen, and wherein most men were slain, and most bloud spilt; and it lasted a great part of the day; the victory euer shewing it self doubtfull, inclining sometimes to one side, and sometimes to the other, vntill that towards the euening, the Emperor LOTHARIVS his forces, being vnable to endure the fury of their aduersaries, began to faint: wherewith, courage increasing of the one side, and failing on the other, LOTHARIVS and his people were driuen to flee, and LEWES and CHARLES remained with the victory.

Warre between Lotharius and his brethren.

*All those which write of this conflict, affirm, that therein were slain the greatest part of all the Nobility and flowre of the French Nation; and that in number more men died, than in any other that in France hath hapned euer since the battell which was fought between ECIVS and ATTILA, King of the Hunnes, in the fields of Catalonia; as before we haue related. LOTHARIVS escaped thence by flight to the City of Aken; and houlding himself to bee there in no safety, he by sundry waies came to Viene in France, where hee again gathered head, and leuied new forces out of Italy and other parts; and his brethren resolued to pursue him. And notwithstanding that from the Pope came the Archbishop of Rauenna, and many other Prelates voluntarily, to treat of peace between them, yet it auailed not: but LOTHARIVS would the second time try the fortune of the warres, and his brothers sought no lesse; so as they fought: and he was again ouerthrowne (and the Archbishop of Rauenna also with him, who came as an Ambassador of peace), and was that day in LOTHARY his Army with three hundred horse, which he brought with him out of Italy) and, in despite of himself, was constrained to flee, the greatest part of his people being first slain.*

The Nobility of France slain in a battell.

Lotharius ouerthrowne the second time.

After these cruell battels between these brethren (which, as it is to be beleeued, GOD permitted for a punishment, for the contumacie and disobedience which they shewed toward their father) and after they had much diminished their forces, they gaue eare to a peace; and the said Archbishop of Rauenna, and many other Prelates, brought them to an agreement: wherein the Emperor (as a man forced and ouercomn) lost much. The conditions were, that the kingdoms should be diuided between them: which diuision so much decaied the power of France, that it neuer after recouered that greatnes which vntill then it held; the accord was made in this manner: That LEWES should be Lord and King of all that part of the Kingdomes and Prouinces which lie ouer the Rhine, in the East side of France, containing all Germanie; to weet, Hungarie, Bohemia, Moravia, Frisia, Bauaria, Saxonie, Suevia, and all the rest, and should be called King of Germany: And that CHARLES, the youngest brother, should bee called King of France, and should be sole Lord thereof, excepting Galia Narbonensis, now called Prouence: and that those Lands which lie between the Rhine and the Maze (which euer since that time are called Lotharingia or Lorrain, after LOTHARIVS) and part of Burgundie, should bee subject to the Emperor LOTHARIVS, together with Lombardy, and all that part of Italy which was in his subjection; with the title and dignity of Emperor.

The diuision of the kingdome of France, between Lotharius and his brethren.

This peace being made with LOTHARIVS against his will; hee, reinforcing his Troops, took his way towards Italie, and so to Rome: where, after some jealousies between them, Pope SERGIVS crowned him Emperor; and his Sonne was chosen his Successor. Yet some Writers say, that onely his Sonne was crowned: but this in my opinion seems to be most likely. But let vs leaue both the Father and the Sonne (for, in truth LOTHARY was of small power after that he was ouercomn, and yet liued in greater peace than those times permitted) and we will say something of the Emperor of Constantinople, THEOPHILVS, and of the losses which ensued in Christendome by reason of the wars between these three brethren.

Lotharius crowned Emperor by Pope Sergius.

The Greek Emperor THEOPHILVS dissented not from his Predecessors in points of Religion; and, concerning his gouernment, he took very good order, and maintained himself wel in his estate; yet somewhat noted of cruelty. In the East he had great and cruell wars with the Sa-

Sarazins, who made incursions into his Dominions in Asia the lesse: in which warre two Captaines did him especiall seruice: the one was called MANVEL, and the other PHEBVS; the Emperor himself in person went to this warre, wherein the victories were variable, sometimes of his side, and sometimes against him. Being in this manner busied, and our Emperour and the house of France (which then was the only defence and refuge of all Christendome) being weakened and diminished, by reason of the said watres, and dissension which hapned; the Moores of Africa with a great Nauie came into Italie, and into Sicilia, and landing in many places, tooke sundry Townes. Lastly, a mighty King of Africa, called SABRA, with a great fleete of shippes and Gallies entered Italie: And knowing that the Coast neere to Rome was well Garrisoned and fortified, he assailed Otranto, and that place being taken and sackt, he did the like by other Townes on the same Coast: and returning from thence, he sayled into the Adriatique Sea, now called the Gulfe of Venice, and tooke and spoyled many places.

The Emperor of Gracia THEOPHILVS seeking to preuent this danger, sent a good Captaine called THEODOSE, with a great fleete, to which the Venetians ioyned theirs, which they had already rigged for the same purpose, (containing threescore gallies): This Infidell king of the Moores was nothing terrified to come to blowes with THEODOSIVS, but they fought a most cruell battaile, wherein the Christians were ouerthrowne, and the Venetian fleet fell into the hands of their enemies. But THEODOSIVS escaped by flight. The Mahometists became so haughty by reason of this victory: and it caused so great feare in Italie, that if God had not sent relieefe, the Infidels in short space might haue made themselues Lords therof: for presently after this ouerthrow, they assaulted Ancona, tooke it, and burnt it, with sundrie other Townes vpon that Coast. And their power was then so great, that neither the Emperor LOTHARIVS, nor the Pope, were able to make head against them, but contented themselues to keepe and defend what they had in possession: Neither was the Emperours brother CHARLES King of France, able to set any fleete to Sea, or yeelde any relieefe: for the Normanes (a most fierce Nation) made warres vpon him, robbing and harrying his Countries, with whom he fought many battels.

Northmen.

Of these Normanes I finde no antient Authors that make any mention; whereby I conjecture that it was then some new name of the people and Inhabitants of those Countries which rose in that manner: yet SABELLICVS, and NAVCLERVS, and some others affirme, that they came from Denmarke. When all other succors failed, it pleased God to send a remedy: for there hapned so great a Tempest vpon the Sea, that the greatest part of King SARRAS fleet was sunke and cast away: and those which escaped, returned into Africa, torne, and sore weather-beaten: and so Italy for that time was relieued, and restored to liberty: but yet afterwards they againe infested it.

A fleete of the Infidels cast away in a tempest.

At this time died Pope SERGIVS, hauing beene Pope little more then three yeers, and then succeded LEO the fourth, in whose time PLATINA affirmeth this ship-wrack of the Moores Nauie to haue hapned: but most say as I haue written. In the beginning of Pope LEO his papacie, THEOPHILVS Emperour of the Greekes died in Constantinople: who before his death feeling himselfe deadly sick, and that he could not escape, and considering also that he should leaue his sonne MICHAEL very yong; and that THEODOSIVS the Captaine before named, was rich and very mighty, he resolued with himselfe, first to dispatch him out of the world, to the end that he should not vsurpe the Empire when he was dead: which was a very good resolution, and signe of a good Christian in a man so neere his end. First, hee caused him to be detained in his Palace: and feeling his sicknesse so to increase vpon him that he could not liue, he made his head to be striken off, and within few houres after died. After his death, his sonne MICHAEL was made Emperor, and for as much as he was very yong, his Mother THEODORA the Empresse (as heretofore did YRENE Mother of CONSTANTINE) tooke vpon her the gouernment, and ruled the Empire for her Sonne MICHAEL, and not ill, as it is written: but as he increased in yeeres, so there grew in him a desire to gouerne alone, and his Mother became more ambitious: in such manner, that the young man setting all respect apart, compelled his Mother to goe into a cloyster, and so hee remained sole absolute Lord.

The death of the Emperor Theophilus and his good resolution. Michael succeeded his father in the Empire.

Within a little while after, the Emperor LOTHARIVS remaining in Lorraine, and Pope LEO in Reme; the Infidels growne proud by reason of their late victories; and coueting the wealth of Italie, repaired vp the remainder of their fleete, and building other vessels, returned to make a conquest thereof, with greater power and resolution then at the first: And after some spoiles spoiles done in some other places they sayled directly to the port of Ostia, where setting their Army on Land, they marched towards Rome, with an intent to haue taken it, and afterwards all the Countrie: which as they hoped, so the poore Inhabitants feared. But it pleased God they were repulsed, and deceiued in their expectation. Neuertheless, they came and besieged Rome, and gaue a very great assault vnto it: but it was so well prouided and furnished, and those which were therein did so valiantly defend the same, that losing all hope to get it, and vnderstanding that succours were comming; robbing and burning the Vaticane with great cruelty, they raised their siege: first burning and prophaning Saint PETERS Church which was there, and where it standeth at this day. And for as much as the Moores raised their siege from before Rome without taking it, the French writers attribute the honor therof to CHARLES king of France, who (they say) came to relieue it, and for feare of whom the Moores departed; and leauing their attempt against it, setting their Army in order, they took their way towards Naples, burning and spoyling all as they went.

the Moors burnt the Vaticane & Saint Peters Church in Rome

In the meane while, Pope LEO sallying forth of Rome, with the ayde of the Emperour LOTHARY, and his Sonne, whom in his life time he had made his companion in the Empire and in the kingdome of Italie, who sent him great supplies; he raysed a sufficient Army, wherewith he went to seeke his enemies, which laden with great riches and spoils, were come neere to the port of Ostia; where the Pope considering how mighty they were, if they should remain in Italie (as they gaue out they would) and how much the Countrie were ruinated, if they should embarke themselues with their prisoners and riches, and the Emperor staying longer then they would he should haue done, he resolued to vse the sword: and encouraging his souldiers, hee charged his enemies, and fought with them a sharpe and bloudie battaile, wherein many were slaine of eyther partie. But in the end it pleased God that the Christians had the victory: and a great slaughter was made of their enemies, and a great number of Captiues were released, and all that they had taken, recouered, and the greatest part of those which fled, were ouertaken and carried to Rome in great triumph.

A battel fought betweene Pope Leo and the Infidels.

Those which remained in the harbour at Ostia, vnderstanding of this ouerthrow, hoising their sailes, with all the haste they could, returned into their Countrie: And so was Rome freed from the great calamitie and miserable seruitude which it feared. Great was the ioy which was conceiued through all Christendome for this victorie, and the Pope was highly extolled, who speedily returned to Rome: where with the consent of the Citizens he resolu'd to compass in with a wall, all those Suburbs called Vaticane, wherein are Saint PETERS Church, and the Popes Palace, to he end they should no more endure the like, as they now twice had suffered. To the performance whereof, the Emperor LOTHARIVS and his brethren LEVVES king of Germany, and CHARLES the Bauld, King of France, sent much of their Treasure: and the worke began with such expedition, that notwithstanding it was very great, and the walles full of Turrets: yet in the space of fiue yeers it was perfected and fully ended: and so that part was made a Citie, and called Ciuitas Leonina, after the name of Pope LEO.

The victory of Pope Leo.

The yeere following the Emperour LOTHARY went to Rome, to see and speake with the Pope, for that he was falsely informed that he purposed to haue reduced the right title of Emperour to Constantinople, whereof the Pope gaue him full satisfaction: and so contented, the Emperour returned into his Countrie. And seeing himselfe now old, and that his Empire had euer beene vnfortunate, aswell for that he was ouerthrowne and dispossessed by his brethren, as for other accidents in Italie, imputing it to his sinnes, especially for the disobedience and little regard which he had shewed to his Father; he resolued to put himselfe into a religious house, and to leaue his Empire to his Sonnes; and putting it in execution, he made a diuision thereof in this manner: to his eldest Sonne LEVVES, he gaue that which he held in Italie, and to the second, whose name was LOTHARIVS, he gaue the Prouince of Lorraine, and other Lands, which in the diuision were allotted to him in France, and in Germany, about the riuer of Rhine; and to CHARLES his third Sonne, he gaue that part of France, which is called Gallia Narbonensis, and now Prouence and Languedoc, which fell to his share in the peace which he made with his brethren when he was by them ouerthrowne.

The Emperour Lotharius diuided his Empire betweene his three Sonnes.

In these estates aswell as in others were afterwards great alterations, which I haue no time to relate: this done, he became a Monke in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne, in the yeere of our Lord, eight hundred fiftie and six, and so he liued, and within a while died, MICHAEL continuing yet Emperour of Constantinople. And shortly after died Pope LEO the fourth, whom succeeded IOHN an English woman, as Historians affirme; who disguising her selfe in in apparell, and changing her name, being excellently well learned, was chosen Pope, and hauing two yeeres liued in the Papall dignitie, died suddenly in Partus; and her succeeded BENEDICT the third.

THE LIFE OF LEVVES THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND THREESCORE AND NINETEENTH Romane Emperour.

HE haue already said, that the Emperour LOTHARIVS, voluntarily and of his owne free will, imparted to his eldest sonne LEVVES the name and dignity of Romane Emperor; of whose life, and for some time after, Historians haue written very little; and in that little is a great confusion amongst them: which hath put me to much trouble, for that I haue beene so carefull and haue vsed all diligence to write the truth. The difficultie is, in that this LEVVES and his Vncle king of Germany were both of one name, by reason whereof Authors attribute the acts and doings of the one, to the other, being deceiued therein: and which is worst of all, there are some which of the raigne of this Emperour LEVVES write nothing at all, of which BLONDVS is one, notwithstanding that in all the rest he hath shewed great diligence, ending with his father; so as presently after LOTHARIVS, they place CHARLES the Bauld, king of France, whereas to the contrary they should first write the life and raigne of this his sonne LEVVES. But I will follow the most approued Authors, and (in the best manner I shall be able) will bring the truth to light, and will rather choose to say but little, and that certaine, then to please with many forged accidents. In the beginning of the raigne of this LEVVES there happened a very prodigious thing; which was, that in the Citie of Brescia in Lombardy for three daies it rained blood, so fresh and so perfect, as if it had beene of a Bull, or of some other beast lately killed. First of all, this Emperor was very zealous and deuout in Religion; much affected to the Romish Church, and the ministers thereof (for he knew no other) and was very pitifull, milde, sincere, vnspotted, of a good condition, and of his word and promise very just. After the decease of Pope BENEDICT, NICHOLAS the first being chosen, the Emperor went to Rome, to confirme his election; where the Pope and he conuersed together very louingly. It afterwards followed that a great fleete of the Moores of Africa came into Italy: but the Emperor gathered together so good forces against them, that (with small hurt done) they were repulsed: for which his care and diligence he was highly extolled. And notwithstanding that this Prince was so well inclined: yet, ADVLGIVS Duke of Beneuent, rebelled, with Capua, and some other Cities; and denying to be subject vnto him, held for the Emperor of Constantinople. And whereas Italie in times past had been subject to those Emperors, they had now lost it, as being vnable to defend the same; yet Pulia and Calabria were of long time after vnder their gouerment. Against this Duke, the Emperor LEVVES leuied an Armie, and in person went to suppresse the rebellion: But ADVLGIVS being vnable to defend himselfe against him, sent to make his excuse; alleaging, that what was done, was against his will, and that he had purposed to come to his seruice and did so; and LEVVES receiued and pardoned him: and then went to such places as rebelled; which he easily tooke, excepting Capua, which stood vpon defence; but in the end craving pardon, they yeelded. From thence he went to Beneuent, where ADVLGIFVS receiued and lodged him, in outward shew, as his soueraigne Lord, and whom he loued; by whose perswasion and counsell (for he seemed to speake from a loyall heart) the Emperour discharged his Armie, and retained few more then the officers of his house: but within few daies after, ADVLGIFVS (as a disloyall traytor) sought to put in execution what he had projected: and getting together certaine Armed men, he suddenly rusht into the Emperors lodging with intent to haue slaine him; and had done so, but that being perceiued, the Emperour and those few which were with him, so valiantly defended themselues, that they gat out of Beneuent, and went to Rome; from whence by the Popes counsel, he sent such an Armie, that the Traytor was constrained to forsake the Countrie, and to flie into Sardinia: and so LEVVES remained in peace, Emperor in Italie.

In the meane season, whilest he was thus busied in Italy; MICHAEL raigned in Constantinople, in Gracia, and in part of Asia, who deposed his mother from the gouernment: but hee proued careless and vicious, and applied himself onely to feasting, sports on horseback, and other pastimes, his estate and house being ruled by fauourites: and in the warres which he made in Asia against the Infidels, he was twice shamefully ouerthrowne; yet PETRONAS a Captaine of his obtained a noble victorie. In the end, one of his great fauourites, called BASILIVS (a man of base linage and condition, whom he had aduanced to great power and dignitie) killed him by treason, and gat the Empire to himselfe; for alreadie in MICHAELS daies he was made CAESAR. This happened in the 13 yeer of his raigne, and in the yeer of our Lord, eight hundred seuenty and six. Yet the Empire of MICHAEL was fortunate in one thing, which was, that the King of Bulgaria, and many other people which beleeued not in IESVS CHRIST (at the least in such sort as they ought to haue beleeued) in his time were wholly conuerted.

Basilius: slew Michael, and made himselfe Emperor of the East.

In these daies also France escaped not free from warres, betweene CHARLES the Bauld, vncle to this our Emperor LEVVES, and the Normanes; a most fierce nation: neither was LEVVES the King of Germany without warres against other nations, which I am not bound to relate; neither such as hapned in other Kingdoms, but only such as are for our purpose. I say then, that within certain yeers, LOTHARIVS King of Lorraine, brother to the Emperour died; and his Vncle CHARLES King of France, would haue made seisure on Lorraine, and all the other lands which he held; but the Emperor opposed himselfe, and vsed so good meanes, that he tooke possession of all, as heire to his father: whereupon there arose great wars and controuersie between them, which lasted aboue fiue yeeres. Soone after this, the Emperour being in Milan, was taken with an infirmitie, whereof he died: who in my opinion (so farre as I can gather out of Histories, left no sonnes to succeede him: wherefore those which say that CHARLES and LEVVES were his sons, are deceiued; for they were the sons of his Vncle LEVVES, King of Germany and Bauuria: the cause of which error was, for that these two Princes were both of one name; but he that diligently readeth the Histories, shall finde that which I say to be true, and the rest false. I do not produce reasons and conjectures to verifie my opinion, which are to no other purpose, but to weary the Reader, and make the History more obscure: presupposse that I say the truth, and then all is cleere. And to conclude with LEVVES, of whom I haue said little, and that confusedly (for that I could not cleerly discouer any more) I say that he died in the yeer of our Lord 878, when he had raigned 21 yeers; yet some say but 19, at which time IOHN was Pope of Rome, and in Constantinople BASILIVS was Emperor, who although he entred into the Empire as a Tyrant, yet he was no euill prince.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE SECOND SVRNAMED THE BAVLD, AND FOVRESCORE ROMAN EMPEROVR; AND OF BASILIVS, Emperour of Constantinople.

THE death of the Emperour LEVVES was soone knowne and published to the world, as vsually is the death of such Kings and Princes as he was: but his Vncles CHARLES the Bauld, king of France, and LEVVES king of Germany, who were his fathers brethren, had soonest intelligence of which were sonnes to the Emperor LVDOVICVS PIVS, the first of that name: and although they were now old and vnwieldie (for they had beene Kings aboue thirtie yeeres) yet each of them pretended to be Emperor. CHARLES for that hee was King of France seemed to haue the better title, for it was transferred thither in the person of his grandfather: and LEVVES for that he was his elder brother, conceiued as much. But CHARLES vsed greater expedition, and made better prouision, by reason of the neerenesse of France to Italy, being thereto ayded by his owne condition; for he was naturally proud and ambitious: so that with greater celerity then any man would haue thought, he had leuied a great Armie, and passing the Alpes came into Italy, and took his way directly for Rome; but hee sent his Son LEVVES another way, to seise vpon that which the Emperour LEVVES had taken in France, by the death of his brother, which was Austrasia, now called Lorraine. CHARLES being come to Rome, where he had already by messages and letters (and as some say by money and bribes) solicited, and gotten the good will of the Romanes, and of Pope IOHN the eight, or ninth, was presently Crowned by him, and held for Emperour, and in the meane time, his brother LEVVES in Germany failed not to leuy forces to come against him: with a resolution to depriue him of the Empire, and of his life also if he could. But CHARLES hauing settled the affaires of Italy in very good order (ingreat choler against his brother) returned into France, against whom he raised his whole power. They beginning to march, the one against the other, LEVVES was arrested by death, at Franckford; leauing his Dominions, First, diuided betweene his 3 sons, which were vey valiant men, to wit, LEVVES, CARLOMAN, and CHARLES, of which three names, the of-spring of CHARLES the great made great account: which causeth a great confusion and obscuritie in the Historie, if the Reader be not very attentiue. The diuision was made in this manner by the mutuall consent of the three brethren; to LEVVES was giuen Saxony, Turingia, Friseland, and the Prouinces within them contained, and that he should be called King of Ostrofrancia, or East Fraunce. To CARLOMAN, was allotted Bauaria, Austria, Carinthia, Slauonia, Bohemia, and Morauia, with the title of King of Bauaria. To CHARLES befell Sueuia, Franconia, and all the rest of Germany, and some Cities in Lorraine, which had beene vnder his Vncle LOTHARIVS, and hee (as his Father had beene) was called King of Germany. Their Vncle CHARLES the Bauld, Emperor and King of France, being hereof aduertised, making lesse account of the Sonnes, then he had done of the Father, being more proud and ambitious, then hardy and valiant, entred Germany with fifty thousand men, and went as farre as Coleyn; neere whereunto his nephew LEVVES, the new King of East France, stayed for him, with the greatest part of his Fathers Army, assisted by his brothers CARLOMAN, and CHARLES, and other great Dukes and Princes of Germany, first seeking peace: but seeing that the Emperor would not grant the same, he ioyned in battaile with him, which was fought of either side very obstinately. And the Emperor seeing his enemies fight with such resolution, fled from the battaile, and his nephew LEVVES remained with the victorie. In this battell and pursuit, was made great slaughter of the French Nobilitie: And so the Emperor returned into his Countrey, with lesse power, and more dishonor, where he reposed himselfe for a season: his nephewes taking no care further to trouble him.

Baldwin Earle of Flanders, fell in loue with the daughter of Charles the Bauld.

After this, it hapned that one BALDVVIN, then Gouernor or keeper of that Countrey, which now is called the Earledome of Flanders, (and was lately so populous and so well inhabited, and then for the most part was nothing but wood and Forrest, with some few little villages) fell in loue with one of the Emperors daughters; and her father being absent in the wars, he found meanes to conuey her out of the Palace, and so hid himselfe with her in those woods: against whom the Emperor meaning to haue proceeded with all rigour, at the entreaty of many religious persons and of estate, was perswaded to marry him to her; and doing so, gaue him that countrey, with the title of Earle of Flanders: and this BALDVVIN proued to be so excellent a man, and vsed such industrie, that he replenished the Countrie with Inhabitants, which so manured the Land, that within few yeeres it did abound with people and all other things necessarie; And his Sonne ARNVLPHVS, and his successors, vsing the like diligence, it came to be one of the most flourishing countries of the world; of such power is diligence and human industry: this was the beginning of that estate.

The Originall of the Earledom of Flanders.

The Emperour CHARLES being thus in his Kingdome of Fraunce, in the meane time while that he warred with his nephewes, the Moores of Africa, who had a taste of the wealth of Italy, came with a great Army, and made great spoiles in the Marches of Capua, and besieged that Citie: Whereupon Pope IOHN sent to request the Emperour, to come to protect the Lands of the Church, which hee performed with the greatest speede hee could make, for he was very politique, and cunning in the leuying of men of warre; but before his going into Italy, (to satisfie his wiues humour) hee made her brother BOSON, who was also his neere kinsman, King of Prouence. Comming to Rome, the Infidels leauing that coast, tooke another way, which was into Sicilia, which yet was vnder the Empire of Constantinople, whereof BASILIVS was Emperour, of whom we will presently make mention.

The Moores came into Italy and besieged the Citie of Capua.

When LEVVES, CHARLES, and CARLOMAN, knew their Vncle was in Italie, they vnited their forces, with a resolution to goe against him, in reuenge of former injuries. Whereof as soone as the Emperour had intelligence, hee departed from Rome with his forces, to make head against them: But it pleased God to saue him that labour; which was, that comming to Mantoa with his Armie, being now old and decrepit, an infirmity tooke him, whereof he feared not that he should haue died. But a Iew called ZEDECHIAS (which was his Physician) poysoned him, and so he presently died: and his affaires remained confused, and out of order; leauing for his heire in his kingdomes, his Sonne called LVDOVICVS BALBVS, and other three which he had, who also had ill successe: which appertaineth not to my Historie. They called this his sonne BALBVS, for that so in Latine they call him which stuttereth, and cannot pronounce certaine letters, but haue that defect in their speech. At this time in the Empire of Constantinople, raigned BASILIVS before named, who (as I haue said) proued no ill Gouernour, for hee released many of the tributes and other exactions, which his predecessors had formerly imposed vpon the people: and hee defended the Empire with great valour and much discretion, although that in some things hee had ill Ludouicus Balbus, and why so called.

First,

First, against certaine great troupes of Infidels, which came from Alexandria in Egypt, into the Ile of Candia, and had taken many places there, he rigged a Nauie, and sailed thither in person, where he fought, and was ouercome, to the great domage of the Christians: and (by great hap) escaping he returned by flight to Constantinople, but not daunted, neither discouraged, and prepared a new fleete: and to try his fortune with a new Captaine, he sent therewith his wiues Father, whose name was CHRISTOPHER, a man very valiant, and of great experience; who had so good hap, that obtaining the victorie, he cleared that Iland. After this, hee waged other warres in Asia, by his Captaines, against the Infidels, Turkes and Persians: wherein for the most part he had good successe; and lastly, against the Africanes, which for feare of CHARLES the Bauld (as was aboue said) leauing Italy, went into Slauonia, or Dalmatia, and had taken some Townes of BASILIVS his Empire, he sent thither his Army and Nauy; and with the aide of the Venetians, draue them out of those Countries, and recouered what they had taken. And so he raigned with greater honour, and to the better liking and contentment of his Subiects, then many of his Predecessors. At which time the Emperor CHARLES the Bauld died in Mantoa, when he had raigned little more then two yeeres, IOHN the ninth being then Pope. Some Authors say that he raigned a longer time; but the truth is as I haue set downe.

THE LIFE OF LEVVES THE THIRD, SVRNAMED BALBVS, AND FOVRESCORE AND ONE ROMANE EMPEROR; TOGETHER WITH the life of BASILIVS Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE.

IF in the time of CHARLES the Bauld there were warres and troubles for the Empire; there were no lesse after his decease, as the Reader may well obserue by the processe of this historie; wherein, although it seeme that I vse breuitie, for that I waste lesse paper in one then in another, yet, is it not so; for I seeke (as much as I may) to make an euen diuision of this booke betweene the Emperours, whose liues I write. But forasmuch as these Princes of whom I doe now treate, liued but a short time in the Empire, (to obserue an equalitie, and due proportion, as farre as possibly may be) I hold it reason, that the memorie of them be briefe, according to the time of their raigne, and to the end that wee may haue space to write of matters neerer to our time. The Emperor CHARLES being deceased in Mantoa, as is aforesaid, his nephew CHARLES King of Germany, with his brethren, which already had entred Italy against him, stayed with their Army: for the enemy being dead, the warre was ended. His Sonne LEVVES, who liued in France being aduertised of the death of his Father, and how that his Cousins had laid downe their armes: first he endeuoured to settle himselfe in his Fathers Kingdom, and he also sent to entreat Pope IOHN to aide him and to stand his friend in attaining to the Imperiall dignitie.

In the first he found some difficultie, being contradicted by his mother in law the Empresse, who was counselled and assisted by her brother BOSON king of Prouence: but the matter was carried so cunningly, that within few daies he was held and obeyed for King. Now concerning the Empire, he found great difficultie; for CHARLES surnamed the Fat, being king of Germany, besides that he already had some Townes in Italie, had also the good-will of many of the principall men in Rome; so as notwithstanding that Pope IOHN would haue had LEWES king of France to haue beene chosen Emperour, yet he could not effect it: For, they not only denied to accept him, but were so audacious as to lay hands vpon the Pope, to the end that he should not doe it. But he stayed not long in prison, for some of his seruants, either by force or policie, released him, and he in great haste went into France, where he was honorably entertained by the King. Being there (of his owne authority) he intitled LEWES Emperor; and giuing him the Imperiall ensignes, crowned him with great solemnity: and after this, remained one yeere in France; where he called a Councell, and made certaine orders concerning the state of the Church, and created a Bishop for the Countie of Flanders, where there neuer had beene any before, being but lately inhabited. In which time the warres and troubles between the new Emperor, and his cosin germane CHARLES King of Germany ceased not; who was also so called by the will of the Romanes, who were the occasion of a worse inconuenience: for the Moores of Africa (seeing Italy abandoned by the Pope, and that the defence came slow and slenderly) prepared a great Nauie, and did much harme there: whereof Pope IOHN being aduertised, with the aide of CHARLES the Fat, King of Germany, who was also called Emperor, came into Italy; at whose comming the Infidels retired, and the countrie was freed from the great danger wherein it was: The Pope seeing how much Rome and all Italy had been better relieued by CHARLES, then by LEWES, and how much CHARLES was more fauoured by the principall Barons in Italy; and to the end to come to agreement with the said Barons, altring his minde, he approued and confirmed the nomination and election made of CHARLES King of Germany who for his corpulence was surnamed the Fat; and so he anointed and crowned him Emperor; disannulling the coronation of LVDOVICVS BALBVS King of France; for which cause it was thought that great warres and troubles would haue ensued: but by the interceſſion of certaine great personages, a peace was concluded betweene the two Emperors in this manner: That they both should hold the name and title of Emperors, and that the countrie of Lorraine (about which was wont to be great contention) should be equally diuided betweene them, and that for the Empire no warre should be made; but that in all parts peace should be entertained betweene the lands and subiects of the one and of the other partie; and that in Italy (vntill that an equall partition were made) each of them should hold such lands and townes as he then had in possession: and if that the Infidels inuaded the dominion of either of them, the other was bound to aide him with his forces.

This peace being concluded (although doubtfull and fained) the Emperor LEWES died in France, whereof he was King, hauing raigned not fully two yeeres; in all which time he neuer came to Rome, neither into Italy. But for as much as Pope IOHN crowned him in France, and afterwards in Rome disannulled his election and coronation, some Historiographers leaue him out of the catalogue of Emperors. He left when he died two bastard sonnes behinde him, the one called CARLOMAN, and the other LEWES, and his wife great with a sonne, whereof she was afterwards deliuered; which sonne being posthumus (for so doe they cal him which is born after his fathers deceasse) hee left for his heir of the kingdoms of France; wherein grew great discord, warres and miserie about the gouernment and the kingdome; and in the one and other were great alterations and changes, too long to be related: for the bastard sonnes pretended title and right to the Crowne, and so did BOSON King of Prouence. Others would haue the child (wherewith the Empresse was great at the death of the Emperor, who was afterwards called CHARLES the Simple) to be King. The gouernours also tooke vpon them the name of Kings: sometimes one was a King, and sometime another, and each of them made himselfe Lord of what he could get. In these troubles the kingdome endured great calamitie. This Emperor LEWES died in the yeere of our Lord, eight hundred and foureſcore, according to the computation which I hold for most certaine.

THE LIFE OF CHARLES THE THIRD, SVRNAMED THE FAT, AND FOVRESCORE AND SECOND ROMANE EMPEROVR; AND OF BASILIVS and LEO, at that time Empe-rors of Constantinople.

DEceasse of LEWES the Emperor and King of France, the king of Germany, CHARLES the Fat, without any contradiction enioyed the Empire; for in the others life time he had in a manner robbed him of that Majesty, which (as the Reader may well consider) was at that time but only in name; for the authority of CHARLES the Great and his successors, consisted more in letters, and in the Kingdomes which they wonne and possessed (which were the Dominions of Germany and Italy) then in any part of the Empire, whereof there remained Italie onely, and therein the Pope held the greatest part; and the Greeke Empire had euer some share: And that likewise which the Emperours held in Italy, was recouered by the said CHARLES, and by his father; yet the name of Emperor was in the highest degree desired, and the authority and Majesty thereof was very great, and so continueth vntill this day. CHARLES the Fat remaining then sole Emperor in peace, as his vertues deserued, leauing Italy in good order, went into Germany, to take possession of his brother LEWES his Kingdomes; who also at that time died without heires, whose dominion contained Frisland, Saxony, Lorraine, and other prouinces; and he had so good hap, that within short space after, his other brother died also without sonnes or issue: which prouinces were afterwards diuided into sundrie houses and states (in processe of time) by the gifts of the Emperors, and through sundry other accidents, as it plainly appeareth. I say then that he remained Lord of all Germany, and King of Italy.

The next yeere after this, died BASILIVS Emperor of Constantinople of a very extraordinatie death: for riding on hunting (as his custome was) hee was slaine by a Stagge. BASILIVS in his life time had chosen and nominated his eldest sonne LEO for CÆSAR, after the death of his other eldest sonne CONSTANTINE: wherefore when as the father was dead, his sonne LEO was crowned and obeyed for Emperour; and was called the Philosopher, for that he was much inclined to learning: BASILIVS left also another sonne, called ALEXANDER. The Emperor CHARLES hauing good successe in his affaires; and knowing what warres and factions were in France; vnder colour to warre against the Normans which harried the Countrie, he sought (as many others did, and had done) to make himselfe King thereof. Leuying then a mighty Army of Germanes and Italians, he entred France, and went to the City of Paris, which the Normans held beſieged: and, hauing taken all the Countrey, and put the Normans to rout, he was called King of France; the young King CHARLES the Simple, or BONOSVS King of Prouence, hauing no ſufficient power to make head againſt him.

In this warre were many great fights; which, becauſe the Authors handle the ſame ſo confuſedly, I paſſe ouer in ſilence. And the Emperors party became ſo mighty, that he not onely enjoyed the title and name of King, but the Kingdome it ſelf alſo: and to the end, that hee might the better draw the Normans to his ſeruice, he treated with them (after hee had ouerthrowne them) of peace, and gaue their King to wife a kinſwoman of his, which was a Dukes daughter; and aſſigned to him that part of France which lieth beyond the riuer Sein, bordering vpon the Engliſh Sea, which after them is at this day called Normandy, and is a very good Countrey and well inhabited. Yet ſome Hiſtorians ſay, that the Emperor CHARLES did not this, but that CHARLES the Simple afterwards did it when hee came to bee King of France; who at that time was but an Infant, and vnder the gouernment of EVDON: but in my opinion that was too long a time, for they afterwards had warres with him. But howſoeuer it was, the Emperor CHARLES the Fat was Lord of the greateſt and beſt part of France, and was called king thereof, being before that time King of Germany, and Emperor of Italy: and, ſetting all things there in good order, he retired himſelf into Germanie; where being arriued, as the ſtate of his dominion and Empire was grounded vpon but weak foundations, ſo it ſuddenly fell from the height of that Throne. Some alledge the cauſe thereof to be, for that he became fooliſh, proud, and vnfit to gouern: others ſay, that a diſeaſe took him which bereaued him of his ſenſes; which commeth all to one in effect.

The coming of the Normans into Normandy.

Charls the Fat depoſed from the Empire, and Arnolph choſen in his place.

To conclude, the Princes, Dukes and Gouerners of the Prouinces of Germany and France, ſeeing his great inſufficiency and vnaptnes to gouern, reſolued to depriue him of his Empire and Kingdomes: and for as much as he had neuer a ſonne (being, as they write of him, vnapt by nature for generation) by common conſent they nominated and choſe a great and valiant Perſonage, called ARNOLPH, who was by CHARLES aduanced to the Duchies of Bauaria and Carinthia, and (as ſome write) was but of mean parentage, and no way allied to CHARLES: and ſo they account CHARLES the Fat to be the laſt of the linage and bloud of CHARLES the Great. But after ſome, which is the moſt common opinion, ARNOLPH was nephew to CHARLES the Far, baſtard or naturall ſonne to CARLOMAN King of Bauiere; which ſeemeth moſt likely to be true, ſeeing that hee without any gainſaying attained both to the Kingdome and Empire, and was not onely intituled Emperour, but alſo King of Germany: but in France, after ARNOLPH's firſt fury, they made OTHO or EVDES (who was CHARLES the Simples Tutor) King of France; whom CHARLES the Simple afterwards ſucceeded. After this, many great matters enſued, which appertain not to my Hiſtory. And ſo CHARLES the Fat loſt both his Empire and vnderſtanding, when he had raigned nine yeers, in the yeer of our Lord eight hundred fourſcore and nine; and liued afterwards about one yeer, in great penury and miſery.

It is written, that this poor Prince found himſelf at one Inſtant depriued of all meanes, and forſaken of all the world, degraded both of Realm and Empire; hauing ſo ill prouided for his affairs in the time of proſperity, that he found himſelf naked without a houſe where to ſhrowd himſelf from the ſhipwrack of his diſgrace, driuen out of his Palace, and retired into a poor village of Swanbe, where he liued ſome daies in extreme want, without any means or relief; in the end died, not lamented or pitied of any man, in an vnknowne corner, yet noted to be the Theatre where was acted ſuch an extraordinary Tragedie, That one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world is dead, without houſe, without bread, without honour, without pity, and without memory, but to obſerue ſo miſerable an end.

In Conſtantinople yet raigned LEO, not ſo ill as ſome others: for, notwithſtanding that hee was ſomewhat cruell, yet he was a louer of juſtice and equity, and very zealous, and built ſome ſtately Temples. He warred with the Bulgares, and ouercame them, and was ouercomne by them; whoſe death and actions we will declare heerafter: for, he raigned 25 yeers.

THE LIFE OF ARNOLPH, ONLY OF THAT NAME, AND THE FOVRESCORE AND FOVRTH ROMANE EMPEROR; AND OF LEO, Alexander and Conſtantine, Emperors of GRAECIA.

()

IT is already mentioned in what maner ARNOLPH attained to the Empire, who is numbred among the good Emperors: for, he was wiſe and vpright in his gouernment, and had both valour and courage to defend and protect the Empire; yet in his time were great warres. As ſoon as he was Roman Emperor and King of Germany, he had a deſire to make himſelf King of France alſo; and hee fought ſome battels with the Normans: who, vnderſtanding that CHARLES was depriued & dead, rebelled, and made warres in France, wherein he had the victory: but, conſtrained through ſome innouations in Germanie, hee returned thither, and abandoned France; which I omit as a matter impertinent. Being comn into Germany, his firſt buſineſſe was with a certain people in the Prouince of Morauia, called Magarens, which warred in all parts of Germanie; and committed ſuch ſpoils, and put him in ſo great fear, that he ſought to pacifie them rather by policy than by Arms: and to the end they ſhould liue in peace and quiet, he agreed to giue them that countrey to inhabit; ſo as to them was aſſigned the Prouince of Morauia, with part of Bohemia, where it bordereth vpon Hungary, Poland and Sileſia. Yet, neuertheleſſe, this continued but a ſmall time: for, this people, waxing proud of their agreement, with greater preſumption inuaded the countrey: againſt whom ARNOLPH leuied an Army of valiant men at Arms, brought out of Hungary; with which, and his other ordinary forces, he ouerthrew the Morauians in a notable battell, and cutting the greateſt part of them in pieces, the reſt fled and abandoned the countrey: but, it being freed from the Subdued, was much more oppreſſed by the victorious Hungares; who, mutinying for want of their pay, ſacked the Cities and Towns of Germany: and, croſſing ouer the Countrey, without any reſiſtance came into Friſeland, and thence into Gallia Belgica; part whereof at this day is the Earldome of Flanders. Theſe Hungars, as ſome affirm, were of the ſame Countrey of Hungarie; and VICENTIVS in his Mirror, and MARTIN affirm, that they came out of Scythia into that Prouince: but whence-ſoeuer they came, it importports not much; it ſufficeth they all agree, that ARNOLPHVS was much troubled with them, and that they burnt and ſpoiled a great part of Germany: and ARNOLPH did all that was poſſible, and at length conſtrained them to return into Hungary, from whence (as long as he liued) they neuer durſt come thither again.

Whil'ſt

Whil'ſt theſe things paſſed in Germany, Italy eſcaped not free from warres and combuſtions; whereof, the Emperors long abſence was the occaſion: for, he had neuer been there, but went thither being called by Pope FORMOSVS, who was choſen after the death of STEPHEN before mentioned. This FORMOSVS was choſen againſt the will of the greateſt part of the people of Rome, which fauoured a Cardinall called SERGIVS, to whom they had giuen their voices: wherefore the Pope, houlding himſelf greatly injured, went to the Emperor, and was the cauſe of his coming into Italy; of whom before that we enter into any diſcourſe, it ſhall not be amiſſe to ſpeak (after our accuſtomed manner) of the Emperor of Conſtantinople, in the life of LEO the Fift, who (as wee ſaid) at that time held that Empire; wherein ordinarily enſued great accidents: for, the Emperor was euer at contention and variance (in Europe) with the Bulgarians, the Hungars, the Ruſſians, and other Nations; and in Aſia with the Armenians, the Perſians, and other Infidels. But I deſire to be held excuſed in that I write not that Hiſtory at large, ſeeing I am bound to write but of the Emperors of the Weſt onely, who are held for the right Emperors; and of the others to make but a brief relation.

LEO, hauing ended his warre with the Bulgarians, reſolued to warre in Aſia againſt the Infidels, and did ſo; wherein although that many loſſes hapned to either party, yet in the end his Armie (being led by a good Generall) obtained a very notable victory; whereby his name cam to be very famous and renowned: ſo as in theſe actions, and others which I write not, fiue and twenty yeers of his Empire were ſpent: in the end whereof, he died of the Colick. And after his death his brother ALEXANDER was choſen Emperor, notwithſtanding that hee left a ſonne called CONSTANTINE: but, foraſmuch as he was of more yeers and better beloued, the brother had the Empire, and held it thirteen or foureteen moneths: during which time he did nothing that was good; and for abuſing the Ambaſſadors of SIMEON King of Bulgaria, warre was made againſt him. He beſtowed offices and dignities vpon ignoble and baſe perſonages, and in the end was taken with a flux of bloud at the noſe, which neuer left him vntill he left the Empire: and CONSTANTINE, ſonne to his brother LEO, had the Empire; of whom we will ſpeak heerafter: for, this hapned in the time of ARNOLPH, Emperor of the Weſt, whoſe life we now write, which ended (as I ſaid) coming into Italy, in fauour of Pope FORMOSVS, and to recouer ſuch Cities as were therein vſurped by certain Dukes and Earles; between whom and them enſued many battels: and in all Italie were factions and diſſenſions, eſpecially between GVIDO Duke of Spoleto, and BERENGARIVS Duke of Friuli, who were made Dukes by the old Emperor CHARLES; being men of the greateſt account in all the Countrey, he thinking by this means to defend the Country againſt the Lombards and French, and to hould the ſame in ſubjection, hauing ſuch mighty Commanders. But theſe men made themſelues Lords of all they could, and either of them was a great enemie to the other, and fought a great battell; wherein GVIDO was ouerthrowne, and BERENGARIVS had the victory: who, vnderſtanding of the Emperor ARNOLPH's coming, ſought to make a league with him, and offred him his ſeruice; more to ſeek his enemies ruine, than for any ſeruice he meant to doo to the Emperor.

Leo, Emperor of Conſtantinople, died of the Colick, and Alexander ſucceeded him.

Alexander, Emperor of Conſtantinople, died bleeding at the noſe.

ARNOLPH, being comn into Italy with a great Army, fought means to make himſelf Lord of the Countrey, aſſiſted by BERENGARIVS, whoſe Dukedome of Friuli was in his way: he took many places which GVIDO had vſurped, and went to Bergamo; into the caſtle whereof, a certain Earle (one of thoſe which conſpired againſt Pope FORMOSVS) was entred: who, together with others of that City, was there beſieged by the Emperor; who, taking it by force, cauſed him to be hanged. And ſo he puniſhed and did juſtice vpon many others, and redreſſed many injuries and wrongs done in Italy. Afterwards hee went with his Army towards Rome, where the Pope attended his coming: but his aduerſaries were of ſuch power, that, whether the Pope would or not, they put the City in Arms, and (ſhutting their ports) would not receiue the Emperor; whereupon hee beſieged it, which cauſed great tumults and mutinies therein: but in the end the Popes authority, and the fear of the Emperors power, ſo much preuailed, that he was receiued; wherein, by his direction, great puniſhment was inflicted vpon ſuch as could be taken; and the Pope crowned him Emperor with great honour and ſolemnity: and, within fewe daies after, hee departed, with an intent to ruine GVIDO Duke of Spoleto, who was of great power, and thought as well as BERENGARIVS, to haue been King of Italy. Hauing taken ſome Towns, he beſieged his wife in a certain City: the Ducheſſe practiſed with one of the Emperos fauourites to giue the Emperor a certain drink, which ſhee made him beleeue would make him milde and courteous: but as ſoon as he had taken it, he fell into a deep ſleep, ſleepe, which held him ſo long, that they thought he would neuer haue awaked againe; for he ſlept three daies and three nights, and no man could make him to moone: but in the ende hee awoke, and found himſelfe ſo ill, that contenting himſelfe to ſettle the affaires of Italie in the beſt order that he could, he return'd into Germany, hoping in his natiue country to recouer his health. At what time as the Emperor ARNOLPH departed Italie, Pope FORMOSVS died, and after him BONIFACE the ſixt was choſen, who was Pope but twentie ſix daies; and then ſucceeded STEPHEN the ſixt, who was ſo great an enemy to FORMOSVS and to his actions, that when he was Pope, he ſought to diſannullal matters done by him; which was an ill example, and whereof afterwards many euils enſued: for ſome Popes did the like by their predeceſſors, againſt whom they had conceiued diſpleaſure.

The ſucceeding Pope condemned the precedents actions.

This being done, Pope STEPHEN dyed in the third yeer of his papacie, and him ſucceeded ROMANVS, a Spaniard borne, who was Pope but three moneths. And after him came THEODORE the ſecond, who held the chaire but twentie daies, in which time his chiefeſt care was to confirme the doings of FORMOSVS, which STEPHEN had diſannulled; and after his death IOHN the tenth was choſen. While theſe Popes ran in ſuch haſte to death one after another, the Emperor ARNOLPH with his Army went into Germany and out liued them all, and raigned in proſperitie, nothing befalling him worthie memorie; but in the end he was aſſailed with a kinde of ſickneſs, which proued the worſt diſeaſe that could be imagined, and this was an infinit number of lice; wherewith he was ſo tormented and eaten, that he could not be cured thereof, but dyed: this happened in the yeere of our Lord, nine hundred and one, and in the twelfth yeere of his raign. ARNOLPH at his death left behind him three children which he had by his two wiues; by his firſt wife, he had ARNOLPH, whom in his life time he made Duke of Bauiere, and BERNARD Earle of a certaine prouince: and by his ſecond wife he had LEVVES, who afterwards was Emperor; he had another baſe ſonne called ZENEBALDVS, whom in his life time he made Duke of Lorraine; and one daughter called BERTA, married to the Duke of Cleue.

The miſerable death of the Emperor Arnolph.

In the time that ARNOLPH raigned, began the Dukes of Normandie; for the King or captaine of the Normans married the daughter of CHARLES the Simple, king of France, and making himſelf to be Chriſtned, was called ROBERT, whoſe ſonne was the firſt Duke of Normandie. There were alſo Dukes in Burgundie of the houſe of France, which a long time after were called Kings: and in Saxony alſo, and in other parts, as hath been obſerued, and hereafter ſhall appeare in this hiſtorie: for the Kings and Emperorus of thoſe times did vſe to gouerne their cities and prouinces by perpetuall Dukes, ſo as at that time were very great Earles and Dukes, and the Emperors gouerned Milan by an Earle, who was called Earle of Milan; the like they did by other prouinces: whereof it afterwards enſued, that their eſtates became perpetuall, they holding the ſame by inheritance.

At this time the principall Earles of Caſtile, through the many murthers and iniuries committed by DON HORDONIO in that countrey, choſe among themſelues two to be iudges betweene them, and to determine their differences and warres: which were HVNNO HVNNES RASVRA, and LAIN CALVO: after this followed DON ALONSO, the Sonne of DON FRVELA, who became a Monke. And the ſame yeare that the Emperor ARNOLPH dyed, DON RAMIRES raigned: this DON RAMIRES performed great matters againſt the Moores. In France raigned CHARLES the Simple. There were then Kings in England, in Denmarke, in Morauia, in Prouence, in Bulgaria: and in Polonia were Dukes, and ſo were ſtill vntill the time of the Emperor OTHO.

In Conſtantinople (as is aboueſaid) CONSTANTINE the ſonne of LEO, and nephew to the Emperor ALEXANDER, was Emperor, and raigned a long time, for he was Emperor thirtie nine yeeres: whereof fifteene were in the company of the tyrant ROMANVS. In the beginning of his raigne (for that he was a child) hee was gouerned by certaine Princes, and by his mother ZOE, and had ſome warres with the King of the Bulgarians, which he ended with happy ſucceſſe; PHOCAS being Generall of his Army, who was of greateſt account in his Court. Afterwards, through treacherie, his ſouldiers abandoned him, and the Bulgarians became Lords and maſters of the field, ſo as he was conſtrained to buy his peace of them for readie money. After this, in deſpite of himſelfe and of his mother, none which of a pettie Prince, was come to be of great power, was made CÆSAR and his companion in the Empire, and had the ſuperioritie the other fifteene yeeres that he liued, notwithſtanding that they both had the title of Emperors: as we will tell you hereafter.

THE LIFE OF LEVVES THE FOVRTH OF THIS NAME, AND FOVRESCORE AND FOVRTH ROMAN EMperor; And of CONSTANTINE the Second, Emperour of CONSTANTINOPLE; And of the Tyrants in ITALIE.

()

AFter the death of the Emperor ARNOLPH, there was great confusion in the Empire: the Italians and Romans desiring to make one Emperor that should bee to their liking; and the Germanes desiring to do the like, they fell at such variance, that the one party held one for Emperor, and the other part another; so as rightly there was not any. And some Historiographers account none, from these Emperours of which we now write, till the time of OTHO the Second, which was for the space of threescore yeers, little more or lesse; for that none of them were crowned by any Pope. Moreouer, the History is written so confusedly and abruptly, that it can hardly be explained. The worst of all is, that those times were most vnhappy through want and defect of Emperors: for, thereof infinite warres ensued; vices, insolencies and rapines abounded, little justice was executed, learning decaied, vertue was nought set by, charity languished, and the Infidels in many places had the vpper hand; vntill it pleased his diuine Majesty to bring matters to a better estate. I say then, that the German Princes chose, for their King and Roman Emperor, LEVVES the sonne of the Emperor ARNOLPH: but he could not (as soon as he desired) come into Italy; without which they neuer held themselues for Emperors, holding Italie for the seat and originall of the Empire: for, the Hungars in those daies were the most feared and redoubted Nation in the World, and which did greatest harm in Germany and in Italie; for, being freed from the feat of ARNOLPH, they brake the peace made with him, and made warre vpon the new Emperor, LEVVES in Italie; whereof, the chiefest Princes and of greatest power were the aboue named BERENGARIVS Duke of Friuli, and GVIDO Duke of Spoleto; who, of Dukes and Gouerners, became Tyrant-Lords, each of them pretending to be Emperor: but BERENGARIVS, being of great power in Lombardy, put his designes in practice, and vsurped the whole Countrey, and any place else that hee could get, in despite of the Emperor, saying, that Italie was the true seat of the Roman Empire, and that Germanie might rather be said to be the patrimony of CHARLES the Great his Successours, than the Empire. But LEVVES, for that he was the sonne of an Emperor, and descended from CHARLES the Great who restored the Empire, pretended that Germany ought to chuse the Emperor.

Lewes chosen Emperor.

Matters standing in these tearms, the Hungars sallied out of their Country, and beganne to rob and spoil the Countries of Austria and Bauiere, vsing in them extreme cruelty with fire and sword. LEVVES, being a courageous young man, was highly displeased with this their presumption; and, gathering together such troops of souldiers as hee was able, with the aid of his brethren went against them, and neer to the riuer Licus they met; where LEVVES greatly desired to come to blowes with them: which the Hungars and Moraians perceiuing, laid a stratagem for him; for, offering to giue him battell, they retired, till they had drawne him within the danger of an ambush which they had laid in a wood; and there they maintained the Fight to their great aduantage, in regard of the place: but the Fight was so well performed by the Emperors people, that if the Hungars had not been rescued by their ambush, hee had that day obtained a notable victory. But when the aduantage was discouer'd, and that so great a number of men on euery side came rushing out of the wood vpon such a sudden, with so great force vnexpected, the Imperialists began to retire, and afterwards to flee; in such manner, that the victory manifestly appeared on the Hungars side, and the Emperor was driuen to saue himself by flight: after which they did much harm throughout all Germany, the Emperor not being able to resist or make head against them; but was constrained to withdraw himself into the countrie, and secretly to giue great summes of money to the Captains and principall men of the Hungars, to the end they should treat of a peace; and he openly gaue great pay to their men of warre, and promised to allow them yeerly prouision for their houses: by these means he freed his country from that misery for that time; but the peace continued not long.

A battell between the Iewes and the Hungars.

After this exploit; the Emperor, vnderstanding that his base brother ZENEBALDVS gouerned the Country of Lorrain cruelly, and as a Tyrant, he deprived him of that Kingdom, and seised it into his owne hands, and took LVITGVARDA, the daughter of OTHO Duke of Saxony, to wife; which Prouince was then subject to the Empire. In those daies France escaped not free from wars and troubles. The Emperor, thinking hee had settled all matters in peace with the Hungars, saw himself in a new perplexity: for, they not content with the promised pay (which was very duely paid them) a great Armie of them again inuaded Germany; and the Emperor in person went against them, and fought with them twice in the Prouince of Bauiere; and both times had the victorie, although with great losse of men, and with no smalle difficultie and daunger: but not knowing how to execute his victorie, or to follow his good fortune, giuing too much eare to some mens counsell; the Hungars fledde into their countrie, who (in most mens opinions) might haue been wholly ruined and defeated: where they reinforced and refreshed their troupes, and did greater harme in the Empire, then at the first, and were so expert in the warres, and so greatly feared, that crossing through Germany, sacking and burning many towns, amongst which the citie of Basil was one, they passed into Lorraine, which then contained the estates of Flaunders, Brabant, Gelders, Cleue, Treuier, and many other prouinces; in which they executed great cruelty: and with the like furie they returned the same way they went, burning and spoyling what before had escaped; and so they retired themselues into their countrie, loden with riches and spoyles; but fewer in number then they came from thence. This people at that time was growne so proud, and of so great power, that all Nations bordring vpon them stood in feare of them, and did as the rest did: for after the same manner as they had entred Bauiere, they afterwards inuaded Bulgaria, and the Emperors countries of Gracia, sacking and burning his Cities; and constrained the Emperor CONSTANTINE to giue them pay, and ordinary tribute, to be at peace with them; and the Emperor LEVVES was driuen to doe the like, to assure Germany from this raging fire.

Historiographers write, that in those daies were great wars in France and Italy between BERENGARIVS and other Princes, and the like in other parts; and that Princes vsed fraud and treachery one against another: so as a man can write nothing that is good of those times; so much did malice, ambition, pride and cruelty abound.

The Hungars inuaded Italie.

It afterwards followed, that the Hungars, moued with the fame of the wealth and aboundance of all things in Italy, and through the ciuill dissension which was therein (the ordinarie gates by which destruction entreth into any Kingdome) and for that LEVVES withstood them mightily in Germany, they resolued to ransack and make a conquest of Italie: for which attempt they leuied greater forces than at any time before they had done. The fame heerof put all Italy into such a feare, that they chose BERENGARIVS for their Captain and defender, who was called Emperor; but till this time was not held for such. BERENGARIVS then with great diligence and expedition leuied many souldiers both of foot and horse; and, at their coming into Italy, oppos'd himself against the Hungars; and coming to blows, fought a battel with them some Authors say two; wherein being ouerthrowne he fled, and lost therein the greatest part of his Army, and retired himself into the estate of Milan, wherein consisted his greatest strength. The Hungars after this victory were Masters of the Field, and spoiled all the Countrey, taking and ransacking many Cities, and in lesse than one yeer ouerranne all the Land: in which time these Barbarians, moued with the bruit of the riches of the City of Venice, made Barks, Brigandines, and other vessels, therewith to haue attempted it; and so they assailed the City, and took some of those Ilands: but their coming was before-hand suspected, and therfore prouided for; so as although they took some part thereof, yet the Venetians so fortified the rest with strong chains, and some places with wals, that, after some conflicts by sea and by land, they despairing to be able to take the City, returned to Padoa, where they had left the remainder of their Cauallerie and their luggage. BERENGARIVS, seeing by force hee could not deliuer Italie from the Hungars, put that remedy in practice which LEVVES had vsed in Germany; which was, to treat of peace by way of money: whereto the Hungars gaue ear, and it was concluded; and he gaue them a huge summe of gold and siluer, which by the industry of BERENGARIVS was collected from all parts of Italie: wherewith, and with the rest which they had stolne, they departed rich and victorious; which had so good a taste, that it made them come thither again.

Berengarius bought his peace of the Hungars.

The Hungars came the second time into Italie.

The coming of the Hungars into Italy, was in the time of Pope SERGIVS the Third: for, BENEDICT the fourth being dead, of whom it was said that he was a good Bishop (which ought not to be accounted for a small matter, considering how fewe were so in those times) LEO the Fift succeeded, who enjoyed that dignity but forty daies; for, a great Cardinall called CHRISTOPHER, took him prisoner; who within few daies died in prison, and CHRISTOPHER remained Pope tyrannously, and within 7 months (for, violence cannot last) was depriued, and put into a Monastery: and then was SERGIVS the Third chosen, in whose time hapned this calamity through the Hungars. But, returning to our History, I say that the Hungars being retired into their Country, Italie was not therefore free from troubles: for, the Moors of Africa infested the same with their fleets; and for all this, the ciuill factions & discord ceased not betwixt the Princes: for, EDILBERT, Marquesse of Tuscane, who vsurped that Country, being of great power, rebelled against BERENGARIVS; and the Popes authority and power was not such as it had been, neither were they of such force by reason of their insufficiency and little worth, and through the want of the accustomed succours from France, which they had in the time of the successors of CHARLES the Great: which considered, LEVVES was of opinion, that Italy might easily be subdued, & that he might bereaue BERENGARIVS both of the name & dignity of Emperor, which he vsurped. Whereupon with a great Armie hee came into Italie: against whom came BERENGARIVS with a good number of men of warre; and they two fought a battell, wherein BERENGARIVS was ouerthrowne, with little bloudshed, by reason of the small resistance made by his people; and LEVVES went to the City of Verona, neer to which the battell was fought, and lay there like a Conqueror, and as one that stood in fear of no man, and therefore careless: whereupon BERENGARIVS, albeit he was ouercomn, practised with some within the City, and some also of the Emperors owne people, to let him into the City; so as he entred it by night, and took LEVVES prisoner. Others say, that LEVVES had not the victory, but that he withdrew himself into the City for fear: and so in the manner (as I said) he fell into BERENGARIVS power. But howsoeuer it was, BERENGARIVS had him prisoner, and put out his eies, and so within fewe daies through grief and sorrow he died; and BERENGARIVS remained sole Lord of the Empire of Italy.

The difference betwixt authors about the taking of the Emperor Lewes, and his death.

In this manner ended LEVVES his Empire, which he held with so much trouble when hee had raign'd Emperor ful eleuen yeers; and died in the yeer of our Lord nine hundred & twelue, after the Abbot WESPERGENSIS his computation, which I follow: other Authors (of no small authority) as, BLONDVS and CVSPINIAN, recount this after another manner; saying, that this Emperor LEVVES neuer came into Italie, neither was ouerthrown by BERENGARIVS; but that in the end he died of his naturall death in Germany, and that that LEVVES which was ouerthrowne and taken in Verona, was LEVVES the son of BOSON King of Prouence, which came into Italy against BERENGARIVS, proclaiming himselfe Emperor; and that BERENGARIVS released him on his oath that he would come no more thither: which oath he afterwards brake. But in that manner as I haue declared it is written by PLATINA, HENRICVS MVGIVS, NAVCLERVS, IOHANNES VTICVS, Saint ANTHONY, VOLATERANVS, and some others. In this time liued Pope SERGIVS the Third, and in Constantinople CONSTANTINE, and ROMANVS the tyrant, who raigned in despite of him. LEVVES left not any son to succeed him. There befell also in his time great wars & combustions among the Princes of Germany; which was tyrannized somtime by one, and sometime by another, whereby his Empire was weakned, and came to be of lesse power. This was the last Em-

Emperor of the line of CHARLES the Great; yet in the Kingdome of France the succession continued, although within a while after it ended also, and passed to another line, which lasteth vntill this day. And in Spain then flourisht the Flowr of chiualrie against the Infidels, conquering their Countries, and Kings which raigned therein, the Earle FERNANDO GONSALVES.

In Hungarie, TASSON first took vpon him the authority of a King: which Countrey in former time was gouerned by Dukes and sundry other Magistrates, from the time of ATTILA, King of the Hunnes. This TASSON was grandfather to STEPHEN who was canonized for a Saint, and the first confirmed King by the authority of the Emperour FREDERICK.

THE ARGVMENT.

LEwes being dead, there arose a contention betweene the French and the Germanes, about the Empire: for, either of these two Nations pretended to haue a iust title to chuse an Emperor, by reason of their antient authority and custome. But in the end the Germanes, preuailing, would haue chosen Otho Duke of Saxony; who, for that he was already old, and vnfit to gouern the Empire so much troubled, refused the charge, and counselled them to chuse Conrade Duke of Franconia: who, by the consent of the Germanes, and of a good part of the French, being made Emperor, was euer ruled by the counsell of the old Duke Otho: and he dying, left a sonne called Henry, whom Conrade suspected and feared. And taking occasion of warre, he bent his force against him, notwithstanding that his father made such account of him, that he preferred him to the Empire; and onely seeking means to bring him to destruction, took no care how matters went in Italie, which was extremely turmoiled. Conrades brother, fighting a battell with Henrie, was by him ouerthrowne: whereupon Conrade, seeing the losse and the dishonour, reinforced his Armie to be reuenged; and sending Ambassadors to Henry to submit and yeeld himself, they were not heard, neither could they come to any composition of peace. Whilest he was busied in this action, Conrade fell very sore sick: and, knowing his end to be nie, more regarding the good of the Empire, than his owne priuate passion, he chose his enemie Henry for his successor, and commanded his brother to yeeld him obedience; which was a very heroicall deed, and befitting a Christian.

THe time of the Emperor LEVVES was troublesome and tempestuous, and his death caused no calm, but brought greater storms in all estates; for in his time the Imperiall power was diuided into two heads, in Italy, and in Germany, which were, LEVVES and BERENGARIVS: and LEVVES being dead, one alone pretended not, but many, to succeede him both in name and in the dignity of the Empire: France would haue nominated an Emperor, alleaging that sith that the line of CHARLES the Great was ex-extinct in Germany, and that in France the same remained, and that Germany was conquered by the same CHARLES; in right therefore the title of the Empire appertained to his successors, and so it ought to returne to the Crowne of France; for CHARLES the Great had it not with the Empire as he had Italy, but it was giuen to him being King of France, and by that title his successors held the same.

Contention betweene the Germans, Frenchmen and Italians, about the election of the Emperor.

The Princes of Germany denied this, fearing to return vnder the subjection of the French, and stood vpon the possession and authority to chuse the Emperor; alleaging for their reason, that the Empire was transported to the Germanes in the person of CHARLES the Great, and that Germany was the Empire, and not the Kingdome of France, and that they were in possession thereof. The Italians said, that Italie was the antient true seat of the Empire, and that they gaue it to CHARLES, and had authority to giue it vnto any other: and so they called and held BERENGARIVS for Emperor, notwithstanding his competitors. In France, LEVVES, the son of BOSON King of Prouence, challenged the Empire, for that he descended from CHARLES the Great. But the Germanes, who seemed to haue the best right and chiefest authority, and haue so continued (hauing not any that might succeed LEVVES, for he had no sonnes) chose OTHO Duke of Saxony for Emperor, a man of great wisdome and valour: but hee would not accept of that Empire which others so much desired; for, as he was now old, so hee knew that the affaires of the Empire stood in such estate, that they needed a man of greater power, and of longer life than himselfe. The Lords Name bee blessed, that in time of so great ambition, one man was found that refused to be an Emperor.

Otho, duke of Saxony, chosen Emperor, refused the Empire.

OTHO then answerd those which had chosen him Emperor, that he had neither such health nor strength as to be able to gouern the Empire, and therefore would not vndertake a burthen which he was not able to bear: but he would assist them with his best counsell; concluding, that in his opinion CONRADE Duke of Franconia was worthie to be chosen, in whom all the qualities and vertuous conditions did concur, that might seeme requisite in an Emperor: And so by common consent of the Germanes, and part of the French, CONRADE was chosen and obeyed for Emperor, who (as some write) descended from CHARLES the Great. And he presently began to gouerne the Empire, and in all things followed the counsell and aduice of OTHO, by whose meanes he obtained it: and so the first yeer he liued and ruled very happily. But the great Dukes and Princes of Germany waxing enuious, and desirous to raign, ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere rebelled against him, and went into Hungary, and induced the Hungars and their King to warre vpon the new Emperor; whereupon, in the second yeer of his Raign, a sharp and cruell warre began: but, as he was very valiant and expert in Arms, so he drew his forces to an head, and came to a battell with the Hungars, and ouerthrew them, and constrained them to flie into their Countrey; and so freed Germany from that perill. And although afterwards it was sometimes molested, yet by his diligence and courage it was euer defended: and so he maintained the same in peace as long as Duke OTHO liued, vpon whose counsell he chiefly relied, but neuer durst come to make war in Italie.

After the death of OTHO, who left one sonne behinde him called HENRY, who was a very gallant yong man, and of great power, CONRADE began to suspect him; which was the occasion of the troubles which I will relate. BERENGARIVS being held in Italie for Emperor, besides CONRADE who with better title was Emperor in Germanie; LEVVES, the son of BOSON King of Prouence, determined to come into Italie to depriue BERENGARIVS of that Empire; who held it, not without great vexation and trouble; aswell with the Princes of Italie (whereof some rebelled against him) as with the Infidels and Hungars which infested the same. And (as I said before) some Authors write, that this LEVVES came the first time to the same purpose, and was ouerthrown by BERENGARIVS, and this (as I beleeue) was the first; and if it were the second, he came being called by some of BERENGARIVS enemies. And notwithstanding that in the beginning of the wars he had good successe, yet in the end hee was ouerthrowne, and constrained to flee. Thus much shall suffice for him, the matter beeing so doubtfull. Yet heer is some diuersity among Authors; whereof some say, At that time raigned in Italie BERENGARIVS the Second, with the title of Emperor; as his father had done, who was son of the other BERENGARIVS before named, others attribute it to the father alone: but, to the end we may the better vnderstand the matter, we yeeld that this was the second BERENGARIVS, for that we shall hereafter haue occasion to treat of another, which shall be the third.

I say then, that at what time CONRADE was Emperor in Germany, and BERENGARIVS in in Italy, poor Italy (besides domestick & ciuil wars) was afflicted with other far more grieuous & pitifull. This was, for that the Towns which the Greek Empire held in Calabria and Pulia, together with the partialities and factions which were in them, were not in subjection: whereupon CONSTANTINE, who at that time raigned in Constantinople, or (as others say) ROMANVS the Tyrant, which with him gouerned the Empire for a time, procured the ayde of the Moores in Africa, and of the Arabians; of which a great number came into Italy, giuing it out, that they came to helpe the Greekes to recouer their right; vnder colour whereof, they became Lords of all Pulia, Calabria, and the rest which containeth now the kingdome of Naples; and they drew so neere to Rome, that they sought to haue taken the same, without regard of the Emperor of Constantinople, vnder whose name they first came into Italie. The cause of all which miseries, were the warres and troubles betweene the Christians: for CONRADE Emperour of Germany was busied in making warre against HENRY Duke of Saxony, the son of OTHO: BERENGARIVS was perplexed with the wars against LEVVES the son of BOSON king of Prouence, and others which for breuitie I ouerpasse: and another occasion was, the small authority and little worth of the Popes of Rome. But Pope IOHN the eleuenth, whom some call the tenth, seeing this great necessitie, sent to ALBERICVS Marquesse of Tuscane, or (as some Authors say) to his brother, which was the greatest Lord in all Italie (BERENGARIVS excepted) with whose father BERENGARIVS had warre and controuersie; who promised him succour: and gathering all his forces together, with the aide of many others which followed him in that enterprise, he went to Rome, wherein the Pope had already leuyed an indifferent good Armie, which he ioyned with ALBERICVS his forces; and so he marched against his enemies: some write that the Pope in person went to this warre, which had such happy successe, that besides many encounters, ALBERICVS fought one battaile against the whole power of the Moores; wherein, notwithstanding that it was very sharpe and doubtfull, yet in the end he got the victorie; after which he was so absolutely master of the field, that he found not any one to make head against him, and so in short time recouered all that the Moores held in Italie; excepting some little, and certaine fortresses neere to Mount Garganus in Pulia; whither the remainder of those Moores retired themselues: whom for that he then forbare wholly to ruinate (an error for want of forcsight) it was the occasion of many calamities which ensued.

The comming of the Moores into Italy.

ALBERICVS hauing obtained so noble a victorie, and leauing it in such estate, as it seemed an easie matter for any other to haue effected the rest; he returned to Rome, where he was receiued with great pompe and triumph: but within few daies there arose discord and controuersie betweene him and the Pope, each of them attributing to himselfe the honour of that journey: whereupon ALBERICVS went discontented out of the Citie; whereof afterwards ensued great warres and mischiefes: and he was so ouercomn with rage and desire to be reuenged, that as soone as he came into his countrie, he began to practise against the Pope, and to moue the Hungars to warre in Italy, promising them his aide and assistance, thinking it a small matter for him to haue made himselfe Lord of Rome. The Hungars came into Italy, and it pleased God that the greatest harme they did there, was in the said Marquesse ALBERICVS owne countries, and amongst his subjects. In the meane time that Italy was thus oppressed, the Emperour CONRADE (whose life we now write) sought the ruine of HENRY Duke of Saxony, who was the sonne of that OTHO by whose direction and counsell hee was chosen and made Emperour, and was by him gouerned in the beginning of his raigne, as heretofore hath beene shewed.

The principall cause hereof, was the feare and jealousie which he conceiued of him: for this HENRY was a yong man of very great courage and valour, and aboue measure desirous of rule; and in the warres of Hungary had done great seruice to this Emperor CONRADE, and to his predecessor LEVVES, against ARNOLPH Duke of Bauiere, which fled into Hungary, as we haue said: by reason wherof, HENRY was generally so much beloued and esteemed, that CONRADE stood in feare to be dispossest by him of his Empire, and that he would haue rebelled against him, and therfore he resolued (if he might) to make him away: first practising his death by fraud and cunning; and that taking no effect, he resolued not to dissemble any longer, but sent his brother EBERARD with an Army to destroy his countrie, and if he might to bereaue him of his life: for which fact he became infamous, and all his actions were attributed to incomparable ingratitude: but his passion was such as he neuertheles continued his intended course. But HENRY gouerned himselfe so discreetely, and had already leuied such an Army of Saxons, which were his subiects and friends, that he met with EBERARD in the field, and gaue him battaile; wherein his people behaued themselues so valiantly, that the Emperors brother was ouerthrowne, with the losse of the greatest part of his Army; and himself escaped by flight. CONRADE being aduertised hereof (in extreme choler) raised the greatest power he could make, and called all the Princes against HENRY, first sending Ambassadors vnto him, to perswade him to yeeld to his mercie, and not to persuere in his contumacie; who concluded nothing: but returning, they reported that in their presence one of Duke HENRIES captaines, whose name was DIEMATE, said, that the Duke had no reason to come to any agreement; for he knew that thirtie legions of souldiers were comming to his aide. These words strake such a feare into the Emperors Army, that without any battaile, or fight of any enemie, the greatest part thereof disbanded; whereupon hee was driuen to retire, with a determination to returne with greater force. But God, in whose hand are the hearts of Princes, in very short time altred his purposes; for CONRADE was assailed with an extreme sicknes, whereof he afterwards died. And knowing that his end drew neere, he in great haste sent for the Princes of the Empire; the principall of which at that time were BVCARD Duke of Sueuia, SIGISBERT Duke of Lorraine, and his brother EBERARD, whom he had made King of Franconia, and many others, excepting ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere, who remained in Hungarie, and HENRY Duke of Saxonie which rebelled. These Princes being in this manner assembled, the Emperor, as a wise man and a good Christian, hauing more regard to the good gouernment of the Empire, than to his owne choler or priuate passion (which is an extraordinary example) made vnto them a very fet speech; wherein in conclusion he exhorted and counselled them, that after his decease (which, so farre as he could comprehend, would be shortly) they should chuse the same HENRY Duke of Saxony (who then was in his disgrace) for Emperor: for, notwithstanding that he had a brother whom he loued very well, and was worthy of great estate, yet he neuertheless chose HENRY, as onely worthy to be an Emperor, and his successor; for, as he very well knew, he was an excellent man, and endued with vertue, and with all the conditions which were requisite in a good Prince; and that he pardoned and restored him to his grace and fauour, and that this was his last will, counsell and resolution. The Noble minde and counsell of the Emperor was generally commended; only his brother EBERARD shewed himselfe grieued and discontented: but CONRADE perswaded him to patience, and recommended to them all, peace and concord. Then he made the Sword, the Scepter, the Robe, and the other Imperial ensignes to be brought before him: and by the consent of all the Princes, he appointed and charged his brother to carrie the same to HENRY, and in his name to make his peace and friendship with him, and to yeeld him obedience as to his soueraigne Lord: which he performed, and continued in HENRIES good grace and loue so long as hee held the Empire; which truly was a most noble part of both these brethren: of the Emperor, in making choise of his enemie for his successor; and of his brother, in voluntarily obeying him which was chosen. This his good resolution being concluded, and put in execution, within few daies after CONRADE departed out of this life, leauing neither sonne nor daughter; when he had raigned only seuen yeeres or somewhat lesse, in the yeer of our Lord, 920; CONSTANTINE yet holding the Empire of Constantinople. In Italy raigned BERENGARIVS with the title of Emperor, notwithstanding that he held no part thereof, but Lombardy onely, and some cities neer thereunto adioyning, and those not without wars and troubles, with LEVVES son to the King of Prouence. The state of Italy being such as I said, the Hungars inuaded it, being cald thither by ALBERICVS Marquess of Tuscane, and ruined the countrie: and on the other side the Moores of Africa salying out of such places as they held in Pulia, troubled the state of the Church of Rome, and the frontiers thereof. And betwixt ALBERICVS and the Romans was war and discord.

The hearts of Kings are in the hands of God.

Conrade chose his enemie Henry for his successor in the Empire.

The death of the Emperor Conrade.

Forasmuch as in the life of this Emperour CONRADE, mention was made of ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere, and for that heretofore this prouince hath been treated of, as of a kingdome, and so it is said, that LEVVES King of Germany, in the diuision made betweene his three sonnes, made CARLOMAN King of Bauiere, and now we call ARNOLD, Duke thereof, which seemeth to be a contradiction: let the Reader therefore know, that in this prouince (as in all others) there haue been great alterations: the last was, that after the said CHARLES, the Emperor ARNOLPH succeeded in the state of Bauiere, and after ARNOLPH the Emperour LEVVES; who dying without issue, made this ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere: and afterwards in processe of time, in this Kingdome happened many alterations and changes, and in the end it ioyned with the state of the Countie Palatine of Rhine: and afterwards it was againe diuided; and so through sundrie accidents, it came to that estate wherein it is at this day. THE

THE LIFE OF HENRY, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, AND THE FOVRESCORE AND SIXT ROMANE EMPEROR; AND OF CONSTANTINE Emperor of Græcia: And of those which in his time were called Emperours.

THE ARGVMENT.

HEnry being chosen Emperor, first he applied himselfe to pacifie the troubles of Germany, which were very tumultuous; but aboue all, to assure the high-waies from theeues, growne by reason of the warres; and to maintaine iustice. There arose against him one Arnold, who liued in Hungary as a banished man; and each of them hauing leuied a great Army, and being in a manner ready to haue come to the shock, Henry called Arnold to a parley, and knew so well how to perswade him, that he ouercame him with words, which peraduenture he should not haue done by Armes; and Arnold became his obedient subiect. He tooke truce with the Hungars, and subdued the Slauonians: but the time of the truce being expired betweene him and the Hungars, and new occasions of warre arising, they came in the end to fight; where the Emperor obtained so great a victory, that all the Princes of Christendome sent to reioyce with him for the same. This good Emperour had set his minde vpon the affaires of Italy, and purposed to haue freed the Church from Hugh, and other Tyrants: but God, who had otherwise determined, when he was providing for his iourney, visited him with a mortall infirmity; and he knowing his life to be neere to an end, ordained, by the consent of all the Princes, his eldest sonne Otho for his successor, hauing raigned seuentеene yeeres, and liued sixtie.

THE election which the Emperour CONRADE before his decease made of HENRY Duke of Saxony, naming him Emperor and his successor, is to be thought to haue beene done by Gods inspiration; for he prooued a good Prince, and worthy the Imperiall majesty. As soone then as CONRADE was deceased, all the States receiued him for their Emperor, and did him homage, calling him HENRY AVCEPS, that is to say, the Faulconer, for that he tooke great pleasure in Hawking; and when the newes was brought him that hee was chosen Emperor, he was found busie in that exercise, which he vsed at times of leasure for his recreation, without omitting any care for his businesse. He then taking vpon him the gouernment of the Empire, applied himselfe to doe iustice, with a desire seuerely to punish the wicked; chiefly those which robbed by the high waies side, to the end that men might passe in safety, which by reason of the warres had done much harme.

The Emperour Henry called Henricus Auceps.

He gaue himselfe also to pacifie all discord and dissension, and to establish peace and concord betweene the Princes, who for matters past were at variance amongst themselues: for all which he prouided a good remedie, employing his wit, authoritie and power; and being obeyed by all men, excepting BVCCARD Duke of Sueuia, who with the fauour of France (for that he was sonne in law to the Duke of Burgundy) attempted some innouations: against whom the Emperour raised forces; but the matter was pacified, and the Duke acknowledged the Emperour for his Lord and Superior. Besides this, it happened (which some report before this time) that ARNOLD Duke of Bauiere, which (as we said) for feare of CONRADE, liued as an exile in Hungary, returned to his Countrie, and gathering together a great number of Hungars, was so hardy as to call himselfe Emperour, and to deny his obedience to the Emperour HENRY; which he vnderstanding, leuying his old subiects of Saxony, and others of the Empire, went with a mighty Army against ARNOLD, who likewise marched towards him; and as a good Christian, being much grieued for the troubles which were likely to haue ensued, forbare not to procure ARNOLD to giue ouer his attempt: and it pleased God that his good desire tooke effect in this manner:

Both the Armies being in a readinesse to fight, notwithstanding it was apparant that the Emperour had the greater number, and better and more choise men; yet he sent ARNOLD word by a Trumpet, that he, vpon sufficient securitie, should come and speake with him; which ARNOLD performed: where the Emperor, among many graue, good, and discreete speeches, spake vnto him in these words:

Speeches vsed by Henry to Arnold.

Take heede ARNOLD, and consider that what thou doest, is to oppose thy selfe against Gods ordinance, who is the giuer of kingdomes and worldly power: Thou maist know that I was chosen of him by the mouth of my predecessor CONRADE, before his death; and that to this election haue consented all the estates of Germany, and thou onely seekest to resist the will of God, and the generall consent of all men. I say vnto thee, take heede what thou doest, and I aduise thee to come to my obedience, and I will vse thee as my sonne or my brother: and if thou wilt not doe this, I take God for iudge betweene thee and me. And one thing I will sweare and assure thee, that if it had pleased his diuine Maiestie that thou haddest been chosen Emperor as I am, I would haue been an obedient subiect, and haue serued thee faithfully: wherefore I pray thee, that sith I am so, thou wilt do the like by mee. Thou mayest see that I intreat thee for peace, at such time as my party hath the aduantage in the warres; consider well what thou doest, for I will not faile in any thing, that I haue promised. These and such like speeches were of such force, and so much moued ARNOLD, that he presently submitted himselfe and his countrey vnto the Emperor HENRY, and from thenceforth was euer most obedient vnto him, without any remembrance of matters past. There happened likewise discord betweene HENRY and the house and kingdome of France, about the soueraignty of the prouince and Duchie of Lorraine; neuertheless comming to a peace and agreement, matters passed prosperously, and he continued Lord thereof. And so Germany (by meanes of his good gouernment) took a taste of the fruites which Iustice and the tranquillity of peace bring forth. But in Italy notwithstanding that BERENGARIVS was called Emperor, the want of such a Prince as HENRY, wrought the contrary: it shall not be amisse therefore to speake of what followed, while that HENRY was busie about these matters.

Arnold submitted himselfe to Henry.

It is already said, how that betweene Pope IOHN and the Romanes of the one side, and ALBERICVS Marquesse of Tuscane of the other, were great warres, after the victory obtained against the Infidels; and how that ALBERICVS had induced the Hungars to come into Italy against the citie of Rome, and that the greatest harme they did, was in his owne countreys, God permitting it as a punishment for his wickednesse; yet they did great spoiles in the Church lands. The Hungars hauing in this maner robbed the countrey, BERENGARIVS who was called Emperor, came to a composition with them; which was, that they should depart out of Italy, in consideration of a great summe of money which was giuen them. And Pope IOHN and the Romanes (in reuenge of the iniurie receiued from ALBERICVS) leuied an Army, which was broken and ouerthrowne by the Hungars, the Duke of Spoleto being Generall of that Army; and ALBERICVS was besieged in a towne of his called Ortano, and was therein taken and slaine.

At the same time the Infidels which remained in Pulia leuying new forces and supplies renewed the warres, which was not foreseene in time by reason of the domesticall discord, and they took many castles and cities, while the Pope applied himselfe to be reuenged of ALBERICVS;

RICVS; and their power so much encreased that the people voluntarily yeelded themselues, by reason of the small relieue which they had from the Emperor of Constantinople, in whose dominion the greatest part of those countries was, or from BERENGARIVS, or from the Pope, vntil that feare seised Rome: wherein making a certaine Earle called GVIDO their General, they leuied a good Army, and it pleased God to giue him the victory, and he made the Moors to retire themselues into those holds which they held before the bringing in of this second war, and so the citie was freed from that feare. But this braue and glorious exploite Earle GVIDO afterwards blemished with the foulest fact that can bee spoken, and such a one as my members tremble to heare it, and my hand to write it. For this Earl GVIDO afterwards comming to Rome, with a resolution to make himselfe Lord thereof, he seised on the Pope and slew him, and made another Pope; but his purpose tooke no effect: for he whom he made Pope was presently deposed, and LEO the sixt chosen, who was Pope but seuen moneths; and him succeeded STEPHEN the seuenth.

Pope Iohn the twelfth taken prisoner, and slaine by the Earle Guido.

Whilest these matters passed in Rome and the marches thereof, BERENGARIVS the Emperor (whom we may call Italian) liued not free from troubles; for through the instigation of certaine Italian Lords, RODVLPH Duke of Burgundy with a great Armie came into Italy, with the title of Emperor, where he found so many friends (especially in Lombardy) that in very short space hee dispossest BERENGARIVS, and was made Emperour and King of Italy; and BERENGARIVS fled into Hungary, thinking there to haue found relefe: where, as saith BLONDVS and some others, he died, and that BERENGARIVS the nephew of the first BERENGARIVS, was he which came afterwards, as shall be specified. Some write that he died in Italy, slaine by the treason of Count FLAMBERT, who was his gossip: But howsoeuer, he died depriued of his dignity: and he of whom we are to treat, was nephew to the first BERENGARIVS, the sonne of his daughter, and of a Marquesse, which was his sonne in Law. I write thus much for that there is a great confusion among st Authors about these BERENGARII tyrant Emperors, for that they all were of one name. RODVLPH remaining with the victory in Italy was called Emperor, and held his Empire there the space of three yeers in prosperity: In which time the Emperor HENRY in Germany ouerthrew and repelled the Hungars, which after their departure out of Italy went into Germany, wherein they did much harme: But (as I say) the Emperour put them to rout, and chased them thence, and taking their Generall prisoner, constrained them to sue to him, and to make peace for ten yeres; hee restoring to them their Generall without ransom, yet they offred a great summe of mony for him. RODVLPHVS hauing raigned three yeeres in Italy, the Hungars whose ordinary qualitie was to spoile their neighbours and other Prouinces, solicited therto by BERENGARIVS the nephew, vnder the conduct of a great man called FALARDVS, came into Italy, and encamped before Pauia, which they besieged: for relefe whereof RODVLPHVS made so small prouision, that the inhabitants of the countrey discontented with his gouernment, conspired against him, and slew his father-in-law BOCARD Duke of Saxony, who came to see Milan; and then they called and solicited HVGH Duke of Arles, a French-man, to come to their defence, promising to receiue him for their King and Lord, and to make him Emperor; which he accepted, notwithstanding his necrenesse in blood to RODVLPH: and he came with so many good men of warre, and with such fauour of the Italians, that none of his enemies durst encounter him: and RODVLPH leauing Italy, returned into Burgundie, where he afterwards had such successe, that he was for a space King of France; and HVGH continued in Italy, and subdued a greater part ther of then any of the other tyrants had done, banishing such as he suspected, and rewarding his friends: he procured peace and friendship with the Emperor HENRY; which he granted, thereby to settle peace in Germany with the Hungars, and with other nations and Princes. And he afterwards preuailed against ARNOLPH Duke of Bauiere: So that HVGO was a greater Lord and of greater power then any of long time had been in Italy; where leauing him vntill his turne, we will returne to our Emperor HENRY.

The comming of the Hungars into Italie.

The comming of Hugh Duke of Orleans into Italie.

HENRY hauing ouerthrowne the Hungars, and made peace with them for nine or ten yeres, as an ambitious Prince, and desirous to enlarge his Empire, after that he had taken care for the establishment of peace and iustice, and for the good gouernment thereof, hee leuied an Armie, and sent the same into the countries of Slauonia and Dalmatia, from which he had been annoyed and endamaged: and ouerthrowing the inhabitants thereof in battaile, he took many townes in those Prouinces, and doing therin great harme; victorious and loden with spoiles, he ioyfully returned into Germany. The next yeere after this victorie (which was the tenth yeere of his raigne) raigne) he marched with his power against the Bohemians and WENCESLAVS their Duke, for that many of them held not the true faith, and also for that they refused to be subject to the Empire, and against him had assisted the Hungars: Wherein hee shewed such valour, that ouerthrowing the Duke, he tooke Prague, which is the chiefe Citie thereof, and brought that kingdome into such subjection, as was the rest of Germany, and so it continued all this Dukes life time.

Henry brought the Bohemians into subiection.

This warre being thus happily ended, another followed, which was against the Danes, who with a mightie Nauie came into Friseland, and into Saxonie, and tooke certaine Townes there; but he made them to flie out of all that countrie, to their great losse: and hee also ouerthrew those of Norway, which then were called Abroditi. HENRY hauing obtained so great and so many victories, the time of the peace with the Hungars being expired, they presently sent their Ambassadors to him, to require certain pay granted to their Ancestors, at what time as peace was made with them; whereto HENRY gaue no good answere; for he accounted it a matter vnworthy the Majestie of an Emperour, to pay tribute for peace: wherewith the Hungars were so much incensed, that with their Duke or Captaine (for at that time they had not the dignitie of a King) they issued out of their confines with the most flourishing Army that euer they had, and beganne to warre with greater fury and cruelty, then euer they had done at any time before, and neuer stayed vntill they came into Saxony, and into other places which were the Emperour HENRIES Patrimony, where they did much harme, and shewed great cruelty; which was done so suddenly, that HENRY in the beginning could not preuent it: But in short space he leuied a great Army; and notwithstanding that he was extreamely sick, yet neither the Princes, nor his Physicians could stay him, but that he would goe with his Army: and encountring the Hungars (being so weake that he could hardly sit his Horse) hee offered them battaile, which they refused not; where the Emperour, although with a weake and low voice, made a speech to his souldiers, which did so much encourage them, that they presently charged with such force, and the Hungars (being a most valiant Nation) fought with such eagernesse and fury, that it was one of the most bloody and cruell battels of the world: But in the end the valiant courage of the Emperour HENRY so much preuailed, that he obtained the victory, and slew an infinite number of the Hungars, and many of them were likewise slaine vpon the way as they fled; and those which suruiued, fled scattered into their countrie; from whence they neuer after returned as long as the Emperour HENRY liued. He wan so great reputation and glory by this victory, that all the Princes Christian, sent their Ambassadours to him, to congratulate, and to desire his friendshippe: But with the greatest instance came Ambassadours from HVGH, who in Italie was called Emperour. HENRY was likewise called by his subjects, semper Augustus, Pater Patriæ, and other antient names and titles of honour; and he as a good Christian gaue thankes to God; and the tribute which at other times he had payed to the Hungars, he made to be distributed among the poore, and so did other good deedes, and ruled the Empire in such manner that Germany enjoyed both peace and justice, which are two blessings which make mighty and rich kingdomes.

The Emperor Henry his victory against the Hungars.

Italy in the meane time endured warre and miserie; for the Empire of HVGH which last raigned, being turmoyled with warre and discord, was neither firme nor good, but Tyrannicall and violent: by reason whereof the Infidels which in Pulia held certaine Townes and fortresses, made ordinary incursions vpon their neighbours. And at that time a mighty Nauie of Moores came out of Africa, vpon the coast of Genoa and of Tuscane; and taking land did great harme, spoiling many places, amongst which they besieged the Citie of Genoa: and the multitude and force of the Infidels was so great, that notwithstanding that the besieged fought very valiantly, yet they entred it by force; all the Genowaies comming first to the fight in defence of thire Citie.

Genoa besieged and taken by the Moores.

After that the Infidels had entred it, they put all those to the sword which were able to beare Armes; and spoyling and sacking it, left nothing therein that was worth the carriage: and all boyes, women and children they tooke prisoners, and carried aboord their shippes and gallies, which they led away with them; and so left Genoa desolate and without any inhabitants: yet some prisoners were soone released, and some were taken in their fleetes at Sea, and elsewhere, which reinhabited the Citie: neuerthelesse it was long before it could recouer it selfe of this calamitie: And some write that the Infidels horse troupes were taken vpon the way, and that the prisoners were not carried into Africa.

The Emperor vnderstanding hereof, and being well enformed of the state of Italy, and that setting setting aside that which the Church held by so many titles and donations, all the remainder of that Westerne Empire, excepting some Townes in Pulia, was held by the Greekes, he therfore resolued to goe thither in person with a mighty Army, to free Italy from the yoke of HVGH, and of other Tyrants; and to reforme and reduce the same to such order as it ought to hold, and as he had established in Germany. And beginning to make preparation for his journey, and hauing mustered vp his men of war, it pleased God to dispose thereof after another manner; for he was taken with a most deadly infirmity; and knowing that his end drew neer, vsing such diligence as a good Christian ought to doe, he gaue order that all the Princes (if possibly it might be) might be assembled; with whose good will and consent he ordained his son OTHO (whom he had by his wife MAVD) Emperor and his successor: and his sicknesse increasing, within few daies after he yeelded his soule to God, being of the age of threescore yeers, in the seuenteenth yeere of his raigne, and in the yeere of our Lord, 937. He left two other sons beside OTHO the one was called, by his name, HENRY, who was afterwards Duke of Bauiere (for ARNOLDS sonnes were depriued of that estate) he being married to his daughter IVDITH; and one other sonne called BRVNVS, who was Archbishoppe of Colein; and he had one daughter whose name was GERBIRGA, who was married to a Duke; and another called ADALCIDA, which was married in Africa to Count Paris; and another called MAVD which was a Nunne.

The death of the Emperour Henry.

In Constantinople ended the Empire of CONSTANTINE, when he had raigned eight and thirtie yeers, in company with the Tyrant ROMANVS; and part (as I said) alone; in which time he had great conflicts in the Easterne parts, with the Infidels in Asia, and with the Bulgarians in Europe; amongst which he wonne one battaile by Sea against the king of Russia, wherein were aboue a thousand saile of shippes, which came to the coast of Constantinople, by the Sea called Euxinum; and other great accidents hapned too long to relate: At the end whereof he died, leauing his Empire to his son, which after his Grandfathers name was called ROMANVS; for CONSTANTINE had to wife the daughter of the other ROMANVS which was the Tyrant, of wom I haue already made mention.

The death of Constantine Emperor of Constantinople.

This CONSTANTINE was a good Prince, very deuout, and excellently well learned in Humanitie.

THE LIFE OF OTHO, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, AND FOVRSCORE & SEVENTH ROMANE Emperour. And of ROMANVS, and the rest which were Emperours in Grecia.

THE ARGVMENT.

THo succeeding in the Empire, was much troubled; for not only the Princes of Germany, but euen his owne brethren and kinsemen made warre against him, and fought bloudy battailes with him: of which, after long troubles he had honourable victories? He also freed his brother in law Lewes king of France from certaine Dukes which oppressed him. Hee was by the Pope called into Italie against Berengarius; and consuming with a great Armie, forced him to flye. Afterwards his sonne, and one Conrade his sonne in lawe, whom he had left for the defence of Italie, rebelling against him, and in the end the sonne comming to a battaile with the father (a thing more beseeming Turkes and Infidels then Christians) was the loser, and his fathers prisoner; who seeing with how great humility, and with how many teares he sued for his life and pardon, he restored him at length to his grace: and 937
